by a painter and mosaicist of the greatest skill and power in the 16th century. However, the use of the quadruple symbols is universal, in east and west, and throughout the Christian world, in every kind of situation, and by use of all vehicles and methods. They are very frequently placed on crosses of the 7th century, about the same time as that in which the change took place from the lamb at the intersection of the limbs of the cross to the human form crucified. They occur on the cross of Velitrae, and on some ancient German crosses mentioned under CRUCIFIX, as the station cross of Planig, &c. But the most interesting 6th century representation of them known to us is the quaintly but most grandly-conceived tetramorph of the Rabula MS., which represents the Lord at the ascension, mounting a chariot of many wings and cherubic form. It shows that the Syrian miniaturist had a most vivid imagination, and the highest power of realising his conceptions, as appears in so many parts of that extraordinary work. The wheels of the chariot, as well as the cherubic forms, connect the vision of Ezekiel with the griffins of Lombard Church-art as at Verona. Mrs. Jameson gives a very interesting tetramorph or cherubic form bearing the evangelic symbols, from a Greek mosaic. This symbol is certainly not of the age of the earlier catacomb paintings, and occurs first with frequency in the tessellated apses and tribunes of Byzantine churches, and is of course specially worthy of note as explaining the connexion between the vision of Ezekiel and that of St. John. The four animals separately represented occur passim, both in Eastern and Western Church-work. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tab. 48.) There are good examples in the spandrels of the dome of Galla Placidia's chapel in Ravenna, as in St. Apollinaris in Classe, and particularly in the chapel of St. Satyrus at Milan. [For a singular specimen of Carolingian grotesques of them see MINIATURE.] (The woodcuts, p. 633, are from the latter.) The eagle given below is taken from the Evangelary of Louis le Debonnaire; but the Hours of that emperor and the MS. of St. Medard of Soissons, also contain whole page emblems of the four evangelists.

In St. Vitale at Ravenna the symbols of the evangelists accompany their sitting figures. St. Matthew has the man, St. Mark the (wingless) lion; the calf, also wingless, belongs to St. Luke, and the eagle to St. John. The nimbus is sometimes added, and sometimes the creatures bear the rolls or books of the gospel (Ciampini, V. M. II. xv.; in St. Cosmas and Damian. See also ibid. II. xxiv. for St. Apollinaris in Classe, temp. Felix IV. about 530).

There is a very strange missal painting referred to by Martigny, where the human forms of the evangelists in apostolic robes are surmounted by the heads of the creatures. This occurs also, he says, in an ancient church of Aquileia (Bartoli, Le Antichità di Aquileia, 404). Two examples are given in woodcut by Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, 83. One is by Fra Angelico, and the hands, feet, and drapery of the other, which is not dated, seem too skilfully done to be of early date.

But the four creatures occur alike in bas-reliefs on altars, on sacred vessels and vestments, and even on bronze medals. See Paciaudi de Cultu S. Joan. Bapt. p. 163, for a bronze coin with the man and the eagle on one side, the lion and calf on the other, lettered respectively ΝΑΘΕΟC (sic), ΙΟΗΑΝΝΙC, ΝΑΡC, ΛΥCΑC. Nothing is known of the history of this relic. It may be supposed that where the Lord is surrounded by saints and apostles the bearers of books are intended for the evangelists, especially if they are four in number, though on the sarcophagus in Bottari cxxxi. t. only three are represented, probably St. Matthew and St. John, with St. Mark as companion and interpreter of St. Peter. Four figures in the baptistery at Ravenna holding books, and placed in niches of mosaic arabesques, are considered of doubtful meaning by Ciampini (V. M. i. tab. 72); but Martigny is perfectly satisfied that the evangelists are intended by them (Martigny, Dictionnaire s. v. Evangelistes). [R. St. J. T.]

EVE. [VIGIL.]

EVENING HYMN. In the vespers of the Eastern church, after certain fixed psalms, concluding with Ps. cxliii., expressive of intense expectation, followed by the "Entrance," so called, of the Gospels considered as enshrining Christ Himself, with an exhortation to the acknowledgment and hearing of Him as there present ("Wisdom, stand up")—the Evening Hymn is appropriately sung; the triumphant "Hymn of the Evening Light," at once giving thanks for the gift of artificial light, and praising the true "Light that shineth in darkness, in Whom is Life, and the Life is the Light of men"—hence called by St. Basil ἐπιλόχιος εὐχαριστία. "Joyful Light of the holy glory of the immortal Father, the heavenly, the holy, the blessed Jesu Christ, we having come to the Setting of the Sun and beholding the Evening light, praise God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. It is meet at all times that Thou shouldst be hymned with auspicious voices, Son of God, Giver of Life: wherefore the world glorifieth thee."

There is reference to the "Evening Psalm"

(τὸν ἐπιλόχιον ψαλμὸν; i. e. Ps. cxli.) in the Apostolical Constitutions, which may be considered to represent the Eastern system of the 3rd or 4th century (lib. viii. c. 35).

So in the West, Hilary (in Ps. lxiv.) writes—"The day is begun with prayers, and the day is closed with hymns to God."

EVOVAE is an artificial word made out of the vowels in the words "seculorum Amen," which occur at the end of the Gloria Patri. Its object was to serve as a kind of memoria technica to enable singers to render the several Gregorian chants properly; each letter in Evovae standing for the syllable from which it is extracted. It must be borne in mind that psalms, &c., were sung under antiphons, and that the music of the antiphon, being constructed in a particular 'mode' or 'scale,' such as Dorian, Phrygian, and the like, the chant or 'tone' (i. q. 'tune') to the psalm, being not intended to represent a full stop or close, might (and usually did) not end on the final belonging to the mode, leaving that for the concluding antiphon: thus different forms of the same mode or tone would arise, and these were called Evovae and sometimes differentiae, finitiones, conclusiones, and species seculorum. This only applies to the latter half (cadence) of the chant, as in the 'mediation' (at the middle of the verse of a psalm) scarcely any variety was admitted, except such as arose from local use. Thus in the various works on the subject, and in service books, varieties of endings are to be found of greater or less antiquity. Gerbert mentions the fact that in some cases the peculiar distinctive marks of the tones had become confused, notably in the 1st and 6th; and the only possible distinction would seem to be in the assignment of accents. It does not appear however that accent, in the modern musical sense of the word, was recognised to any extent by the ancients, ACCENTUS being equivalent to what we should now call inflection. [ACCENTUS ECCLESIASTICUS.] For the first few centuries of the Christian era rhythm was regulated by quantity, which gradually gave place to accent; and it seems to the writer that musical accentuation remained in a very uncertain state until the 17th century. Still the Evovae must be regarded as containing the germ of the present accepted views respecting accent, as may be seen by comparing the following forms.

(1) Full form of the 1st tone, which is in the Dorian mode; the dominant or reciting note being a, and the final note D.

Sic - ut erat in principio, et nunc, et sem - per:

et in secula secu - lo - rum. A - men. . . .

This ending would be written thus:

E V O V A E.

The accents are supplied by the writer. Before the invention of notes the same would be expressed thus:

a a G F G a G F E D
E V O V A E .

(2) A shortened form of the 1st tone, which does not end on the proper final D, leaving that correct cadence to be supplied by the antiphon.

Sic - ut erat in principio, et nunc, et sem - per:

et in secula secu - lo - rum. A - men.

The accents are as before, and the Evovae thus:

E V O V A E.

(3) Sixth tone, in the Hypolydian mode; dominant a, final F.

Sic - ut erat in principio, et nunc, et sem - per:

et in secula secu - lo - rum. A - men.

The Evovae would be expressed thus (accents being supplied):

E V O V A E.

Any one acquainted with music can see how nearly identical, so far as notes are concerned, these two last forms are, and that the only difference of character they can assume is by reason of different accentuation.

From the uncertainty of accent already mentioned, it will easily be seen that in different cases the same tone, and the same ending of it, would receive different accentuations according to the feeling of the compiler of the Psalter of the church in question; and this gives authority for the different versions that will be found in the modern books of Gregorian tones which are very accessible, and to which the reader is referred, as for example the following ending of the sixth tone (the one most commonly heard) compared with the one given above:

and these, which are both alleged to be the correct ending of the second tone:

It is almost needless to say that modern notation is here adopted for the sake of greater simplicity and definiteness.

The chief authority made use of here is the supplemental essay in Dyce's edition of the Book of Common Prayer, with plain tune (now rare) which gives ancient authorities, Elias Salomonis, Adam de Fulda, and the Tonale of St. Bernard, all referred to by Gerbert. Although these are of later date than the 8th century, the number of variations which they recognise, and the manner in which their recognition is made, seem to make it tolerably clear that these differences or Evovae are of much prior date to them. The view here taken by the writer receives some confirmation from the fact that a modern imitation of the word Evovae proposed by Mr. Dyce has never got into use, and is a mere curiosity, inasmuch as our means of expressing accent are more obvious. EXACTIONES are extraordinary revenues, whether drawn from a new form of impost (census de novo impositus), or from raising the rate of an old source of revenue (augmentatio census). Such exactions were in early times condemned by the church; thus the 33rd canon of the third council of Toledo (A.D. 589) and the fifth of the sixteenth (A.D. 693) forbade bishops to levy exactions upon their dioceses;

EXAMINATION FOR ORDERS

pope Leo IV. (A.D. 853) also stigmatized as "exactiones illicitae" any demands for supplies made by bishops "ultra statuta patrum." Similar decrees were also made by later authorities. It is laid down by canonists that an "exaction" must have manifest justification (manifesta et rationabilis causa) and be limited to the sum absolutely necessary to be raised (moderatum auxilium). EXAFOTI. The Liber Pontif. tells us (p. 250, D. ed. Muratori), that Benedict III. "obtulit canistra exafoci ex argento purissimo," where the true reading no doubt is exafota (i. e. ἑξαφῶτα) coronae of six lights. Compare ΕΝΑΦΟΤΙΑ. The same authority speaks of a corona of sixteen lights, "canistrum excaedecafotii" (ἑξακαίδεκαφωτίου) (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

EXAPOSTEILARIA (ἑξαποστειλάρια) are TROPARIA, which probably received their name from the fact that the word ἑξαπόστειλον frequently occurred in them, as they were mainly supplications to God to send forth His Holy Spirit upon the worshippers. When other subjects were introduced into them another etymology was imagined, that the word "exapostelaron" referred to the "sending forth" of God's servants into the world to preach the gospel.

EXAMINATION OF COMMUNICANTS. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.]

EXAMINATION FOR ORDERS. It appears always to have been the intention of the church that there should be a careful examination into the fitness of candidates for orders. As regarded their moral character, this was in some degree provided for by the public testimony of the people at the time of ordination [ELECTION OF CLERGY]. So it is said that when Alexander Severus was about to appoint any governors of provinces or other officials, he ordered that public enquiry should be made into their character, adding that this was the custom both of Jews and Christians in the selection of their priests (Ael. Lamprid. Vita Alex. Sevr. c. 45). In some cases, as in that of Augustine (Possid. Vita August. c. 4), it appears that this may have supplied the place of any further examination. The third council of Carthage (c. 22), decreed that a candidate for ordination must be approved either by the testimony of the people or the examination of the bishop. But in general the duty of examination appears to have rested with the bishop. Chrysostom (περὶ ιερώνυμης iv. 2, § 376), speaks of the duty of the ordaining bishop to make diligent enquiry into the characters of those presented to him by the electors. The 6th canon of Theophilus, archdeacon of Alexandria (Balsamon, ii. 170), provides that when the candidates have been selected by the clergy, the bishop shall examine them. Basil however (Ep. 181), speaks of an examination conducted by presbyters and deacons, and then referred to the chorepiscopi. The canon too of Theophilus, already quoted, mentions the orthodox clergy of the district as having the right of examination in certain cases. Thomasin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 32, § 11-12), thinks it probable that the task of examining candidates was delegated in the first place to the cathedral clergy, and afterwards, in the provinces, to the priests and deacons.

The examination in these cases appears to have been chiefly an enquiry into the moral character and general fitness of the candidates. The fourth council of Carthage (c. 1), directs that every bishop should be examined before ordination, as to his personal qualities, such as prudence, morality, and learning, both profane and sacred, and also as to his holding the right faith as contained in the creeds. It is not said by whom the examination was to be conducted. The council of Narbonne (c. 11), forbids any bishop to ordain either a priest or deacon who is utterly unlearned. This appears to imply a previous examination into literary as well as moral qualifications. [P. O.]

EXARCH. Generically the word Ἐξάρχος is applied to any one who takes the lead. Hence it is used of one who is chief in any department or undertaking. So Plutarch in his life of Numa has Ἐξάρχος τῶν ἱερῶν in the sense of sacrorum princeps, or summus pontifex.^a In its specific ecclesiastical application it has more than one sense.

1. It is perhaps most commonly and most strictly applied to the great prelates who presided over the 'dioceses' (Διοικήσεις, see DIOCESE), as they were called, which were formed in imitation of the civil dioceses of Constantine. Each of these 'dioceses' comprehended several 'provinces' (ἐπαρχίαι), and the metropolitans of these latter were subordinated to the exarchs of the former. The 9th and 17th canons of the council of Chalcedon recognise, or give,^b a right of appeal from the decision of the metropolitan to the exarch. The word therefore became nearly synonymous with patriarch. Accordingly, in the Novels of Justinian, when imperial sanction is given to the principle expressed in the canons of Chalcedon, the word exarch is turned into patriarch.^c Yet though every patriarch had the power of an exarch, every exarch was not, properly speaking, a patriarch, the latter name being given only to the heads of the more eminent dioceses. Thus in the 'Notitia' given in Bingham, book ix. ch. 1, § 6, which seems to represent the state of things at the end of the 4th century, we find the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, but the exarchs of Asia, Pontus, Thrace, Macedonia, Dacia, and others.^d [NOTITIA.]

^b "Ut rum omnes exarchi hanc potestatem ante hoc concilium exercuerint necne, incertum est: Hoc tamen certum, eam ab hoc concilio illis primo confirmatam esse." Beveridge, Pandect. Annot. in Canon. Concil. Chalced. p. 115.

^d Beveridge thinks that Balsamon and Morinus are in

Subsequently Constantinople absorbed Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, becoming a patriarchate. (See Neale, Holy East. Church, General Introduction.)

2. The word is also sometimes used in reference to metropolitans. For we find the phrase exarch of the province (ἐξάρχος τῆς ἐπαρχίας) as well as exarch of the diocese (ἐξάρχος τῆς διοικήσεως). It is used, for instance, in the 6th canon of the council of Sardica, where the sense seems beyond doubt.^e But the word is here probably used in its general sense of chief, rather than in any technical signification.

3. In later times the name exarch was also applied to certain legates of the patriarch of Constantinople, who appear to have been charged by him with the general maintenance of his rights and authority, and also entrusted with the visitation of monasteries subject to him. The name is also given to ecclesiastics deputed by him to collect the tribute payable by him to the Turkish government. These legates appear to have had large powers, and might even excommunicate, depose, or absolve in the name of the patriarch. (See Beveridge, Pandectae Canonum, Annotations on the Canons of Chalcedon, pp. 120, 121.)

Authorities.—Suicer, Thesaurus, s.v. Ἐξάρχος; Beveridge, Pandectae Canonum, Oxon. 1672; Bingham, Antiquities, bk. ii. ch. 17, and bk. ix.; Thomassinus, Vetus et Nova Eccles. Discip. part i. lib. 1, cap. 17. [B. S.]

EXCAECATIO. To deprive of sight was not a mode of punishment sanctioned by the Benedictine rules. But in the 8th century some abbats had recourse to this barbarity in the case of contumacious monks. It was forbidden by Charles the Great (Capitul. A.D. 789, c. 16) and by the council of Frankfort (A.D. 794, c. 18); and abbats were strictly ordered to confine themselves to the infliction of punishments prescribed in their rule (cf. Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 25; Mabillon, Ann. Ord. Bened. Saec. IV. Praef. i. 139). [I. G. S.]

EXCEPTOR. (1) The word excipere was used in later Latinity to express the "faking-down" of a person's words. Thus Augustine (Epist. 110), "a notariis ecclesiae excipiuntur quae dicimus." Hence a reporter of judicial acts and sentences—as in the case of Christian martyrs—was called exceptor. A gloss on Prudentius (apud Ducange) speaks of "exceptores" who took down the dicta of the judge and the answers of the martyr. Compare NOTARY. (Ducange's Gloss. s. v.; Bingham's Antiq. III. xiii. 5).

(2) The word is occasionally used as equivalent to ἀνάρδοχος [SPONSOR], for which "susceptor" is more commonly employed. [C.]

EXCLUSION FROM COMMUNION. [COMMUNION, HOLY: EXCOMMUNICATION.]

EXCLUSIVA designates, in modern times, the right claimed by certain Roman Catholic error in speaking of a kind of metropolitans set over whole dioceses, and yet not patriarchs. May they not have meant such as the exarchs of Asia and Pontus? (See Bev. Pandect. Can. Annot. in Conc. Chal. p. 121.) Valesius (Obs. on Socrates' Hist. Eccles. lib. 3, cap. 9) calls these exarchs "minores patriarchas," and says "Patriarchae nomen interdum usurpant."

The present form of this right is of course modern, and arises from the political circumstances of the age in Europe; but traces of the very decided influence exerted by princes in restraining the liberty of papal elections are found at a comparatively early date. The emperor Honorius, for instance, in the case of the double election and consecration of Eulalius and Boniface, decided (A.D. 418) in favour of Eulalius, afterwards drove him from the city, and (A.D. 419) ordered the installation of Boniface (Auctarium Symmachianum, Epist. 19-31; Baronius, an. 419, §§ 2 and 11, etc.). The same emperor, at the request of Boniface, made an ordinance that for the future, in case two candidates disputed the papal chair, neither should be pope but a fresh election should be held (Corpus Juris Canon. Dist. xcvii., cc. 1 and 2; Hardouin, Concil. i. 1237). Nor was the influence of the temporal power diminished when Germans ruled in Italy. Odoacer (A.D. 483) desired that no papal election should take place without his concurrence (sine nostrâ consultatione), and little heed was paid by subsequent princes to the canon of a Roman synod under pope Symmachus (A.D. 502) condemning such interference of the secular arm (Hardouin, ii. 977; C. J. C. Dist. xvi. c. 1, § 7). Theodoric repeated the enactment of Odoacer. On the reconquest of Italy under Justinian the confirmation of the papal election fell into the hands of the emperors, who exacted considerable sums in consideration of it, until the fee was given up by Constantine Pogonatus in the year 678 (Liber Pontif., in Agatho; C. J. C. Dist. lxiii. c. 21). Somewhat later, in the case of Benedict II. (A.D. 684) the claim to confirm the pope was also resigned by the same emperor. This, however, led to so much disorder, that it was found necessary again to invoke the co-operation of the civil power; and the fact of the necessity of the emperor's concurrence is recognised in the Liber Diurnus Pontif. Rom. (c. ii. lib. 3; see also Garnier's Dissertation in his edition of the Lib. Diurn.), probably of the end of the seventh or the beginning of the eighth century. The necessity for the confirmation of the emperor continued when the Frankish chiefs acquired the imperial dignity. Compare POPE. (Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. iv. 280.) [C.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (Abstentio, Anathema, Excommunicatio, ἀνάθεμα, ἀπορισμός). The partial or total, temporary or perpetual, exclusion of a member from the privileges of the church.

I. ORDINARY EXCOMMUNICATION.

Excommunication belongs to the class of corrective or medicinal penalties (poenae medicales or censurae), not to the vindictive (poenae vindicativae). Augustine (Serm. 351, c. 12), distinguishes between "prohibitio medicinalis," and "prohibitio mortalis," meaning (apparently) by the one, exclusion from the mysteries, by the other, exclusion from the church and Christian fellowship altogether. The canon law (Corpus J., c. 37, can. xxiv. qu. iii.), lays down generally that excommunication is "disciplina, non eradicatio;" the excommunicated person is capable of being restored to his privileges, upon repentance [PENITENCE].

The exclusion of peccant members from social privileges is a right inherent in all societies; it was in practice among the Jews at the Christian era, and was incorporated by our Lord into the constitution of His church. It is no part of our purpose to discuss the theological bearing of the language in which our Saviour conveyed this power (St. Matt. xviii. 15-18, xvi. 19), nor to investigate the traces which the New Testament contains of the use to which the apostles put it (Rom. xvi. 17; 2 Cor. vi. 14, 17; Gal. i. 8, 9; 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10, 11) (See Art. Excommunication in Dict. of the Bible). It is sufficient to note that a power of cutting off offenders was conferred on the apostles as rulers of the church, and was by them made a systematic part of church government. There are however two instances of direct excommunication by St. Paul, which must be noticed in more detail, because they supplied at once the language and the model after which the church framed in subsequent ages her censures. The apostle by a formal judgment delivered the incestuous Corinthian "to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh" (1 Cor. v. 5); a sentence which cannot signify less than this—that the man was thrust outside the Christian fold. When St. Paul wrote his second epistle, some six or nine months later, the man on his repentance was readmitted into the church. A similar sentence, but producing no similar penitence, was delivered against Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20). Hymenaeus is mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, as a teacher of heresy. His case therefore formed a precedent for excommunication for heretical opinion, as that of the Corinthian for immorality. The authority for the use of the formula, ANATHEMA, (ἀνάθεμα), so common afterwards in the Penitential Canons, is to be found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9.

The proofs that the church has always claimed and exercised the power of excommunication, are everywhere patent. Fathers (e.g., Irenaeus, Haeres. iii. 3; Cyprian, De Orat. Dom. c. 18; Epist. 41, c. 2; 59 cc. 1, 9, 10, 11; Basil, Epist. 61, ad Athanas.; Leo the Great, Epist. 32, ad Faustum; Ambrose, Epist. 40, ad Theodos.), and councils (e.g., Cann. Apost. c. 8, &c.; iv. Carth. c. 73; ii. Arles, c. 8; Venet. c. 3; Toledo, cc. 15, 16, 18), all claim the power or excommunication, of greater or less severity and duration, in the case of offenders, whether against morality or against orthodoxy. The PENITENTIAL BOOKS mention numberless cases in which excommunication is the penalty. See for instance the Penitential of archbishop Theodore (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 173).

Persons subject to Excommunication.—The power of excommunicating was held to be in some measure correlative to that of baptising; those who could admit into the church could also exclude. The unbaptised were never excommunicated, though catechumens might be, and were, put back into a lower grade, and their baptism postponed. Children were not excommunicated, nor (commonly) reigning princes or large sections of the church. With these exceptions all Christian people, men or women, might be cut off from communion with the faithful. But the sentence was invariably a personal one for personal offences; the innocent were not punished with the guilty. Such a process as laying a whole nation under an interdict for some supposed offence of the people or their rulers was not known in the early ages, nor before the 12th century.

According to the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. cc. 37, 38, 39) the course of discipline was that if any offender did not voluntarily come forward and acknowledge his guilt he was to be summoned by the bishop, first in privacy, then in the presence of two or three witnesses; then if he would not yield, the case was to be told to the church, and if he was still obdurate, sentence would proceed against him. No one was to be excommunicated before he had been several times admonished, according to the apostolic injunction, "him that is an heretic, after the first or second admonition, reject." Nor could any offender be excommunicated in his absence, nor without legal conviction either by his own admission or by credible witnesses. On this safeguard against abuse of power, Van Espen quotes a passage from St. Augustine, "We cannot reject any from our communion unless they have either voluntarily confessed or been charged and convicted before some secular or ecclesiastical tribunal" (St. Aug. Serm. 351 de Poenitent.). One witness was not received as sufficient evidence of guilt, even though the one was a bishop. No one could incur excommunication for anything temporal; such matters were left to the civil courts, and excommunication in the early ages was a spiritual weapon, cutting off from spiritual privileges. Gregory the Great, writing to some bishop whose name has been lost, severely rebukes him for using for his own private ends, power conferred upon him for the good of the souls of his flock (Epist. ii. 34). It was forbidden also to excommunicate for sins of infirmity and frailty. "There are some sins," says St. Ambrose (in exhort. ad Poenit.), "which may be daily pardoned by mere supplication to God, in that petition 'forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.'" And it was necessary that the offence should be public; for it was always a maxim "De occultis non judicat Ecclesia." So St. Cyprian, "We so far as it is committed to us to see and judge, look only at the face (the conduct) of each one, his heart and his conscience we cannot investigate" (Cypr. Epist. 55).

It would be impossible within reasonable limits to enumerate the graver crimes for which the church cut off her unworthy members. They may in general be reduced under one of the three heads of uncleanness, idolatry, bloodshed. Upon the treatment which men guilty of these crimes should receive, many of the early controversies on discipline hinged. There were, moreover, many breaches of each of the commandments which rendered the offender subject to the highest censure of the church, which cannot be brought under this classification. Of these it will be sufficient to point out a few which were peculiar to the times, or which the opinion of the present day would deal with more leniently. The principle underlying the whole system of ecclesiastical censures, was the preservation of sound members of the Christian body from the evil example and contagion of the unsound. Hence, heresy was ever reckoned among the gravest sins. Hardly less dangerous, and hardly less rigorously punished in times of persecution, or during the barbarian invasions, was apostasy either to heathenism or to Judaism. Any tampering with idolatry was rigidly prohibited. A Christian was forbidden to be a public actor, or to be present at any theatrical representation, which commonly in that age ministered to lasciviousness; or to frequent the circus, for it was regarded as an appendage of false worship, and detrimental to the majesty of God; or to use divination or astrology, for that was to put destiny in the place of divine providence; or to follow any trade, such for example as the training of gladiators, which in its nature was scandalous; or to be a talebearer, a gambler, or a vagrant. See Gregory Nyssen's canonical epistle to Letoius bishop of Melitina, which contains an elaborate classification of sins, and the penalties to be allotted to them.

Degrees of Excommunication.—Morinus distinguishes three degrees of excommunication: 1st. All those who were guilty of lighter sins were punished by exclusion from the offering of the oblations and partaking of the communion; 2nd. Those who sinned more grievously were not only altogether shut out from partaking of the communion, but also from being present at that service, and were moreover "delivered unto Satan," i.e. to certain bodily austerities and mortifications; 3rd. Those who persisted in offending, or fell into deadly sin, were expelled alike from all share in the sacred mysteries, and from the very building of the church. (Morin. de Poenitent., lib. 4, c. 11.) Van Espen considers that, there were two degrees only, one of which was called "medicinalis," the other "mortalis," (Aug. Hom. lib. 1.), or more commonly, "Anathema" (Van Espen Jus Eccl. Pars iii. Tit. xi. c. iv.); Bingham also discovers two degrees, lesser and greater excommunication (ἀφορισμὸς, ἀφορισμὸς παντέλης). The former, which corresponds with the first two classes of Morinus, excluded offenders from the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful, but did not exclude them from the church, for still they might stay to hear psalms and the reading of the scripture, and sermon and prayer of catechumens and penitents, and depart when the service of catechumens ended. Greater excommunication was a rejection not only from the eucharist but from any presence in church whatever, and any association with Christian men (Bingham, Antiq. lib. xvi. c. 11). There remains a still more terrible form of censure, which undoubtedly was sometimes imposed, and which was an absolute and final excision from the church. St. Cyprian (Epist. 55 ad Anton.) speaks of some of his predecessors who closed the door for ever against adulterers, but adds, that other bishops admitted similar offenders after a period of penitence to the grace of the church. There are various canons in the council of Elvira (circa 305 A.D.), which utterly debar offenders from communion with the faithful for the remainder of their lives, "nec in fine communionem accipere" (Con. Elvira. cc. 1, 12, 13, 71, 73). Can. 46 declares that if any persist in sin after having been already punished, he should be totally cast out, "penitus ab ecclesiā abjiciatur." The council of Ancyra (cc. 9, 16; circa 315 A.D.) fixes a limit to the penalty attached to those very crimes for which that at Elberis had decreed final excision. It would appear therefore that total and irremediable exclusion was at no time a universal practice, but nevertheless, at certain periods, and in certain localities, where possibly the magnitude of offences required to be dealt with by a penalty of equal magnitude, it was unhesitatingly employed. The practice of excommunicating the dead had no existence in the early centuries, or if here and there it existed, was supported by no canonical authority. The second council of Constantinople (553 A.D.), first introduced it into the Eastern church, and about 100 years later it crept into the Western (Morin. de Poenitent. lib. x. c. 9).

Effect of Sentence.—The punishment inflicted by a sentence of excommunication varied not only with the gravity of the offence, but with the discretion of the bishop, the customs of the diocese or province, and still more with the age of the church in which the offender lived. In the early centuries the church was ruled with a gentler discipline than was possible when her ranks were filled up promiscuously from the multitude. The incestuous man, whom St. Paul expelled from among his Corinthian converts with such solemn denunciation, was received again on his repentance, probably within a few months, certainly within the year. And up to the time of Montanus, punishments even for grave breaches of the law of the gospel were equally lenient. The term of the penalty was left to the discretion of the bishop. Through the whole of Tertullian's Treatise de Poenitentia, and in the Apostolic Canons, with one exception, there is no mention of any time for the duration of the censure. And even in the increasing severity which prevailed for the next hundred years, punishments scarcely ever exceeded one or two years (Morin. de Poenitent. lib. iv. c. 9). Thenceforward, years would not suffice where weeks or months had been deemed sufficient before. Ten, fifteen, twenty years, were no uncommon penalties. St. Basil excludes a murderer from the church for twenty years (can. 56). The council of Ancyra decrees that a murderer should be a penitent for the rest of his life, and be received back into communion only at the hour of death (can. 22). For murder combined with other great crimes the council of Elvira (can. 11), forbids communion even in death. But at no period did any hard and fast law prevail; if an offender voluntarily confessed his guilt, a shorter term of exclusion was measured out to him; if on the other hand, a man who had before caused scandal was further rebellious and obdurate, his sentence was doubly severe. The lesser excommunication carried with it only an exclusion from communion, and from the inner mysteries and privileges of the faith. Three weeks of this separation was the punishment assigned by the council of Elvira to those who wilfully absented themselves from church for three successive Sundays; a year for some more venial forms of unchastity; another period for eating food in company with a Jew (Con. Eliber. cc. 21, 14, 50). And when the term expired they were received again to all the privileges of full communion, without being called upon to submit to public penance. Very different from this was the punishment attending the greater excommunication, anathema. For the first 300 years the punishment was exclusively spiritual, laid upon the souls, not the bodies of men, depriving them of spiritual blessings, and in no way interfering with their political relations. Heresiarchs however, and dangerous heretical teachers, were at all periods treated with exceptional severity; the church was forbidden to hold any intercourse with them, to receive them into their houses, or to bid them God speed. It was only gradually, after the empire became Christian, that the weapons of the church's warfare began to be more carnal, and the secular power was invoked to uphold the ecclesiastical. At no time before Theodosius, who declared apostates either to Judaism or heathenism incapable of making wills or receiving bequests, and whose Codex de Haereticis attaches other pains and penalties to heretics, were any civil disabilities imposed upon those whom the church had cast off. Whatever rights a man had from the laws of God or man, as father, master, magistrate, these he retained after the door of the church was closed against him. Yet in the primitive ages, when the congregations of Christians were comparatively small and the members known to each other, and the spiritual censure was followed by an immediate and literal banishment from all sacred offices, from the society of their brethren in the faith, from all association whatever with holy men and holy things, the sentence fell with overwhelming severity. All the man most valued was taken from him. He was looked upon as under the ban of God's wrath; he was cut off from the kingdom of God on earth; like the leprous man among the Jews, he had the visible plague-spot of sin upon him; there had been passed upon him what was regarded as a presage of the future judgment, for what God had by his ministers bound on earth, he would certainly, it was believed, unless the man repented, bind in heaven. The Apostolical Canons (c. 11) forbid any one even to pray in a house with a man under anathema. The first council of Toledo (400 A.D.), ordered (c. 15), that "If any layman is under excommunication, let no clergyman nor religious person come near him nor his house. Also if a clergyman is excommunicated, let him be avoided, and if any is found to converse or to eat with him, let him also be excommunicated." His name was erased from the DIPTYCHS, [p. 561]; and there are instances of the erasure having been made after the man had died, and his sins had not come to light while he lived. His oblations were not received at the altar, and even gifts which he had presented to the church were rejected with him. His books might not be read, nor might any intermarry with him. And when his end came he was refused all sacred offices on his deathbed, and no Christian man might attend his funeral, and no Christian rite be performed at it, unless he had given proof of repentance and passed away before being formally absolved. Nor could any one hope to avoid judgment by a voluntary exile, for notice was sent to other congregations, and in the discipline of the early church, a stranger was not admitted into communion unless he brought with him COMMENDATORY LETTERS from his own diocese. A man once excommunicated was never ordained, or if it was discovered after his ordination, that he had been previously censured, he was removed from the ministry (Conc. Eliber. can. 30; Conc Nic. 10). This latter strictness was not invariably enforced, but the axiom "Poenitentes ordinari non debent," became universal in the Western church, although not always in practice in the Eastern.

Excommunication of Clergy.—In some cases the clergy, for offences for which laymen were excommunicated, were suspended and reduced to lay communion [DEGRADATION]; but they might incur both degradation and excommunication. The clergy were brought to trial with more legal formalities than the laity, because if found guilty they were deprived not only of spiritual privileges but of office and emolument. The Apostolic Canons (30) decree that any bishop, priest, or deacon guilty of simony shall be cut off from all communion whatever. Mention is also made of reducing clergy to "peregrina communio," communion of strangers, which would seem to signify that they were to be treated as strangers who came without commendatory letters, allowed a mere subsistence from the offerings, but denied communion [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417]. By the council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.) monks were subject to the same discipline as laity.

Form or Rite.—Judgment was delivered in the indicative mood, inasmuch as it decreed a punishment then and there inflicted. It was declared after the reading of the gospel, the bishop standing on the ambo. There is no record of any ceremony attending the delivery of the sentence in the early ages; but Martene publishes a MS. of about the year 1190 which prescribes that twelve priests ought to stand round the bishop with lamps or torches in their hands, and that after the conclusion of the sentence they should cast them on the ground and stamp out the light beneath their feet, and that the bishop should then explain to the people the meaning and effect of the ceremony they had witnessed. No recognised rite of excommunication was in general use before the 9th or 10th century. The formula ordinarily employed was founded on our Lord's words, "Let him be as an heathen man and a publican." The council of Ephesus degraded Nestorius in these terms. "Wherefore our Lord Jesus Christ, whose majesty he by his blasphemous words has assailed, pronounces Nestorius, through this sacred synod, deprived of his episcopal rank and degraded from the fellowship and office of the priesthood throughout the world." The sentence of excommunication of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by his bishop, Synesius (410 A.D.), gives a more detailed account of the penalties involved in the sentence. "The church of Ptolemais makes this injunction to all her sister churches throughout the world. Let no church of God be open to Andronicus and his accomplices; but let every sacred temple and sanctuary be shut against them. The devil has no part in paradise; though he privily creep in he is driven out again. I therefore admonish both private men and magistrates neither to receive them under their roof nor to their table: and priests more especially, that they neither converse with them when living nor attend their funerals when dead. And if any one despise this church as being only a small city, and receive those that are excommunicated by her, let them know that they divide the church by schism. And whosoever does so, whether levite, presbyter, or bishop, shall be ranked in the same class with CHRIST. ANT.

Andronicus. We will neither give them the right hand of fellowship, nor eat at the same table with them, and much less will we communicate in sacred mysteries with those who choose to take part with Andronicus" (Synes Epist. 58). [See PENITENCE.]

The following, from an Anglican Pontifical preserved at Gembours, considered by Martene (De Lit. Ant. ii. 322; ed. Venet. 1783) to have been written in the 8th century, may serve as a specimen of the later forms. The bishop, denouncing certain persons who, not having the fear of God before their eyes, had plundered the property of the church, and who, after being thrice summoned, contumaciously refused to appear, proceeds: "These therefore we, by the authority conferred upon us by God . . . and the statutes of the canons, excommunicate and cut off from the bounds of the Holy Church of God, and expel from the congregation of Christian men; and unless they speedily come to a better mind and make satisfaction to us, we condemn them with eternal malediction and condemn with perpetual anathema. May they incur the wrath of the heavenly judge; may they be deprived of the inheritance of God and His elect; may they neither in this present life have communion with Christians, nor in the life to come obtain part with God and His saints; but may they be numbered with the devil and his servants, and receive the punishment of avenging flame with everlasting mourning. In heaven and earth may they be abominable, and be tortured for ever with the pains of hell. Cursed be they in the house, cursed in the field; cursed be their food and their fruit; cursed be all that they possess, from the dog that barks for them to the cock that crows for them. May they have their portion with Dathan and Abiram, whom hell swallowed up quick, and with Ananias and Sapphira, who lied unto the apostles of the Lord and fell down dead, and with Pilate, and Judas who betrayed the Lord; may they be buried with the burial of an ass, and so may their light be quenched in the midst of darkness. Amen."

Minister of Excommunication.—The officer entrusted with the power of excommunication was the bishop of the diocese to which the offender belonged. [BISHOP, p. 231.] The administration of discipline was originally entirely in his hands; it was he who bound and he who loosed. As the church increased, the infliction of other forms of penance was delegated to the inferior clergy, but the great sentence of excommunication was a weapon which the bishop kept exclusively in the power of his own order. Within his diocese his jurisdiction was supreme; he might mitigate or increase censure at his discretion. In the exercise of this authority he was independent of his presbytery; he sat indeed with it to hear confessions which might criminate others, or to receive accusations against the brethren, or to decide rights and causes brought before him, and offences might then be divulged which would expose the offender to excommunication, but when once guilt was established, either by confession, or conviction, or notoriety, the bishop alone imposed the sentence. Instances also abound of bishops consulting with one another in special emergencies, and deciding amongst themselves the period of penitence to be allotted to special sins, but such advice or support put no limitation on each bishop's original jurisdiction. The council of Nice (can. 5) forbids any one bishop to receive delinquents cut off by another bishop, which clearly points to each bishop possessing the power to act alone. The end of the same canon decrees that a synod of bishops shall be held in each province twice a year, before Lent and in the autumn (compare Apost. Can. 38), to examine into the cases of excommunication which had taken place in the province. There was thus a right of appeal against the sentence of an individual bishop, but only to the bishops of the province. This probably explains instances of synodical excommunication, which do not imply that the bishop had not an independent power to excommunicate, but that an appeal was made from his judgment to the provincial synod, whose sentence was only a more solemn confirmation of the bishop's.

The Apostolical Canons (74) decree that, if a bishop is accused he is to be summoned by the synod of bishops, and if he refuse to come two bishops are to go for him, and on his second refusal, to go again, and if he is still contumacious, the synod may proceed against him in his absence. Accordingly the episcopal rank of Nestorius required a synodical censure, which was pronounced by provincial synods under Cyril of Alexandria and Celestine of Rome, and confirmed 431 A.D. by the council of Ephesus. And Eutyches, who was an abbot and so far allowed the privileges of a bishop, was tried at the provincial synod of Constantinople under Flavianus, and on an appeal to a general council was again condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedon, together with Dioscorus of Alexandria.

II. MONASTIC EXCOMMUNICATION.

By the Benedictine rule contumacious monks incurred the penalty of the greater or the lesser excommunication according to the gravity of the offence, but not till admonition, first private and then public, had been tried on them in vain, nor in cases where, owing to moral stupidity, flogging was likely to be more efficacious (Reg. Bened. c. 23). These two kinds of excommunication are further defined as excommunication only from the common meal (a mensâ) for slighter faults, and excommunication from the chapel also (a mensâ et oratorio) for faults less venial. Thus the subdivision of monastic excommunication corresponds in its main features with the more minute subdivisions of ecclesiastical discipline generally (Ib. cc. 24, 25). Even under the lighter ban the offender was forbidden to officiate in the choir as reader or "cantor," and, according to some commentators on the rule, he was to lie prostrate before the altar-steps while the others were kneeling. In the refectory he was to take his food alone after the rest had finished (Martene, Reg. Comment. cc. 25, 44).

A monk under the graver excommunication was debarred not only from the common board, but also from all the chapel services as well as from the benedictory salutation, and indeed from all intercourse whatever with his brethren (Reg. Bened. c. 25). He was to lie outstretched at the doors of the chapel till re-admitted by the abbat; nor even then might he take any public part in the services without express permission (Martene, u. s. c. 44). Any monk speaking to an excommunicated brother was "ipso facto" excommunicated himself (Reg. Bened. c. 26). But it was kindly ordered by Benedict, that the abbat should send some sympathising brother to console the offender in his loneliness (Ib. c. 27; cf. Reg. Mag. cc. 13, 14; Reg. Caes. Arelat. c. 23; Id. ad Virg. c. 10).

The duration of the punishment varied, the intention being correctional rather than merely penal. By the rule of Fructuosus, a monk for lying, stealing, striking, false swearing, if incorrigible, was, after flogging, to be excommunicated and kept on bread and water in a solitary cell for three months (Reg. Fruct. c. 17). By the rule of Ferreolus, a monk for bad language was forbidden to be present at the mass or to receive the kiss of peace for six months (Reg. Ferr. c. 25). By the rule of Chrodegang a canonick was excommunicated for what seems so slight an offence as sleeping after nocturns. It was for the abbat to fix the degree of excommunication (Reg. Bened. c. 24). Some commentators argue therefore, that the severest form of monastic excommunication cannot be tantamount to the severest ecclesiastical sentence of the kind (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 25).

Mabillon cites instances (Annal. x. 46) of monks (Columbanus and Theodorus Studita) excommunicating lay people not belonging to their order. He relates an excommunication of one of the sisterhood by an abbess in the 7th century (Ib. xii. 36). Abbats and abbesses were themselves liable to this penalty. Gregory the Great reproves a bishop for harshness in excommunicating an aged abbat of good repute. The second council of Tours in A.D. 567 decreed sentence of excommunication against any abbat or prior allowing a woman to enter the monastery (Conc. Turon. c. 16). See further Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. cc. 30–34 with Menard's Commentary, and Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v. [I. G. S.]

EXCUBIAE. [VIGIL.]

EXCUSATI. (1) Slaves who had fled for refuge to a church, and then—on the owners making oath upon the gospels that they would not punish them—been restored to their masters, were called excusati. If the master broke his oath he was punished by excommunication. See Conc. Aurel. I. cc. 1 and 3; III. c. 13; IV. c. 24.

(2) Those who under some terror or oppression had fled to a church or monastery and remained there were also called excusati (Charter of Charles the Great, quoted by Ducange, s.v.). [C.]

EXECUTORES. A name given either to the DEFENSORES themselves or to officers who performed analogous functions. In one of the canons of a council held at Carthage, A.D. 419 (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 96), it is decreed that permission should be demanded of the emperor for the appointment of five "executores," who should reside in the provinces, and be employed on all occasions of necessity on behalf of the church, "in omnibus desideriis quae habet ecclesia." These are evidently distinct from the "defensores scholastici," mentioned in the canon that follows. In a capitulary of Charles the Great, quoted by Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 99, § 12), executores are mentioned in connexion with advocates and defenders, "executores, vel advocati seu defensores." Thomassin (Ibid. c. 98, § 3) speaks of the title being given to certain officials when employed in carrying into execution the will of the bishop of Rome, who is himself the executor and protector of the canons. [P. O.]

EXEDRA is explained by Ducange, Binterim, and others as a general term including all buildings annexed to a church, or contained within the consecrated area. In classical usage an exedra was a semicircular room, or large alcove with seats against the wall for the purposes of conversation (Cic. de Nat. Deorum, i. 6; de Orat. iii. 5). Exedrae are spoken of by Vitruvius (vi. 5) in connection with oeci (olkoi) as rooms for conversation and other social purposes. The two words are similarly coupled together by Eusebius (H. E. x. 4, § 44) when describing the church of Paulinus at Tyre. Here Eusebius writes "he provided spacious exedrae and oeci on each side (ἐξέδρας καὶ οἴκους τοὺς παρ' ἐκάτερα μείζοντες) united and attached to the royal fabric (βασιλείῳ) and communicating with the entrance to the middle of the temple." The church built by Constantine at Antioch is also described as "being surrounded with a large number of oeci and exedrae in a circle," οἴκοις τε πλείουσιν ἐξέδραις τε ἐν κύκλῳ (Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. iii. c. 50). Augustine uses the word in the sense of a large room or hall annexed to the great church at Caesarea (de Gest. cum Emerito). The sixth canon of the council of Nantes prohibits interments except "in atrio aut porticu, aut in exedris ecclesiae,"^a Bingham holds that baptisteries were included under exedrae. The apse of a basilica was also sometimes termed exedra from its similarity in shape to those of the baths.

(Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. c. 7, § 1; Augusti Christ. Archaeol. i. 387; Valesius ad Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iii. c. 50.) [E. V.]

EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES.

In the earlier stage of their existence, monasteries generally availed themselves gladly of the patronage of the bishop of the diocese [BISHOP, p. 231], but as they increased in wealth and power, struggled to emancipate themselves from his control. For instance, towards the close of the 6th century the abbess of Ste. Croix at Poitiers, after the death of Radeunde the foundress, who had become one of the nuns, requested the bishop to take the convent under his protection. After some hesitation, on account of the royal rank of the foundress, or because she had placed the convent under royal jurisdiction, he consented "to govern it as the rest of his parishes" (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. VII. xxxix. xl.; Gregor. Turon. Hist. ix. 46). On the other hand, in the middle of the 7th century, or later, for the exact date of the deed is uncertain, a monastery at Vienne, apparently of monks and nuns under one constitution, obtained absolute exemption from the bishop's authority. By this deed, no bishop had any claim to any property of the monastery; no bishop, unless by invitation of the abbot or abbess, could consecrate altars or admit nuns, nor was any fee to be required for performing these ceremonies; and the diocesan was not to hinder any appeal of the monastery to the see of Rome (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. XIII. ii. cf. App. tom. 1). In another fragment cited by Mabillon in the same place no bishop even by invitation was allowed to enter the more private parts of the convent; nor was any bishop to be entertained in the convent, lest this should be an expense and a distraction to the inmates, nor to interfere with the abbess in the correction of the nuns, for she was to be responsible only to the apostolic see. Instances might easily be multiplied of the almost continual collision in Western Christendom between the bishops and the monasteries in their dioceses; in which the monasteries, almost invariably, had the support of the pope, and, frequently, of the royal authority (cf. Martene, Regul. Comment. Bened. ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxvi. pp. 839, 840). And the same struggle was going on at the same time in the East. Thus, in the 7th century, the emperor Maurice granted to the monasteries of Theodorus Siceota entire exemption from all episcopal authority, except that of Constantinople (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xiv. 23). Monasteries subject only to emperor or king, were called "imperialia" or "regalia" (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.) [For exemption of monasteries from taxes see MONASTERY.] [I. G. S.]

EXEMPTIONS. [IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY.]

EXEQUIES. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD: OBSEQUES.]

EXERCISES, PENITENTIAL. [PENITENCE.]

EXHORTATION (Exhortatio), is used in a special sense for the admonition on the duties of their office addressed by the ordainer to a person just ordained. See, for instance, the Coptic ritual of ordination, in Martene, De Rit. Ant. I., viii. 11, Ordo 23. [C.]

EXILE (Exilium, Peregrinatio). For certain offences a penitent was ordered to leave his country and pass some period of his penitence in distant lands. This mode of penance is found among the canons ascribed to some of the British councils of the 6th century; but there are strong grounds for believing that they are interpolations of a later period, and that the penance of exile cannot be traced to any earlier source than the 7th century. The Penitential of Theodore (I. ii. 16) appoints fifteen years of penance for incest, of which seven are to be passed in a foreign land (perenni peregrinatione). The Penitential of Egbert (iii.) declares seven years of exile to be part of the penance due to parricide; and (v. 9) orders a cleric who begets an illegitimate child to go into exile for either four, five, or seven years. Morinus, however, considers (de Poenit. vii. 15) that these wanderings of penitents soon led to abuses, and were checked in a capitulary of Charles the Great (vi. 379).

The practice thus begun in submission to a judicial penalty was continued as a voluntary self-discipline, and in the 10th century it began to be considered a meritorious action to leave home and country and make a pilgrimage to some spot consecrated by association with some holy man; the earliest of which places were Rome, Tours, and the supposed burial-place of St. James at Compostella. This tendency received a great impulse from the Crusades, and especially from the decree of the council of Clermont (Conc. Clavom. c. 2), which allowed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to expiate all penance whatever. [G. M.]

EXOCATACOELI. Five great dignities of the patriarchal church of Constantinople, viz. the oeconomus or steward, the senior and junior keeper of the purse (σακελλάριοι), and the senior and junior chartophylax, were anciently called ἐξωκατάκοιλοι. To these, in the 11th century, the defensor of the church was added. The etymology of the word is uncertain. That of Ducange (Gloss. Graec.) that they received their name from having their seats of dignity on a raised platform, not in the lower portion of the floor (κατακοίλι) where less distinguished persons sat, is perhaps as probable as any. (Thomassin, Eccl. Discip. I. ii. 99, § 10; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 702.) [C.]

EXODIASTICON (Ἐξοδιαστικόν). As the departure of a Christian was frequently spoken of as ἐξόδος, the service at the death-bed is called in Greek office-books ἐξοδιαστικόν (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 608, 634). [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; SICK, VISITATION OF.] [C.]

EXOMOLOGESIS (Exomologesis, Confessio, ἔξομολογσις, ἐξαγόρευσις). The verb in St. Matt. xi. 25 expresses thanksgiving and praise, and in this sense was used by many Christian writers (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. ἐξομολ.). But more generally in the early fathers it signifies the whole course of penitential discipline, the outward act and performance of penance. From this it came to mean that public acknowledgment of sin which formed so important a part of penitence. Irenaeus (c. Haeres. i. 13, § 5) speaks of an adulteress who, having been converted, passed her whole life in a state of penitence (ἐξομολογουμένη, in exomologesi): and (ib. iii. 4) of Cerdon often coming into the church and confessing his errors (ἐξομολογούμενος). Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) considers the Greek word ἐξομολόγησις more suitable than the Latin confessio; and proceeds to define the term as "the discipline of humbling and prostrating a man." At the end of the same treatise he speaks of the king of Babylon's humiliation as an exomologesis, and of the king of Egypt's neglect of repentance and its attendant confession. The term occurs twice in Cyprian (de Lapsis, cc. 11, 18), and six times in his Epistles (Epist. 4, ad Pompon. c. 3; 15, ad Martyr. c. 1; 16, ad Cler. c. 2; 17, ad Laic.; 55, ad Anton. c. 24; 59, ad Cornel. c. 18, Oxf. ed.) in the sense of the course of penitence and public humiliation; three times (Epist. 18, ad Cler.; 19, ad Cler.; 20, ad Rom.-Cler. c. 2) referring to the confession of dying penitents: and once (de Lapsis, c. 19) as applied to Azariah and his companions, in the sense of confession of the lips generally. St. Basil, describing the morning service of his time (Epist. 207, ad Cler. Neocaesar.), says that after the antiphonal chant, at daybreak they all burst forth into the psalm of confession (τὸν τῆς ἐξομολογήσεως ψαλμὸν τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀναφέρουσι), meaning no doubt that which is emphatically a psalm of confession, the fifty-first. This psalm is also mentioned by Cassian (De Instit. Coenob. iii. 6) as occurring at the close of matins. Pacian in one place (Paraen. ad Poenit. p. 372, Oxf. ed.) following Tertullian, speaks of the degradation of Nebuchadnezzar as exomologesis; in another (ibid. p. 373), in imitation of Cyprian, applies the term to the song of the "three children." At the council of Laodicea (can. 2) it is the whole course of penitence: "As to those who sin by divers offences and persevere in prayer of confession (ἐξομολ.) and repentance." With Chrysostom it is in one place (Hom. 10 in S. Matt. c. 4) the course of penitence; elsewhere (Hom. 5, de incomp. Dei nat. t. i. p. 490; Hom. 2, ad illum. Catech. t. i. p. 240, Bened. ed.) it is confession to God only. Isidore of Seville (Etymol. vi. 19) defines exomologesis to be that by which we confess our sins to the Lord. But at the end of the same chapter he adduces an entirely different meaning of the word. "Between litanies and exomologeses there is this difference, that exomologesis stands for confession of sins only, litany for prayer to God, and imploring His pardon; but now each word has the same meaning, nor is there any difference between the use of litany and exomologesis." The 17th council of Toledo, A.D. 694 (c. 6), orders litanies (exomologeses) to be said for a whole year for the church, for the sovereign, &c. &c. And the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (Conc. Mogunt. c. 32) quotes the exact words of Isidore on exomologesis being equivalent with litany (Comp. Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; note L. on Tertull. de Poenit., in Oxford Library of the Fathers).

Of these meanings the first and last are quite foreign to the general ecclesiastical use of the word and need not be pursued any further; that which signifies the whole course of penitential discipline will be discussed under the article PENITENCE; this article will relate to exomologesis only so far as it signifies oral confession.

Public Confession.—1. Of public sins.—This was the first stage in the restoration of a penitent. So long as discipline was in force, any one guilty of a notorious crime which had subjected him to censure [EXCOMMUNICATION] was required to make an open acknowledgment of his crime at the beginning of his course of penitence. The confession took place after the Missa Catechumenorum, and when they and the hearers had been warned to withdraw from the church by the deacon. Then if any one had been recently convicted of any open sin, he confessed and bewailed it before the church, and in accordance with the gravity of his offence, his penitential station was assigned him by the bishop; sometimes, however, the bishop, yielding to the requests of the clergy and people who had heard the confession, allotted a less remote station. The bishop then addressed the congregation on the nature of the offence, and they offered up their prayers for the offender's repentance. This public confession was addressed not merely to the bishop or the priest in the presence of the congregation, but in a loud voice to the congregation at large. It signified that as the church had been scandalised by an open sin in one of its members, reparation should be made to it by an equally open admission of sin. It also manifested the earnestness of the offender's repentance that he was willing to undergo this public humiliation. But the chief object was that the offender might seek the prayers of the congregation to support and stimulate his conversion. If any one who was notoriously guilty failed or refused to confess, no one would communicate with him, in accordance with the apostle's precept (1 Cor. v. 11; Ephes. v. 11). Again, if he waited to be convicted, his censure was heavier than if he had made a spontaneous confession. The council of Elvira (Conc. Elib. c. 76) orders that if a deacon before his ordination had committed a mortal sin, and afterwards confessed, he should be restored after three years' penitence; but if detected, after five years, and only to lay communion. Basil (ad Amphiloc. cc. 7, 61) allows alleviation of punishment on three grounds, ignorance, confession, and lapse of time. This encouragement to confession reappears in the 8th century in the Rule of Chrodegand of Metz (c. 18), "he who voluntarily confesses his lighter sins shall be visited with lighter censures." And not only was an offender urged to confess for his own sake, but any who was privy to his crime was under a similar obligation to accuse him, for if he failed or even delayed to do so, he was himself exposed to censure (Basil, ad Amphiloc. c. 71).

ii. Of secret sins.—Such confession was at no time obligatory. Sometimes, however, under the direction of a priest who had been consulted, or moved by a sudden contrition and remorse, some would charge themselves with a secret sin before the congregation. Thus (Iren. c. Haeres. i. 9) the virgins seduced by the heretic Marcus, and the wife of the deacon Asianus made a public acknowledgment of guilt which was known only to themselves. One of the three men who had calumniated Narcissus of Jerusalem (Euseb. H. E. vi. 9) publicly acknowledged years afterwards, when his two associates had died from some painful disorder, that his charge against the bishop had been false. Some of the priests who had joined Novatian (ibid. vi. 43) spontaneously charged themselves before the church with heresy and other crimes; one of the bishops who had been induced to consecrate him publicly acknowledged his error, and Cornelius, in deference to the intercession of the people who witnessed the confession, admitted him to lay communion. But public confession of secret sins needed at a very early period to be checked and regulated; and the people were admonished to consult their priests before divulging their sins to the church [PENITENTIARY]. Anything which would create a scandal or endanger life or liberty was forbidden to be revealed. So Basil (ad Amphiloc. c. 34) would not permit a woman who had privately admitted the guilt of adultery to acknowledge it in the church or even to perform openly the penance generally demanded for such a sin, lest she should be murdered by her husband. Similar precautions are laid down by Origen, Augustine, and Caesarius of Arles (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 13). In the 6th century the practice arose of making confession of public sins to the bishop, of private to the priest.

iii. Before the bishop and his presbytery.—Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) says it is part of exomologesis for the penitent "to throw himself upon the ground before the presbytery, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God." Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 18) praises the faith of those who, having without any overt act meditated idolatry, made a confession "apud sacerdotes Dei." Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letoium, in Marshall p. 195) speaks of a certain evil which had been overlooked by the ancient fathers, from whence it had come to pass, that no person who was brought before the clergy to be examined as to his life and conversation was at all examined upon that point. Before the presbytery confessions were made which criminated others; and this frequently happened; for any one making a public confession named his confederates, unless by so doing he exposed them to legal penalties. No ecclesiastical censure, however, fell on any who denied a crime which his associate had admitted: on the principle that penitence was a privilege not a punishment. The deacon and virgin whose case is decided by St. Cyprian and his presbytery (Epis. iv. ad Pompon.) must have had an information laid against them by some associate, for their guilt had been secret. This mode of confession was affected in the East by the appointment of the Penitentiary; but in the West so long as public penitence for secret faults prevailed, so long did public confession to bishops and their assistant priests. Probably this was the origin of the custom introduced into the Benedictine Rule of confession to the abbot surrounded by his monks.

Private Confession.—i. General account.—The testimony of the fathers will be discussed in detail later; here it is sufficient to say that the early fathers Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, hardly allude to private confession at all; and among the writers generally of the first 500 years those who mention it do so with some reference more or less direct to public discipline. But it is certain that public penitence was not assigned to all sins which were secretly confessed, but only to such as in the discretion of the priest required it. It is easy to understand that offences of a trivial nature might be confided to a priest, or offences of such a character as would scandalise the church were they openly divulged; and until this spiritual direction had been given, the offender would be in doubt whether or not a public acknowledgment would be expected from him. But it is equally clear that no absolution was given after direction of this sort, or until penitence had been performed. Such at least for many centuries was the practice in the Latin church (see PENITENCE, under which the question of absolution will be discussed); in the Eastern church a practice arose of pronouncing some preliminary absolution immediately after the utterance of the confession, and a second absolution when the penance had been performed. The evidence of this practice is to be found in the early Greek Penitentials at the end of the 6th century; but Morinus would carry back its origin to the time of the abolition of the office of Penitentiary at the end of the 4th. To resort to a spiritual guide for comfort and counsel was one thing; to obtain through his ministry by confession penance and absolution, reconciliation with God and communion with the faithful was another: and there is no proof that the two were combined, and that private sacramental confession had any existence in the first 500 years of the Christian church. The term itself is not found in any of the documents of the first eight centuries: and if the definition of Thomas Aquinas (Summa, pt. iii. qu. 84–90) is to be accepted as a theological definition of the term, its growth must be assigned to a much later period. There existed undoubtedly from a very early period private confession followed by no penitence, but also by no absolution; there was also private confession followed by public penitence, and generally by subsequent public confession, to which the private was a preliminary; and there was after the beginning of the 6th century private confession followed by private penitence, but the penance was always exacted, and differed only from public penance in solemnity; there is nowhere to be found in canons or sacramentaries or penitentials one punishment for private penitence and another for public. The sins thus privately confessed with a view to penitence were those only of a grievous character, sins which excluded from communion or public prayer, or even from the church itself, which required a long and painful course of penance before they were blotted out, and into which if the sinner relapsed, there was, certainly in the rigour of the primitive ages, no second door of reconciliation open to him. Sozomen indeed, writing at the end of the 5th century, says in reference to penitence that there is pardon for those who sin again and again, but this is not the language of antiquity. There was but one admission to solemn penance. Moreover, sins for which penance was to be performed were described by canons and in canonical epistles, and sins which did not fall within these canons were neither confessed nor made subject to penance. Sins of frailty incidental to mankind were to be healed by daily prayer and confession to God only. So, among numerous authorities that penitence, and confession as a part of penitence, was not exacted for venial sins, Augustine (de Symb. ad Catech. t. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.), "those whom you see in a state of penitence have been guilty of adultery or some other enormity, for which they are put under it: if their sin had been venial, daily prayer would have been sufficient to atone for it." The Greek Penitentials of the end of the 6th century, and the Latin ones of a century later, give no hint of habitual confession of common infirmities, or of private confession being a matter of indispensable obligation, still less of the doctrine that one may daily confess and be daily and plenarily absolved.

ii. In the Western Church.—In the times of Tertullian and Cyprian public discipline was in full vigour, and as part of it a public acknowledgment of sins: the passages which have already been adduced from these fathers contain nothing to show that they regarded confession in any other light than as one stage of the act of penitence.

Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 6) speaks of confession, but it is confession to God. "If thou wilt be justified confess thy sins; for humble confession looses the bonds of sin." Another passage, selected by Bellarmine to support secret confession, relates manifestly to the course of discipline; for having at the end of the previous section said that "very many, out of fear of future punishment, conscious of their sins, seek admission to penitence, and having obtained it are drawn back by the shame of public entreaty," Ambrose thus proceeds (ib. c. 10), "Will any one endure that thou shouldst be ashamed to ask of God, who art not ashamed to ask men? that thou be ashamed to supplicate Him from whom thou art not hid, when thou art not ashamed to confess thy sins to man from whom thou art hid?" Another passage (in Luc. x. 22, p. 5, 1787) commenting on St. Peter's denial of Christ and subsequent repentance, is inconsistent with the existence of a custom of private confession in his time. "Let tears wash away the guilt which one is ashamed to confess with the voice. Tears express the fault without alarm; tears confess the sin without injuring bashfulness; tears obtain the pardon they ask not for. Peter wept most bitterly, that with tears he might wash out his offence. Do thou also, if thou wouldest obtain pardon, wash out thy fault with tears."

Augustine's own confessions contain no hint that he either practised or inculcated private confession. "What have I to do with men that they should hear my confession, as if they could heal all my infirmities" (x. 3). Bellarmine quotes from the same writer (on Ps. 66, c. 7)—"Be downcast before thou hast confessed; having confessed, exult; now shalt thou be healed. While thou confessedst not, thy conscience collected foul matter; the imposthume swelled, distressed thee, gave thee no rest; the physician fomented it with words, sometimes cuts it, employs the healing knife, rebuking by tribulation. Acknowledge thou the hand of the physician; confess; let all the foul matter go forth in confession; now exult, now rejoice, what remains will readily be healed." But Augustine is commenting on the text, "Sing unto the Lord all the whole earth;" and confession can be confession to God only, as surely the physician who heals by tribulation can be none other than God. In Serm. 181 (fin.) he speaks of daily prayer as the sponge which is to wipe away sins of infirmity and contrasts them with death-bringing sins for which alone penitence is performed. Elsewhere (de Symb. ad Catech. tom. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.) he again speaks of the "three methods of remitting sins in the church, in baptism, in the Lord's Prayer, in the humility of the greater penitence," and he limits penance and consequently confession to sins which deserve excommunication. And in many similar passages he is a witness that up to his time no confession was required of any sins but such as subjected a man to penitential discipline.

Leo in his Epistle to Theodorus gives plain testimony of the connection of confession with penance (Ep. 91, c. 2). But in a letter to the bishops of Campania he gives some directions which mark if they do not make an era in confession in the Latin church. The epistle is too important not to be quoted at length (Ep. 80, ad Episc. Campan.). "That presumption, contrary to the apostolic rule, which I have lately learned to be practised by some, taking unduly upon themselves, I direct should by all means be removed, and that a written statement of the nature of the crimes of each should not be publicly rehearsed, since it suffices that the guilt of the conscience be laid open to the priests alone in secret confession. For although that fulness of faith, which out of the fear of God fears not to take shame before men, seems to be praiseworthy, yet because the sins of all are not of such sort, that they who ask to do penitence fear not their being published, let so unlaudable a custom be done away, lest many be kept from the remedies of penitence; either being ashamed, or fearing that actions for which they may be punished by the laws should be discovered to their enemies. For that confession suffices, which is made first to God, then to the priest also, who draweth near to pray for the sins of the penitents. For so at length may more be stirred up to penitence, if the sins confessed by the penitents be not published in the ears of the people." In the early ages public confession was only remitted in case of danger to the individual or scandal to the church: by this constitution of Leo secret confession to the priest was to take the place of open confession, and the priest's intercession of the intercession of the church. The door thus opened for escaping from the shame of public confession was never afterwards closed, and secret confession gradually became the rule of the church.

In the pontificate of Gregory the Great, a century and a half later, there is no evidence to be found of the existence of public confession: and even after private confession it was difficult to bring men to submit to public discipline (Expos. in 1 Reg. t. iii. 15, p. 342). "The sign of a true confession is not in the confession of the lips, but in the humiliation of penitence. . . . The confession of sin is required in order that the fruits of penitence may follow. . . . Saul, who confesses and is not willing to humble and afflict himself, is a type of those who make a sterile confession and bear no fruit of penance."

In the 7th century, the stern rule that solemn confession as a part of penitence was received only once, had become obsolete, but habitual confession had not yet taken its place. The first council of Châlons, A.D. 650 (1 Cabil. c. 8), declares that all agree that confession to the priest is a proof of penitence. The Penitential of Theodore (I. xii. 7) gives a rule which shows that auricular confession was not yet obligatory. "Confession if needful may be made to God only."

[COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.] Bede (tom. v. Exp. in S. Jac. v.) reverting to the old practice draws a distinction between the confession of frailties and of heinous sins. "We ought to use this discretion, our daily light sins confess to one another, and hope that by our prayers they may be healed; but the pollution of the greater leprosy let us according to the law open to the priest, and in the manner and the time which he directs, purify ourselves." The second council of Châlons, A.D. 813 (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 32) complains that people coming to confess neglect to do so fully, and orders each one when he comes to examine himself and make confession of the eight capital sins which prevail in the world—which are then enumerated—and by implication, of no others. Theodulph's Capitulary (c. 30) draws a distinction between confession made to a priest and that to God only, and (c. 31) mentions the same eight principal sins as the council, and appoints that every one learning to confess should be examined on what occasions and in what manner he had been guilty of any of them, and consequently be subjected to no further examination. Chrodegand (c. 32) orders "confession to be made at each of the three fasts of the year, 'et qui plus fecerit melius facit,' and monks to confess on each Sunday to their bishop or prior." But there is no other document showing that confession had yet become periodical. That secret confession was not yet a matter of obligation is clear from the canon of the council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 33). "Some say they ought to confess their sins to God only, and some think they are to be confessed unto the priests, both of which not without great fruit are practised in the Holy Church. . . . the confession which is made to God purgeth sins, that made to the priests teacheth in what way those sins should be purged." And so it remained an open question for the next 300 years, for Gratian (de Poenit. Dist. i. 89) summing up the opinions of different doctors on necessity of confession leaves it still undecided. "Upon what authorities or upon what strength of reasons both these opinions are grounded, I have briefly declared; which of them we should rather cleave to is left to the judgment of the reader; for both have for their favourers wise and religious men." And it was not determined till the famous decree of the Lateran council, A.D. 1215 (4 Conc. Lateran. c. 21) ordering all of each sex as soon as they arrived at years of discretion to confess at least once a year to their own priest.

iii. In the Eastern Church.—The duty of consulting a priest when the conscience is burdened is urged more strongly by the Greek than by the Latin fathers; there are consequently more distinct traces of secret confession to be found in the Eastern than in the Western church. Origen has one passage speaking directly of confession, not to God only but to the ministers of the church; the purpose of the confession however is not to obtain absolution, but spiritual guidance; after having spoken of evil thoughts which should be revealed in order that they might be destroyed by Him who died for us, he continues (Hom. 17 in Luc. fin.), "if we do this and confess our sins not only to God, but to those also who can heal our wounds and sins, our sins will be blotted out by Him," &c. In another passage, which is even more explicit, he speaks of the care required in choosing a discreet and learned minister to whom to open the grief, and the skill and tenderness required in him to whom it is confided (Hom. 2 in Ps. 37, t. 11, p. 688, ed. Bened.).

Athanasius (Vit. Ant. Erem. p. 75, ed. Augs.) narrates an injunction of Anthony to his fellow-recluses, that they should write down their thoughts and actions and exhibit the record to one another, which probably was the beginning of habitual confession among monastic orders, where there are many grounds for supposing it prevailed long before it became the custom of the church. Basil lays it down even more definitely than Origen, that in cases of doubt and difficulty resort should be had to a priest; and in his time such a priest was specially appointed in each diocese, whose office it was to receive such private confessions and decide whether they should be afterwards openly acknowledged. [PENITENTIARY.] Thus in Basil, Reg. brev. tract. (Q. 229) the question is proposed, "Whether forbidden actions ought to be laid open to all, or to whom, and of what sort?" And the answer is, that as with bodily disease, "so also the discovery of sins ought to be made to those able to cure them." Again (Q. 288) Basil asks, "he who wishes to confess his sins ought he to confess them to all, or to any chance person, or to whom?" and replies, "it is necessary to confess to those entrusted with the oracles of God." There would have been no necessity for regulations like these had not private confession been in frequent practice. In Serm. Ascet. (t. ii. p. 323, ed. Bened.) monks are directed, by a rule similar to that of Anthony, to tell to the common body any "thought of things forbidden, or unsuitable words, or remissness in prayer, or lukewarmness in psalmody, or desire after ordinary life," that through the common prayers the evil may be cured. Like instructions are found in the Reg. fus. tract. (Q. 26) "On referring everything, even the secrets of the heart, to the superior."

Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letoium, in Marshall, p. 100) in one place speaks of secret confession which is to be followed by penance: "he who of his own accord advances to the discovery of his sins, as by his voluntary accusation of himself he gives a specimen of the change that is in his mind towards that which is good, will deserve lighter correction," alluding to the well-established rule that voluntary confession was allowed to mitigate the subsequent penance: in another place he writes as if he commended the custom of confessing all transgression of positive law whether it involved penance or not, "if he who has transferred to himself the property of another by secret theft shall unfold his offence to the priest by secret confession, it will be sufficient to cure the guilt by a contrary disposition."

The abolition of the office of the Penitentiary made undoubtedly a great break in the practice of confession in the Eastern church. The account is given in Socrates (H. E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16). [PENITENTIARY.] It is difficult to believe that the scandal which had arisen in connection with the Penitentiary had not some influence on the teaching of St. Chrysostom, who immediately afterwards succeeded to the see of Constantinople. He both recommended and enforced penance, but any confession which had not immediate reference to discipline, he taught should be made to God alone. None of the fathers bear equally strong testimony against auricular confession (Hom. 5 de incomp. Dei nat. p. 490). "I do not bring you upon the stage before your fellow-servants, nor do I compel you to discover your sins in the presence of men, but to unfold your conscience to God, to show Him your ail and malady, and seek relief from Him." So (Hom. 20 in Gen. p. 175). "He who has done these things (grievous sins) if he would use the assistance of conscience for his need, and hasten to confess his sin, and show his sore to the physician who healeth and reproacheth not, and converse with Him alone, none knowing, and tell all exactly, he shall soon amend his folly. For confession of sins is the effacing of offences." For numerous other examples compare Dailé (iii. 14, iv. 25), Hooker (vi. c. iv. 16), note on Tertull. de Poenit. in Oxford Library of the Fathers, p. 401.

From the time of Chrysostom to the time of the Greek Penitentials there is no material evidence. Joannes Climacus (cited by Dailé) has a rule which points to the existence of confession in the eastern monasteries of the 6th century: a similar notice from Theodorus Studites, in his life of Plato, shows that the practice had a greater hold on the monks of the 9th century.

It appears from the Penitentials that some form of absolution was given in the east immediately after confession, a practice of which there is no trace for many centuries later in the Latin church. Joannes Jejunator orders that immediately after the confession is over and the priest has said the seven prayers of absolution. i.e., absolution in the precatory form, he is to raise the penitent from the ground and kiss him, and exhort him thus—"behold by the mercy of God who would have all men to be saved, you have fled for refuge to penitence, and made a confession, and been freed from all your former wicked works, do not therefore corrupt yourself a second time, &c. &c.;" after this the penitence is imposed. In the contemporary Penitential of Joannes Monachus the form of absolution directly after confession is still stronger. "May God who for our sake became man, and bore the sins of all the world, turn to your good all these things which you, my brother, have confessed to me, His unworthy minister, and free you from them all in this world, and receive you in the world to come, and bring all to be saved, who is blessed for ever." But this absolution did not entitle the penitent to Holy Communion, nor do away with the necessity of subsequent penitence, which often continued for years after this, and at the end of it another and more formal and perfect absolution was granted. (Morin. de Poenit. vi. 25.) On the practice of confession among the sects which broke away from the Orthodox church, see Daniel (Codex Liturgicus, iv. p. 590).

iv. Confession before receiving Holy Communion may have been an occasional practice, but the presumption is very strong against its having been a general one. Socrates (H. E. v. 19), in his account of the abolition of the office of the Penitentiary, states that Nectarius was advised to strike his name from the roll of ecclesiastical officers, and allow each one henceforward to communicate as his own conscience should direct; a notice which seems to imply that in the time of Nectarius, who was Chrysostom's predecessor at Constantinople, it had been the custom for the people to consult with the Penitentiary before presenting themselves to receive the eucharist. But the passage is an isolated one; it is supported by no other authority; and whatever value it may have, it is a two-edged testimony, for if it proves that the custom prevailed at that time, it also proves that after that time it ceased. On the other hand there is this class of indirect evidence, that no such preparation was generally enforced. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 43), relates that during the episcopate of Cornelius at Rome, 1050 widows and destitute people received alms from the church; the Roman church must therefore at that time have consisted of many thousands, to minister to whom were the bishop himself and forty-six presbyters; and when the frequency with which the faithful communicated even at the latter half of the 3rd century, is borne in mind, it would seem to be almost physically impossible that each one should make an individual confession before communicating. Similar evidence is furnished from the ancient liturgies, in which special directions are given to the deacon to warn to depart from the church the catechumens, penitents, and others who were not allowed to communicate, but no hint is given that those who had failed to confess were to be excluded. Stronger evidence is supplied by the absence of any mention of confession among the preparations required for a worthy reception of the sacrament. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 1, p. 318, Potter) seems to imply that some ministers judged who were or were not worthy [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413], though he himself thought the individual conscience the best guide. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 in Gen. p. 268, ed. Bened.) similarly leaves each one to judge of his fitness, "If we do this [reconcile ourselves with the brethren], we shall be able with a pure conscience to approach His holy and awful table, and to utter boldly those words joined to our prayers—the initiated know what I mean; wherefore I leave to everyone's conscience how, fulfilling that command, we may at that fearful moment utter these things with boldness." Augustine also tells his hearers that their own conscience, and that alone, must determine their fitness (Serm. 46 de Verb. Dom.), "considering your several degrees, and adhering to what you have professed, approach ye to the flesh of the Lord, approach ye to the blood of the Lord; whoso proveth himself not to be such, let him not approach." The second council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 46), gives detailed directions on the manner and order of receiving, but no word about confession—an omission which bears so much the more strongly upon the question, because private confession had undoubtedly begun to take the place of penitential confession in the 9th century.

v. At the hour of death.—The evidence on this head, still more than on the preceding, is negative. If confession immediately before death had been customary, some notice of it would have found a place in the narratives of the last hours of the saints and fathers of the early church. But no such records appear. Cyprian in three of his epistles (Ep. 18–20, Oxf. ed.), allows the confession of the lapsed to be received on their deathbed preparatory to imposition of hands; but this was only to meet the emergency of sudden illness overtaking penitents; it was no part of a systematic practice. Athanasius in his account of the death of Anthony (in Vit. Ant. Eremit. fin.), has no allusion to a previous confession. Equally silent is Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 21), on the death of Athanasius; and (Orat. 19), on the death of his own father, Gregory bishop of Nazianzum; and (Orat. 20), in the eulogy which he delivered at the tomb of Basil. Gregory Nyssen (de Vit. Greg. Thaum.) has no account of the deathbed confession of Gregory Thaumaturgus: nor has Ambrose (de Obi. Theod.) of that of Theodosius. Augustine (Confess. ix. 10, 11), records the last hours of his mother, but he records no last confession; his own last hours which Possidius (de Vit. Aug. c. 31) has described, were spent in penitence, but the only confession made was to God, "He was wont to say to us that even proved Christians, whether clergy or laity, should not depart from life without a full and fitting penitence, and this he carried out in his last illness. For he had the penitential psalms copied out and arranged against the wall in sets of four, and read them as he lay in bed, all through his sickness, and freely and bitterly wept. And he begged that he might not be interrupted, and that we would not go into his room except when his physicians came, or he needed food. And all that time we neither read nor spoke to him." Bede, narrating (Ecc. Hist. iv. 3), the death of bishop Ceadde, and (ib. iv. 23), the abbess Hilda, and (Cuth. Vit. c. 39) Cuthbert, states that each received the Holy Communion at the last, but not that it was preceded by confession. Similar is Eginhard's account (Vit. Car. Mag.), of the death of Charles the Great (see Dailly iv. 3, where the evidence is drawn out in detail).

vi. Time and Manner.—The time of public confession was originally whenever the penitent felt moved to acknowledge his sin before the church; afterwards, in common with the whole course of discipline, the time was restricted to certain seasons [PENITENCE]. Private confession not being part of the recognized order of the church, had necessarily no time assigned to it. The capitulary of Theodulph (c. 36) indeed orders confessions to be made the week before Lent, but this is an exceptional instance. There is an example of a confession made in writing by Potamius, archbishop of Braga to the 10th council of Toledo, A.D. 656, charging himself with misdemeanours. The confession was entirely spontaneous, for the council having no suspicion of his guilt could not at first believe him; but on his reaffirming the fact, he was deposed and subjected to penitence for the remainder of his life; allowed, however, out of compassion to retain his title, his successor signing himself bishop and metropolitan. Robert, bishop of the Cenomani (Le Mans), also made a written confession, but the council to which it was made absolved him (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; v. 10).

It appears from the Greek Penitentials that confession was made sitting; the penitent kneeling only twice while making his confession, at the beginning, when the priest asked the Holy Spirit's aid to move the man to disburden his soul completely, and at the end, when a prayer was offered that he might obtain grace to perform his sentence conscientiously. The origin of this custom was the great length to which the form and process of confessing extended. The practice has since continued in the Greek church, for both priest and penitent to sit (Martene de Rit. i. 3; Daniel Codex Liturg. iv. p. 588). The Penitential of Joannes Jejunator gives the following instructions on the order and manner of confessing; "he who comes to confess ought to make three inclinations of the body as he approaches the sacred altar, and say three times 'I confess to thee O Father, Lord God of heaven and earth, whatever is in the secret places of my heart.' And after he has said this he should raise himself and stand erect; and he who receives his confession should question him with a cheerful countenance, which he who confesses should also if possible present, and kiss his hand, especially if he sees the penitent to be depressed by the severity of his sorrow and shame, and after that he should say to him in a cheerful and gentle voice" . . . and then follow 95 questions, and the priest orders the penitent, if not a woman, to uncover his head even though he wear a crown: he then prays with him: after that he raises him and bids him recover his head, and sits with him, and asks him what penance he can bear. The Penitential of Joannes Monachus directs that the priest should invite the penitent into a church or some other retired spot, with a cheerful countenance, as though he were inviting him to some magnificent feast, and exhort him to make a confession of his sins to him: the priest should then recite with him the 69th Psalm, and the Trisagion, and bid him uncover his head, and neither should sit down before the priest has minutely investigated all that is in his heart. The penitent should afterwards prostrate himself on the earth and lie there, while the priest prays for him: the priest is then to raise him and kiss him, and lay his hand upon his neck and comfort him, after that they are to sit together. Alcuin, or the author of De Divinis officiis, orders the penitent coming to confess to bow humbly to the priest, who is then on his own behalf to say "Lord be merciful to me a sinner," and afterwards to order the penitent to sit opposite to him, and speak to him about his sins; the penitent is then to rehearse the articles of his faith, and afterwards kneel and raise his hands, and implore the priest to intercede with God for all the sins which have been omitted in the confession; he is then to prostrate himself on the ground, and the priest is to suffer him to lie there awhile, and afterwards raise him and impose a penance upon him: afterwards the penitent is again to prostrate himself, and ask the priest to pray that he may have grace given him to persevere in performing his penance; the priest then offers a prayer, which is followed by six others, which are found in all the Western Penitentials; the penitent then rises from the ground and the priest from his seat, and they enter the church together, and there conclude the penitential service. Compare Morinus (de Poenit. iv. 18-19).

Literature.—Morinus (de Poenit. lib. ii. et passim) who is however hampered by the Roman doctrine of obligatory confession, and contains far fewer details on this than on the other stages of discipline. What is to be said on the distinctively Roman side of the controversy will be found in Bellarmine (de Poenit. lib. iii.); and on the Protestant side in Ussher (Answer to a Challenge, s.v. Confession, Lond. 1625). The subject is more thoroughly treated from the same side in Dailé (de Auric. Confess. Genév. 1661), a very learned controversial work, and the source of most of the subsequent Protestant writings, which deal with confession. Also Bingham (Antiq. xviii. 3), Marshall (Penitential Discipline), and a long note on confession, founded on Dailé, appended by the editor of the Oxf. Lib. of Fathers to Tertullian (de Poenit.). [G. M.]

EXONARTHEX (Ἐξωνάρθηξ). Monastic churches sometimes have (besides the ordinary NARTHEX at the west end) an outer narthex, where the monks may say those portions of their devotions which bear the character of penitence without being disturbed by the influx of the general congregation. Cedrenus says that the great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had four nartheces, but other authorities attribute to it only two (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 202). [C.]

EXORCISM (ἄρκωσις, ἔξορκισμός, ἔξορκισμός, ἀφορκισμός adjuratio, invocatio) is the employment of adjuration, and especially the naming the name of Jesus Christ, with a view to expel an evil spirit. "Exorcismus est sermo increpationis contra immundum spiritum in energumenis sive catechumenis factus, per quem ab illis diaboli nequissima virtus et inveterata malitia vel excursio violenta fugetur" (Isidore, De Div. Off. ii. 20).

1. To the early Christians the heathen world presented itself as under the dominion of evil spirits; everywhere they recognized the need of driving these spirits from their ancient seats, whether in the bodies and souls of men, in the brute creation, or in inanimate objects. They saw themselves surrounded by squadrons and gross bands of daemonia, supernatural beings who worked for evil under their several captains (Origen, contra Celsum, bk. vii. p. 378, Spencer; viii. p. 399); daemonia were the great officers of the evil world, and might well have fasces and toga praetexta (Tertullian, de Idolol. 18); the gods of the nations were daemonia (ib. 20; Orig. c. Cels. p. 378, quoting Ps. xvi. 5); daemonia were by some devilish magic compelled to inhabit the statues in an idol's temple (Minucius Felix, Oct. c. 27; Tert. u. s. 7 and 15; Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 374); the theatre was the very special dominion of evil spirits (Tertul. de Spectac. 26). Demons ruled the flight of birds, the lots, the oracles; they troubled men's minds, disturbed their rest, crept with their subtle influence into bodies and caused disease, distorted limbs; they compelled men to worship them, in order that, fed with the savour of the offerings, they might release those whom they had bound (Minucius, Oct. c. 27). And the members of this great supernatural army were driven from their seats by the mere word of a simple Christian naming over them the name of Christ (Acts xix. 13; Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. c. 8; Dial. v. Trypho. c. 85; Tertul. ad Scapulam, cc. 2 and 4, Apol. c. 23; Orig. c. Cels. iii. p. 133) with no parade of incantations or magic formulae, by mere prayers and adjurations (ἀρκώσεων, Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 334), or by sentences of Scripture (ib. p. 376); and that not only from the bodies and souls of men, but from haunted places and from the lower animals; for these too fell under the tyranny of demons (l. c.). From such expressions as these it is evident that exorcism was practised from a very early period in the church.

In one form, indeed, exorcism was practised by the Lord Himself and His disciples, namely, in the casting out of evil spirits from those who were in a special sense "possessed" or "demoniac;" and such exorcism was continued for some generations in the church [DEMONIAC: EXORCIST]. But we are at present concerned with the more general form of exorcism, by which the inherent evil demon was to be expelled from some creature or substance not specially "possessed," but belonging to the "evil world."

2. It is not wonderful that when the minds of men were full of the conception of an all-pervading army of evil spirits in the world around them, they should endeavour to free from this influence those whom they received from heathenism into the holy ground of the church. Hence, at a comparatively early period, we find candidates for baptism not only renouncing for themselves all allegiance to Satan and his powers, but having pronounced over them a formula of exorcism.

It is probable that in the first instance the use of exorcism was confined to the case of those who entered the church from heathenism; but in the 4th century, if not earlier, it was clearly applied to all, for it is constantly appealed to as a conclusive proof that the church recognized the presence of original sin even in infants. Thus Optatus (c. Donatist, iv. 6, p. 75) insists that no one, even though born of Christian parents, can be destitute of a foul spirit, which must be driven out of the man before he comes to the font of salvation; this is the work of exorcism, by which the foul spirit is driven forth into the wilderness. And pope Celestinus (Ad Episcop. Gall. c. 12) says that none came to baptism, whether infants or "juvenes," until the evil spirit had been driven out of them by the exorcisms and insufflations of the clerics. Compare Augustine, Epist. 194, ad Sxtum, § 46; De Symbolo ad Catechumenos, i. 5; Contra Julianum, i. 4.

Cyril of Jerusalem (Procatechesis, c. 9, p. 7; Catech. i. c. 5, p. 18) begs his catechumens to be earnest in receiving their exorcisms (ἐπορκισμοὺς); whether they had been insufflated or exorcised (κὰν ἐμνοσηθῆς κὰν ἐπορκισθῆς), he prays that they may be blessed. And again (c. 13) he says, "when ye have entered before the hour of the exorcisms, let every one speak things that conduce to piety," as if the exorcisms began the catechetical office on each occasion. These instructions are evidently for all the catechumens, and not for those only who had come over from heathenism. And Chrysostom (Catech. I. ad Initian. c. 2, p. 227) speaks of the catechumens, after instruction, proceeding to hear the words of those who exorcise (τῶν ἐπορκισόντων); to this exorcism they went barefooted and stripped of their upper garments. There can of course be no doubt that the great body of those whom Chrysostom catechised were born of Christian families.

3. Formulae of Exorcism.—Celsus, who wrote against the Christians probably in the middle of the 2nd century, says that he had seen in the possession of certain presbyters "barbaric books containing names of daemons and gibberish (τερατείας)" (Orig. c. Celsum, vi. p. 302); and again the same opponent says that, "to name the demons in the barbarous tongue (βαρβάρως) is efficacious; to name them in Greek or Latin is useless" (ib. viii. p. 402). Origen, in answer to this, alleges that Latin, Greek, or other Christians in their prayers use the name of God in the tongue in which they were born; but he does not deny the superior efficacy of names or formulae in one language over those in another. On the contrary, he admits (ib. i. p. 19) the mystic power of Hebrew names, and declares that Egyptian, Persian, and other names have a peculiar efficacy over certain demons; and elsewhere (In Matt. ser. 110, p. 232, ed. Wirceb.) complains that those who practised exorcisms (adjurationibus) used improper books, as, for instance, books derived from Jewish sources. From all this it seems clear that formulae of exorcism which to a Roman seemed "barbaric" were in use in the 2nd century. That written forms of exorcism were used in the 4th is clear from the 7th of the Statuta Antiqua [Conc. Carth. IV.], which orders the bishop to deliver to an EXORCIST on ordination a book containing such forms.

With regard to the form of exorcism, we find in ancient authorities the following particulars.

We have already seen that to name the name of Christ was regarded as being of the utmost efficacy for the expulsion of evil spirits. The passage of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. 85; compare c. 30) which says that every spirit (δαμόνιον) is conquered and subjected on being adjured "by the Name of the Son of God and first-born of every creature, Who was born of the Virgin and became Man capable of suffering (παθητοῦ), was crucified under Pontius Pilate by your [the Jewish] people, and died, and rose again from the dead, and ascended into heaven," renders it probable that a recitation of the redeeming acts of the Lord accompanied the naming of his name. And the same thing seems to be indicated by the words of Origen (c. Cels. i. p. 7), who says that demons were expelled by the name of Jesus, "together with the recitation of the acts related of Him" (μετὰ τῆς ἀπαγγελίας τῶν περὶ αὐτὸν ιστοριῶν). See Probst, p. 49.

The words of Tertullian again (Apol. 23), that the power of Christians over evil spirits derives its force from naming Christ, "and from the making mention of those punishments which await them from God through Jesus Christ the judge," make it probable that the awful punishment which was to overtake the evil ones was spoken of in the formula of exorcism. So Tertullian: "representatione ignis illius" (Apol. 23). And in another passage—"Satanas . . . quem nos dicimus malitiae angelum" . . . (De Testim. Animae, c. 3)—we are to take "dicimus" in a ritual sense, it would appear that the exorcists of Tertullian's time cursed and reviled Satan.

That prayer was added to the exorcism proper we know from the testimony of Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 27, § 5).

The actions which formed part of the rite of exorcism were touching and breathing on the afflicted, and signing them with the cross.

As to the first, Tertullian tells us (Apol. 23), that the evil spirits depart unwillingly from the bodies of men at the touch and on-breathing of Christians (de contactu deque afflatu nostro). Vincentius of Thibari (Sententiae Episcoporum, No. 37, in Cyprian's Works), contending that heretics require baptism at least as much as heathens, distinctly refers to the imposition of hands in exorcism, quoting (incorrectly) Mark xvi. 17, 18. So Origen (on Jo-hua, Hom. 24, c. 1) speaks of the imposition of the hands of the exorcists which evil spirits could not resist. Similarly the Arabic canons of Hippolytus (Can. 19, § 6, and Can. 29, quoted by Probst, p. 50). The same canon enjoins the exorcist, after the adjurations, to "sign" (no doubt with the cross) the breast, forehead, ears, and mouth. And at an even earlier date, when Justin (Dial. c. 131) speaks of the outstretched arms of Moses as a type of Christ, and then immediately after of the power of Christ crucified over evil spirits, it is not improbable that he alludes to the use of the sign of the cross. So when we read (Origen on Exodus, Hom. 6, § 8) how the demons tremble before the cross which they see on Christians, we may well believe that the reference is to the use of the cross in exorcism. Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 27) distinctly mentions the use of the sign of the cross (signum passionis) for the expulsion of evil spirits. The first council of Constantinople (c. 7) describes the course of proceeding with those heretics who were to be received as non-Christians (ὧς ἑΑλληνας) as follows: "the first day we make them Christians; the second, catechumens; then the third we exorcise them, after breathing thrice upon the face and ears, and so we catechise them, and cause them to stay in the church and hear the Scriptures; and then we baptize them."

The ceremony took place in the church. "Shameless is he," says Pseudo-Cyprian (De Spectac. c. 4), "who exorcises in a church demons whose delights he favours in a theatre." During the exorcism the patient lay prostrate on the ground (Origen on Matt. Hom. 13, § 7).

Most of the characteristics of the form of exorcism which we have traced in ancient times are found in existing rituals. For instance, in the ancient Roman form of receiving a heathen as a catechumen (Daniel, Codex Lit. i. 171), after the admonition to renounce the devil and believe in the Holy Trinity, the priest "exsufflat ab eo saevam maligni spiritus potestatem dicens—'Exi, immunde spiritus, et da locum Spiritui Sancto Paraclito.'" Then he signs him with the cross on the forehead and breast. At the seventh scrutiny [SCRUTINIUM], which took place on Easter Eve, after the recitation of the Creed by the candidates for baptism, the priest lays his hand on the head of each severally, saying—"Nec te lateat, Satanas, imminere tibi tormenta, imminere tibi diem iudicii, diem supplici, diem qui venturus est velut clibanus ardens, in quo tibi atque universis angelis tuis aeternus veniet interitus. Proinde, damnate, da honorem Deo vivo et vero: da honorem Jesu Christo filio ejus et Spiritui Sancto, in cujus nomine atque virtute praecipio tibi ut ex eas et recedas ab hoc famulo Dei, quem hodie Dominus Deus noster Jesus Christus ad suam sanctam gratiam et benedictionem fontemque baptismatis vocare dignatus est, ut fiat ejus templum per aquam regenerationis in remissionem omnium peccatorum: in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos et saeculum per ignem" (Daniel, u. s. 177). Then follows the epheta [EARS, TOUCHING OF], and the anointing on the breast and between the shoulders with holy oil.

In the Vetus Missale Gallicanum, published by Thomasius and reprinted by Mabillon (Lit. Gall. bk. iii. p. 338) the essential part of the form of exorcism is as follows: "Aggredior te, immundissime damnate spiritus . . . Te, invocato Domini nostri Jesu Christi nomine, . . . adjuramus per ejusdem majestatem adque virtutem, passionem ac resurrectionem, adventum adque judicium; ut in quacumque parte membrorum latitas propria te confessione manifestes, exagitatique spiritalibus flagris invisibilibusque tormentis vas quod occupasse aestimas fugias expiatumque post habitationem tuam Domino derelinquas . . . Abscede, abscede quocumque es, et corpora Deo dicata ne repetas. Interdicta sint tibi ista in perpetuo. In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, et in gloria dominicae passionis, cujus cruci ore salvantur, cujus adventum expectant, judicium confitentur. Per Dominum."

The Gelasian Sacramentary (i. 33), in the Exorcismi sup' Electos,* gives the following form. The acolytes, laying their hands on the candidate, after praying God to send forth His angel to keep them, proceeds: "Ergo, maledicte diabole, recognosce sententiam tuam, et da honorem Deo vivo et vero, et . . . Jesu Christo Filio ejus et Spiritui Sancto; et recede ab his famulis Dei; quia istos sibi Deus . . . vocare dignatus est: per hoc signum sanctae crucis, frontibus eorum quod nos damus, tu, maledicte diabole, nunquam audeas violare. . . . Audi, maledicte Satanas, adjuratus per nomen aeterni Dei et Salvatoris nostri Filii Dei, cum tua victus invidia, tremens gemensque discede."

And again, the foul spirit is adjured to depart, in the case of the males, in the name of Him who walked the water and stretched out His right hand to Peter; in the case of the females, in the name of Him who gave sight to him that was born blind, and raised Lazarus from his four days' death.

The form given from the Roman ritual by Probst (p. 53) presents a remarkable parallelism with the passage of Tertullian (Apol. c. 23) before referred to.

Greek forms similar in character to those given above may be seen in Daniel's Codex Liturg. iv. 493 f.

4. Representation of Exorcism.—Paciaudi (De Christianorum Balneis, pp. 136 ff., 143 ff.) describes an urn or water-vessel found near Pisaura, which he believes to be not of later date than the 7th century. One of the bas-reliefs on this vessel (see woodcut) evidently represents an exorcism. The contortions of the person on the ground seem to show that it was an exorcism of one possessed. Now, if the vessel was a font for holding the baptismal water, it would seem more appropriate to represent upon it the ordinary pre-baptismal exorcism. It seems therefore more probable that it was intended for the

* i. e. the accepted candidates for baptism.

ATRIUM of a church, where it might be used to contain HOLY WATER.

5. Besides human beings, various inanimate objects were exorcised. Of these we may mention especially water [BAPTISM, §§ 30, 42; FONT, BENEDICTION OF: HOLY WATER], salt for use in sacred offices [SALT, BENEDICTION OF], and oil for various uses [CHRISM: OIL, HOLY].

(Martene, De Ritibus Antiquis; Probst, Sakramente und Sakramentalien, Tübingen, 1872; F. C. Baur, Kirchengeschichte der Drei ersten Jahrhunderte, c. 6.) [C.]

EXORCISTS. Exorcists are only once mentioned in the New Testament (Acts xix. 13), and then without any reference to the power given to Christians to cast out devils. [See DICT. OF BIBLE.] In the early days of the church, it appears to have been considered that the power of exorcising evil spirits was a special gift of God to certain persons, who are therefore called exorcists. In the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. c. 26), it is said that an exorcist is not ordained, because the power of exorcising is a free gift of the grace of God, through Christ, and that whoever has received this gift will be made manifest in the exercise of it. It is added that if expedient an exorcist may be ordained bishop, priest, or deacon. Exorcists are not named among those who received ecclesiastical stipends, nor are they mentioned in the Apostolic Canons, though probably their office is alluded to in the direction that a Gentile convert who has an evil spirit may not be received into the church till he has been purified (καθαρισθῆις, Can. 70). Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 30, § 1, 8), thinks that exorcists were either priests or deacons. So Eusebius makes mention of one Romanus, as deacon and exorcist in the church of Caesarea in Palestine (De Martyr. Palest. c. 2).

Tertullian speaks as if all Christians were exorcists, driving away evil spirits by the exorcisms of their prayers. Thus (De Idol. c. 11), he forbids Christians to have anything to do with the sale of things used for the purposes of idolatry, asking with what consistency they could exorcise their own inmates, to whom they had offered their houses as a shrine (cellarium); and in another place (De Cor. Mil. c. 11), uses as an argument against Christians entering the military service, that they might be called upon to guard the heathen temples, so as to defend those by night whom by their exorcisms they had put to flight during the day.

But it is evident that in later times they were reckoned among the minor orders of clergy. Cyprian (Ep. 69, Mag. Fil.), speaks of exorcists as casting out devils by man's word and God's power, and in his epistle to Firmilian (Ep. 75), says that one of the exorcists, inspired by the grace of God, cast out a certain evil spirit who had made pretensions to sanctity. Cornelius in his epistle (Euseb. H. E. i. c. 43) names forty-two exorcists among the clergy of the church of Rome. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 21), mentions them among the clergy, ranking them with the hermeneutae, immediately after the deaconesses. Paulinus of Nola (De S. Felic. Natal. carn. 4), speaks of St. Felix as having been promoted from the order of lectors to the office of exorcist. The council of Laodicea (c. 24), mentions them among the minor clergy, placing them between the singers and the doorkeepers, and, in another canon (c. 26), forbids any to exorcise either in church or in private houses, who had not been appointed to the office by the bishops. The council of Antioch (c. 10), places them after the subdeacons, among the clergy who might be appointed by the chorepiscopi. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), provides an office for the ordination of an exorcist. He was to receive from the hands of the bishop a book, in which were written forms of exorcism, with the bidding, "Take and commit to memory, and receive power to lay hands on energumens whether baptized or catechumens." The same council also provided that exorcists might lay hands on an energumen at any time (c. 90), and (c. 92) gave it into their charge to provide the energumens with their daily food while remaining in the church. [DEMONIACS.]

The names of four exorcists, designating themselves by no other titles, are found among the signatories of the first council of Arles (Routh's Reliq. Sac. iv. p. 312).

There seems little reason for connecting the exorcists with the form of exorcism that was used in the case of all catechumens. Their work, as expressly allotted to them by the 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), lay among all energumens, whether baptized or not. [P. O.]

EXPOSING OF INFANTS [compare FOUNDLINGS]. The frequency of the exposition of infants among the ancient heathens is a fact to which both the mythology and the history of Greece and Rome bear frequent witness. Among the early Christian writers we find exposition, together with actual infanticide, constantly cast in the teeth of their Pagan opponents. "I see you," writes Minucius Felix, "now casting forth the sons whom ye have begotten to the wild beasts and to the fowls of the air" (Octavius, c. 30, § 2; 31, § 4). Lactantius (bk. vi. c. 20) inveighs against the false pity of those who expose infants. Justin, Tertullian, Augustine and others might be quoted to much the same effect.

A law of Alexander Severus, which has been retained in Justinian's Code (bk. viii. t. lii., l. i.; A.D. 225), allowed the recovering of an infant exposed against the will or without the knowledge of the owner or person entitled to the services of its mother, whether slave or adscriptitia, but only on condition of repaying the fair cost of its maintenance and training to a trade, unless theft could be established—an enactment obviously framed only to secure the rights of slave-owners, and not inspired by any consideration of humanity for the infants themselves. There is something of a higher spirit in a law of Diocletian and Maximin, A.D. 295 (Code, bk. v., t. iv., l. 16), enacting that where a female infant had been cast forth by her father and brought up by another person, who sought to marry her to his own son, the father was bound to consent to the marriage, or in case of refusal (if we construe the text aright), to pay for his daughter's maintenance. Constantine (A.D. 331), by a law contained in the Theodosian Code (bk. v., t. vii., l. 1), but not reproduced by Justinian, enacted that whoever took up an infant cast forth from its house by the will of a father or master, and nourished it till it became strong, might retain it in whatever condition he pleased, either as a child or as a slave, without any fear of recovery by those who have voluntarily cast out their new-born slaves or children. The growth of Christian humanity is shown in a constitution of Valentinian, Valens and Gratian, adopted by Justinian (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 2; A.D. 374), which absolutely forbade masters or patrons to recover infants exposed by themselves, if charitably saved by others, and laid down as a duty that every one must nourish his own offspring. A constitution of Honorius and Theodosius, in the Theodosian Code (A.D. 412), repeated the prohibition, observing that "none can call one his own whom he contemned while perishing," but required a bishop's signature by way of attestation of the facts (bk. v., t. vii., l. 2).

The law last referred to may seem in some degree to explain a canon of the council or synod of Vaison, A.D. 442. There is a universal complaint, it says, on the subject of the exposition of infants, who are cast forth not to the mercy of others, but to the dogs, whilst the fear of lawsuits deters others from saving them. This therefore is to be observed, that according to the statutes of the princes the church be taken to witness; from the altar on the Lord's day the minister is to announce that the church knows an exposed infant to have been taken up, in order that within ten days any person may acknowledge and receive it back; and any who after the ten days may bring any claim or accusation is to be dealt with by the church as a manslayer (cc. 9, 10). A canon almost to the same effect, but in clearer language, was enacted by the slightly later 2nd council of Arles, A.D. 452, indicating that which serves to explain both the law of Honorius and the two canons just referred to, viz., that it was the practice to expose infants "before the church" (c. 51). The council of Agde, in 506, simply confirmed former enactments.

In the East, the full claims of Christian humanity were at last admitted by Justinian, as towards foundlings themselves, though without sufficient consideration for parental duties. He not only absolutely forbade the re-vindication of exposed infants under any circumstances, but also the treating of them, by those who have taken charge of them, either as slaves, freedmen, coloni or adscriptitii, declaring such children to be absolutely free (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 3; A.D. 529; see also bk. i., t. iv., l. 24; A.D. 530). This applied to infants cast away either in churches, streets or any other place, even though a plaintiff should give some evidence of a right of ownership over them (bk. viii., t. lii., l. 4). The 153rd Novel, however, shows that it was still the practice in certain districts (Thessalonica is specified) to expose new-born infants in the churches, and after they had been brought up to reclaim them as slaves;

The Wisigothic law contains some rather remarkable provisions as to the exposition of infants (bk. iv., t. iv., cc. 1, 2). Where a person has out of compassion taken up a foundling of either sex, wherever exposed, and when it is nourished up the parents acknowledge it, if it be the child of a free person, let them either give back a slave in its place or pay the price of one; otherwise, let the foundling be redeemed by the judge of the territory from the ownership of the parents, and let these be subject to perpetual exile. If they have not wherewithal to pay, let him serve for the infant who cast it forth, and let the latter remain in freedom, whom the pity of strangers has preserved. If indeed slaves of either sex have cast forth an infant in fraud of its masters, when he has been nourished up, let the nourisher receive one-third of its value, the master swearing to or proving his ignorance of the exposing. But if he knew of it, let the foundling remain in the power of him who nourished it.

In a collection of Irish canons, ascribed to the end of the 7th century, is one "on infants cast forth in the church," which enacts, in very uncouth and obscure Latin, that such an infant shall be a slave to the church unless sent away; and that seven years' penance is to be borne by those who cast infants forth (bk. xli., c. 22).

A capitulary of uncertain date (supposed about 744) enacts, in accordance with the canon of the synod of Vaison before referred to, that if an infant exposed before the church has been taken up by the compassion of any one, such person shall affix—probably on the church door—a letter of notice (contestationis ponat . . . epistolam). If the infant be not acknowledged within ten days, let the person who has taken it up securely retain it (c. 1).

The "Lex Romana," supposed to represent the law of the Roman population of Italy in Lombard times, contains a less liberal provision on this subject, founded on the earlier imperial law. If a new-born infant has been cast out by its parents either in the church or in the precincts (platea), and any one with the knowledge of the father or mother and of the master has taken it up and nourished it by his labour, it shall remain in his power who took it up. And if a person knew not its father or mother or master, and wished nevertheless to take it up, let him present the infant before the bishop (pontificem) or the clerics who serve that church, and receive from the hand of that bishop and those clerks an epistola collectionis, and thenceforth, let him have power either to give such infant liberty, or to retain it in perpetual slavery (bk. v., t. vii.). EXPULSION FROM A MONASTERY.

So soon as there began to be any sort of discipline among the ascetics who dwelt together in a community, expulsion inevitably became a necessary part of it. In the so-called "Rule of Pachomius," expulsion (or a flogging) was the penalty for insubordination, licentiousness, quarrelling, covetousness, gluttony (cf. Cass. Inst. iv. 16). Menard, however, thinks that this was only expulsion for a stated time (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regg. xxxi. 5). By the Regula Orientalis

(c. 35) obstinate offenders are to be expelled. Benedict, with characteristic prudence, prescribed expulsion for contumacy (Reg. c. 71), on the principle that the gangrened limb must be lopped off, lest the rest of the body should be infected with the poison (ib. c. 28), while with characteristic gentleness he allowed such offenders to be re-admitted, if penitent, so often as thrice, on condition of their taking the lowest place among the brethren (ib. c. 29). Some commentators, however, take this permission as not extending to the case of a monk expelled for such vices as could hardly fail to corrupt the community (Mart. Reg. Comm. loc. cit.). The Benedictine reformers generally made expulsion more common and readmission more difficult. Fructuosus orders all incorrigible offenders to be expelled (Reg. cc. 8, 16); and the Regula Cujusdam, still more severe, enacts expulsion for lying, fornication, persistent murmuring, and even abusive language (cc. 6, 8, 16, 18). At a later period, under the stern discipline of Cîteaux, a monk was to be unfrocked and expelled, even for theft above a certain value (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 33). Obviously the frequency or infrequency of such a penalty as expulsion depended on the monastery being regarded rather as a reformatory or as a place of ideal perfection. [I. G. S.]

EXTREME UNCTION. [SICK, VISITATION OF THE : UNCTION.]

EX VOTO. [VOTIVE OFFERINGS.]

EYES, TOUCHING OF. 1. The first council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) laid it down (c. 7) that Arians and certain other heretics were to be received into the church, without rebaptism, on renouncing their heresy and being crossed or anointed with holy unguent (μύρον) on the forehead, eyes, &c. So in the form of baptism given by Daniel (Codex Lit. iv. 507) from the Greek Euchologion, the priest after baptism anoints the neophyte with holy unguent, mak g the sign of the cross on forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet, saying, "the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit. Amen." Compare Martene, De Rit. Ant. I. i. 17, Ord. 24, 25.

2. In extreme unction, the eyes are anointed with holy oil. Thus, in the Ratold MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 549, ed. Ménard), the priest is directed to anoint the eyes, with the words: "Ungo oculos tuos de oleo sanctificato, ut quicquid illicito visu deliquisti per hujus olei unctionem expietur."

3. It seems to have been the custom to touch the eyes, as well as the other organs of sense, with the moisture remaining on the lips after communicating (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Myst. v. 22: see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413; EARS, TOUCHING OF). [C.]

EZEKIEL, the prophet; commemorated April 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi); Miaziah 5 = March 31, and Hamle 27 = July 21 (Cal. Ethiop.); Sept. 3 (Cal. Armen.). [W. F. G.]

EZRA, the prophet; commemorated Jakatit 10 = Feb. 4, and Hamle 6 = June 30 (Cal. Ethiop.), July 13 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FABARIUS. The Cantores anciently fasted the day before they were to sing divine offices, but ate beans, as being supposed to benefit the voice (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xx. 6); whence they were called by the heathen Fabarii (Isidore, De Div. Off. ii. 12). [C.]

FABIANUS, the pope, martyr at Rome in the time of Decius; commemorated Jan. 20 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FABIUS, martyr at Caesarea; "Passio" July 31 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FABRICA ECCLESIAE. [CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388.]

FACE, BRANDING IN THE. It was enacted under Constantine (Code, lib. ix. tit. 47, l. 17), that branding should not be in the face, as disfiguring the heavenly beauty [CORPORAL PUNISHMENTS, p. 470]. [C.]

FACITERGIUM (also facietergium, facietergium, facietergula; facialis, faciale). This, as its name indicates, is a handkerchief for wiping the face ("facietergium et manitergium, a tergendō faciem vel manus vocatur." Isidore, Etym. xix. 26). Mention of this is occasionally found in various monastic rules. It is appointed as part of the furniture of a monk's couch in the Rule of St. Isidore (c. 14; p. 127, part 2, in Holstenius, Codex Regularum; ed. Paris, 1663). See also Magistri Regula, cc. 17, 19, 81 (op. cit. pp. 214, 216, 257). The last passage ordains that there shall be dealt out "singula facietergia per decadam." Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patrum, viii. 8; p. 1191, ed. Ruinart) speaks of the value set upon the "facietergium dependentibus villis intextum, quod Sanctus [i.e. Nicetius Lugdunensis] super caput in die obitus sui habuit." The facietergia used by nuns were at times embroidered (Caesarii Regula ad Virgines, c. 42; Holstenius, part 3, p. 22). Again, Venantius Fortunatus, in his life of St. Radegundis of France, describes her on one occasion as "circa altare cum facietergio jacentem pulverem colligens" (c. 2; Patrol. lxxii. 653). One more example may suffice, where the word, perhaps, appears in the transitional state of its meaning: "donata etiam particula sancti orarii, id est facialis" (Hypomnesticon de Anastasio Apocriario, etc., in Anast. Biblioth. Collectanea: Patrol. cxxix. 685). For further examples, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv. [R. S.]

FAITH. [SOPHIA.]

FAITHFUL. The present article is intended to give an account of the principal names applied to Christians in early times, whether by themselves or by others.

The names most common among Christians in the apostolic and sub-apostolic ages seem to have been Saints (ἅγιοι), Elect (ἐκλεκτοί), Brethren (ἀδελφοί), and Faithful (πιστοί), often followed by the words, ἐν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ.

The words πιστὸς and Fidelis were also used in a special sense to distinguish the baptized Christian from the catechumen. Thus Augustine (Tract. in Joan. 44, c. 9) says that if a man tells us that he is a Christian, we have to ask further, whether he is catechumen or "fidelis." Hence such an inscription as CHRISTIANA FIDELIS (Le Blant, Inscript. de la Gaule, i. 373) is not a mere pleonasm. So the council of Elvira (C. Elib. c. 67) seems to distinguish between "fidelis" and "catechumena." In the liturgies, the portion of the office at which catechumens were not allowed to be present was called Missa Fidelium, and the Lord's Prayer Fidelium Oratio. See Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Πιστός. Eusebius (Praep. Evang. i. 1) repudiates the charge that Christians were called πιστοί from their credulity.

Fidelis is a frequent epithet in inscriptions, particularly in the case of young children, who might otherwise be supposed to have died unbaptized. Thus an inscription given by Marangoni (Acta S. Victorini, 103) runs thus: HIC REQUIESCIT IN PACE FILIPPUS || INFAS FIDELIS. Similar inscriptions are given in the case of a child who died at the age of a year and nine months (Ib. p. 109), and of another who died at the age of five years and five months (Ib. p. 96). Another may be seen in Cavedoni (Ant. Cimit. di Chiusi, p. 33). On a marble at Florence (Gori, Inscr. Ant. Etrur. iii. 314) it is said of a child of three years and three months, ΠΙCΤΗ ΕΤΕΛΕΥΤΗCΕΝ. In one case given by Marini (Frat. Arval. p. 171), the inscription describes an ancestress (major) begging baptism for a child at the point of death: PETIVIT AB ECCLESIA UT FIDELIS DE SECVLO RECECISSET (i. e. recederet). In another case (Oderico, Inscr. l. c. p. 267), one of two brothers, who died at eight years old, is described as NEOFITVS, while the brother, who died at seven, is described as FIDELIS. And again a guardian described as FIDELIS, erects a monument to a nursing boy who was yet among the "audientes" or catechumens: ALVMNAE AVDIENTI (Gori, u. s. i. 228).

Such inscriptions as VIXIT IN PACE FIDELIS, or REQUIESCIT FIDELIS IN PACE, are too common to need particularizing (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Fidelis).

Other names given to Christians were perhaps either (1) Designations of some peculiarity of their practice or profession, rather than recognized titles; more epithets than names; or (2) names given them by the outside world, either in derision or by mistake.

I. Under the first head may be classed (a) Ἰεσσαῖς; Jessaeans, a name which Epiphanius (Haer. 29, n. 4) says may be derived from Jesus, or (as seems far-fetched and improbable) from Jesse, the father of David. Epiphanius (u. s.) considers this name earlier than that of "Christian."

Another such name was (b) γνῶστικοί, applied to Christians by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 294; ii. p. 383; vi. p. 665; vii. p. 748) as having the true knowledge. Later we find Athanasius (ap. Socrat. Hist. Eccl. iv. 23) using the term of the Ascetics of Egypt, and Socrates (ibid.) tells us that Evagrius Ponticus wrote a book for the use of these Ascetics, called "The Gnostic, or Rules for the Contemplative Life."

(c) Θεοφόροι, a name claimed by Ignatius in his interview with Trajan (Acta Ignat. ap. Grabe, Spicil. t. ii. p. 10), because he "carried Christ in his heart," and seemingly conceded especially to him, was commonly used of all Christians, as Pearson (Vind. Ignat. par. ii. c. 12, p. 397) shows by quotations from many writers of the 2nd century.

Clement of Alexandria, agreeing about the meaning of the name, gives the varieties of it Θεοφοράν and Θεοφοροῦμενος, and Eusebius (viii. 10) quotes a letter of Phileas, bishop of Thmuis, to his flock, in which he calls the martyrs Χριστοφόροι.

(d) St. Ambrose (de obit. Valentin. t. iii. p. 12) speaks of Christians as Christi, i. e. "anointed," and justifies his use of the title by reference to Ps. cv. 15, "nolite tangere Christos meos," all Christians receiving the unction of the Holy Spirit, and Jerome commenting on the passage (Ps. civ. [cv.]), justifies it by the same reference.

(e) The name Ecclesiastici was used within the Christian body (Bingham, i. 1, § 8) to distinguish the clergy from the laity, and with a modification of this meaning of the word Eusebius (iv. 7) speaks of "ecclesiastical writers;" and it was also used of Christians generally in contrast to those who did not belong to the ἐκκλησία, as Jews, infidels, and heretics. Bingham quotes Eusebius (iv. 7, v. 27), and Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 15, n. 4), as employing the word in this sense, and Valesius (not. in Euseb. l. ii. c. 25) finds the same use of it in "Origen, Epiphanius, Jerome, and others" [ECCLESIASTICUS].

(f) Bingham asserts that Christians were called οἱ τοῦ δόγματος, "They of the Faith," giving as his authority for this statement the rescript of Aurelian against Paul of Samosata, quoted by Eusebius (vii. 30), in which the bishops of Rome and of Italy are called ἐπισκοποὶ τοῦ δόγματος.

(g) Christians also called themselves CATHOLIC [see the word]; and (h) Pisciculi, alluding to the mystic Fish [BAPTISM, p. 171; FISH].

It is to be observed, says Bingham (i. 1, § 6) that all these names express some relation to God or to Christ, and that none of them were taken from the names of men, as was the case with the heresies and sects. He quotes Chrysostom (Hom. 33 in Act.), Epiphanius (Haer. 42. Marcionit., also Haer. 10.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 31, p. 506) and others as noticing these opposite tendencies. The name of Christian was neglected by the heretics for the names of their leaders, while the Christians thought it enough without any other title derived from parents, country, city, quality, or occupation; see the case of the deacon Sanctus martyred in the reign of Antoninus, related by Eusebius (v. 1).

II. Among the names given to Christians from without their body are probably to be reckoned

(1) Χρῆστοι, a name which would easily arise from a misunderstanding or mispronunciation of the name Χριστοί, and was naturally not refused by Christians; referred to by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 4), Lactantius (Inst. iv. 7), Tertullian (Apol. c. 3), and others.

(2) It was quite to be expected that they would be called Jews by the heathen world, and there is evidence of this. Bingham (i. 1, § 10) refers to a passage in Dio's Life of Domitian, in which he speaks of the Christian martyr Ocilius Glabrio (Baronius, an. 94, § 1), being put to death for turning to the Jews' religion.

Again, Suetonius says (Claud. c. 26) that Claudius "expelled the Jews from Rome because they made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus;" and Spartianus (in Caracal. c. i.) says that Caracalla's playfellow was a Jew, Caracalla, according to Tertullian (ad Scapul. c. 4), having been "lacte Christiano educatus."

(3) There remains to be considered the word Christian, a name which differs from those already spoken of in being traceable to a particular locality, and with great probability to a particular year. The reason why the name arose when and where it did, is probably to be found in the long stay—"a whole year"—(Acts xi. 26) made in Antioch by Paul and Barnabas after their return from Tarsus, in the assembly of the church there for the same time, and in the publicity given to the teaching of Christ by frequent addresses to the people.

The question whether the Christians assumed the name themselves or received it from the Jews, or from the Gentiles, can only be determined with an approach to certainty.

(a) The only reason for thinking that the Christians assumed this name is the language of Acts xi. 26, κληματίσαι τε πρώτον ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ τοὺς μαθητὰς Χριστιανούς, because κληματίζω, when used of acquiring a name generally means to assume one; but on the other hand, both in the Acts and in the Epistles, Christians speak of themselves as "brethren," "believers," "disciples," "saints," and only in three places in the N.T. is the word Christian used (Acts xi. 26, xxvii. 28; 1 Peter iv. 16), in only one of which, and there doubtfully, is the word used by Christians of themselves.

(b) Nor is it likely that the Jews would give them a name which would virtually concede the claim made by Christians, and so strenuously denied by Jews. For "Christ" being the Greek equivalent of "Messiah," to call the followers of Christ "Christians" would be to acknowledge Christ as the Messiah; nor would they have used so sacred a name in derision even for the sake of insulting a despised and hated sect. When they wanted to designate them, they used a name derived from a place they held in contempt (John i. 46, vii. 41; Luke xiii. 2), and called St. Paul "a ringleader of the sect of the 'Nazarenes'" (Acts xxiv. 5).

(c) But it is not unlikely that the Gentiles, seeing the wide aim of this new community, its readiness to admit all sorts of people, and even to dispense with the rite of circumcision in its converts, should have early come to distinguish it from the sects of the Jews, with which they very naturally at first confounded it, and so should have attached to it a new name. And this probability is increased when we remember that "Christ" was the title of the head of the new sect, represented his peculiar office to them, and was the name by which he was generally known in their letters and conversation. It would be adopted, of course, by the Gentiles from them, as we know it was (Tacit. Ann. xv. 44), and in a city like Antioch, "notorious for inventing names of derision, and for turning its wit into channels of ridicule" (cf. Procopius, Bell. Pers. ii. 8, quoted by Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. p. 130), the new society would soon get its name. The form of the word indicates its Roman origin (cf. Sullani, Pompeiani, and later Othoniani and Vitelliani), and that it was first used as a term of reproach may be gathered from the use made of it by Tacitus in the passage referred to above, "quos per flagitia invisos vulgus Christianos appellabat." The great increase in the number of Gentile converts would soon turn what was at first a nickname into a title of honour, and the predominance of Rome in the world naturally made the Roman name what it has become, the universal one. It is interesting to contrast with "Christian" the name "Jesuit," as unlike the other in its comparatively modern date and Greek form as in its history and significance.

See Conybeare and Howson (vol. i. p. 129 ff.), from whom this note on the word Christian is derived.

[E. C. H.]

III. The following names were appellations of scorn, or "nick-names," given to Christians by their enemies.

1. That they should be called Atheists was inevitable in an empire in which the vulgar at least knew of no gods that could not be represented by art and man's device. And Atheism was in fact a common charge against them. See Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ. c. 3) and Justin Martyr (Apol. I. c. 6). "Down with the Atheists" (αἶρε τοὺς ἀθεοὺς) was a mob-cry against the Christians (Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 6).

2. From the time that Christians were first recognised as a sect, they were contemptuously called Nazarenes (Acts xxiv. 5; Epiphanius, Haeres. 29, c. 1; Jerome on Isaiah XLIX.; Prudentius, Peristeph. ii. 25). This no doubt at first designated the supposed origin of the Lord and the disciples from Nazareth; but the variety of ways in which the word is written (Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαραῖοι, Ναζωραῖοι, Ναζηραῖοι, Ναζιραῖοι) seems to show that in later times various senses were attached to it. It was also, perhaps, sometimes used to designate a sect of Judaizing Christians, rather than the whole body of the church.

3. The name Galilaei was one which the philosophic emperor Julian (Epist. 7) endeavoured to fix upon the Christians (see Gregory Nazianz., Orat. iii. p. 81; Socrates, H. E. iii. 12), meaning, no doubt, to express the contempt of a cultivated man for a sect which arose in a despised district of Palestine, among shepherds and fishermen. His last words were, according to Theodoret (H. E. iii. 21), γενικηκας, Γαλιλαῖε, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilaean!" Cyril of Alexandria (c. Julian. iii. p. 39) sets himself to show that the name "Galilaean," if it implied roughness and want of culture, was no more applicable to Christians than to Julian and his friends (Gibbon's Rome, ch. 23; iii. 162, ed. Smith).

4. Graecus, Graeculus. It was probably with reference to the falseness and want of principle attributed to the Greeks, in the days of the empire, that Christians came to be called "Greeks," that is, impostors. The Christian in the streets was saluted with the cry, ὁ Γραικὸς ἐπιθέτης (Jerome, Epist. 10, ad Furan.). If his tunic was not white, he was "impostor et Graecus" (Ib. Epist. 19, ad Marcell.). The recognising a Christian by the want of the "tunica alba," perhaps indicates a time when the ALB had become with them almost wholly a ministerial dress.

5. Sybillists was an appellation given to Christians by Celsus (Origen c. Cels. bk. v. p. 272, Spencer). The early Christians did in fact pay great respect to the Sibylline books (Tertullian, ad Nationes, ii. 12), and discovered in them clear prophecies of Christ. Celsus accused them of having interpolated these books.

6. From peculiarities, or supposed peculiarities, of their worship, they were called cross-worshippers, σταυρόλατραι, or Crucicolae, a reproach as old as the days of St. Paul, often repeated (Tertul. Apol. 16 and Ad Nat. i. 7, 12), and from which they were not slow to vindicate themselves (Minucius Fel. Oct. 29). Whether Christians in general, or a sect of them, were called οὐρανολάτραι, Coelicolae, sky-worshippers, seems somewhat doubtful; and the same may be said of Hypsiastarii. That they were called Sun-worshippers and Ass-worshippers is certain. [ASINARI; CALUMNIES AGAINST CHRISTIANS.]

7. The miracles of the early church procured Christians the reputation of being Magicians. [MAGIC.] Hence Suetonius (Nero, c. 16) calls Christians "gens hominum superstitionis maleficae," a set devoted to the black art. The steadfast endurance of torture was often thought the effect of some charm. Asclepiades (Prudentius, Peristeph. xii. 868), ascribed to magic the endurance of Romanus the martyr; and St. Ambrose (Serm. 90, in Agnen) mentions that the crowd shrieked against her, "Tolle magam! tolle maleficam!"

8. Several nick-names were given by the heathen to the Christians in consequence of their inexplicable endurance of martyrdom. They were βιοθάνατοι, as dying violent deaths, often, as it seemed, little better than suicides. They were Παραβολάνι (παραβολάνοι) and Desperati, as freely risking their lives. They were Sarmentitii, from the faggots (sarmenta) which consumed them; and Semixaxii, from the stake (semiaxis) to which they were bound. (Tertull. Apol. 50). They were Cinerarii, from the respect which they paid to the ashes of their martyrs.

(Bingham's Antiq. i. ii.; Augusti's Handbuch der Christl. Archäol. II. i.) [C.]

FALDESTOLIUM, or FALDISTORIUM.

The first form of this word points to its true etymology and signification. It is connected with the German falden, "to fold," and stuhl, "a chair," and indicates a folding-chair, "sella plicatilis," answering to our modern "camp-stool" (Muratori, tom. iii. p. 646, not. 18). A false etymology, often given, "fandistolum quasi fandus locus" is at variance with its use, and would better apply to a pulpit. Faldistorium, originally employed for any portable seat, became limited in ecclesiastical use to a low armless folding-chair, in which a bishop or mitred abbot sat at the altar after his enthronisation, or on other solemn occasions, offered himself to the gaze of the people in his full official attire. According to Macri (s. v.) it was also placed at the epistle corner of the altar for the bishop, when celebrating in a church in which he had no jurisdiction, or if a superior dignitary was present (Macri, Hierolex. s. v.; Ducange, s. v.; Augusti, Hdbch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 556). [E. V.]

FALSE WITNESS. [PERJURY.]

FAMILY. The influence of the Christian religion upon the customs and habits of family life was very considerable, even from the first; although it did not aim at making any abrupt or sudden changes, except in those things which were necessarily sinful.

The great Christian doctrines which so powerfully affect the feelings, hopes, and whole inner life of those who heartily receive them, led at once to the renunciation of idolatry in all its forms, and of the excesses and licentiousnesses then so common and so little thought of; and inculcated new principles of thought and action, which operated more or less powerfully in every direction. But the ordinary usages of domestic life, which were not directly connected with the religious and moral obliquities of the old polytheism, were apparently left untouched by any positive interference or command. Christianity proved itself the salt of the earth by gradually interpenetrating the surrounding mass of pagan civilisation, and not by shrinking from all contact with it.

The elevation of the female sex was one of the most conspicuous of the indirect results which rapidly followed the reception of the new religion. The position of women among the Jews, and the manner in which Jesus had received them as his disciples and friends, must have taught the apostles, if they needed any such teaching, what place women were entitled to hold in the social economy of the church. And accordingly, wherever Christ was proclaimed, women were invited and welcomed into the Christian communities, and were admitted equally with men to all Christian privileges. Hence in a Christian family the wife and mother held an honourable place; and the conjugal union, the source of all other family relationships, being thus honoured, communicated a happy influence throughout the household.

Another result, only less important than the former, was the amelioration, and, in the course of time, the abolition of slavery. Apostolic Christianity did not endeavour to remove this nefarious but inveterate evil by any direct or violent denunciation, which, if successful, would have rudely upset the existing framework of society, and would have proved as ruinous to the slave, as it would have seemed to be unjust to the master; but it distinctly taught the equality of all men in Christian privilege and religious position;—it taught most emphatically the duty of caring for others;—it taught the master that he had a Lord over him who was no respecter of persons, and the slave that he was Christ's freedman. And thus slavery in a Christian family was relieved from some of its most galling burdens. This happy change, however, it must be remembered, depended entirely upon the personal feeling and will of the master; for slavery was not legally and publicly alleviated to any great extent, until the time of Justinian, who did much to promote its extinction, after which it was gradually discontinued or changed to serfdom (Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. 343, and Latin Christ. i. 391; and SLAVERY in this work). In the mean time Christians in general did not think it wrong to have bondmen in their service (Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. 12).

But besides particular results of this nature, Christianity to some extent changed the general habits of men, and tended to make them more domestic and less public in their feelings and pursuits. More especially, while Christians were small communities separate and distinct from the general mass of the population, they felt it necessary to withdraw themselves in some degree from public affairs; they were less frequent in their attendance on courts of law; they could not, without scruples and repugnance, be present at many of the ordinary amusements and popular festivities, mixed up as they were with the idolatry and some of the worst moral abominations of paganism. Thus they were thrown back more upon the society of each other, and upon their own family life. And although afterwards, when the new religion became dominant, and was at length the religion of the people, the objections to public life greatly disappeared, the family life with its attractions and its virtues continued to maintain a wholesome influence, which has indeed never since been lost. (See Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. 134.)

But to look more closely at the family life of Christianity, it must be observed that the abnegation of idolatry caused a displacement of the household and hearth gods—the Penates and Lares of the Romans,—together with all family rites which savoured of idol worship, and a substitution of Christian observances in their stead. And as it seems to have been the custom of religious Romans to offer their prayers the first thing in the morning, in the Lararium, or household shrine (Lampridius, Alex. Sever. 29. 31); so family prayer, in which the different members of a Christian household joined, appears to have had its place from the beginning of the new religion. Such united prayer seems to be alluded to in the remark, "that your prayers be not hindered" (1 Pet. iii. 7). And Clement of Alexandria, at the end of the second century, testifies to the same thing when, commenting on the words, "where two or three are gathered together in my name," he says that the three mean a husband, a wife, and a child (ἀνδρα, καὶ γυναῖκα, καὶ τέκνον τοὺς τρεῖς λέγει, Stromat. iii. 10). And the same author speaks expressly of "prayer and reading of the Scriptures (εὐχὴ καὶ ἀνάγνωσις) in Christian families (Paedag. ii. 194).

It is evident from the words of Tertulian (ad Uxorem, ii. 4) and subsequently of Cyprian (De Lapsis, c. 26) that Christians were in the habit of taking home portions of the eucharistic bread, and eating a small piece of it every morning, as an act of devotion [EULOGIAE, p. 629].

The practice also of making the sign of the cross upon the forehead, to which at a later period so much efficacy was superstitiously ascribed, had become before the beginning of the third century a perpetually repeated ceremony in Christian families, being used "on getting up and going to bed, on putting on their clothes or their shoes, on walking out or sitting down, at table or at the bath;" in short in every act or movement of the day (see Tertullian de Cor. Mil. § 3). This little symbolical action may in the early times have been a useful memento to Christians in the midst of so many things of a contrary tendency, however much, like some other practices once innocent and salutary, it was subsequently used in the service of formalism and error. And the same desire of being constantly reminded of their Christian position led them to adorn their goblets with the figure of a shepherd carrying a lamb, and their seal-rings with a dove, an anchor, and other similar devices. (Neander, Hist. Christ. p. 399.)

Besides these there were other domestic observances which from time to time interested the piety as well as the natural affections of Christian households, especially those which were connected with the baptism of children, marriages, and funerals, more particularly noticed in separate articles [BAPTISM, CHILDREN, MARRIAGE, BURIAL]. Christians cherished the memory of departed relatives as those with whom they trusted to be reunited in rest and glory, and not unfrequently held family banquets over their remains in a room provided for that purpose [CELLA MEMORIAE].

But besides those festivals which were exclusively Christian, there were some celebrations of an older date, in which, as they were not mixed up with any idolatrous rites, Christian families might unite with their pagan neighbours, and which they might retain for their own use. Even Tertullian, who was so strict in forbidding all semblance of participation in idol worship, saw no objection to Christians joining in the domestic ceremony of "putting on the toga virilis," which corresponded with our "coming of age," or to their being present at weddings, or the "naming of children" (Nominalia or Dies lustrici; Tertul. de Idolol. 16).

As the facility of divorce was a primary principle of corruption in Roman social and family life; so Christianity, having invested marriage with a religious sanctity, and not allowing divorcement under any circumstances, except those mentioned by Christ himself, drew more closely together not only the husband and wife, but all other members of the family.

The relationship between parents and children was greatly influenced for good. The barbarous practice of infanticide, which prevailed among the Greeks and Romans, was immediately discontinued. Under the old Roman law parents might at any time put their children to death, or sell them as slaves; but this severity was at once voluntarily softened in Christian families; and the power was afterwards taken away by Christian emperors; who further directed that in cases of great poverty, when parents might be tempted to sell their children, relief might be given them out of the public revenues, thus affording an example of an incipient poor-law (Cod. Theod. vi. 27, in Bingham, xvi. ix. 1).

Parental authority, however, and family ties were strongly upheld. Children were not allowed to marry without the consent of their parents (Tertul. ad Uxor. ii. 9), and, under the Christian emperors, in the case of daughters thus marrying, the most dreadful punishments were ordered to be inflicted on all who were consenting parties to the marriage (Cod. Theod. ix. 24).

The education of their children assumed a new interest with Christian parents, but at the same time caused them new anxieties and cares; since in "bringing them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," it was needful, more especially in the earlier times, to guard them from the evil influences in the midst of which they lived,—from the contact of idolatry all around them,—from the contagion of companions on every side. Further difficulties too presented themselves in connection with the future occupation of their children, inasmuch as many employments open to others were closed against them. For a Christian had to avoid all the numerous trades and arts which were connected with idols and idol-worship, together with some offices of civil and military life.

While children were young their superintendence and education engaged especially the mother's care and vigilance; but besides this and other strictly domestic duties, it was usual for Christian women to devote a portion of their time to doing good beyond their own homes; and Tertullian shows that in his days it was expected, as a matter of course, that they would attend on the sick, go round to the houses of the poor, relieve the needy, and visit imprisoned martyrs (Tertul. ad Uxor. ii. 4).

One source of uneasiness was, it must be confessed, introduced into the household in Christian times, which had not existed previously. After the institution of monastic orders, a husband, a wife, or a child might desire to adopt the "religious" life, even without the consent of those who had a claim upon their services and society. Where the persons interested consented, as in the cases of Ammon and his wife (Socrates, H. E. iv. 23; Palladius, Hist. Lausiac. c. 8), and of Martianus and Maxima (Victor Utiensis [or Vitensis], De Persec. Vandul. i. 5), no harm was done; but in many cases monastic fanaticism disturbed the peace of households and sundered their members. It is evident from the references to the matter (for instance) by Paulinus (Epist. 14, ad Colant.) and Augustine (Epist. 45 [al. 127], Armentario et Paulinae; Epist. 199 [al. 262], ad Ecdiciam), that in the 4th century the question of the relative claims of domestic duty and ascetic life was felt to be a pressing one. Basil the Great in the Larger Rule (Qu. 12) directs that a married person offering to enter a monastery should be questioned as to the consent of the other party; yet he thinks that the precept about hating father, mother, wife, or children to be Christ's disciple (Luke xiv. 26) applies to this case; and in another place (Epist. 45, ad Monachum Lapsun) he certainly mentions a man's declining domestic cares and the society of his yoke-fellow, for an ascetic life, without the smallest censure. Jerome (Epist. 14, ad Heliod.) expresses similar views. The feeling of the church on this subject was distinctly pronounced in the 6th century, for the legislation of Justinian (Codez. lib. i. tit. 3, De Episc. et Cler. leg. 53) allowed married persons to desert their yoke-fellows for "religion" with impunity, and to reclaim their own fortunes. So in the case of children. The council of Gangra in the 4th century (c. 16) anathematized children—especially children of Christians—who should withdraw from their parents on pretence of religion (BeobreBelas) and refuse them due honour. So Basil (Reg. Maj. qu. 15) enjoined that children should not be received into monasteries unless offered by their parents, if the parents were alive. But here again the legislation of Justinian (u. s. leg. 55) betrays the presence of a feeling that "religion" might override domestic obligations, in that it forbids parents to restrain their children from becoming monks or clerics, or to disinherit them for that cause alone. And this feeling, in spite of the not unfrequent protests of jurists, was very prevalent from that time onward. On the other hand, the power of parents to devote their children to "religion" became in time almost absolute; they who had been devoted by their parents were as much bound as those who had entered of their own accord in mature age (Conc. Tolet. IV. c. 49, A.D. 633; see OBLATI).

In our view of the family life of Christians, their use of music and singing must not be unnoticed. Among the Greeks especially, and to some extent among the Romans also, their songs occupied a conspicuous place in their social life. These, however, from their generally expressing and encouraging some of the worst evils of the old religions, could not be used in the Christian family circle. But the want was rapidly supplied. Christian songs and hymns were soon composed and extensively multiplied; and these became an abundant source of recreation to all the members of the household, while at meal times, and in all family or friendly unions, they thus expressed their habitual faith, and hope, and joy.

Before Christianity became the prevailing and established religion, families were in continual danger of being molested by popular violence, and of being utterly broken up in times of legalised persecution. But besides these dangers and troubles there were sometimes others hardly less painful within the family itself, when only a part of the household had become Christians. The antagonism and consequent discomfort, if not positive misery, must then have been almost perpetual; and the difficulty of maintaining religious faithfulness, without losing family affection or breaking family ties, must have been very great. Jesus himself had warned his disciples beforehand that "a man's foes might be those of his own household;" and that his religion, in such cases, might bring "not peace but a sword." St. Paul, while desirous that this difference of religion should not actually separate a husband and wife, admitted that it would and must sometimes have this effect. Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii. 4) describes in detail the sort of hindrances, opposition, and ridicule, which a Christian woman must expect if she married a husband who was an unbeliever; and how impossible she would find it to fulfil in peace, if she could fulfil at all, her Christian duties,—even if nothing worse occurred. But in times of persecution, or of any strong excitement of antichristian feeling, it was not merely difficulties and discomforts that had to be encountered. The strongest words of Christ were then often literally realised, when the most powerful natural affections were shattered, and Christians were betrayed and denounced by their nearest relatives and given up to the persecutor's sword. See an early instance of this in Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. 2. [G. A. J.]

FAMILY—THE HOLY. The subject which bears this title in modern art is generally a group consisting of the Virgin Mother bearing the Sacred Infant, of St. Joseph, and frequently of the younger St. John Baptist, and occasionally of St. Elizabeth. It is frequently treated in an academic or purely artistic spirit, and chosen mainly for the sake of opposing the age of St. Elizabeth or maturity of St. Joseph, to the high ideal of feminine, infantine, or youthful beauty in the Blessed Virgin, the infant or St. John. As a complete and isolated group of this kind the subject is hardly ever treated in art of the earliest Christian age, unless the three Oranti given by Martigny (from Bosio Roma Sott. p. 279; see woodcut) are to be considered as representing it. He is inclined to think so, though Bosio, Aringhi, and Bottari consider the group as an ordinary Christian family in the attitude of prayer, and though the boy is more decidedly in that attitude than either the father or the mother. He mentions another lately discovered, but also somewhat conjectural monument, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and says that the subject occurs on sarcophagi of the South of France, naming one in the museum of Arles, No. 26, where St. Joseph leads the Saviour by the hand to the Virgin Mother, probably representing Luke ii. 48, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us?" FAN. [FLABELLUM.]

FANATIC. From their frequenting Fana, shrines of heathen deities, all heathen were sometimes called "fanatici"; thus Clovis before his conversion, is said (Gesta Reg. Franc. c. 10), to have been "fanaticus et paganus." In a special sense, priests of idol-temples were "fanatici" (Iso Magister on Prudentius, quoted by Ducange, s.v.); and those who professed to prophesy by the aid of the demon attached to the place [EXORCISM; and see Jerome on Isaiah,

c. 6, and Augustine on Psalm 40]; these were condemned with others who practised such evil arts (Code, lib. ix. tit. 16, l. 4; Macri, Hierolex. s. v.; Bingham's Ant. xvi. v. 4). [C.]

FANDILA, presbyter, martyr at Cordova; commemorated June 13 (Mart. Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

FANON. (1.) A head-dress worn by the pope when he celebrated mass pontifically. It is described by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. i. 239) and Macri (Hierolex. s. v.) as a veil variegated, like the Mosaic ephod, with four colours, symbolising the four elements, put over the head after the pope was vested with the alb, and tied round the neck, forming a kind of hood, the tiara or other head-dress being put on above it. The lower part was concealed by the planeta (Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 24. 15). Ciampini gives the annexed figure from a small brass statue on the doors of the oratory of St. John Baptist at the Lateran. At the Pedilavium the "Caerimoniale Romanum" directs that the pope should wear the fanon alone without the mitre.

(2.) The napkin or handkerchief, mappula, sudarium, used by the priest during the celebration of the mass to wipe away perspiration from the face, &c. (Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 24. 5; Rab. Maur. de Inst. Cler. i. 18; Augusti, Handbch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 504). [FACITERGIUM.]

(3.) In later times the white linen cloth in which the laity made their oblations at the altar. "Populus dat oblationes suas, id est panem et vinum, et offerunt cum fanonibus candidis," Ordo Romanus; "cum fanonibus offerunt," Amalar. de offic. Miss.; Martene, de Eccl. rit. lib. i. c. 4, § 6; Augusti, u. s. ii. 649. The word is sometimes erroneously spelt "favones."

(4.) A still later use of the word is for the church banners, "vexilla Ecclesiastica," employed in processions. This is perhaps not earlier than the French and German writers of the 11th century (Augusti, u. s. iii. 348, 355).

(5.) The strings or lappets of the mitre (Willem, Monuments inédits. pls. 68, 76, 90) [E. V.]

FARA, virgin, of Meaux; "Natalis" Dec. 7 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FAST OF CHRIST IN THE DESERT, THE, is commemorated in the Aethiopic Calendar on Feb. 4 (Daniel's Coder, iv. 252). [C.]

FASTING (νηστεία, jejunium, abstinentia). Fasting was total or partial abstinence from food for a certain period; it also signified abstinence from pleasure, or from the celebration of birthdays or marriages or church festivals; and it had the further spiritual signification of abstinence from sin. See the passages collected in Gunning (Lent Fast, pp. 130-150) on the spiritual meaning of fasting.

1. The stated fasts of the Western church were these:

(i.) The great ante-paschal Fast of LENT (Quadragesima).

(ii.) The fasts of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months, called also EMBER FASTS, or the fasts of the four seasons (jejunia quatuor temporum).

(iii.) The weekly fasts of the STATIONS, Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta, stationes, semijejunia, τερὰς καὶ παρασκευή).

(iv.) The ROGATIONS (rogationes, litaniae).

(v.) The Vigils or Eves of holy days (pernoctationes, pervigilia).

2. The Greek church kept in addition to Lent three fasts of a week each: 1st the Fast of the Holy Apostles, immediately after Pentecost [APOSTLES' FESTIVALS AND FASTS]; 2nd the Fast of the Holy Mother of God (Sanctae Deiparae) in August; 3rd the Fast of the Nativity (Suicer Thesaurus s. v. νηστεία; Neale Introduction to Eastern Church, p. 731). Some have supposed (Morinus de Penit., Appendix, p. 124) that the Fast Sanctae Deiparae at one period lasted forty days, and began originally on 6th of July and afterwards on 1st of August, and that the Fast of the Nativity was also one of forty days, and began on 15th of November.

3. Other fasts had only a local or partial observance. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) introduced into Spain fasts of superposition (jejuniorum superpositiones) for every month in the year except July and August. It does not appear on what days of the month they were kept, but their name implies that they were something over and above the usual fasting days. Bingham (Antiq. xxi. 11 § 5) quotes from Philastrius the mention of a fast of three days before Epiphany. In the Dialogue of Egbert of York (Haddan and Stubbs' Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. p. 413) there is the appointment, in addition to the Ember fasts, of a period of twelve days before the Nativity to be spent in fastings, watchings, prayers, and alms; on which twelve days not only were the clergy but laity also, with their wives and households, exhorted to resort to their confessors. The seventeenth council of Toledo A.D. 694 (c. 6) orders litany-fasts (exomologeses) to be kept every month in the Spanish and Gallic churches to supplicate "for the safety of the sovereign, for the preservation of the people, and the pardon of their sins, and the expulsion of the devil from the hearts of the faithful." The fasts to be observed throughout the year in the western monasteries are given in detail by the second council of Tours (A.D. 567, c. 17): "From Easter to Pentecost let dinner be served to the brothers every day except on Rogation-days; after Pentecost let them fast an entire week; thence till the 1st of August let all, except those who are suffering from illness, fast three days a week, second, fourth, and sixth days. In August because the Missa Sanctorum is daily celebrated, let them eat their dinner; through the whole of September, October, and November, fast three days a week, and in Decembe, every day till the Nativity. And because between the Nativity and the Epiphany all days are festivals, with the exception of the three when private litanies are to be said, they shall eat their dinner; and from Epiphany to Lent fast three days a week."

4. Special fasting was occasionally ordered or advised in a diocese by the bishop, as Tertullian (de Jejun. c. 13), after he became a Montanist unwillingly bears witness. It was also one of the means used for preparing for the reception of a sacred ordinance. Fasting before Holy Communion, if not invariable, had become a common practice in the 4th century [COMMUNION]. Fasting before baptism can be traced to a much earlier date. Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. 61) mentions among the customs of the Christian church that candidates "are taught to pray fasting, we fasting and praying with them." Tertullian (de Bapt. c. 20) exhorts those who are about to receive baptism to pray with frequent prayers and fastings. And the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 85), appoints abstinence from wine and meat among the preparations for baptism (Apost. Const. vii. 22). The only authority which Martene (de Rit. viii. 4) discovers for the practice of fasting before ordination is from Leo, who (Ep. ad Diosc.) with reference to ordinations taking place on Sunday, speaks of the Saturday's fast continuing both for candidates and bishop till the ordination was over. No notice of fasting before confirmation is to be found before the 13th century (Martene de Rit. iv. 1).

5. Penitential Fasting.—For the first 500 years fasting does not appear to have been imposed as a special penance, or to have taken place of other penitential exercises; but in all ages, so long as penitential discipline was in force, a penitent was required to abstain from delicacies of food as from all other bodily gratifications during his period of punishment. Tertullian (de Penit. c. 9) defines a true exomologesis to consist, among other duties, in "the use of simple things for meat and drink, and in cherishing prayer by fasts." Pacian (Paraen. ad Penit. c. 19) makes his penitent, when invited to a feast, reply, "These things belong to the happy, but as for me I have sinned against the Lord." In the 6th century fasting began to be inflicted as a special and separate mode of penance. One of the canons of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 60), appoints to those who lapse into heresy, in place of the longer term of penitence allotted by the early church, a fast of two years, to be kept on the third day of the week without any break; if at least that is the meaning of the rather obscure language of the canon (ut biennio tertio sine relaxatione jejunent). The penance of fasting is found in the early British penitential canons attributed to Gildas; and in the Penitential of Theodore sentences of a fast of so many days or weeks, or even years, are very common (Penitential I. viii. 3, 4, 8, 9; xii. 8; xiv. 9), and no less so in the Penitential of Bede (iii. 5; vii. 11), and in that of Egbert (iv. 6; v. 3; xiii. 4). The crimes for which these sentences were inflicted in these early English penitential books are such as could exist only among a people just emerging from heathenism. In the Penitential of Theodore (II. xiv. i.) is found the first notice of the appointment of three regular fasts of forty days in the year (tria legitima quadragesima), forty days before Easter, forty days before the Nativity, and forty days after Pentecost. The Rule of Chrodegang (c. 32) with reference to the same observance, orders confessions to be made at each of these three annual quadragesimal fasts. And the Capitularies of Charles the Great (vi. 184) repeat in identical words the injunction of Theodore on the three quadragesimal fasts, and add that "although some of them lack canonical authority, yet it is well for all of us together to observe this custom in accordance with the practice of the people and of our forefathers." These fasts were probably first appointed as appropriate penitential seasons for the performance of long periods of penance; afterwards, as may be inferred from the canon in the Capitularies, they came into partial use with the people at large. There is no evidence that they existed earlier than the 7th century, for the councils prior to Theodore which are strict in ordering the people to keep Lent (e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 12; 4 Conc. Aurelian. c. 2), contain no hint of there being more than one such season in the year; and the canon of the second council of Tours which enumerates the fasts of the monks, and approaches nearer the time of Theodore, evidently recognises no Pentecostal Quadragesima, for it orders monks, whose self-denial would be more severe than that of the rest of the church, to fast only three days a week from Pentecost till August. Hence it is probable that Theodore introduced these as penitential fasts into the Western church from the East, for in the Greek Penitential of Joannes Jejunator two fasts of forty days in addition to Lent are imposed upon penitents, the former of which was called the Quadragesima of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the latter the Quadragesima of St. Philip: One of the councils of the Carolingian kings, about A.D. 821 (Conc. apud villam Theodonis cc. 2-5) held for the purpose of devising means for the protection of the clergy, inflicts five quadragesimal fasts on any one slandering or wounding a subdeacon, six on the slanderer of a deacon, twelve of a priest, and a lifelong fast on the slanderer of a bishop. Even after absolution, a penitent was sometimes ordered to fast one day a week for the remainder of his life—a sentence opposed to the earlier practice, by which admission to communion was a sign of the forgiveness of all past offences.

The penitential fasts were observed with various degrees of severity. In the East the Penitential of Joannes Jejunator allows penitents on the second, fourth, and sixth days of the week to eat oil and beans with oil, but orders them to abstain from cheese, eggs, flesh, and fish; on the third and fifth days eat everything freely except flesh; and on the first and seventh days use wine and flesh as if under no punishment. In the Anglo-Saxon church Egbert (Penitential iv. 15) directs penitents to fast three days each week, without specifying the days, from wine, mead (medo), and flesh, till the evening, and eat only dry food; and also keep three quadragesimal fasts in the year on dry food, two days a week till the evening, and three days till three o'clock. Burchard (Decret. xix. 9, 10) referring to this direction from the Penitential, states the following to have been the manner in which a fast of two years on bread and water was kept. "For first year fast three days in each week, second, fourth, and sixth, on bread and water; and three days, third, fifth, and seventh, abstain from wine, mead (medo), beer flavoured with honey (mellita cervisia) flesh and blood, cheese, eggs, and rich fish of various sorts, and eat only small fish if they are to be got, but if not, fish of one kind only, and beans, and herbs, and apples, and drink beer." This list makes no mention of Lent, because it is assumed to be spent entirely on bread and water. "The next year the penitent should fast two days, second and fourth, till the evening, and then refresh himself with dry food, i.e. bread and dry cooked beans, or apples, or raw herbs; let him select one of these three, and drink beer sparingly; on the sixth day let him fast on bread and water." In some cases no additional time of abstinence was imposed, but only a greater rigour during the ordinary ecclesiastical fasts. A very old sacramentary, assigned by Morinus to the 8th century, directs the actual incarceration of a penitent through Lent; "Take him in the morning of the first day of Lent and cover him with ashes, and pray for him, and shut him up till the Thursday of Holy Week (feria quinta in coena Domini), and on the Thursday of Holy Week he may come forth from the place in which he has performed his penance." A Gothic codex from the monastery of Remigius of Rheims, dating probably from the next century, also orders imprisonment through Lent, but instead of the whole body of the penitent being covered with ashes, directs that a few should be sprinkled on his head, and that they should be blessed. This severity was relaxed before the 10th century, and penitents were assigned a parish or district in which to confine themselves through Lent. But both incarceration and confinement within bounds were deviations from an older practice of shutting up a penitent in a monastery (1 Conc. Matiscon. cc. 5, 8).

6. Exemptions from Fasting.—A superstitious abstinence from flesh and wine on pretence of keeping a stricter fast was forbidden. The Apostolical Canons (cc. 52, 53) direct that if any of the clergy abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, not for exercise, but abhorrence, forgetting that God made all things very good, they shall be deposed (Conc. Ancyra. c. 14; Conc. Gangra. c. 2). The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 14), orders, under pain of excommunication, clergy who have been in the habit of abstaining from meat, to eat vegetables boiled with meat, in order to avoid the suspicion of being infected with the Priscillian heresy.

Fasting was strictly forbidden on all Sundays throughout the year in every part of the church. The reason of this prohibition was that fasting was held inconsistent with the observance of so high a festival. [LORD'S DAY.]

The observance of Saturday was, as is well known, one of the points in dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. In the East it was always observed as a festival, with the exception of the Paschal Vigil, the Great Sabbath, in which Christ lay in the grave, which was kept as a fast both in East and West (Apost. Constt. ii. 59; v. 15, 20; vii. 23; viii. 33; Conc. Laod. cc. 49, 51; Conc. in Trull. c. 55). [SABBATH.]

It was not customary to fast on any festivals, nor consequently to hold festivals during seasons of fasting. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320 (c. 51), forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, but orders them to be kept on Saturdays and Sundays. Another canon (c. 52) forbids the celebration of marriages or birthdays in Lent. The Greek church held no festival through Lent except the Annunciation, a festival which the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656 (c. 1), ordered to be held eight days before Christmas. [MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.] The church at Milan held no missa sanctorum whatever throughout Lent.

The non-observance of a fast was permitted in the case of weakness or sickness (Apost. Can. 68, 2 Conc. Turon. c. 17). To these grounds of excuse the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653 (c. 9), adds old age or strong necessity. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) had allowed the Spanish churches to omit the monthly fasts in the sultry heat of July and August.

7. Manner of Fasting.—A fast day in the early church was kept by a literal abstinence from food till the evening, and then a simple meal was eaten. Ambrose (de Eia et Jej. c. 10) speaks of the fast during Lent continuing through the whole day; and Chrysostom (Hom. 6 in Gen. p. 60; Hom. 8 in Gen. p. 79) rebukes the folly of those who abstain all day from food and do not abstain from sin. There was no restriction upon the kind of food eaten at the evening meal, provided only it was partaken of sparingly. Many, no doubt, refused meat or wine during the greater fasts, and contented themselves with bread and water, Xerophagia (Tertullian de Jej. c. 11); but that there was no settled rule, and that the choice of diet was left very much to individual discretion is evident from the account given by Socrates (H. E. v. 22) of the variety of the observances of the Western church; "some abstain from every sort of creature that has life; others eat fish only of living creatures; others eat birds as well as fish, because, according to the Mosaic account of the creation, they too sprung from the water; others abstain from fruit covered with a hard shell, and from eggs; some eat dry bread only, others not even that; others again when they have fasted till three o'clock eat varieties of food." The Greek church kept Lent very strictly, eating neither fish, nor eggs, nor milk, nor oil; but on the other fasts, except on the fourth and sixth days, these were allowed. The great Sabbath fast of the Paschal Vigil was sustained not only till the evening, but till cockcrow on Easter morning (Apost. Const. v. 18). But the other appointed seasons were kept with less rigour than that of Lent, and the fast, instead of continuing till the evening meal, was broken at the ninth hour (three o'clock), the hour at which our Lord expired on the cross. This was the hour at which the fast of the Stations ceased (Epiphanius Expos. Fid. c. 22). And the English council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 16), orders the Rogations to be kept till three o'clock. The food which was thus saved by abridging the number of meals it was considered a pious act to bestow upon the poor (Origen, Hom. 10. in Levit. ; Leo, Serm. 3 de Jej. Pentecost. ; Chrysol. Serm. 8 de Jej.). Another practice mentioned by Tertullian (de Orat. c. 18) was refraining from the kiss of peace while a fast lasted. A change of dress during fasting was confined chiefly to penitents [PENITENCE], although Tertullian (Apolog. c. 40), if his language is not merely rhetorical, speaks of pious Christians in contrast with heathen self-indulgence, "being dried up with fasting and prostrating themselves in sackcloth and ashes." And at a much later date the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (c. 33), orders the greater Litany to be observed for three days by all Christians, "not riding nor clothed in rich garments, but barefoot and clothed in sackcloth and ashes." [G. M.]

8. Fast after Communion.—St. Chrysostom, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, speaks as follows: "Before receiving thou fastest, that thou mayest by any means appear worthy of the communion. But when thou hast received, it being thy duty to persevere in self-control, thou undoest all. Not that sobriety before this and afterwards are of equal importance. For it is our duty, indeed, to exercise self-control at both times, but especially after receiving the Bridegroom; before this indeed that thou mayest be worthy to partake; but afterwards that thou mayest not be found unworthy of that of which thou hast partaken. What! Ought we to fast after partaking? I do not say so, nor do I use constraint. For indeed this also is good, but I am not enforcing it, only advising you not to be self-indulgent to excess" (Hom. xxvii. ad c. xi. v. 27.) We should infer from this passage that the hearers of St. Chrysostom neither had themselves, nor knew of, any custom of abstaining from ordinary food, for however short a time, after receiving the Holy Communion. Nor have we any evidence that his advice led to the formation of such a habit in the members of the Greek or Oriental churches. In the West, on the other hand, we meet with occasional notices of the practice from the 6th century downwards; and it is probable that it survived, as the pious custom of a few, to the 14th, or even later. A canon of the council of Mâcon held in 585 contains the earliest reference, if the writer mistake not, to this post-communion fast. We give the decree in full: "Whatever relics of the sacrifices shall be left over in the sacrum after the mass is finished, let innocent children be brought to the church on Wednesday or Friday by him whose business it is, and let them, being enjoined a fast, receive the said relics sprinkled with wine" (Can. 6; Labb. Conc. tom. v. col. 982). Among the Forged Decretals is an epistle purporting to be written by Clement of Rome to St. James the Lord's brother. The greater part of this epistle appears to have been composed in the 8th century, and in that earlier portion we find a direction to this effect, viz. that the remainder of the consecrated elements "is not to be kept till the morning, but is by the care of the clerks to be consumed with fear and trembling. But they who consume the remainder of the Lord's body, which has been left in the sacrum, are not to assemble forthwith to partake of common food, nor to presume to mix food with the holy portion . . . If therefore the Lord's portion be given to them at an early hour, let the ministers who have consumed it fast till the sixth; and if they have received it at the third or the fourth, let them fast till evening" (Præcepta S. Petri, inter Opp. S. Leonis, ed. Baller. tom. iii. p. 674). There is a law of Charlemagne, A.D. 809, with this heading, "Touching those who have communicated, that they wait three hours, on account of the mixing of the food." The decree itself says "two or three hours (Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. i. col. 1213. Similarly col. 1224). Regino (De Eccl. Discipl. lib. 1. c. cxcv.) at the beginning of the 10th century, and Gratian (Decr. P. iii. Dist. ii. c. xxiii.) in the 12th give the passage from pseudo-Clement as above quoted. It was therefore well known during the latter part of the Middle Ages. In the 13th century we find it cited from Gratian by Thomas Aquinas, who acknowledges the principle, while he declares the rule obsolete (Summa Theol. P. iii. Qu. lxxx. Art. viii. ad 6m). There is, however, as we have already intimated, some reason to think that the practice which Aquinas evidently considered altogether gone by was yet observed by some long after his time. In England John de Burgo, A.D. 1385, refers to our subject in this manner: "After taking the eucharist it is meet for reverence thereof to abstain for some time from food, but not very long. For preparation by abstinence and devotion is more required before receiving the eucharist than after. For the sacrament has its effect at the reception itself, and therefore actual devotion is required then; but after the reception habitual devotion suffices" (Pupilla Oculi, P. iv. c. viii. ad lit. H.). It is also thus mentioned by Duranti, who was murdered by the partisans of the League in 1589, "Not only ought men to be fasting when about to sacrifice and communicate, but they ought also in honour of the sacrament to abstain from all food some time after" (De Rit. Eccl. L. ii. c. vii. § 6.) [W. E. S.]

FATHER (Pater). 1. A name rhetorically given to the priests of any religion (Arnobius, Adv. Gent. lib. 4, c. 19).

2. Commonly applied to Christian bishops. Epiphanius (Hæres. Adv. Aerim. n. 4) says that the reason of the title is that by their right of ordaining they beget fathers to the church. Jerome (Ep. 52, ad Theoph. ed. Migne) says that bishops are content with their own honour, for they know that they are fathers and not lords. Augustine (Comm. in Ps. 44) says that the church itself calls them fathers. Chrysostom (Hom. 3, ad Pop. Antioch.) speaks of looking to the bishop's throne and not seeing the father upon it. The decrees of the council of Nice are usually cited as those of the 318 fathers (I. Conc. Nic. Proem.; I. Conc. Constantin. c. 1).

3. To a godfather. In the life of Epiphanius it is said that one Lucian became his father in holy baptism (Epiph. Vita, n. 8). So Ruffinus (in Hieron. Invect. c. 1) says that the same person was his instructor in the creed and his father.

4. It is said that Charles Martel sent his son Pepin to Luitprand, king of the Lombards, who cut his hair according to custom, "juxta morem," and thus became his father, "ei pater effectus est" (Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Longobard. vi. 53).

5. To the priest by whom baptism was administered. Avitus of Vienne (Hom. de Rogat.), says that Mamertus was both his predecessor and his spiritual father by baptism, "spiritualis a baptismo pater." So Theodori Cantuar. Poenitentiale, II. iv. 8) it is stated that one father is sufficient to administer baptism, "in catechumeno et confirmatione et baptismo unus potest esse pater."

6. To a confessor. One of the Benedictine rules provided that no monk should become a spiritual father without the consent of the abbot (I. leg. Tarnat. A.D. circa 570; Migne's Patrol. t. 66, coll. 977).

7. The title "father of fathers" was sometimes assigned to eminent bishops. In one place it is given to the apostle Paul (Quæst. ad Orthodox. c. 119, apud Justin Mart. Opp.). Athanasius (ad Solitar. Vit. Agent. c. 1) speaks of Hosius as being by universal consent called the father of bishops. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 19; De Funer. Patr. § 44) says that his father was called the father of all the bishops (ἀρχιερέας). Gregory the Great (Epist. vi.) addresses Lupus of Troyes, as "father of fathers, bishop of bishops." In a letter from the African bishops which was read at the 1st Lateran council, at the close of the epistle, Theodore, bishop of Rome, is styled "father of fathers." In a letter read at the 6th council of Constantinople (Act 13), Sergius is addressed in the same manner. At the 2nd council of Nice, A.D. 787 (Act 6), Gregory Nyssen is said to have been called "father of fathers" by universal consent.

8. The head of a monastery was naturally called Pater by Latins, as Abbas by Orientals; thus Augustine (De Mor. Eccl. Cath. i. 31) speaks of the respect to be paid by the Decani to the one "quem Patrem appellat;" and Gregory the Great (Dial. i. 1; cf. ii. 3; iii. 23) speaks of one who was "Pater" in a monastery over 200 monks. FEET. WASHING OF. [BAPTISM, §§ 34, 67; MAUNDY THURSDAY.]

FEILIRE, THE, OF AENGUS THE CULDEE. The word Feilire, derived from "feil" the Irish equivalent of vigilia, is applied to the metrical festology composed by Aengus the Culdee about the year 780. It is the most ancient of five martyrologies belonging to Ireland. The others are (1.) The martyrology of Tamhlacht, which must have been written after 845. (2.) That of Maelduire ua Gorman, dating from between 1156-1173. (3.) The Saltair na Rann, which, however, contains only four Gaelic entries; and (4.) The Kalendar of the Drummond Missal, published in Bishop Forbes' Kalendars of the Scottish saints.

Of the personal history of Aengus we know that he was educated in Cluain Ednach in Queen's County, and travelling into Munster founded Disert Aengusa in co. Limerick. At the time of the expedition of king Aedh Oirdnidhe against Leinster in 799 he was residing at Disert Bethac near Monasterevin. Latterly he went to abbot Maeldruain at Tamhlacht, when he from humility concealed his gifts, and passing himself as a serving man was entrusted with the charge of the mill and kiln, till at last his learning was discovered by accident.

The Feilire consists of three parts. 1. Five quatrains invoking a blessing on the poet and his work. 2. A preface of 220 quatrains; and 3. The festology itself in 365 quatrains for every day in the year (O'Curry, Early Eccl. MSS. of Ireland, pp. 359-371. [A. P. F.]

FEMORALIA or FEMINALIA. These are drawers or breeches covering the thighs and loins, as the derivation implies. (See Isidore Hispal. Etym. xix. 22.) They were an essential part of the dress of the Levitical priesthood (Ex. xxviii. 42, 43), and as such are often referred to by the fathers (see e.g. Jerome, Epist. 64, ad Fabiolam; i. 360, ed. Vallarsi), many of whom are delighted to find a symbolical meaning in this as in other vestments.

The injunction as to the wearing of breeches during divine service is repeated in sundry monastic rules. Thus the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Bracara, when settling the dress to be worn by monks, permits the use of femoralia to all, but "maxime his qui ministerio implicantur altaris" (Regula S. Fructuosi, c. 45: in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, part 2, p. 139, ed. Paris, 1663; cf. Grimalci Solitariorum Regula, c. 49; op. cit. p. 341). For general rules as to this and other articles of monastic dress see Magistri Regula, c. 81 (op. cit. p. 257). The Rule of St. Benedict enjoins that monks who were going on a journey should borrow femoralia from the Vestiarium, and on their return should restore them thither washed:—"femoralia, ii qui diriguntur in via, de Vestuario accipiant, qui revertentes lota ibi restituant" (c. 55; p. 117, ed. Venice, 1723). For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv., and Menard's note to the Concordia Regularum (Patrol. ciii. 1235).

FENCING-MASTERS. [GLADIATORS; LANCISTAE.]

FERETRUM, a bier on which the corpse, after washing, was placed and carried to burial [BURIAL OF THE DEAD]. It was as a rule made of wood, in which Ambrose (in Luc. vii. 14) sees a mystical allusion to the resurrection, drawn from the miracle at Nain (Durant. de Ritib. lib. i. c. 23). The feretrum of Constantine the Great appears to have been of gold, like his coffin (Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iv. c. 66). The bier was covered with a pall, more or less costly, according to the rank of the deceased. That of Constantine was of purple (ἀλουργκῇ ἀλουργίδι). That of Blesilla, the daughter of Paula, was of cloth of gold, against which Jerome remonstrated vehemently as an unchristian extravagance (Hieron. Ep. 25). Constantine's bier was surrounded with a circle of lights burning in golden candlesticks (Euseb. u. s.). The bier was carried to the grave sometimes by relations or near friends, sometimes by officials designated to that duty (Copiatæ, decani, lectionarii), and in the case of persons of high dignity or sanctity by bishops and nobles, e.g., Basil by his clergy (Greg. Mag. Orat. xx.), his sister Macrina by Gregory Nyssen, and other clergy (Greg. Nys. Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 201); Paula, by the bishops of Palestine, "cervicem feretro subjicientibus" (Hieron. Ep. 27). [E. V.]

"FERIA. The proper sense of this word is that of a holyday, of a festival viewed in the aspect of a day of freedom from worldly business. It is in this meaning that we find the word in classical Latin, though here it occurs exclusively in the plural. Besides this, however, the word has been used in a special sense in the Christian church from very early times to denote the days of the week, feria secunda, tertia, &c., for Monday, Tuesday, &c.

The origin of this system of notation cannot be stated with absolute certainty. It is explained by Ducange (Glossarium, s. v.) as arising from the fact that the week following Easter Day was appointed by the emperor Constantine to be observed as one continuous festival, and that originally the year began with Easter. Hence the Monday, Tuesday, &c., of Easter Week would be respectively secunda feria, tertia feria, &c., and in this way, following the example of the first week of the year, the names passed to all other Mondays, &c., of the year. The great objection to this view, which seems to have found many supporters (see e.g. Pelliccia, De Christianæ Ecclesiæ politia, i. 277, ed. Colon. 1829), is that long before the time of Constantine we find Tertullian speaking of Wednesday and Friday as quarta and sexta feria (de jejuniis adv. Psychicos, c. 2).

It seems more reasonable to explain the phrase as being akin to and probably derived from the Jewish system of notation under which such an expression as e.g. ἡ μία τῶν σαββάτων (Mark xvi. 2; Acts xx. 7, and often in the New Testament) means the "first day of the week." This extension of the word Sabbath, which, besides the instances adducible from the New Testament, occurs also in the Targums (see e.g. Esther ii. 9), is merely a natural transference of a word from its primary meaning of the point of time, as it were, to express the periods marked out by such points; and an exact parallel is found in the Hebrew שַׁבָּת, which is primarily the new moon, and hence the month, or period between two new moons. The real feria then being Sunday, the other days of the week are reckoned as in the above instances with reference to this. On this view see Heinichen on Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. (vol. iii. p. 87). The explanation given by Durandus (Ratione de divinorum officiorum, vii. l. 11) deserves to be quoted, though of course not admissible as a solution—"vocantur ergo feriae a feriando, quia toto tempore a vitiiis ferari, id est curare, debemus, non quod sit a necessariis vitae operibus feriandum."

With the seventh day of the week the name Sabbatum was so closely associated that it was nearly always used instead of septima feria, though Ducange (s. v.) gives an example of this last phrase. In like manner, the first day of the week, from its association with the Resurrection, became "the Lord's Day" from apostolic times, and thus though the phrase prima feria does now and then occur (see e. g. in one of the spurious sermons once attributed to Augustine, Patrol. xxxix. 2005), dominica is the regular word for Sunday in ancient liturgies. The days, however, from Monday to Friday inclusive are habitually designated as secunda feria, &c., of which practice an examination of, e. g., the Gregorian Sacramentary will furnish abundant examples. A good illustration, showing how completely the word feria had passed into this new sense, is furnished by the use of the phrase feriae legitimae in the Libri Poenitentiales of Theodore of Tarsus and of Bede, as when for some offence a special fast is enjoined "praeter legitimas ferias" (see e. g. Patrol. xcix. 968), that is, in addition to those days of the week which were fasts under all circumstances.

For further remarks on this subject see Ducange's Glossarium, (s. v.), and Augusti's Handbuch der christl. chen Archäologie, i. 467 sqq.

[R. S.]

FERIALES (i.e. Libri) were books containing a record of the festivals of the martyrs. Thus Chromatius and Heliodorus, writing to Jerome (Hieron. Epist.), beg him to search for the Feriales from the archives of Eusebius of Caesarea, as a guide to the fast-days of the martyrs [CALENDAR: MARTYROLOGY] (Ducange, s. v.).

FERMENTUM. I. The earliest Ordo Romanus extant, which is supposed to represent the ritual of Rome in the age of Gregory the Great, A.D. 590, orders a portion of reserved eucharist (Sancta) to be brought into the church before the celebration by a subdeacon, to be delivered by him to the archdeacon after the canon, and to be put into the chalice by the latter, saying, "The Peace of the Lord be with you always." (Ord. R. I. nn. 8, 17, 18, in Mus. Ital. tom. ii. pp. 8, 12, 13). The bishop of Rome is supposed to be present, and to celebrate. The particle thus used was called Fermentum, the leaven, n. 22, p. 16. If the pope was not present, "a particle of the leaven, which had been consecrated by the apostolical, was brought by the oblationary subdeacon, and given to the archdeacon; but he handed it to the bishop, who, signing it thrice, and saying, 'The Peace, &c.,' put it into the chalice." The reason of the name Fermentum is now obvious. Leaven is dough reserved from one baking to be mixed with that prepared for another, and may be said to make the bread of both one. The eucharistic leaven connected successive celebrations with each other in the same manner, and was at the same time a token of union between congregations locally separated from each other. If we may trust to the Liber Pontificalis, the custom of sending the Fermentum to the several churches in Rome originated with Melchisedech, A.D. 311. The same authority tells us that Siricius, A.D. 385, "ordained that no presbyter should celebrate masses through the whole week unless he received a certified (declaratum), consecrated (portion) from the bishop of the place appointed (for a station), which is called the leaven" (Anast. Biblioth. de Vitis Pont. Rom. nn. 32, 39, pp. 12, 22). The custom is noticed at some length in a letter ascribed to Innocent I., A.D. 402, but apparently composed by a later and inferior writer. From this document we learn that the pope "sent the leaven per titulos," i.e. the churches within the city only (those without being in the suburbicarian dioceses), and that it was done on Sundays, "that the presbyters who on that day could not meet him (in worship) on account of the people committed to them, might not, above all on that day, feel themselves cut off from communion with him" (Innoc. Ep. ad Decent. in Cigheri, V. PP. Theolog. Univ. tom. iv. p. 178). The writer had been asked by another bishop, if it was proper to send the Fermentum about through a diocese (i.e. beyond the walls of an episcopal city). The question shows that the practice had spread. In the writings of Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, we meet with a story which proves incidentally that it was not unknown in France. We are told of a certain deacon, in a town in Auvergne, who, "when the time to offer the sacrifice was come, having taken the tower in which was kept the mystery of the Lord's Body, began to carry it to the door (of the church), and entered the temple to place it on the altar," &c. (Mirac. L. I. cap. 86).

Before the custom became obsolete, its observance was, it appears, reduced by authority to a few days in the year. For in an ancient gloss on the letter ascribed to Innocent, found by Mabillon in the library of St. Emmeran at Ratisbon, the following statement occurs: "Touching the leaven, which he mentions, it is the custom of the Romans that a portion be reserved from the mass which is sung on Maundy Thursday and the Easter-Eve, and on the holy day of Easter, and at Pentecost, and on the holy day of the Lord's Nativity, throughout the year; and that of the said mass there be put into the chalice, everywhere at the stations, if the pope himself be not present, when he says, The Peace, &c. . . and this is called Fermentum. Nevertheless, on Easter-Eve, no presbyter in the baptismal churches communicates any one before there be sent to him of that very same holy thing which the Lord Pope hath offered" (Mabillon, Itin. German. Descript. p. 65; Hamb. 1717). The rite was observed at Rome under the second Ordo Romanus, now extant (pp. 43, 9), which is probably at least a century later than the first. Amalarius, who wrote about the year 827, cites some words that relate to it from Ordo II. § 12 (p. 49); but there can be little doubt that he understood them of the "commixture" of a particle of the newly-consecrated oblate (De Eccles. Off. lib. iii. c. 31).

II. There was another use of the reserved element, somewhat similar to the above, at the ordination of bishops and priests. The earliest notice occurs in a very ancient Roman directory, and refers (as indeed all the strictly Roman documents do) to bishops only. The pope at the communion which followed the consecration, gave a whole oblate to the newly-made bishop, of which he took a part at the time, but "reserved the rest of it to serve for communions for forty days" (Ordo VIII. p. 89). The practice may have spread from Rome, but it was at one time so widely observed that we are compelled to assign its origin to a very early though not primitive date. In the opinion of Morinus (De Sac. Ordin. P. III. Exerc. VIII. c. ii. § iv.), it sprang up in Italy in the 8th century. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, who was born in the 10th century, asserts that it was observed by all the bishops of his province at the ordination of presbyters, and he believed it to be universal (Ep. II. ad Einard. apud Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. L. I. c. viii. Art. IX. n. xx.). Rubrics prescribing it at the consecration of bishops are found in old pontificals of Concha, in Spain (Martene, u. s. Art. X. n. xxi.); of Salzburg (Ibid. Art. XI. Ord. VIII.); of Toulouse, Rouen, Rheims (Morinus, de Sac. Ord. P. II. p. 281; and P. III. p. 130), and the Latin church of Constantinople (Mart. u. s. Ordo XIV. note at end), where the term was forty days; and of Mayence (Morinus, P. II. p. 278), where it was thirty. The pontificals of Compiègne (Mart. u. s. Ord. VII.) and of Salzburg (Ibid. Ord. IX.) testify to the custom at the ordination of priests, the former fixing forty days for them, and the latter only seven. In the pontifical of the Latin church of Apamea in Syria, the pope, who is supposed to consecrate, is directed to give a "whole Host" to the new bishop, but its use is not mentioned. Afterwards, however, it is said that "for forty days from the day of his consecration he ought, if possible, to sing mass daily for the people committed to him." (Mart. u. s. Ord. XIV.). This evidently indicates the original purpose, and makes it highly probable that wherever in the west we find an order that the newly ordained shall celebrate for forty days (and this was a common rule: see Morinus, P. III. Exerc. VIII. c. ii. § vii. p. 132), there had also existed in connection with it the custom of reserving for those celebrations from the communion at the ordination.

Maillon (Comm. in Ord. Rom. p. xxxix.) states expressly that the particles of the reserved oblate were put day by day into the chalice by the newly-made bishop or priest, as in the rite before described. This is more than probable; but it is right to mention that he gives no reference, and that no direct evidence of the fact has come within the knowledge of the present writer.

FESTIVAL (ἑορτή, festum, dies festus). The history of the first rise of festivals in the Christian church is a subject involved in much obscurity. During the first few years, while the essentially Jewish character of the church continued, the Jewish yearly festivals were doubtlessly observed, especially the Passover and Pentecost, which later events had raised to a far higher pitch of dignity. The Sabbath also continued to be observed, and with it the first day of each week became a lesser Easter day.

As time went on, the Jewish element in the church became proportionately diminished, with the breach between it and the Gentile part continually widening. Indeed the tone of the language used by Christian writers in the 2nd century, with reference to the Jewish nation, is on the whole one of undisguised hostility. It is obvious therefore that the tendency would be from the nature of the case to reject such Jewish festivals as had not in some sort been made Christian, and thus, e.g., though some have seen in Christmas a higher form of the feast of the Dedication, it may be considered that the inheritance of the younger from the older church, so far as festivals are concerned, consists of the ennobled Passover and Pentecost. The "first day of the week" was no doubt a Christian festival from the earliest times. Up to the end of the 2nd century, we have no evidence of the existence of any other festival than these three. Gradually, however, from a belief in the lessons of good derivable from a celebration of great events in the history of our faith, and perhaps too from the analogy of the numerous festivals of the older religions, fresh commemorations arose, the earliest being that of the Epiphany, from which afterwards arose the celebration of Christmas as a separate festival. The exact time of the first rise of these, and of the connection between the two, is uncertain; reference may be made to the separate articles. [CHRISTMAS, EPIPHANY.] The time, too, from Easter to Pentecost came to be viewed as one long festal season, and in this period a special distinction began to be attached to Ascension-day, in the 3rd or more probably in the 4th century. Together with these festivals and similar ones which were gradually added (e.g. those of the Presentation and Annunciation in the 6th century), all commemorative of the great events in the foundation of the faith, we find also festivals of another kind, the celebration of the anniversary of a martyr's death, viewed as his natal day into the better life. These would be at first confined more or less to special churches, but would subsequently obtain in many cases a general observance. Thus by the end of the 4th century we find a wide-spread observance of festivals of e.g., St. Stephen, SS. Peter and Paul, and the Maccabees. The festival of St. John the Baptist, which at an early period became one of great importance (see e.g. the canon of the council of Agde, cited below), is not however of the above class, being a commemoration of the actual birthday, as one intimately associated with that of the Saviour Himself.

We find, however, considerable diversity of feeling in the primitive church on the subject of festivals. On the one hand, it was most justly felt that a festival, as being a cessation from the world's everyday cares and pleasures, should claim regard as a special means of help for the soul in its heavenward way; on the other hand, it was urged with equal truth, that when the shadows of Judaism had become the realities of Christianity, to lay any special stress on the observance of times and seasons was at any rate to incur the danger of losing sight of the reason why festivals were established at all, and the rather that in Christianity every day was in a new sense consecrated to God. It was the disregard of one or other of these two co-ordinate truths to which must be attributed much of the false ideas that have been held on the subject of festivals. Protests on the second point were deemed necessary by our Lord Himself (Matt. xii. 8; Mark ii. 27), and by St. Paul (Romans xiv. 5, 6; Gal. iv. 9-11; Col. ii. 16). In like manner too, Origen (contra Celsum viii. 22) urges that the Christian who dwells on the thought of Christ our Passover, and of the gift of the Holy Ghost, is every day keeping an Easter and a Pentecostal feast. Similar remarks are found also in Chrysostom (Hom. i. de S. Pentecoste, c. i.; vol. ii. 458, ed. Montfaucon: cf. Hom. xv. in 1 Cor. c. 3; vol. x. 128). These passages, however, are not to be viewed as objections brought against the celebration of festivals, but rather as answers to those who saw in them but a relic of Judaism. Tertullian, in very sweeping language, condemns the practice of holding festivals altogether on this ground,—“Horum igitur tempora observantes et dies et menses et annos, galaticamur. Plane, si judaicarum caerimoniarum, si legalium sollempnitatum observantes sumus. . .” and asks why in the face of St. Paul's language as to times and seasons, Easter is celebrated, and why the period from thence to Whitsunday is spent as one long season of rejoicing (de jejunio adv. Psychicos, c. 14). Jerome, on the other hand, while endorsing such views as those which we have referred to as held by Origen and Chrysostom, proceeds further to maintain the definite advantages arising from the observance of festivals (Comm. in Gal. iv. 10; vol. vii. 456, ed. Vallarsi: cf. Socrates, Hist. Eccles. v. 22).

We shall now briefly notice the chief points in which a festival was specially distinguished in its observance from ordinary days. (1) The essential idea of a Christian festival was obviously such as to make ordinary festivities, other than those of a religious character, unseemly at such times; and thus numerous imperial edicts were promulgated from time to time, prohibiting public games, etc. on Christian holy days (Eusebius, Vita Constantini iv. 18, 23; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. i. 8; Cod. Theodos. lib. xv. tit. 5, ll. 2, 5; vol. iv. pp. 350, 353, ed. Gothofredus: Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. 12, l. 11; p. 208, ed. Gothofredus). Of the two references to the Theodosian Code, the former enjoins that “Nullus Solis die populo spectaculum praebeat;” the latter specifies Sundays, Christmas, the Epiphany, Easter, and the anniversary of apostolic martyrdoms as the days to which the prohibition extended, “. . .

(2) In like manner all legal business had to be suspended. (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. 8, ll. 1, 2; vol. i. pp. 118, 121; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. 12, ll. 7, 11; pp. 207, 208). A special exemption was allowed in the case of emancipation or manumission (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. 8, l. 1; supra). (3) The celebration of public worship was of course a necessary concomitant of a festival. The council of Eliberis [305 A.D.] condemns the man who on three consecutive Sundays was absent from the church (can. 21; Labbe i. 973). The council of Agde (506 A.D.) while sanctioning generally the practice of communicating in private chapels, forbids it elsewhere than in the public assembly on the more important festivals. These are specified in another canon of the same council as Easter, Christmas, the Epiphany, Ascension-day, Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, “vel si qui maximi dies in festivitatibus habentur.” (can. 18, 21; Labbe iv. 1386; cf. Concil. Aurel. iv. [541 A.D.] can. 3; Labbe v. 382). (4) Fasting was a thing utterly foreign to the idea of such days; indeed it was a distinguishing mark of sundry heretics to turn the festivals into seasons of fasting. The so called Apostolic Canons censure those who would fast on the Lord's day or the Sabbath (i.e. Saturday, which, it will be remembered, was regarded in the East as a day of distinctly festal character), and orders that any of the clergy who does so shall be deposed (καταλείθω, can. 65, al. 66, Labbe i. 40); and a previous canon (52 al. 51) had spoken of a bishop, priest or deacon, who abstained from flesh and wine on a festival as “a cause of scandal to many.” (See also Tertullian, de Corona Militis c. 3; Council. Gangrense [circa 324 A.D.] can. 18; Labbe ii. 424; Concil. Carthag. iv. [398 A.D.] can. 64; Labbe ii. 1205). On these days in earlier times were held Agapae [AGAPAE], a custom which was afterwards changed into the plan of the richer members of a Christian community feeding the poorer (cf. e.g., Tertullian, Apol. c. 39). (5) Among minor but significant ways of distinguishing a festival it may be added that at such times it was usual to offer prayer standing, not kneeling; “die dominico nefas . . . de geniculis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschae in Pentecosten usque gaudemus” (Tertullian, de Corona Militis c. 3). Irenaeus, in referring to the same practice, speaks of this absence of kneeling as figurative of the resurrection (Frag. 7; vol. i. p. 828, ed. Stieren: cf. Justin Martyr, Quaest. et Resp. ad Orthodoxos 115; Jerome Dialogus contra Luciferianos c. 8; vol. ii. 180; Epiphanius Expos. Fidei c. 22; vol. i. 1105, ed. Petavius; Isidore de Ecl. Off. i. 33; Rabanus Maurus de Inst. Cler. ii. 42. See also Concil. Nicaenum i. [325 A.D.] can. 20; Labbe ii. 37; also Dr. Pusey's note to the Oxford translation of Ephrem Syrus, pp. 417 sqq.).

Festivals may be divided into ordinary and extraordinary (feriae statutae, indictae), according as they came in regular course in the Christian year, or were specially appointed in consequence of some particular event. The former may again be divided into immoveable and moveable (feriae immobiles, mobiles), according as they did or did not fall on the same day in every year; those in the latter division obviously consisting of such as depended on Easter, the time of which, depending on the Jewish or lunar calendar, to which the Paschal festival originally belonged, varies with reference to its place in the Julian or solar year [EASTER]. It follows that the number of Sundays between Christmas and Easter, and again between Easter and Christmas, is variable. Besides the obvious divisions of feriae majores, minores, there is further that into feriae integrae, intercalariae, according as the festival lasted for the whole or part of a day. Such divisions as those made by the Roman church of festum simplex, duplex, semiduplex, to say nothing of further subdivisions (principale duplex, majus duplex, etc.), fall quite beyond our period. (For information concerning them see Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. Festum). On the subject of the repeated commemorations of the more important festivals, see OCTAVE, and for the preliminary preparation for festivals, see VIGIL.

FINES (mulcta, emenda, ἐντιμία). Mulcta signified a fine paid by way of penalty to the judge: emenda, satisfaction made to the injured party. On the variations from this usage, see Du Cange, s. v. Emenda. Fines are found in the records of the early English church among the penalties inflicted for ecclesiastical offences. The laws of Ethelbert of Kent, A.D. 597–604 (c. i.) require the following compensation to be made for injuries; "to the property of God and the church twelve fold, a bishop's property eleven fold, a priest's property nine fold, a deacon's six fold, a clerk's property three fold." The laws of Ine, king of Wessex, A.D. 690 (c. 2), order a man to have his child baptized within thirty days, "if it be not so, let him make 'bot' with thirty shillings, but if it die without baptism, let him make 'bot' for it with all that he has;" (c. 3) a lord to pay thirty shillings who compels his 'theouman' to work on Sunday, a freeman working without his lord's command to pay sixty shillings; and (c. 13) any one committing perjury before a bishop to pay one hundred and twenty shillings. In the laws of Wiltred of Kent, A.D. 696, it is decreed (c. 9) that if an 'esne' do work contrary to his lord's command from sunset on Saturday to sunset on Sunday, he must make a 'bot' of eighty shillings. The Penitential of Egbert (vii. 4) directs an offender for certain crimes either to do penance or pay a fine to the church, or divide money among the poor; and elsewhere (xiii. 11) allows a fine to take the place of fasting; but this latter instance is rather of the nature of a Redemption than a direct penance. FIR-TREE OR PINE. See Aringhi, vol. ii. p. 632–3. "Praeter cupressum, et pinus quoque et myrtus pro mortis symbolo, etc. Et pinus quidem, quia semel excisa nunquam reviviscit et repullulascit." These are rather general or human reasons for choice of the pine as an emblem of death, than as conveying any specially Christian thought. See Herodotus vi. 37, on the threat of Croesus to the people of Lampascus. But the fir, or some tree much resembling it, accompanies the figure of the Good Shepherd, Aringhi, ii. 293, from the cemetery of St. Priscilla. Also at pp. 75 and 25; and it is certainly intended to be represented among the trees which surround the same form in vol. i. 577. The latter painting is from the Callixtine, and is certainly an adaptation from the common fresco-subjects of Orpheus. The shepherd bears the syrinx or reeds, but sits in a half-reclining position, as Orpheus with the lyre; and various trees are surrounding him. This association of the fir or pine with the Good Shepherd, and of both with Orpheus, would account for the introduction of different species of "trees of the wood," the fir being also characteristic of the mountains or wilderness in which the lost sheep is found. Herzog thinks it was placed on Christian graves (as well as others), as an evergreen tree, and therefore a symbol of immortality; which is by no means unlikely. [R. St. J. T.]

FIRE, KINDLING OF. In the first Ordo Romanus (c. 32, p. 21; cf. p. 31), among the ceremonies of Maundy Thursday, the following is mentioned. At the ninth hour fire is produced by a flint and steel sufficient to light a candle, which ought to be placed on a reed; a lamp lighted from this is kept unextinguished in the church until Easter eve, to light the Paschal taper, which is to be blessed on that day. The directions of pope Zacharias (Epist. 12, ad Bonif.) are different. He says, that the tradition of the Romish church was, that on Maundy Thursday, three lamps of more than usual capacity were set alight in some hidden spot in the church, with oil sufficient to last till Easter eve, and that from these on the latter day the baptismal tapers were to be lighted. "But," he continues, "as to the crystals which you mention we have no tradition." The latter words seem to prove incontestably that the custom mentioned in the Ordo Rom. I., of striking fire from flint or "crystal," was not introduced at Rome in the time of Zacharias (†752), when it was already practised in some churches—probably in Gaul or Germany—known to Boniface. Pope Leo IV., however (†855), recognises it as an established custom to produce fresh fire on Easter eve, saying (Hon. De Cura Past. c. 7), "in sabbato paschae extincto veteri novus ignis benedicatur et per populum dividatur." Amalarius (De Ord. Antiph. c. 44) says that he learned from Theodorus, archdeacon of Rome, that no lamps or tapers were used in the Roman church on Good Friday, but that on that day new fire is kindled, the flame from which is preserved until the nocturnal office. Compare Martene, Rit. Ant. IV. xxiii. 6.

FIRST FRUITS (Primitiae, of animals or men, πρωτότοκα; of raw produce, πρωτογενήματα; of prepared produce, ἀπαρχαί. Aug. Quaest. in Num. xviii.). Compare FRUITS, OFFERING OF.

The custom of dedicating first fruits to God obtained early in the church (Orig. c. Cels. viii. 33, 34). Irenaeus thinks that Christ enjoined them when he took bread and wine at the last supper (Haer. iv. 32), and that they ought to be paid (Oportet, ib. 34). Origen says their payment is becoming and expedient, and refusal is unworthy and impious, yet he distinctly states that the Levitical law of first fruits is not binding in the letter upon the Christian church. (Num. xviii. Hom. xi.). But as the idea grew that the clergy had succeeded to the position and to the rights of the Levites, first fruits were considered obligatory, to withhold them was to defraud God; they are more incumbent upon Christians than Jews, for Christ bids his followers to sell all they have, and also to exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees; the priest whom they support will bring a blessing on the house by his prayers, the offerer by his spirit of thankfulness. (Jerome in Ezek. xlv.; in Mal. iii.; Greg. Naz. Epist. 80, Orat. 15. Apost. Const. ii. 25.) Yet, though the payment was so vigorously pressed, we find in Cassian (Collat. xxi. 1 seq.) that abbot John regards first fruits as voluntary gifts, while Theonas says he has not even heard the reason for paying them before. The council of Friuli (A.D. 791, can. 14), quotes Malachi iii. as conclusive proof of the obligation of first fruits.

Most stress is laid upon paying first fruits of the corn-floor and the wine-press, but the Apostolic Constitutions mention others and regulate their distribution. First fruits of the corn-floor and wine-press, of sheep and oxen, of bread and honey, of wine in cask, are to be paid for the support of the priests, but of clothing, money, and other possessions for the orphan and widow (Const. vii. 30). The bishop alone has the right to receive and apportion first fruits (ii. 25). At first they were brought with the other oblations at the celebration of the eucharist. This was found inconvenient, and it was ordered tural or anagrammatic meaning is perhaps the most popular at the present day. In Matt. xiii. 47-49; Luke v. 4-10; it is used in the parable of the net for the members of the church; and our Lord there assigns it its significance; His parabolic use of it is frequently imitated in early Christian art, where the fishes in the church's net, or caught by the hook of the fisher, correspond exactly to the lambs of the fold, or to the doves, which also represent the faithful on many Christian tombs and vaultings (see s. vv.) But the anagrammatic use of the word ΙΧΘΥΣ appears to have been very early. It was derived, as all know, from the initials o. the word; 'Ιησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ. This appears to be in the mind of St. Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. iii. c. 11, p. 106), and to have been so well understood in his time as to have required no explanation, since he recommends the use of the symbol on seals and rings, without giving an explanation of its import. The other devices he commends are the dove, ship, lyre, and anchor. At so early a period as the middle of the 2nd century, and under the continual dangers of persecution, the use of such a symbol for the person of the Lord was perfectly natural, as it (Canon. Ap. 4) that they should not be brought to the altar, but to the bishop and presbyters, who would distribute to the deacons and other clerics. The church of Africa (Cod. Can. Afr. 37), made an exception in favour of honey and milk, which were needed as accompaniments of the sacrament of baptism.

The payment of first fruits was accompanied by a special formula (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.); lo, I have brought to thee first fruits of the produce of the earth, which thou hast given me, O Lord. The priest replied with the blessing written in Deut. xxviii. 3. A special form of thanksgiving is found in Apost. Const. viii. 40.

The amount of first fruits was not fixed by the Levitical law, but left to the liberality of the worshipper. Tradition handed down one-sixtieth as the minimum, those who were more religious gave one-fortieth, the rest something between. (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.; Cassian Coll. xxi. 3). [J. S.]

FISH. [See EUCHARIST IN CHRISTIAN ART, p. 625.]

The Fish is a symbol of almost universal occurrence in the painting and sculpture of the primitive church. Like the Dove or the Lamb it is used in more than one sense; and its non-scriptural would attract no notice from the outer world; and in the same manner, with even more obvious reasons, the form of the cross was frequently disguised up to the time of Constantine. [See CROSS.] But see also Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 1) "Nos pisciculi secundum ΙΧΘΥΣ nostrum in aqua nascimur." Also Jerome ad Bonosum, Ep. 43, "B. tanquam ΙΧΘΥΣ filius aquosa petit." [BAPTISM, p. 171.] But the mystic senses assigned to the emblem by various fathers often seem to the modern mind somewhat gratuitous and ill-founded. They strain their imaginations, apparently, to find reasons in the nature of things for a devoutly ingenious arrangement of initial letters; and seem to assume that there must be real analogy between the Divine Lord and the fish, because the initials of the name and titles of the one made the Greek name of the other. The pleasure derived from the anagram, or the facility it may have given for concealing Christian doctrine from the heathen, seem occasionally to have overcome the thought that the Lord Himself used the fish as an emblem of His people only, not of Himself—of the sheep, not the Shepherd. Aringhi dwells more naturally on the Scriptural meaning, and the various examples he gives (vol. ii. p. 684; ii. p. 620; also that from the inscription made in Stilicho's consulship A.D. 400, vol. i. p. 19) all speak of the fish in the Scriptural sense as a type of the disciple. The lamp in Aringhi (ii. 620; see woodcut) has the monogram on the handle, and the two fishes on the central part. He also refers to the dolphin as king of fishes, speaking of its reported love for its offspring; with reference to the tomb of Baleria or Valeria Latobia, now in the Vatican. Martigny states that because Christ is man, He therefore is a fish of His own net, and gives prophetic significance, following Aringhi, to the story of Tobias and the fish which delivered Sara from the power of the evil spirit. This he literally accepts, and follows the various attempted connexions of the anagram with the fish of the last repast at the sea of Galilee; and sees in them the sacramental representatives of the body of our Lord, quoting St. Augustine, (Tract cxxiii. in Joann. xvi.) and Bede's observation on the same passage, Piscis assus, Christus est passus. These analogies are difficult to follow, especially when we consider the Scriptural use of the emblem from the Lord's own mouth.

The fish as the believer, (Ambrose, iv. in Luc. v. "piscis qui hanc enavigant vitam") is more frequently represented on the hook of the gospel fisherman, than in the net of the church. [See FISHERMAN.] Bread and fish are the universal viands of the representations of earlier Agapae, as frequently in the Callixtine catacomb. The genuineness of some at least of these paintings is generally allowed, and Dr. Theodore Mommsen mentions in particular an Agape with bread and fish, in the vault named after Domitilla, the grand-daughter of Vespasian, on the Ardeatine way and near the ancient church of SS. Nereus and Achilles. In this painting so impartial and accurate an observer has full confidence, as coeval with the vault; though he thinks the case incomplete for the vault itself being so early as 95 B.C.; and observes that the painting of this subject, as of those of Daniel, Noah, and the Good Shepherd, is less excellent than that of the vine in the vaultings of the original chamber of Domitilla without the catacomb, which is quite like a work of the Augustan age.

The use of this emblem is connected by Martigny with the "disciplina arcani" of the early church. There can be little doubt that reverent mystery was observed as to the eucharist, and that in ages of persecution, till Constantine's time, no public use of the cross was made, as a sign of the person of the Lord. Till then, the fish-anagram was perhaps in special and prevailing use, and it may have yielded its place from that time to the cross, the sign of full confession of Jesus Christ. For the secret discipline after the time of Constantine seems to have consisted mainly in the gradual nature of the instructions given to catechumens, and the fact that for a time the chief doctrines of the faith were not brought before them.

[R. St. J. T.]

The tesserae given to the newly-baptized were frequently in the form of the symbolical fish, as pledges or tokens of the rights conferred in baptism (Alleganza, Opusc. Erud. p. 107). Of this kind is probably the bronze fish given by Costadoni (Del Pesce, iv. 22), inscribed with the word CaCAIC. See woodcut.

Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 516) discovered in the catacombs three glass fishes, with a number inscribed upon each; thus, x. xx. xxv. The purpose of the numbers is altogether uncertain.

The custom of decorating baptisteries with fish has a similar origin. In the ruins of an ancient baptistery near the church of St. Prisca at Rome, two beautiful mosaics representing fish were discovered, which are now in the Kircher museum (Lupi, Dissert. i. 83). See BAPTISM, p. 171. [C.]

Martigny gives an example (see cut No. 1.) from an article by Costadoni, Del pesce (vol. 41, p. 247, in the collection of Calogera, Venice, 1738-1787), representing a man clothed in the skin of a fish, bearing a sporta or basket, which may, as Polidori supposes, represent the divine or apostolic fisher, or the fish of the church's net. The net is more rarely represented than the hook and line, but St. Peter is represented casting the net, in an ancient ivory in Mamachi (Costumi i. prefaz. p. 1). The net of St. Peter, with the Lord fishing with the line, is a device of the papal signets. In the Callixtine catacomb (De Rossi, IXOTC tab. ii. n. 4) the fisherman is drawing forth a huge fish from the waters which flow from the rock in Horeb (see cut No. 2). See also Bottari, tav. xlii., and a cornelian given by Costadoni, Pesce tav. xxx., on a small glass cup given by Garrucci (Vetri, vi. 10), a figure in tunic and pallium (supposed to represent the Lord) holds in his hand a large fish as if just drawn from the sea (cut No. 3). At St. Zenone in Verona, the patron saint is thus represented, and this subject, with those of Abraham's sacrifice, Noah's ark, and others, on the bronze doors and marble front of that most important church, are specially valuable as connecting the earlier Lombard carvings with the most ancient and scriptural subjects of primitive church-work. This symbol, like the Vine, is adopted from Pagan decoration, which of course proves its antiquity. [R. St. J. T.]

FISHERMAN'S RING. [RING.]

FISTULA (called also calamus, canna, cannula, siphon, arundo, pipa, pugillar). A tube, usually of gold or silver, by suction through which it was formerly customary to receive the wine in communicating. The ancient Ordo Romanus thus explains its use: "Diaconus tenens calicem et fistulam stet ante episcopum, usque dum ex sanguine Christi quantum voluerit sumat; et sic calicem et fistulam subdiacono commendet." Among other instances, five silver-gilt fistulae ad communicandum are enumerated among the sacramental vessels of the church of Mayence; and at a later date, pope Victor III. left to the monastery of Monte Casino, "fistulam auream cum angulo, et fistulas argenteas duas." Pope Adrian I. is said by Anastasius to have offered "calicem majorem fundatum cum siphone pensantem libras xxx."; and the ancient Carthusian statutes recite that the Order has no ornaments of gold or silver in its churches, "praeter calicem, et calamum, quo Sanguis Domini sumitur."

The adoption of the fistula doubtless arose from caution, lest any drop from the chalice should be spilt, or any other irreverence occur in communicating. This seems intimated by the rule of the Cistercian Order (Lib. Us. Ord. Cist. cap. 53), which says that the fistula is not necessary in Missa solennis, when the ministers alone communicate; but that when more communicate it should be used. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iii. 31) states that it was the custom of the Arians to communicate by drinking from the chalice, as if the use of the fistula was for that reason preferred by the orthodox.

The fistula has fallen into disuse since the practice of communicating in one kind has prevailed. It is, however, still retained in solemn papal celebrations for the communion of the pope. The senior cardinal bishop purifies the tube (calamum aureum Papae) with wine, and, after kissing it, places it in the chalice, which he delivers into the right hand of the pope, who communicates by suction. Cardinal Bona states that the fistula was used in his time in the Benedictine monastery of the congregation of St. Maur, in France, where also the assistants communicated in both kinds.

The fistula does not appear to have been adopted in the Eastern church, which made use of a spoon for communicating. [See Voigt, Historia fistulae Eucharisticae; Krazier, Lit. pp. 204-5; Bona, Rer. Lit.; Martene, De ant. rit. lib. iv.; Catalani, Caerem. &c.] [H. J. H.]

FLABELLUM (ῥηπίδιον, ῥηπίς). Among the evidences of the Eastern origin of the Christian religion is the use of fans, flabella, during the celebration of the Eucharist. Having its birthplace and earliest home in a climate teeming with insect life, where food exposed uncovered is instantly blackened and polluted by swarms of flies, it was natural that the bread and wine of its sacramental feast should be guarded from defilement by the customary precautions. The flabellum, or muscarium, having been once introduced among the furniture of the altar for necessary uses, in process of time became one of its regular ornaments, and was thus transferred to the more temperate climates of the West, where its original purpose was almost forgotten.

The earliest notice of the flabellum as a liturgical ornament is in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 12), which direct that after the oblation, before and during the prayer of consecration, two deacons are to stand, one on either side of the altar, holding a fan made of thin membrane (parchment), or of peacock feathers, or of fine linen, and quietly drive away the flies and other small insects, that they may not strike against the vessels. In the liturgies also of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, the deacons are directed to fan the holy oblations during the prayer of consecration. This fanning, according to Germanus (Contemp. rer. Eccl. p. 157), who, though a late authority (A.D. 1222), may be taken as an evidence of earlier usage, ceased with the Lord's Prayer, and was not resumed. Early writers furnish many notices of the use of the flabellum as an essential part of the liturgical ceremonial. Cyril of Scythopolis, in his Life of St. Euthymius, § 78 (c. A.D. 550), describes Domitian standing at the right side of the holy table, while St. Euthymius was celebrating, with the mystical fan (μετὰ τῆς μυστικῆς ῥηπίδος) just before the Trisagion. Moschus also (Prat. Spirit. § 196) when narrating how some shepherd boys near Apamea were imitating the celebration of the Eucharist in childish sport,^a is careful to mention that two of the children stood on either side of the celebrant, vibrating their handkerchiefs like fans (τοῖς φακιολοῖς [fasciis] ἐρπίπων). The life of Nicetas (ap. Surium, April 3) describes St. Athanasius assisting at the divine mysteries, "ministerii flabellum tenens erat enim diaconus." Among the ornaments of the church of Alexandria specified in the inventory given, Chronic. Alexand. A.D. 624 (ap. Menard. ad Sac. Gregor. p. 319) are ῥημία ῥηπίδια.

As the deacons were the officers appointed to wave the fan over the sacred oblations, the delivery of the flabellum, or ῥηπίδιον, constitutes a part of many of the Oriental forms for the ordination to the diaconate. Thus Eucholog. p. 253, after the ὡράριον stole has been given and placed on the left shoulder, the holy fan (ἅγιον ῥηπίδιον), is put into the deacon's hands, and he is placed "at the side of the holy table to fan;" and again, p. 251, the deacon is directed to take the ῥηπίδιον, and stand at the right side of the table, and wave it over the holy things (ῥητίζε ἐπὶ τῶν ἁγίων) (cf. Martene, de Ritib. Eccl. ii. 525). Martene gives similar examples from the ordination of the Maronite deacons (de Rit. ii. 545), chorepiscopi ("diaconi tenentes flabella," ib. p. 554), and patriarchs (ib. 559); as well as of the Jacobite deacons (ib. 579, 580). Renaudot (ii. 80) asserts that though mentioned in the ordination services, the ῥηπιδιον does not appear in the Syrian liturgies. A flabellum, formed of a silver disk, was used in the Armenian church, as it still is. Neale (Eastern Ch. p. 396) remarks that the use of the flabellum was much more frequent among the Armenians than in the Greek church.

^a We may compare with this the well known story of St. Athanasius acting the boy-bishop and baptizing his companions on the shore at Alexandria.

wood's Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. pl. 53, No. 7, and pl. 20 (see also p. 153).

Although there is no mention of the flabellum in the Ordo Romanus, or Latin ritual books, there is no doubt that it was used by the Western church at an early time. This is evidenced by a story given by Moschus (Prat. Spiritual. § 150) of a deacon who had falsely accused his bishop, being removed from the altar when he was holding the fan in the presence of pope Agapetus, A.D. 535, because he hindered the descent of the Holy Spirit on the gifts. An earlier example is furnished by a gilded glass found in the catacombs, representing a deacon fanning the infant Saviour, seated on the knees of His Virgin Mother (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 202), ment attached to a handle. Bona, u. s., cites also the ancient Cluniac Consuetudinal, and that of St. Benignus of Dijon, together with a Pontifical Ceremonial of the time of Nicholas V. c. 1447. The flabellum often appears in inventories of church furniture. In that taken at St. Riquier, near Abbeville, in 831, mention is made of a "flabellum argenteum ad muscas a sacrificiis abigendas." Other later examples, including some from our own country, will be found in Mr. Albert Way's paper on the Flabellum (Archaeol. Journ. v. 203), sufficiently establishing its use in the churches of the West, where it could be scarcely regarded as requisite as regarded its original intention. We may cite also a letter of St. Hildebert of Tours, c. 1098 (Ep. 2, 71), accompanying the present of a flabellum made to a friend, in which the writer expounds its mystical signification; the flies representing the temptations of the devil to be driven away by the Catholic faith.

The flabellum appears to have gradually fallen into disuse in the Western church, and to have almost entirely ceased by the 14th century. At the present day, the only relic of the usage is in the magnificent fans of peacocks' feathers, carried by the attendants of the pope in solemn processions on certain great festivals.

Though the original intention of the flabellum was one of simple utility, various mystical meanings collected round it. Reference has been already made to the idea that these feather fans typified the cherubim and seraphim surrounding the heavenly throne, αἱ ῥιπίδες εἰς τὸ πῶν εἰσὶ τῶν Χερουβὶμ (German. u. s. p. 163), τὰ ῥιπίδια καὶ οἱ διάκονοι ἐμφαίνουσι τὰ ἐξαπτέρυγα Σεραφίμ καὶ τὴν τῶν πολυνομάτων Χερουβὶμ ἐμφέρεται (Ib. p. 169). Germanus also holds, according to Neale (Eastern Ch. p. 396), that the vibration of which we give a woodcut (No. 5). The annexed engraving (No. 6), showing a deacon vibrating his fan during the celebration of the eucharist, is from a miniature in the Barberini Library (Martigny, de l'usage du flabellum). In the next illustration (No. 7) from an illumination in a MS. in the Public Library at Rouen, a bishop is seen bowing his head in the act of elevating the wafer, over which the attendant deacon waves a flabellum, apparently made of parchment of the flabella typifies the tremor and astonishment of the angels at our Lord's Passion. We find the same idea in a passage from the monk Job, given by Photius (cod. ccxxii. lib. v. c. 25), who also states that another purpose of the vibration of the flabella was the raising of the mind from the material elements of the eucharist, and fixing them on the spiritual realities.

Two flabella are still preserved, that of Theodelinda of the latter part of the fifth century, in the treasury of the Cathedral of Monza, and that of the Abbey of Tournus, now in the Museum of the Hôtel de Cluny, assigned by Du Sommerard to the ninth. The former (No. 8) is constructed like a modern lady's fan, only circular, formed of purple vellum, illuminated with gold and silver, with an inscription round the upper edge on either side, describing its purpose, which was evidently domestic and not liturgical. The fan is contained in a wooden case, with silver ornaments, probably a reconstruction on the original plan (W. Burges, Archaeol. Journ. xiv. pp. 17-19). The Tournus fan was liturgical (No. 9).

No. 9. Flabellum of the Abbey of Tournus. From Du Sommerard, 'Les Arts du Moyen Age.'

It is described by Du Sommerard, Arts du Moyen Age (ii. 195, iii. 251, v. 231), and figured in his Atlas (ch. xiv. pl. 4), and Album (ix. série, p. 17). It is circular when fully expanded, and is ornamented with the figures of fourteen saints, in two concentric zones on either side. On one side are represented four female saints, the Blessed Virgin with Our Lord in her arms, St. Lucy, St. Agnes, and St. Cecilia, in one zone, and St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew, in the second; on the other side, the two zones contain male figures alone, St. Maurice, St. Denis, St. Philibert, St. Hilary, and St. Martin, with a "Judex," and a "Levita." Latin hexameters and pentameters are inscribed on three concentric bands on the fan, describing its use and its oblation in honour of God and St. Philibert. The relics of this saint, who died in 684, were translated to the Abbey of Tournus, where he was held in especial honour. The verses are very curious. We give one of the three series. It will be observed that some words have been misplaced by the painter to the confusion of the metre:—

"Sunt duo quae modicum confert estate flabellum
Infestas abigit muscas et mitigat estum,
Et sine dat tedio gustare manus ciborum. (sic)
Propterea calidum qui vult transire per annum,
Et tutus cupit ab atris existere muscis (sic)
Omni se studeat estate muniri flabello (sic)
Hoc quoque flabellum tranquillās excitat auras
Estus cum favet (fervet?) ventum facit atque serenum
Fugat et obscenas importunasque volucres."

The handle is of ivory, measuring about 2 feet in length; round the pommel is inscribed the maker's name, "† Johel me scae fecit in honore Mariae." When shut up it goes into a case ornamented with ivories, representing subjects from Virgil's Ecloques.

The making of fans of palm leaves, both for ecclesiastical and domestic purposes, employed the leisure of the Syrian solitaries. St. Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspium, while still an anchorite, is recorded to have made fans for the use of the altar (ap. Surium, ad Jan. 1). The fans sent by Marcella to the Roman ladies, for which she is thanked by St. Jerome (lib. i. Epist. 41), were for ordinary not religious use.

(Martigny, de l'usage du flabellum; Bingham, viii. 6, § 21, xv. 3, § 6; Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 25, § 6; Martene, ll. cc.; Augusti, Christl. Archäol. iii. 536 sq.; Archaeol. Journ. v. 200, xiv. 17.) [E. V.]

FLAGELLATION (Flagellatio). Flogging was a punishment inflicted on certain orders of the clergy, on monks, nuns, serfs, and slaves; but all orders of the clergy were forbidden (Apost. Can. 28) themselves to strike an offender either for correction or in self-defence. Augustine is a witness (Ep. 159 ad Marcell.) that this mode of discipline was employed not only by schoolmasters and parents, but by bishops in their courts. In the church of Mount Nitria (Palladius, Hist. Lousiac. c. 6, quoted by Bingham) three whips were kept hanging up; one for chastising offending monks, another for robbers, and the third for strangers who misconducted themselves. The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 38), orders monks who will not listen to admonition to be corrected with stripes, and (c. 41) the secular clergy who are guilty of drunkenness to be flogged. The 1st council of Mâcon (c. 8) sentences any of the junior clergy who summon an ecclesiastic before a lay tribunal to receive "forty stripes, save one" (Conc. Vernet. c. 6; Conc. Epaonens. c. 15). The rule of Isidore of Seville (c. 17) directs that minors shall not be excommunicated but be beaten. The higher orders of the clergy are exempted from the degradation of personal chastisement by the 4th council of Braga, A.D. 675 (c. 6). The laws of Ine king of Wessex, A. D. 690 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. p. 214) grant a pardon from his scourging to any one who takes refuge in a church. [G. M.]

FLAMEN. Bishops are supposed by Duncange (s. v.) to be called by the old ethnic title of flamen in the second, third, and fourth canons of the council of Elvira. But the "flamines" there mentioned are almost certainly priests of heathen deities, who are warned against relapsing into their former practices after conversion (Bingham, Antiq. xvi. iv. 8). [C.]

FLAMINA. A name occasionally used for the banners borne in a procession. Thus Wolfhard, in the life of St. Walpurgis (iii. 11, in Acta SS. Feb. 25) speaks of crosses and "signifera flamina," being borne in a procession (Duncange, s. v.). [C.]

FLOWERS. 1. Use of natural flowers.—The early Christians rejected the ancient heathen custom of strewing the graves of the dead with flowers and wreaths. This is clear from the testimony of Minucius Felix, who (Octav. 12, § 6; cf. 38, § 3), makes the heathen Caecilius reproach the Christians with refusing wreaths even to sepulchres. But they had adopted the practice in the 4th century; thus St. Ambrose (De obitu Valentiani, c. 56) says, as of a lawful custom, "I will not sprinkle his tomb with flowers, but with the sweet scent of Christ's Spirit; let others sprinkle basketfuls of lilies; our lily is Christ;" and Jerome (Epist. 20, ad Pammachium) says, "other husbands strew over the tombs of their wives violets, roses, lilies, and purple flowers, and soothe their grief of heart by these kind offices." So also Prudentius has an allusion to it (Cathe-merin. hymn x., circa exequias Defunctorum, 177-8).

"Nos tecta fovebimus ossa Violis et fronde frequenti."

And the same writer again (Peristeph. ix. 201, ff.) exhorts the votaries of St. Eulalia on her festival (Dec. 10), to pluck such flowers as the genial winter yielded—the violet and the crocus—to heap their baskets, while he (the poet) would bring his garlands of verse, woven in dactylic strain; "thus should we venerate the relics, and the altar set above the relics."

In course of time the churches, many of which in their origin were but memorials or vast sepulchres of martyrs, came to be adorned with garlands of leaves and flowers. The basilica of Paulinus at Nola, for instance, appears to have been ornamented in this manner. Jerome (Epist. ad Heliodorum) notes it as especially praiseworthy in Nepotianus, that he had decorated both basilicas and memorial churches of martyrs (basilicas ecclesiae et martyrum conciliabula), with various flowers and foliage and vine-leaves, mentioning distinctly the two classes of churches, those which were built over the remains of martyrs, and those which were not. St. Augustine mentions (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8) a blind woman bringing flowers to the tomb of St. Stephen, when the relics were translated. Venantius Fortunatus, in a poem addressed to St. Rhadegund (Carmena, viii. 9), gives a somewhat more detailed description of the floral decoration of a church for Easter. In spring-time (he says) when the Lord overcame hell, vegetation springs more freshly. Then do men decorate the door-posts and desks with flowers; women fill their laps with roses, these too for the temples. The altars are covered with wreaths; the gold of the crocus is blended with the purple of the violet; white is relieved with scarlet. So rich are the flowers that they surpass gems in colour, frankincense in odour. Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Mart. c. 50) tells us that the basilica of Severinus was decorated with lilies; and further (u. s. c. 91), that at Menda, in Spain, three trees were planted before the altar of St. Eulalia, the flowers of which, being carried to the sick, had often wrought miracles. He also informs us (De Gloria Confess. 31) that St. Severus used to gather lilies and other flowers to decorate the walls of his church.

At Whitsuntide a profusion of flowers was (in some places) showered down from some elevated spot to the floor of the church, to symbolize the outpouring of the gifts of the Spirit (Martene, De Rit. Ant. IV. xxviii. 17).

2. Sculptured or painted flowers.—The word "paradise" (meaning garden) having been used in the church from an early period to designate the future abode of the blessed, the custom would easily and naturally arise of ornamenting with flowers, the cemeteries and crypts containing the venerated remains of martyrs, and even the humble graves of the faithful. Here accordingly we find flowers lavished in every direction, and in every device, in wreaths, in bunches, in crowns, in vases, in baskets. In the cemetery of St. Agnes we trace a beautiful idea from the antique in the decoration of the entrance to the first chamber—little winged genii carrying on their shoulders small baskets filled with flowers, to be strewed on the graves of the saints who repose within (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. cxxxix.). In the churches of Rome and Ravenna the mosaics of the apse usually represent the delights of paradise; there we find figures of our Lord with the Virgin and other saints upon a groundwork of grass and flowers (Ciampini, I vet. monim. I. tab. xlv. et passim). The bottoms of ancient glass cups have been found embellished with the same subjects treated in the same manner [GLASS, CHRISTIAN].

A flower rising out of a crown placed between St. Peter and St. Paul in the place where the monogram generally appears has been thought to be a symbol of the Lord. An example may be seen on a gilt vase (Buonarroti, Frammenti di Vetro, xvi. 1).

FOLIATI. [SHOE.]

FONT, BAPTISMAL. In the article BAPTISTERY, full particulars have been given of the building or chamber set apart for the administration of the sacrament of baptism. It remains now to speak of the cistern or vessel for containing the water. This was known under different names; the general Greek appellation being κολυμβήθρα, the Latin, piscina. Other names were κόγχη, ὑπονόμος, lavacrum, natatorium (Ducange, Constantinopol. Christ. lib. iii. c. 81, p. 73).

The material in the Western church was, as a rule, stone; frequently porphyry, or other rich marbles. It was permitted by the council of Lerida, A.D. 524, that if the presbyter could not procure a stone font, he might provide himself with a "vas conveniens ad baptizandi officium" of any material (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1615), which was to be reserved for that sacrament alone (Leo. IV. de Cura Pastoral.; Labbe, Concil. viii. 37). In the Eastern church the font was usually of metal or wood, and seldom or never possessed any beauty. (Neale, Eastern Church, i. 214.)

The usual form of the font was octagonal, with a mystical reference to the eighth day, as the day of our Lord's resurrection, and of regeneration by the Spirit (cf. Ambros. Epist. 20, 44). This explanation of the octagonal form is given in the following lines attributed to St. Ambrose, first published by Gruter, Thes. Inscr. p. 1166, descriptive of the baptistery of the church of St. Thecla, in which Alypius and his companions were baptized by him, Easter, A.D. 387.

"Octachorum sanctos templum consurgit in usus,
Octagonus Fons est munere dignus eo.
Hoc numero decuit sacri Baptismatis aulam
Surgere qua populis vera salus redit.
Luce resurgentis Christi qui claustra resolvit
Mortis et a tumulis suscipit exanimas,
Confessorque reos maculoso crimine solvens
Fontis purifui ditius irriguo."

The piscina is sometimes found of a circular form, and is occasionally, though very rarely (as at Aquileia) hexagonal (cf. BAPTISTERY, woodcut, p. 175). Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Martyr. lib. i. c. 23), speaks of a font in the shape of a cross in Spain. The form of a sepulchre is stated to have been sometimes adopted, in allusion to the Christian's burial with Christ in baptism (Rom. iv. 4).

The piscina usually formed a basin in the centre of the baptistery, rather beneath the level of the pavement, surrounded with a low wall. It was entered by an ascent and descent of steps. According to Isidore Hispal. (Orig. xv. 4; de Div. Off. ii. 24) the normal number was seven; three in descent to symbolize the triple renunciation of the world, the flesh, and the devil; three in ascent to symbolize the confession of the Trinity, and a seventh, "septimus . . . qui et quartus" at the summit of the enclosing wall, for the officiating minister to stand on. But the rule concerning the number was not invariable. At Nocera, the number of steps is five, two in ascent, and three in descent. The descent into the piscina of St. John Lateran is by four steps. We find frequent references in the fathers to the catechumens going down into the font for immersion, e.g. Cyril, Myst. ii. § 4; "ye were led to the pool of Divine baptism . . . and descended three times into the water, and ascended again;" Id. Myst. iii. § 1. "After you had come up from the pool of the sacred streams"; Ambrose, de Sacr. lib. i. c. 2. "Venisti ad fontem, ingressus es." The most detailed description of a baptismal font, is that given in the life of St. Sylvester, in the Bibl. Pap. of the so-called Anastasius (§ 37). This font is said to have been presented by Constantine the Great to the church of the Lateran, in which he is falsely recorded to have been baptized himself. The description is at any rate of value as indicating the decoration and arrangements of an early font. The cistern is stated to have been of porphyry, overlaid within and without with silver. In the middle of the font were two pillars of porphyry, carrying a golden dish, in which the Paschal lamp burnt, fed with balsam, and with an asbestos wick. A lamb of pure gold on the brim of the basin, and seven silver stags, in allusion to Ps. xlii. 1, poured out water; on either side of the lamb were silver statues of Christ, and the Baptist. The font erected by St. Innocent at the church of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, c. 410, was also ornamented with a silver stag, pouring out water (Anastas § 57). Over the fonts, doves of silver or gold were sometimes suspended, in allusion to the circumstances of Christ's baptism. [E. V.]

FONT, BENEDICTION OF. In the 4th century, the ceremony of blessing the water to be used in baptism was already regarded as of high antiquity. Basil the Great, says expressly (De Spiritu S. c. 27), that the benediction of the baptismal water was one of the rites which the church had received from ecclesiastical tradition, not directly from Scripture; i.e. it was then of immemorial usage. The principal traces of it in the remains of early literature are the following.

The passage sometimes cited from the Ignatian letter to the Ephesians (c. 18), that Christ was baptized to purify the water, is very far from proving that any special benediction of the water took place at the time of baptism. Nor is it by any means certain that the heretics mentioned by Irenaeus (Haeres. i. 21, § 4), who poured oil and water over the head of those whom they baptized, did so as imitating the consecration of the water by pouring in chrism, as practised by the orthodox. But when Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 4), after speaking of the aboriginal consecration of the element of water at creation by the Spirit of God, goes on to say, "Therefore all waters acquire the blessing of consecration (sacramentum sanctificationis) from their primæval prerogative, God being invoked (invocato Deo)," he probably alludes to a special invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the water which took place before baptism. Some years later, Cyprian (Epist. 70, c. 1) says that the water for baptism should first be cleansed and sanctified by the priest. So bishop Sedatus of Thuburum (Sententiæ Episc. n. 18, in Cyprian's Works), speaks of baptismal water consecrated by the prayer of the priest (aqua sacerdotis prece in ecclesia consecrata). The Arabic canons of Hippolytus (can. 19, p. 75, quoted by Probst, p. 77), direct the candidates for baptism to stand by the font of pure water made ready by benediction. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iii. 3) says that simple water, having uttered over it the invocation of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, acquires a power of holiness (ἀγιότητος). Ambrose (De iis qui initiantur, c. 5) mentions exorcism, benediction, invocation of the Holy Trinity, and prayers. We have here, perhaps, the earliest distinct mention of the exorcism of the baptismal water. An example of the form of exorcism may be seen in BAPTISM, § 30, p. 158.

With regard to the form of benediction, we have already seen that Tertullian speaks of an invocation over the water. Probably the earliest form extant, which cannot be assumed with certainty to be older than the beginning of the 4th century, is that of the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 43), in which the priest, after a recitation of the mercies of God analogous to the PREFACE of the eucharistic office, proceeds, "Look down from heaven, and sanctify this water, and grant grace and power that he who is baptized according to the command of Thy Christ, may with Him be crucified and die and be buried and rise again to the adoption which is in Him, by dying unto sin, but living unto righteousness." Compare Dionysius Areop. Hierarch. Eccl. c. 2.

Another ceremony, the pouring in of chrism, generally so as to form a cross on the surface of the water, was probably of later introduction, though it is found at least as early as the 6th century [BAPTISM, p. 159]. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Mart. i. 23) after a curious description of the miraculous filling of certain fonts in Spain, proceeds to say that the water was sanctified by exorcism and sprinkled over with chrism; a passage which proves that in the time of Gregory (†594), the pouring in of chrism was regarded as a matter of course. And it may be mentioned in illustration, that according to Flooard's description of the baptism of Clovis (Hist. Remens. Eccl. i. 13), it was after the benediction of the font that chrism was found wanting, and supplied by the advent of the miraculous AMPULLA; on receiving which, St. Remi sprinkled the font with chrism (chrismate fontem conspersit).

In Mabillon's Vetus Missale Gallicanum (c. 25, p. 362), we find exhortation, prayer, exorcism of the water, preface, benediction of the font, another preface (called Contestatio Fontis), then the rubric, "Postea facis tres cruces de chrismâ." In the Gallican Sacramentary printed by Martene (l. i. 18, ordo 3) from a MS. at Bobbio, a somewhat more explicit description is given of the making of the cross on the water with chrism, "Deinde in fonte chrismâ decurrente signum † facis." And again (Martene, u. s. ordo 10), the priest "accipiens vas aureum cum chrismate fundit chrismâ in fonte in modum crucis, et expandit aquæ cum manu sua." It may be observed that in the Missale Aethiopicum quoted by Binterim (l. i. 86), where the threefold infusion of oil in the form of a cross is described, it is expressly stated to be unconsecrated oil (oleum non benedictum).

The description in Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 25) corresponds generally with that of these sacramentaries. Amalarius expressly mentions insufflation as one of the rites in EXORCISM [see that word]. After the expulsion of the evil spirit by exorcism, he simply says, "munitur aqua crucis signaculo," not distinctly mentioning the pouring in of chrism in the form of a cross.

In the Gregorian Sacramentary (pp. 71-73) is mentioned another rite, that of plunging tapers into the water to be consecrated. Two lighted tapers are carried before the bishop to the font; after the benediction, the aforesaid two tapers are plunged into the font, and the bishop "insufflates" on the water three times. After this the chrism is poured into the font, and the children are baptized. This dipping of the taper into the font is represented in the accompanying woodcut, from a Pontifical of the 9th century [compare the cut on p. 159], where however only one taper is given. The ceremony mentioned by Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 25) of plunging the tapers of the neophytes [BAPTISM, p. 162, § 59] into the font, seems to be distinct from this.

FOOTPRINTS ON SEPULCHRAL SLABS, AND SEAL RINGS. Sepulchral slabs have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere, incised with footprints.^a The two feet as a rule point the same way, though sometimes, but rarely, they are turned in opposite directions (Fabretti, Inscript. Antiq. p. 472). A slab in the Kircherian Museum, given by Lupi (Epitaph. Sever. Martyr. p. 68), bears two pairs of footprints pointed contrary ways, as of a person going and returning (fig. 1). Some of these slabs are certainly Christian, though the fact in other cases is uncertain. A slab given by Boldetti (c. vii. p. 419), inscribed with ΙΑΝΟΥΡΙΑ ΕΝ Θ (Januaria in Deo) at one end, bears the sole of a foot, with IN DEO incised upon it, at the other. Perret gives a slab erected by a Christian husband to his wife, with a pair of footprints incised on it, not bare, as is customary, but shod in shoes or sandals (Catacombes, vol. v. pl. 26, No. 53). Sometimes but more rarely we find a single foot seen in profile (Ib. pl. 52, No. 37).

^a The white marble slab preserved in the church of St. Sebastian outside Rome, said to have been brought from the chapel of "Domine quo vadis," bearing the prints of two feet, plausibly believed to be those of our Blessed Lord, when met by St. Peter coming to be crucified a second time, in the city from which his apostle was fleeing, is probably nothing more than a sepulchral stone of the kind described above, round which the exquisitely beautiful legend, found first in Ambrose, has crystallized. It

The signification of this mark is much controverted. Boldetti (p. 507) and others regard the footprint as the symbol of possession, denoting that the burial-place had been purchased by the individual as his own. This view is based on the false etymology of "possessio," quasi "pedis positio," given by Paulus (Dig. 41, tit. 2, § 1), and probably needs no refutation.

The idea of Pelliccia (de Christ. Eccl. Polit. iii. 225) and Cavedoni (Rappaggl. di m. num. dell' Art. Crist. p. 40) that a sense of their loss and a deep regret and affection for the departed was thus indicated, is a mere romantic fancy. More may be said for Lupi's view (u. s. p. 69), that as such emblems were sometimes dedicated as votive offerings by travellers on their return from a journey, they were intended on a Christian slab to indicate a holy thankfulness for the safe completion of the earthly pilgrimage of the departed. Another more prosaic, but by no means improbable, interpretation, especially of a single foot, is that found in Thomassinus (de Donatus, c. 7) and Fabretti (Inscript. c. vi. p. 467), quoted by Lupi (u. s.), that it was a thank-offering for recovery from gout or other disease affecting the foot.

should be remarked that the basilica of St. Sebastian was erected over one of the chief Christian cemeteries, that from which the name catacomb has been transferred to the rest, so that the presence of such a memorial slab is easily accounted for. In the church of St. Radegund at Poitiers a well defined footmark in the stone supposed to indicate the spot where our Saviour appeared to that saint, probably has a similar origin. The Roman remains at Poitiers are numerous. The footprints shown as our Lord's in the church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives mentioned by Augustine (in Joann. Hom. xlvii. 4; Jerome de locis Hebraic.; Beda de nom. loc. in Act. Apost.) are stated by Stanley (S. & P. p. 452) to be "nothing but a simple cavity in the rock with no more resemblance to a human foot than to anything else."

The same emblem is frequently found on seal rings. The sole of the foot bears sometimes the name of the owner, e.g., FORTVNIVS (Boldetti, p. 506; Perret, vol. iv. pl. xi. No. 4); JVSIVS (Airinghi, ii. 698; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. viii. No. 23), from the catacomb of St. Agnes; sometimes a Christian motto or device, e.g., SPES IN DEO (fig. 2) (Perret, u. s., No. 5), and the monogram of Christ (Ib. No. 6). In an example given by Perret (vol. iv. p. xxiii. No. 21), we see the stamp of such a seal bearing the sole of a foot, with PAVLI incised on it, five times repeated on the mortar in which a gilt glass had been embedded, in the catacomb of St. Sixtus. [E. V.]

FORGERY is a particular case of the offence called Falsum.

Falsum is any perversion or corruption of truth done with malice (dolo malo) to the prejudice of another. It may be committed either by word, as in the case of perjury; by act, as in the case of coining base money; or by writing, as in the case of forgery. In the case of the latter, the crime of falsum is equally committed whether a man has written a document which is not what it professes to be, or forged a seal or a signature, or erased or destroyed the whole or a portion of a document maliciously to the prejudice of another. Falsum was punished under the empire by deportation, or even (in extreme cases) by death (Codex Theod. lib. ix. tit. 19, ll. 1 et 2). The special precautions taken by the authorities of the church against the forgery of ecclesiastical documents seem to belong to a later period than that with which we are concerned; but no doubt the falsarius, like other offenders against the laws of truth and justice, incurred ecclesiastical censures. (Ferraris, Bibliotheca Prompta, s. v. Falsum; Bingham's Antiq. xvi. xii. 14.) [C.]

FORMA. An impression or representation, as (for instance) the stamp on coins, whether effigy or mark.

(1.) It is used for the impression of a seal; and it seems highly probable that literæ formatæ [COMMENDATORY LETTERS, DIMISSORY LETTERS], derived their name from the fact that seals were appended to them. Sirmond quotes a Vatican gloss which interprets the term "formatæ epistola" by "sigillata," and the Greek interpreter of the 23rd canon of the Codex Eccl. Afric. [3 Carth. c. 28], renders "formatam" by τετυμμενην, clearly in the sense of "sealed." The second council of Chalons (c. 41), testifies to the fact that seals were appended to such documents.

And not only is the word formata used absolutely for a sealed official document, but forma came to be used in the same sense. Thus Capitolinus describes Antoninus as consulting his friends before he drew up authoritative documents (formas); and the word is similarly used by Christian writers (Ducange, s. vv. Forma, Formatae).

(2.) From the same use of the word Forma for an effigy or stamp, it arises that the word Formata designates the formed or stamped bread used in the Holy Eucharist. The Ordo Romanus in the rite for the consecration of a bishop has the following; "cum autem venerit ad communicandum Dominus Pontifex porrigit ei formam atque sacramentum oblationem integram." Menard takes this to mean an "epistola formata;" but it seems in the highest degree improbable that the consecrator would present an official document to the newly-ordained bishop at the moment of communicating, and Ducange (s. v. Formata) has shown that the word is elsewhere used to designate the eucharistic bread.

(3.) The word Forma is also used to designate the seats or stalls used by clerks or monks when saying their offices in choir. The gloss on the rule of St. Benedict (De Suppellect.) explains Forma as "sella arcuata, θρόνος." The desk in front of such a stall, on which its occupant might lean, seems to be sometimes called formula (Supplex Lib. Monach. Fuld. Car. Magno, c. 5, in Migne's Patrol. cv. p. 419; compare Gregory of Tours, De Glor. Confess. c. 92; Hist. Franc. viii. 31). [C.]

FORMARIUS, the person in a monastery who was especially appointed to promote the spiritual welfare of the brethren, and to be a model of life to them, "qui in bonis sit forma" (Regula S. Ferreoli, c. 17); an elder brother fitted to benefit the souls of the monks, who should studiously devote himself to watching over them (Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 58). The corresponding person in a monastery of women was called Formaria (Reg. S. Caesarii ad Virgines, c. 37; Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

FORMATA. [FORMA.]

FORNICATION (Fornicatio, πορνεία) is defined to be "copula carnalis soluti cum soluta"; a sin committed by two persons, male and female, who are not connected by blood within the prohibited degrees of kindred, and are neither married nor contracted. This is in substance, Augustine's definition (Quaest. in Deuteronom. n. 37). The older definitions of fornication seem to refer almost entirely to the freedom of the woman from the marriage bond, without regard to the condition of the man [ADULTERY]. Thus Basil (ad Amphilocho. c. 21) regards the sin of a married man with an unmarried woman as simple πορνεία, not μοιχεία; and Gregory of Nyssa (Epist. Canonica) defines fornication to be a gratification of lust which takes place without wronging another; which words Balsamon (in loco) explains to mean, intercourse with a woman who is not married (Πορνεία λέγεται ἡ χωρίς ἀδικίας ἑτέρου μλκίς, ἡγουν ἡ πρὸς ἐλευθέραν ἀνδρὸς γυναῖκα). To the same effect Theophylact (on St. Matt. v. 32) says that fornication is committed with a woman not under marriage bond (εἰς ἀπολελυμένην). Ambrose, however, lays down the wider and truer principle, "nec viro licet quod mulieri non licet; eadem a viro quae ab uxore debetur castimonia" (De Patriarch. i. 4). Concubinage, the continued cohabitation of an unmarried man with an unmarried woman, is a special case of fornication. The word fornicatio is also used to designate all kinds of sexual sin and unnatural crime; see, for instance, Theodore's Penitential, l. ii. Fornication in this wider sense is commonly called luxury by later canonists.

It was one of the first cares of the apostolic church to repress this evil held so venial among the Gentiles (Acts xv. 20; 1 Cor. vi. 18; Eph. v. 3, 5); nor were the rulers of the church in later times less anxious to put down all forms of uncleanness. Basil (ad Amphil. c. 22) lays down the rule, that men practising concubinage after seduction should be excluded from communion for four years, in the first of which they are to be excluded from the prayers, and weep at the door of the church; in the second to be received as hearers; in the third to penitence (εἰς μετάνοιαν); in the fourth to attend divine service with the congregation, abstaining from the offering; and then to be admitted to communion of the good (κοινωνίαν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ). In the case of concubinage, the great bishop evidently feels that the times will not bear due severity. He holds (ad Amph. c. 26) that it is best that persons living together in fornication should be separated; but if they persist in living together, "let them be warned of the penalty of fornication; but let them not be meddled with (ἀφιέσθωσαν), lest a worse thing come upon them." So previously (c. 21) he acknowledges the difficulty of treating certain cases, and confesses that custom is too strong to be contended against. For fornicators in general he enjoins (Ib. c. 59) seven years' exclusion from the sacraments; two among the Flentes, two among the Aulientes, two among the Substrati, and one among the Consistentes [PENITENCE].

The treatment of sins of uncleanness occupies a large, perhaps an undue space in later Penitentials; as (e.g.) in those of Theodore (l. ii.), Bede, (c. 3), Egbert (cc. 2 and 4), Halitgar (i. 16, 17), and others.

Periods of penance are prescribed, varying according to the condition of the offender, and the nature of the offence. The offence of a cleric was naturally more heinous than that of a simple lay person, and might be punished by degradation, as well as by the same kind of penalties as those inflicted on the laity. And it is evident from the repeated denunciations of such sins by bishops and councils, and the elaborate provision made to separate the clergy and the monks from the society of women, that the celibate clergy were only too liable to fall into the sin of incontinence (Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccl. Discip. l. ii. 61, §§ 8-12). [C.]

FORUM. [JURISDICTION.]

FOSSARI or FOSSORES. The grave-diggers or sextons of early Christian antiquity were known by these designations. [COPITAE; DECANUS.]

Padre Marchi has drawn a very definite picture of guilds of fo-so-es, organized under special regulations, attached to each of the tituli of Rome, and acting under the directions of the bishops and presbyters. (Monum. Primit. pp. 87-91.) But the evidence he adduces is of the slightest texture; and the good father probably did not intend his description to be regarded as more than a pleasing hypothesis.

The term fossor is of frequent occurrence in the inscriptions of the catacombs. Marchi, p. 91, gives several epitaphs of fossores. Boldetti, i. 15, gives the following from St. Callistus: "Sergius et Junius Fossores || B. N. M. in pace bisom." But the most common appearance of the term is in the later epitaphs, which testify to the purchase of graves from individuals of this class. The burial of the departed was probably at first a work of Christian charity, performed without fee or reward by their surviving brethren. Afterwards, when the church had become more numerous, it was carried out at the public expense under the special care of the presbyters of the tituli of Rome. When Christianity became the established religion, the fossores evidently established a kind of property in the catacombs, which authorized them to sell graves either to living persons for their own burial, or to the friends of the deceased. This state of things seems to have had a wide-spread but transient existence. The examples are almost innumerable in which the purchase of graves of the fossores is plainly stated in the epitaph. No trace of such bargains appears before the latter years of the 4th century, nor later than the first quarter of the 5th century. According to De Rossi (R. S. i. p. 216), the last known mention of fossores is A.D. 426. As examples of these bargains, belonging to the time when interment had become the private enterprise of the fossores, and Christian burial had been degraded into a trade, we may refer to the instances already given under CATACOMBS. The eager craving after sepulture in the proximity of the holy dead, to which some of these epitaphs bear witness, has been the cause of the destruction of many paintings of high interest. The fossores could not afford to have a taste either archaeological or artistic, and pierced the painted walls to make new highly-priced loculi, as recklessly as the exquisite carved work of so many of our cathedrals has been cut away for the erection of tasteless monuments.

The fossor at his work appears frequently in the frescoes of the catacombs. (Bosio, pp. 305, 335, 339, 373; Aringhi, ii. pp. 23, 63, 67, 101.)

Bottari, tom. ii. tav. 118, gives two pictures from the catacomb of Marcellinus and Peter. One represents a young man, his beard closely shaven, in a short tunic, girt round his waist, his legs and feet bare, excavating the rock with his pick, a lamp hanging by his side. The other depicts an older man in a long tunic, not at work, holding a lamp affixed to a long handle ending in a sharp point, and a little below on the shaft a hook for suspension.

The most curious and interesting of these representations is that of a fossor named Diogenes, from the cemetery of Callistus (see woodcut).

He wears a tunic marked with gammodia on its hem, carries a pick over his right shoulder, and a lamp in his left hand, and is surrounded by a heap of levers, picks, and other tools employed in his work. Above is the inscription: "Diogenes Fossor in pace depositus Octabu Kalendas Octobris." (Boldetti, lib. i. cap. 15; Bottari, tom. ii. p. 126, tav. 99.) A fossor's pick has been discovered by De Rossi in the cemetery of Callistus, much oxidised, but still recognizable. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 281.) [E. V.]

FOUNDLINGS (Alumni). Compare EXPOSING OF INFANTS.

From an early period the church provided ORPHANAGES [see the word] for the reception of children left destitute by the death or desertion of their parents. But, independently of such institutions, it also maintained a large number by appeals to individual charity, and exhorted the faithful to feed and shelter the innocent creatures in their own houses. The number of these alumni, "nurslings," was large; the rescue of a deserted infant being considered as an act specially inspired by Christian charity. The word alumnus consequently occurs much oftener in Christian than in pagan inscriptions. Sometimes we find the adopting parents raising a tomb to their alumnus (Perret, Catacombes, v. xli. 13). In the cemetery of Pontianus the name of a young person departed is inscribed upon a circular ivory tablet thus: EMERINVS || VICTORINAE || ALVMNAE SVAE (Fabretti, In- script. Antiq. iii. 331). In other instances the titulus is a token of the child's gratitude to his benefactors, whom he calls father and mother (Perret, xlii. 4). FELICISSIMVS ALVMNVS in the following inscription expresses the happiness of the adopted son under the care of his tutelary parents.

FELICISSIMVS ALVMNVS VALERIE CRESTENI

De Rossi (Inscript. Christ. i. 46) gives the epitaph of an alumnus of the date A.D. 340. Le Blant (Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule), mentions an inscription at Trèves to the memory of an alumna who survived only one month and a few days. Infants were generally exposed at the doors of churches (Conc. Arles II. can. 51, A.D. 451).

A person wishing to adopt an exposed child was required to place in the hands of the minister of the church near which it was found a written statement giving the sex of the child with the time and place of its discovery, in order that it might be restored to its parents if they wished to reclaim it. If no such claim were put forward within ten days after its exposure, the child belonged by right to those who had given it shelter (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., s. v. Enfants Trouvés). FOUNTAIN OR WELL. [See ROCK, and EVANGELISTS, REPRESENTATIONS OF.] Our Lord is represented (in Bottari, tav. xvi.; Buonarrotti, Vetri, tav. vi. et passim) as the Source of the Gospel and Fons Pietatis, from under whose feet flow the four Rivers of Paradise. [See FOUR RIVERS.] In the Lateran [CROSS, p. 496] and other baptismal crosses the Holy Dove is the fount or source from which the sacred rivers flow. The well springing in the wilderness is rather a Hebrew, Arab, or universally Eastern image, than a specially Christian one. In some early baptisms of our Lord, as that in the ancient baptistery of Ravenna, the river-god or presiding deity of the source of Jordan is introduced. FOUNTAINS AT THE ENTRANCE OF CHURCHES. The natural symbolism which required external purity in the worshippers, as an index of the cleanness of heart necessary for approaching God with acceptance, dictated the erection of fountains or cisterns of water in the atria, or forecourts of the primitive churches, for the people to wash their hands, feet, and faces, before they entered the sacred building. Such a fountain was known by different designations, κρήνη (Euseb. H.E. x. 4; Chrys. Hom. 57, Ed. Savil.), φρέαρ (Soer. H.E. ii. 38), φιάλη (Paul. Silentiari. ii. vers. 177), ἐμβατήρ (Theophanes), κολυμβήτειον (Eucholog.), Cantharus (Paul. Nolan. Ep. xiii. xxxii.), Nymphaeum (Anastas. § 69). The earliest notice we have of this arrangement is in Eusebius' description of the church erected by Paulinus at Tyre (Euseb. H.E. x. 4). He speaks of "fountains" being placed as "symbols of purification" in the centre of the cloistered atrium, affording means of cleansing to those who were going into the church. A similar basin was erected by Paulinus of Nola, in the atrium of the basilica of St. Felix, its purpose being expressed by the following verses over one of the arches of the opposite cloister—

"Sancta nitens famulis interluit atria lymphis Cantharus, intrantumque manus lavat amne ministro."
Paul. Nolan. Ep. 32 ad Sever.

This "cantharus" was protected by a brazen canopy, or turret of lattice work—

"Quem cancellato tegit aerea culmine turris."
Paulin. Poem. 28 (Nat. x.)

Other brazen basins supplied from the same source stood in different parts of the forecourt, as well as a row of marble basins, conchae, at the entrance of the church (ib.).

Paulinus also describes a "cantharus" in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome (Ep. 13, p. 73), "ministra manibus et oris nostris fluenta ructantem." This was covered by a dome or tholus, of brass, supported on four columns, typifying the fountain of living water flowing from the four gospels, the foundation of the evangelical faith. This cantharus and its quadriporticus were adorned with marbles and mosaic by Symmachus, c. 500, who also erected another external fountain below the steps of the atrium for the convenience of the people thronging thither "ad usum necessitatis humanae" (Anastas. de Vit. Pont. § 79). Another was placed by Leo III. c. 800, under the silver gates of the same basilica (ib. § 360). The popes vied with one another in the magnificence of these fountains. Leo the Great, c. 450, placed a very remarkable one in the atrium of the basilica of St. Paul, on the Ostian way, for the supply of which he recovered a long-lost spring, as recorded in the verses of Ennodius.

"Perdiderat laticum longaeva inenrta cursus
Quos tibi nunc pleno cantharus ore vomit.
Provida pastoris per totum cura Leonis.
Haec ovibus Christi larga fluenta dedit."
Ennod. Carm. 149, ed. Sirmond.

Anastasius also describes a "nymphaeum" erected by Hilarius, c. 465, in the triporticus of the oratory of St. Cross, adorned with columns of vast size, and pillars of porphyry from apertures in which the water flowed into a porphyry basin (Anastas. u. s. § 69). Ennodius also (u. s.) speaks of the water of the baptistery of St. Stephen coming through the columns, "per columnas." In other cases the water issued from a statue in the centre, sometimes of grotesque form, or from lions' mouths, from which arrangement the basin erected by Justinian in front of St. Sophia at Constantinople was called λεοντάριον (Ducange, Constantinop. Christ. lib. iii. c. 22). This fountain was made of jasper, with incised crosses. There were other smaller basins in the cloisters for the lustrations of the people (Ducange, u. s.). A cantharus discovered at Constantinople bore the palindrome given by Gruter (Inscript. p. 1046).

ΝΥΦΟΝ ΑΝΟΜΗΜΑ ΜΗ ΜΟΝΑΝ ΟΥΙΝ.

These fountains were usually supplied with water from running springs, as that at St. Paul's already mentioned. Where springs were absent, the supply came from rain water tanks, as at the basilica of St. Felix at Nola (Paul. Nolan. Poem. 27 (N. et. ix.) v. 463, sq.).

Such fountains were solemnly consecrated and blessed on the annual recurrence of the vigil of the Epiphany (identified in primitive times with the day of our Lord's baptism, when the element of water was hallowed, Chrys. Homil. in Bapt. Christ. vol. ii. p. 369, Montf.), or of the festival itself (Ducange, u. s.). The office is given in the Euchologion.

We find frequent reference in the early fathers to this custom of washing the hands and face before entering the church, e. g. Tertull. de Orat. c. 11; Chrysost. Homil. 51, in Matt.; in Joann. 72; Homil. 3, in Ephes.; in Psaln. 140, ad *Pop. FOUR RIVERS, THE. In ancient art our Lord is frequently represented, either in person or under the figure of a lamb, standing upon a hillock from whence issue four streams of water. (See woodcut.) These are supposed by many to signify the four rivers of Eden, which went forth to water the earth (Gen. ii. 10); others (Cyprian, Ep. 73, § 10, ad Jubaian.; Bede, Expos. in Gen. II.; Theodoret, in Psaln. XLV.; Ambrose, De Paradiso, c. 3) discern in them the four gospels, flowing from the source of eternal life to spread throughout the world the riches and the life-giving powers of the doctrine of Christ. St. Ambrose again (u. s.) is of opinion that the four rivers are emblems of the four cardinal virtues. The four first oecumenical councils, so often by early writers placed on a par with the gospels themselves, are sometimes compared to the four rivers of Paradise. Jesse, bishop of Amiens in the eighth century, in writing to his clergy, thus illustrates the veneration due to these august assemblies (Longueval, Hist. de l'Egl. Gallicane, tom. v. p. 144).

In several sarcophagi of ancient Gaul, we find two stags quenching their thirst at these streams; these are supposed to represent Christians partaking in the gospels and the eucharist of the "well of water springing up into everlasting life." [CROSS, p. 496.] The two stags are occasionally found in mosaics, in that of the ancient Vatican for example (Ciampini, De Sacr. Aedif. tab. xiii.).

However we explain it, this subject was extremely popular in the primitive church; we find it repeated over and over again in the catacombs, either in frescoes or in the sculptured ornaments of sarcophagi, and sometimes on the bottoms of glass cups, which have been discovered therein. It appears also in the mosaics of some basilicas, for instance, in that which is described by Paulinus (Epist. 32, ad Sever.), and in that mentioned by Florus, deacon of Lyons (Mabillon, Analec., p. 416, ed. Paris. See also Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xxxvii. xlvii. xlix. liii., &c.). To illustrate this passage of Paulinus,

"Petram superstat ipse Petra Ecclesiae
De qua sonori quatuor fontes meant,"

Rosweid refers to the mosaic of St. John Lateran, and the sarcophagus of Probus and Proba, as represented by Bosio. We are informed by Spon (Recherches curieuses, p. 34) that the four rivers of Paradise in human form, with their names beneath, are represented in mosaic on the pavement of Rheims Cathedral (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chréti.) [C.]

FRACTION. The rite of breaking the bread in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist is technically so called. There are three kinds of fractions, which are in use at the present time; though but one of them is essential to the sacrament, and can be traced with certainty to the infancy of the church. The three are, (1) a fraction illustrative of the words of institution, and therefore a direct imitation of our Lord's action, (2) purely symbolical fractions after the consecration has been completed, (3) the necessary fraction for the distribution of the bread among the communicants.

(1) The first of these has a place in the English office, the celebrant being ordered to "break the bread" while he utters the words, "He brake it." Nothing could be more natural than that in reciting the words of institution, the priest should "suit the action to the word," and break the bread as "He brake it." It is very probable, therefore, that this was a common, if not the universal, practice, in what we may call the first ritual period. Traces of it are found both in the East and West. In the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil, the celebrant is ordered at those words to "break the oblation into three parts;" but he is at once to reunite them, "so that they be in a manner as not divided." (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. p. 15.) They are put together again with a view to a later and purely symbolical fraction. There is but one extant Latin missal, which is reported to contain an order for the actual fraction at this time, viz., that of Rheims, of the middle of the 16th century, in which the following rubric occurs, "Dicens fregit frangit modicum." (De Vert, Explication des Cérémonies de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 262.) In our own country the missals of

• This fountain is incorrectly represented at p. 406.

Sarum and York to the last ordered the celebrant to "touch the host," while a manuscript Manual in the possession of the Rev. W. J. Blew goes further, and prescribes "the sign of a fraction." The frequency of the latter custom in England may be likewise inferred from its condemnation by John de Burgo, A.D. 1385 (Pupilla Oculi, pars iv. cap. x.), and its prohibition in the Manual authorised by Cardinal Pole in the reign of Mary. The foregoing facts are mentioned because they appear to support the antecedent probability that the fraction, which is now peculiar to the English and Coptic liturgies, was once general. The reason for giving it up need not be sought for. When the bread was once broken, it would not be possible for the priest to perform the subsequent symbolical fraction, introduced at a later period, with the same convenience and effect.

(2) From an early period we find other ceremonial fractions, more or less elaborate, employed, the evident intention of which was to develope and enforce the devotional allusion to our Lord's sufferings on the cross. No fraction of any kind is mentioned in St. Cyril's account of the liturgy of Jerusalem (Catechesis Mystag. v. cc. 17, 18), nor in the Clementine liturgy, which exhibits the ritual and worship of the 3rd or 4th century. [APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS.] In that of St. Mark, which from its long disuse has undergone less change than any other which was ever in actual use, the fraction for distribution is alone mentioned (Renaudot, tom. i. p. 162). In St. James, which is still used at stated times, and has been much altered in the course of ages, the celebrant "breaks the bread, and holds half in his right hand, half in his left, and dips that in the right in the cup, saying, 'the union of the all-holy body and the precious blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ.'" (Assemani, tom. v. p. 54.) In the Office of Prothesis in the common Greek liturgy, there is a preparation of the bread by the aid of a knife (ἀόγχη), accompanied by symbolical allusions. [PROTHESIS.] After the Sancta Sanctis, which follows close upon the Consecration, "The priest dividing it ('the holy loaf') into four parts with care and reverence says 'The Lamb of God, the Son of the Father, is dismembered and divided, &c.' Then he takes the uppermost part of the holy loaf (which is stamped with the letters ΙϞ, for 'Ιησοῦς'), and holds it in his hand, and the deacon pointing with his oration to the holy cup, says, 'Fill, Master, the holy cup. And the priest says, 'The fulness of faith of the Holy Ghost. And he makes the sign of the cross and casts it into the holy cup'" (Euchologium, Goar, pp. 60, 81, 175). These rites, though not perhaps in their present form precisely, must have been in use before the separation of the Nestorians and Eutychians from the church; but whether they were known to St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, the alleged remodellers of the Greek liturgy, it is impossible to say. On the first part of the foregoing ceremony, Symeon of Thessalonica, the mystical expositor of that rite, observes, "He divides the bread into four parts, and these he arranges in the form of a cross, and in this he beholds Jesus crucified." De Templo &c. printed in Goar, p. 228. In the Coptic liturgies the rite is still more elaborate. There is first a special prayer, Prooemium ante fractionem, preceding it; which is in fact an act of thanksgiving, and is called a Benediction in the office itself. After crossing both the bread and the cup with a finger dipped in the latter, he says a "Prayer of Fraction." Later on, in preparation for the communion, "he divides the body into three parts, as he had done before at the words He brake it;" but this time transversely to the former fractures. The piece from the middle of the Corban is the largest, and from this he takes a small piece (Ischodicon, or in the Greek Alexandrian liturgies Σπουδικόν, corruptions of Δεσποτικόν, the Lord's body), which he sets aside. The larger piece from which it is taken is put in the middle of the paten, and the other eight are placed about it so as to form a cross. The allusion to the Passion is thus expressed by an act rather than by words. The priest next breaks up, in prescribed order, all but the large piece in the middle, and "collects about that the holy body which he has broken." The Ischodicon is put into the cup; a rite corresponding to the Commixtio of the West. The fraction now described, into which a devout priest could evidently infuse great solemnity is common to the three Coptic liturgies; which fact implies that the former fraction at the words He brake it is so also; although it is only prescribed in that of St. Basil. (See Renaud. tom. i. pp. 19-23; and Gabriel's Ritualis, ibid. p. 258.) Whether the same ceremonies were observed in the Greek liturgies of Egypt cannot be decided, owing to the brevity of the rubrics and the absence of commentaries; but the Coptic of St. Basil carries us up to a period earlier than the conquest of Amrou in the 7th century. The rubrics of the Ethiopic liturgy do not prescribe any fraction, but as it was derived from the Coptic, and retains the Coptic Oratio Fractionis, we may infer that it had a solemn fraction similar to that which we have described.

In the Syrian rite the priest (in a short office of Prothesis) "divides the bread into as many pieces as may be necessary, censes them, and sets them on the altar, saying, He was led like a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep, etc." (Renaudot, tom. i. p. 3.) After the consecration he breaks a small piece off with the words, "Thou art Christ our God, who on the top of Golgotha in Jerusalem wast pierced in Thy side for us, etc.," or something conveying the same allusion. (Ibid. pp. 22, 40, etc.) Before the communion he dips this particle (pearl) "into the chalice and signs the rest with it crosswise, saying, The Blood of the Lord is sprinkled on His Body, in the Name of the Father," etc. The pearl thus used is then put into the chalice with a prayer alluding to the union of the Godhead and Manhood in Christ (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 3, 41). Another symbolical action, viz. that of touching the body in the paten with the moistened pearl, is not marked in the rubrics. It is done in allusion to the piercing of our Lord's side with a spear (Barsalibi, ibid. p. 111). Among the Nestorians the consecrated oblate is broken into two parts. One of these is laid on the paten, and with the other the priest crosses the cup. He then dips the latter to the middle in the cup, and "signs with it the body which is in the paten." Both signs are made with appropriate words. He then unites the two pieces of the oblate; and it is here that we find the passion symbolized, the wounded and bleeding body of our blessed Lord being evidently represented by the broken and wine-stained bread. He further with his right thumb crosses the oblate "so as to make a slight crack in it, where it has been dipped in the blood, and puts a part of it into the chalice in the form of a cross." (Renaud. tom. ii. p. 594.) The Armenian celebrant breaks the oblate into two parts over the chalice, saying, "The fulness of the Holy Ghost. Then dividing one part into three he casts them into the chalice of the blood in the form of a cross" (Le Brun, Explication de la Messe, Diss. x. Art. xx.).

There are no directions for any fraction in the early Roman sacramentaries, nor for the commixture which now follows the symbolical fraction; but in the first Ordo Romanus, a directory of worship of the 8th century, if not earlier, we find the following method prescribed. The bishop (for a pontifical celebration is described) "breaks an oblate on the right side, and leaves on the altar the piece (particulam) which he breaks off." It is explained that this is done "in order that the altar be not without sacrifice," while the mass is performed, a piece (fermentum) reserved from a former celebration, and placed on the altar before the service began, having just before been put into the chalice. This is the only fraction before that for distribution, and there is nothing to give it a symbolical character (Ordo Rom. i. § 19, p. 13). There appears to have been no symbolical or merely ritual fraction in the primitive liturgy of Milan, although for "many ages" an oblate has been broken before the Lord's Prayer, with the words, "Thy Body is broken, O Christ," etc. (Muratori, Liturgia Rom. Vet. Diss. c. x. tom. i. col. 134). An anthem, called Confractorium, is sung during this fraction, but with no special reference to the Passion (Pamelii Liturgicon, tom. i. p. 304). There is some evidence of a symbolical fraction in the Gallican church before its liturgy was tyrannically suppressed by Adrian I. and Charlemagne. In an exposition of the old Gallican liturgy written by Germanus bishop of Paris, A.D. 555, or one of his disciples, we read, "The confection and commixture of the body of the Lord was set forth of old by the holy fathers" (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. c. iv.; Art. xii. Ord. i.). The sacramentaries are without rubrics; but several of the prayers, post secreta, which were said immediately after the fraction, refer expressly to the sufferings of the cross. Thus, for example, in the Missale Gothicum in the Post Secreta for Christmas: "We believe, O Lord, Thy Advent; we commemorate Thy Passion. For Thy Body was broken (confractum) in the remission of our sins; Thy holy Blood was shed for the price of our redemption" (Mabillon, Liturgia Gallicana, p. 192). In the semi-Oriental ritual of Gothic Spain and Gallia Narbonensis, the priest broke the oblate in halves and divided one-half into five parts, the other into four. He then formed a cross with seven of them, putting five in a line to make the stem, and one on each side of the second from the top to make the arms. Each piece had a name given it. The uppermost in the stem was called Corporatio (i.e. Incarnation). Then followed in order Nativitas, Circumcisio, Apparitio (Epiphany), Passio. The piece which formed the left arm of the cross (taken from the spectator) was called Mors; that on the right Resurrectio. The two remaining pieces Gloria and Regnum were placed in the paten below Resurrectio in a line with it. See the illustration below. Thus the whole course of our Lord's being, acting, and suffering in the flesh, with the fruits of it, was in a manner represented (Missale Mixtum dictum Mozarabes, ed. Leslie, pp. 5, 6, 230-1).

	Corporatio
Mors	Nativitas	Resurrectio
	Circumcisio	Gloria
	Apparitio	Regnum
	Passio

In some of the ancient liturgies the fraction now described took place before, and in some, after the Lord's Prayer which followed, or more properly closed, the prayer of consecration. In the Greek, Roman, and Egyptian St. Mark it comes after. In the Gallican (Liturg. Gall. p. 192), the Milanese, Mozarabic, Coptic, and apparently in all the Syrian liturgies (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 22, 38, 131, 138, etc.) it comes before. To these we may add the Ethiopic, but, in that liturgy, as in our own, the Lord's Prayer is said after the communion (Renaud. tom. i. p. 518).

(3) The earliest notices of, or allusions to, a fraction refer only to the necessary division of the bread for distribution among the communicants. St. Augustine: "That which is on the Lord's Table . . . is blessed and hallowed, and broken small (comminuitur) for distribution" (Epist. cxlix. ad Paulin. § 16). Clement of Alexandria: "Some having divided the eucharist according to custom, permit every one of the people to take his own share" (Stromata, L. i. c. i. § 5). Pseudo-Dionysius: "Having exposed to view the bread that was covered and undivided, and divided it into many parts, and having divided the oneness of the cup unto all, he symbolically multiplies and distributes unity." Again: "Bringing into sight the covered gifts, and dividing their oneness into many parts . . . he makes those who partake to have communion (with each other) in them" (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. iii. § iii. nn. 12, 13). In the liturgy of St. Mark, in immediate preparation for the communion, "the priest breaks the bread, and says, Praise ye God in [i.e. Psalm cl. as in the Septuagint]. The priest divides the bread, saying to those present [i.e. to the deacons, &c. who assist], The Lord shall bless and minister with you," &c. Then, after a few verses entirely free from any mystical allusion, he communicates. In St. James the later Greek rite of putting the bread into the chalice has been adopted. "When he distributes a single portion into each chalice, he says, A holy portion of Christ, full of grace and truth, of the Father and the Holy Ghost, to whom be glory, &c. Then he begins to divide [i.e. the bread in the chalices with a spoon], and to say, The Lord is my Shepherd," &c. (Ps. xxiii.). In the common Greek rite, a second part of the prepared loaf which is stamped XC (for Χριστός) is divided for the communion of the priest and his assistants, who receive the elements separately. The other two (marked NI and KA; see ELEMENTS, p. 603) are also divided according to the number of the other communicants, and put into the chalice. As intinction began to appear in Spain in the 7th century (see Can. ii. Conc. Braccar. Labb. tom. vi. col. 563), the method of fraction now described as attendant on it was probably in use among the Greeks so early as the 6th. In the 4th and 5th we find Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil, Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria, still recognizing the practice of receiving in the hand (see Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 632, and COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 416), which is incompatible with intinction. We have already described the last fraction in the Coptic liturgy. The rubrics do not specify any further preparation for the communion. Nor are those of the Ethiopic, Armenian, or Syriac more explicit. The last named liturgy, however, may receive illustration from the Nestorian, in which "another fraction of the same Host into lesser particles for the distribution of the communion" is expressly ordered, though no method is prescribed (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 595, 611).

In the West the Mozarabic priest preparing for the communion put the "particle" called Regnum into the chalice, received himself that called Gloria, and if any others received must, it is presumed, have used the remainder for their communion, breaking them up as the number of communicants might require. We say presumed, for the present rubrics, which recognize but one Host, divided as before described, direct him afterwards to consume all the particles in order. The tract of Eldefonsus, printed by Mabillon in an appendix to his dissertation De Pane Eucharistico (Analecta Vetera, p. 549), prescribes the use of several Hosts, the number varying with the festival or season. We have no information respecting the early practice of the Gallican and Italian churches. In an Ordo Romanus which probably carries us up to the 7th century, and certainly to the 8th, the last fraction is thus described. The bishop of Rome, it should be said, is the chief officiant. "Then the acolytes go behind the bishops about the altar; the rest go down to the presbyters; that they may break the Hosts [which were then small loaves]. A paten goes before near the throne, two regionary subdeacons carrying it to the deacons, that they may break. But they look on the face of the pontiff that he may give the signal to break.

CHRIST. ANT.

And when he has given it by a motion of the head, having again saluted the pontiff, they break them" (Ordd. Rom. i. ii. iii. pp. 14, 49, 59). [W. E. S.]

FRANKFORT, COUNCIL OF (Frankfordense concilium), held at Frankfort, A.D. 794. "by favour of God, authority of the pope, and command of Charlemagne, who was present and attended by all the bishops of the kingdom of France and Italy, with the province of Aquitaine" (300 in number, according to later writers), as we read in the first of the fifty-six canons ascribed to it. From the same canon we learn that the first thing discussed in it was the heresy of the Spanish prelates Felix and Elipand, since called Adoptionism, which was condemned; and from the second canon that a decree of a recent synod of the Greeks, visiting all with anathema who would not worship and serve the images of the saints as they would the Trinity, was repudiated as well as condemned. This is about all we know of what passed at Frankfort; at any rate we have no direct authentic record extant of its proceedings beyond its canons. And of these the second has been made a subject of hot controversy both in ancient and modern times. Contemporaries aver that bishops Theophylact and Stephen (without naming their sees) represented pope Adrian at Frankfort, and that the council repudiated there was that "falsely called the 7th." In the modern heading to this council, on the other hand, it is asserted that "the acts of the 2nd Nicene council respecting images were confirmed there." There are four dogmatic epistles printed in the collections of councils as having emanated from Frankfort. (1) A letter from pope Adrian to the bishops of Spain. (2) Another from the bishops of Italy against Elipand. This is better known as "the sacrosyllabus" of Paulinus of Aquileia, but it is said to have been published at Frankfort, and sent by order of the council into Spain. (3) A third is from the bishops of France and Germany to the bishops of Spain. (4) A fourth from Charlemagne to Elipand and the rest of the Spanish bishops. In this the three preceding are stated to have been sent by him after holding a council, and conferring with the pope on the subject of which they treat, without however naming Frankfort. Still, after reading the 1st canon of Frankfort, we may not doubt their having been brought out there. As little can we doubt another work having been brought out there also, for the light it throws upon canon 2. The title given originally to this work was "the capitulary respecting images;" but it is in four books, now known as the "Caroline." It has been ascribed to Alcuin, Angilbert, and Angilram in turn; it is ascribed to Alcuin still (Bibl. Rer. Germ. tom. vi. 220). What it says of itself (Praef.) is, that it was jointly composed by Charlemagne and his prelates in refutation of two councils "held in the parts of Bithynia" (both calling themselves the seventh); one iconoclastic (that of Constantinople, A.D. 754), the other in favour of images (the 2nd Nicene, A.D. 787), and within three years of this last (or four years before it was brought out). But, in reality, there was no need of refuting the first of them, as this had been already done by the last (Art. Conc. Nic. ii.). The last alone

therefore, now stood for refutation. "De cuius destructione," says Hincmar (in causâ Hinc. L. c. 20), "non modicum volumen, quod in palatio adolescentulus legi, ab eodem imperatore Romam est per quosdam episcopos missum"—and then follows a reference to c. 28 of the fourth book, which identifies it at once. Further, not only was it sent to Rome, but it elicited a formal reply from the pope, as pope, vindicating in detail the teaching of the 2nd Nicene council which he had confirmed himself (Mansi xiii. 759 and seq.). In this work it is the 2nd Nicene council accordingly which is attacked all through: the creed of Pelagius the heretic (St. Aug. Op. x. App. pt. ii. Ed. Ben.) is paraded in the opening c. of the 3rd book as St. Jerome's, and called "the tradition of the Catholic faith in its integrity," in opposition to that of the 2nd Nicene council, which is attacked further on for wanting the "Filioque" clause (c. 8): while c. 17 of the same book unravels the statement of canon 2 of this council, by shewing that what is condemned there as having been decreed by the 2nd Nicene council under anathema, was no more than the informal utterance of one of the bishops who spoke there, named Constantinus. If the pope then was really represented at Frankfort by his legates, they must have left after the condemnation of Adoptionism, or, at all events, before this canon was framed. Most of the other canons, indeed, are couched in a style of their own, "Statutum," or "definitum est a Domino Rege, et a sanctâ synodo." The 33rd canon runs thus: "Ut Catholica fides sanctae Trinitatis, et oratio Dominica, et symbolum fidei omnibus prædicetur et tradatur." It has been assumed that what was meant here by "Catholica fides" is the Athanasian Creed. But it would seem, rather, from the two verbs which follow, that as by the Lord's Prayer and Creed are meant what had to be "delivered," so by the "Catholic faith" is meant merely what had to be "preached." Besides, this phrase was applied to so many things then (Ffoulkes' Ath. C. Append. p. 32 and seq.), that its actual meaning cannot be assumed where the context is not explicit. The 55th is remarkable as shewing how Angilramn had been employed. "Dixit Dominus rex . . . se a sede apostolicâ . . . licentiam habuisse, ut Angilramnum archiepiscopum in suo palatio assidue haberet, propter utilitates ecclesiasticas." Now the only work extant with which his name is associated, is a collection of canons said to have been given by him to the pope, or received from the pope when he was at Rome, containing indisputable germs of the false Decretals. In the next canon Alcuin is commended to the fellowship and prayers of the council. There is a strong family likeness, in conclusion, between this council and that of Paris, A.D. 825, which should not be overlooked by anybody wishing to form a just notion of either (Mansi xiii. 859 and 863 and seq.). [E. S. Ff.]

FRATER, FRATERNITAS. 1. The name Frater was applied among themselves to all Christians [FAITHFUL]. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39) says that those who recognise one God as their father, and have drunk of one Spirit, are called brethren. Jerome (De Perpet. Virg. c. 15) says that all Christians are called brothers. The Pseudo Clemens (Epist. ad Jacob. Proem.) speaks of the priests and deacons, and all the other brethren. Hence the title Fraternitas was commonly applied to all the members of the church, or of a particular church, regarded collectively; as by Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39; and perhaps De Virg. Vel. c. 14), and Cyprian (Epist. 51, c. 1) where "fraternitas" is equivalent to "clerus et plebs."

Frater and Fraternitas, in this sense, are frequently found in inscriptions. Thus, in an Algerian inscription (Reinier, Ins. de l'Algérie, No. 4025), a church is designated ECCLESIA FRATRVN. In a Greek epitaph copied by Marini (Arval. Prefaz. p. xx.), from the Olivieri collection at Pesaro, the body of the faithful is addressed with the salutation, "peace to the brethren," ΕΙΠΗΝΗΝ ΕΧΕΤΕ ΑΔΕΛΦΟΙ. Another (Muratori, Thesaur. t. iv. p. MDCCCXXIV. 9) is dedicated by "the brethren" (fratres reddiderunt) to Alexander, their brother. Another (Brunati. p. 108) appeals to the "good brothers" (fratres boni). In another, from the cemetery of Priscilla, "the brethren" bid farewell to Leontius.

Some proper names appear to have arisen from this idea of brotherhood. As that of Adelpheus, which is found on a marble in the museum of Lyons (Boissieu, p. 597, lxi.). (Martigny, Dictionnaire des Antiq. Chrét.; Art. Fraternité).

2. Persons of the same official body styled each other Frates; thus, not only does Cyprian speak of fellow-bishops as Frates, but he addresses presbyters and deacons by the same title (e.g. Epist. 16). When in the same epistle (c. 2), he says, that "fraternitas nostra" has been deceived by certain persons, it seems doubtful whether he means the body of bishops, or the members of the church in general. Hosius (Conc. Sardic. c. 8) speaks of a fellow-bishop as "frater et coepiscopus." From this official use of the word "Frater," it arose that the members of a council speak of themselves as "concilium fraternitatis" (I. Conc. Lugd. c. 6), i. e. of the episcopal brotherhood. So I. Syn. Rom. c. 2; IV. [III.] Syn. Rom. c. 1.

3. A monastic order is emphatically a brotherhood (fraternitas), and its members Frates, or Frates Spirituales (Fructuosi Regula, cc. 4 and 8). See BROTHERHOOD, MONASTERY. [P. O.]

FRESCO. The object of this article is to furnish a brief historical sketch of the rise and progress of pictorial decoration in the religious buildings of the early Christians. Embellishments in mosaic will be treated of in a separate article, but all other wall decorations will be included, not those only strictly comprehended under the title fresco,* i. e. when the colours are mixed with water simply, and applied to fresh plaster while wet. This was the ordinary mode of colouring walls among the wealthier Romans; but the care and skill it required, and the tedious processes necessary for preparing the walls for the colours, forbade its use where economy was an object. In the better-class houses at Pompeii, Rome, and elsewhere, the wall-decorations are executed in fresco; but the greater part of the paintings in ordinary dwellings are in distemper of various degrees of excellence. We are at present deficient in accurate information as to the exact process employed in the paintings of the catacombs; but considering the general absence of wealth among the primitive Christians, it is probable that the less expensive method would be adopted. Whenever paintings were repainted or touched up, the plaster being dry, the distemper process must have been necessarily employed. That encaustic painting in wax was also employed in early religious pictures is certain from the references in the fathers to that process. Chrysostom and Basil (Contra Sabellian, p. 805) in the East, and Paulinus in the West, may be cited. The latter speaks of "imagines ceris liquentibus pictas" (Ep. xxx. § 6), while Chrysostom more than once refers to κροχυρος γραφή. Hermogenes, the African painter, is reproached by the vehement Tertullian as being "his falsarius, et cauterio et stilo" (Adv. Hermog. c. 1). The fact is that Christian art followed the technical rules of the period, and adopted whatever processes were in use among the artists of the day, and were most suited to the particular work in hand, whether fresco, tempera, or encaustic.

* The word fresco is by a popular error commonly used for all kinds of wall-painting. Accurately speaking it is restricted to that which the word indicates, painting on freshly-laid plaster, executed while the wall is still damp, in water colours and pigments not liable to be injured by the lime. Dry fresco is painting on old plaster wetted afresh. Distemper (a tempera) is on a dry wall with opaque colours, made up with some viscous medium, size, white of egg, milk, or gum, diluted or "tempered" with water. Encaustic painting is painting with wax as a vehicle, the colours being burnt in afterwards.

Nor was it only in the processes adopted but also in the character of the pictorial decorations themselves that the early Christians conformed to the practice of the age in which they lived. Indeed, it could not be otherwise. As has been remarked with perfect truth by Raoul Rochette, "un art ne s'improvise pas." A school of painting is the result of a long previous train of education, and cannot spring into existence in a moment "fully formed, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter" (Northcote, Rom. Sott. p. 198). There was nothing exceptional about Christian art. It was no more than the continuation of the art Christianity found already existing as the exponent of the ideas of the age, with such modifications as its purer faith and higher morality rendered necessary. The artists employed were not necessarily Christian; indeed, in most cases, especially in the earliest times, they would probably be pagans, working in the style and depicting the subjects to which they were accustomed, only restricted by the watchful care of their employers that no devices were introduced which could offend the moral tone of Christians. In the earliest examples there is absolutely nothing distinctive of the religion professed. "At first," writes Mr. Burgon (Letters from Rome, p. 250), "they even used many of the same devices for mural decoration as the pagans had used, always excepting anything that was immoral or idolatrous; introducing, however, every here and there, as the ideas occurred to them, something more significant of their own creed, until by-and-by the whole was exclusively Christian." The deep-rooted aversion of the early Christians to all sculptured or pictorial representations, natural in a community that had sprung from the bosom of the Jewish church, for a considerable period forbade all attempts to depict the person of the Saviour or the events of either Testament, and limited the efforts of Christian art to the simple naturalism of the decorations already common, or the arabesques in which the fancy of the artists loved to indulge. The earliest Christian frescoes with which we are acquainted present the same subjects from pastoral life and the vintage, the trellised vines and bunches of grapes, the bright-plumaged birds and painted butterflies, the winged genii and gracefully draped female figures, with which we are familiar in the wall-decorations of the Roman baths and the houses of Pompeii. By degrees the natural instinct for the beautiful asserted itself, and the desire to make the eye a channel for the reception of the truths of revelation led to the introduction of symbolic representations, which, without attempting directly to depict sacred things, conveyed to the initiated the expression of the truths believed by them. The actual change in the character of the subjects represented was at first inconsiderable. The vine laden with clusters became a recognised symbol of Christ "the True Vine" and the "much-fruit," by which Christians, as "branches," were called to glorify the Father. The pastoral subjects, especially those in which the Shepherd was the principal figure, at once led the mind of the worshipper to the contemplation of Christ the "Good Shepherd." To the devout imagination a Fish represented at once the Saviour Himself, the anagrammatic ΙΧΘΥΣ, and the human object of His salvation, the Christian deriving his life from the waters of baptism (cf. Tertull. de Baptism. c. i.), while the Fisherman spoke of Him who by the Gospel-hook takes men for life, not for death.^b [FISH; FISHERMAN.] Not only were these natural emblems made to breathe a Christian spirit by the infusion of a new element of life, but even directly mythological personages were pressed into the service of the church. Orpheus captivating the wild beasts by the sound of his lyre was adopted as a symbol of Christ subduing the savage passions of men by the melody of the gospel, and Ulysses deaf to the alluring voices of the sirens represented the believer triumphing over the seductions of worldly and sensual pleasure (Martigny, Dict. des Ant. Chrét. pp. 447, 643; De' Rossi, Bulletino, 1863, p. 35). The hold which the old forms still maintained long after the ideas of which they were the exponents had passed away, is seen in the combination with Scriptural scenes of those personifications of Nature under the human form so frequent in pagan times, which lasted even down to a late date. In the delineation of the ascension of Elijah, one of the most frequently repeated subjects of early Christian art, the Jordan is represented as a river god, with his urn.

"Fisher of men whom Thou to life dost bring;
From evil sea of sin,
And from the billowy strife, Gathering pure fishes in Caught with sweet bait of life."

Thus also "a mountain is occasionally represented by a mountain god, a city by a goddess with a mural crown, night by a female figure with a torch and star-bespangled robe, &c." (Kugler, Handbook of Painting, part i. p. 9).

So slow and timid was the commencement of Christian art. The profane abuse of sculpture and painting which had associated these forms of art with idolatry and licentiousness formed an almost insuperable barrier to its recognition as the hand-maid of religion. The earlier fathers viewed all sculptural or pictorial representations with suspicion if not decided disapprobation. The stern Tertullian, transferring the prohibitions of the Old Testament to the New, absolutely condemned all representations of religious objects, and reproached Hermogenes as vehemently for painting as for his defence of second marriages: "pingit illicite, nubit assidue, legem Dei in libidinem defendit, in artem contemnit" (Tertull. adv. Hermog. c. i.; De Idolatr. c. 5; cf. Neander, Antignosticus, Bohn's tr. pp. 225, 451). We find similar but milder condemnations of the pictorial art in Clement Alex. (Protrept. c. 4) and Origen (cont. Cels. lib. iv. c. 31). Sacred art being thus frowned on it was only by gradual and cautious steps that symbolism gave way to direct historical representation, the events selected to be depicted being, at first, themselves symbolical of those great gospel facts which a deep-seated reverence as yet forbade them to portray. The persons and incidents of the Old Testament included within the limited cycle in which Christian art originally moved had all a typical or allegorical reference to the leading doctrines of Christianity, and reminded the devout worshipper of the Sacrifice, Resurrection, and Redemption of Christ. This will be apparent from the cycles of O. T. subjects given in the latter part of this article.

It was something that in spite of the profane and licentious associations of pictorial art, and the aversion of some of its most influential teachers, painting should have secured admission thus far into the service of Christianity. But it was still halting at the threshold, and timidly shrinking from the province of its greatest triumphs, so long as it was restricted to allegory. It could only accomplish its object in elevating the mind, and connecting beautiful and ennobling ideas with the external facts on which the faith is founded, when it adequately depicted the Person of the Saviour and chief events of His saving life. Referring to the article JESUS CHRIST for fuller details of the pictorial history of the Redeemer, and of the slow degrees with which the pious horror of any direct delineation of His outward form was broken down (of the persistence of which feeling the notorious decree of the council of Elvira,^c A.D. 305, forbidding the depicting of the objects of worship and adoration on the walls of churches is a remarkable evidence), it will be enough here to say that portrait-like representations of our Blessed Lord are found among the early wall-paintings in the Roman catacombs, and that a limited number of events from His life on earth, belonging to a strictly-defined cycle, are of constant occurrence in the same localities. It deserves notice that this cycle does not include any representations of the history of the Passion or Crucifixion. A feeling of awful reverence forbade any attempt to portray the atoning death of Christ in any but a symbolical or allegorical form. "The catacombs of Rome . . . offer no instance of a crucifixion, nor does any allusion to such a subject of art occur in any early writer" (Milman, u. s. p. 398). The most ancient instance known does not date earlier than the 8th century (Munter, Sinnbilder, p. 77). Beyond the domain of sacred allegory and Scriptural painting, Christian art busied itself in the representation of saintly personages and of the martyrdoms, the memory of which was still so vivid in the church. It is difficult to point to indubitably early examples of the first class, and all traces of the latter class have perished. That representations of holy persons were not unfrequent in the time of St. Augustine is certain from his reference to wall-paintings of St. Peter and St. Paul as commonly existing, "pluribus locis . . . pictos" (de Consens. Evang. i. 10). But the paintings of St. Cornelius and St. Cyprian, in the crypt of Cornelius, in the Callistine catacomb, are in the style of the 8th century, while the Orante called St. Cecilia by De' Rossi, in the crypt bearing her name, is of the 9th; and the figure of St. Urban, in the same crypt, "can hardly have been executed before the 10th or 11th" (Northcote, u. s. p. 159). The paintings of saints in the catacombs of Naples may be assigned to an earlier period: some belonging to the 5th, others to the 8th century. Although all representations of martyrdoms have perished, there is no doubt that such existed. Prudentius (c. 405) speaks of a picture of the martyrdom of St. Casianus, of which he says expressly, "Historiam pictura refert" (Peristeph. Hymn. ix. v. 5), and he elaborately describes the paintings of the martyrdom of St. Hippolytus, which embellished the walls of the chapel in which the body of the saint had been deposited (Peristeph. Hymn. xi. v. 141 sq.). Paulinus of Nola also at the commencement of the 5th century, decorated a chapel erected by him with martyrs (Poem. xxviii. v. 20, 21). At a still earlier period we have the testimony of St. Gregory Nyssen as to the prevalence of this practice in the Eastern church. He describes the martyrdom of St. Theodore as painted on the walls of a church dedicated to that saint, "The fiery furnace, the death of the athlete of Christ . . . the painter had expressed by colours as in a book . . . The dumb walls speak and edify" (Orat. in Theod. tom. iii. p. 579).^d

Early Christian paintings may be conveniently treated of under three divisions, Roman, Byzantine, and Lombardic.

I. Roman.—All the earlier Christian buildings above ground having yielded to time and human violence, the catacombs are the only source of examples of primitive Christian art. In them, as has been already remarked, the earliest examples offer nothing exclusively Christian, and differ hardly at all from the contemporaneous pagan decorations. Agincourt long since called attention to this fact in his great work (L'Histoire de l'Art par les Monumens), proving by comparative representations in successive plates (Peinture,

^c "Placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur" (Conc. III. can. 36; Labbe, Concil. vol. i. p. 974).

^d See Pusey, Note to Tertullian's Apology, Lib. of the Fathers, vol. x. p. 109 sq.

pl. v. vi.), that the first Christian sepulchral chambers were arranged and decorated after heathen models. The artists probably adhered to the old faith; and even if this were not so, they were only accustomed to work in one style, and could not extemporize a new one. In some of the most ancient chapels of the catacombs it has been truly said that "you are not certain whether you are looking on a pagan or a Christian work. There is the same geometrical division of the roof, the same general arrangement of the subjects, the same fabulous animals, the same graceful curves, the same foliage, fruit, flowers, and birds in both" (Burgon, Letters from Rome, p. 250; Northcote, u. s. p. 190). Agincourt could discover no difference in style, except, perhaps, what was not unnatural, greater signs of hurry, and coarser execution. It is only the occurrence of the figure of the Good Shepherd, which usually occupies the central position, or some Scriptural subject, such as Jonah or Daniel, or some Christian symbol, that clears up the doubt as to the religion of the art we are studying. The entire absence of all same charge to the island of Pontia (Dictionary of Christian Biography, DOMITILLA). In this burial-place, therefore, we have work of the end of the 1st or the beginning of the 2nd century. The frescoes which ornament the walls and ceilings of the sepulchral chambers and their recesses or cubicula, are clearly contemporaneous with the original building, and are, especially in the subordinate embellishments, of rare beauty. There is a vaulted roof, over which a vine trails with all the freedom of nature, laden with clusters, at which birds are pecking, while winged boys are gathering or pressing out the grapes, of which no decorative artist of the Augustan age need be ashamed (Mommson, Contemp. Rev. May 1871, p. 170). The annexed wood cut (No. 1) gives a faint idea of its exquisite grace and beauty. Traces of landscapes also still exist here, which are of rare occurrence in later Christian burial vaults. In the portion of this catacomb known by the names of St. Domitilla's chamberlains, St. Nereus and St. Achilleus, a painted cubiculum exhibits representations of the four seasons, which are very curious. They are represented as female figures, with small butterfly wings attached to their shoulders. We give woodcuts of Spring and Autumn (Nos. 2, 3).

gloomy associations in connection with death deserves remark. The cheerful symbolical decorations which adorn the sepulchral chambers—the graceful vine, the clustering grapes, the birds and bright landscapes—bespeak a faith which nerved its possessors to meet the most terrible sufferings with calmness and even with delight, as the path to never-ending joys, and to view death as the door to eternal life, the true birthday of the soul. Every thing that meets the eye excites pleasurable emotions, and indicates a heart full of peace and happiness.

As an example of Christian mural decorations of the very earliest period we may instance the Catacomb of Domitilla on the Appian way (see p. 314). This catacomb is attributed to Flavia Domitilla, a near relative of the emperor Domitian—perhaps his niece, the daughter of his sister who bore the same name. She was the wife of Flavius Clemens, the cousin of Domitian, and his colleague in the consulship A.D. 95, who was accused of "atheism," by which we are almost certainly to understand Christianity, and put to death by the emperor. Domitilla was banished on the

The latter has an attendant genius emptying out a cornucopia of fruit. There is an entire absence of anything distinctively Christian in these decorations, which reproduce the wall-paintings of the best period of Greco-Roman art. On the walls, however, we find the usual allegorical and Scriptural subjects—the Good Shepherd, the

Another equally beautiful specimen of the vine ornamentation is exhibited on the vault of a square chamber of the cemetery of Praetextatus, otherwise known as that of St. Urban, beneath the church of the same name, lying to the east of the Via Appia, near the circus of Maxentius. This burial-place belongs to the earliest period, and the character of the decorations corresponds with heathen art of the 2nd century, and is not at all inferior to the best works of the age. The accompanying woodcut (No. 4) gives an imperfect notion of the elaborate beauty of the design. The vault of the chamber is divided into four bands, each containing a continuous wreath of foliage and flowers, among which are nests, and the birds visiting their young. The highest wreath is of laurel or bay, a symbol of victory, indicative of the Christian triumph. Immediately round the arch of the arcosolium is a band of reapers cutting down corn and binding up the sheaves. The plafond of the recess originally bore the Good Shepherd with a sheep upon his shoulders; but the design has been almost destroyed by the excavation of later loculi. The paintings are small and exquisitely beautiful, even in their present state of decay. The family to whom this burial-place belonged was evidently one of considerable wealth and dignity. But the specimens already adduced seem to have been surpassed by the great vine of the Callistine catacomb (Bottari, vol. ii. tav. 15), the "antique style of beauty" of which is noticed by Kugler. A stem of a vine encircles each side of the arch of an arcosolium with its graceful spirals, lovely little naked boys standing on its branches and plucking the clusters. The soffit of the arch is similarly decorated with vintage scenes. The wall of the recess presents what is commonly, but erroneously, designated the Dispute with the Doctors. Christ, represented as a beardless young man seated on a curule chair, holds a scroll in his left hand and turns towards a number of hearers, probably intended for his apostles, some of whom are seated and others standing (woodcut No. 5).

The general arrangement of the mural decorations of the sepulchral chambers or cubicula of the Roman catacombs is remarkably uniform. The arch-headed tomb recesses or arcosolia, which occupy three sides of the square chambers, have the back wall, the soffits of the arches, and the wall above them painted, in the earlier examples with mere ornamental arabesques, in the later with subjects drawn from the narrow Scriptural or symbolical cycle to which reference has already been made. The ceilings are even more richly decorated, the subjects being usually depicted in panels distributed round a central picture, which most commonly exhibits a representation of the Saviour under a typical form. The general appearance of these cubicula, and the distribution of the paintings, is shown in the accompanying illustration from the cubiculum of the Ocean in the catacomb of St. Callistus (No. 6). The paintings are early—probably of the 3rd century—representing trellis work overgrown with flowers, peacocks and other birds, and winged genii. In the centre of the vault is the head of Ocean, giving its name to the chamber. The ornamentation of an early ceiling is exhibited in woodcut No. 7, representing the roof of the chapel of St. Callistus. The central panel contains Christ under the typical form of Orpheus. Four of the eight circumscribing panels contain Biblical subjects—(1) Moses smiting the Rock; (2) Daniel in the Lions' Den; (3) The Raising of Lazarus; (4) David armed with his Sling. The intermediate panels represent pastoral subjects—two of sheep, two of cattle. Another chamber, depicted by De' Rossi (vol. i. pl. 10), called that of Orpheus, has a similar Pompeian in character. The ceiling is a beautiful work of art. Orpheus is seen in the centre, surrounded by heads of genii with dishevelled and flowing hair, and supported by eight oblong panels, two containing the Good Shepherd, two female orantes, and the remaining four winged genii bearing crooks, floating lightly in the air. The panelled walls are embellished with a rich profusion of arabesques, combining doves, peacocks, and other birds, dolphins, and sea monsters, the only unmistakably Christian emblem being the lamb bearing the eucharistic bread.

The style of these earliest efforts of Christian art has been unduly depreciated. They are characterized by Lord Lindsay (Hist. of Christ. Art, vol. i. p. 39) as "poor productions," where "the meagreness of invention is only equalled by the feebleness of execution," "inferior, generally speaking, to the worst specimens of contemporary heathen art." Such a verdict evidences but slender acquaintance with the paintings which are the subjects of his criticism. The earlier Christian frescoes, as we have seen, are quite on a level with the best specimens of pagan art of the time, and the rapid decadence manifested in the later examples belongs not to Christian art alone but to art in general. The judgment of Kugler is far more favourable. He speaks of the "grandeur of arrangement" exhibited by the earliest paintings, and admires the "peculiar solemnity and dignity of style" which characterize them, though he acknowledges that these excellencies are "accompanied by certain technical deficiencies," chiefly such as naturally arose from tone was thrown over the flesh portions of the figure, the shadows being worked in in broad masses with a deeper tint of the same warm hue,

* The very early date of these decorations is acknowledged by Le Normant, who considers some of the paintings in St. Domitilla's cemetery to be of the same style as those in the well known pyramidal tomb of Caius Sextus, a.c. 32.

The details were almost entirely left to the imagination of the beholder. The draperies were coloured in the primary keys, indicating a tolerable acquaintance with the laws of harmony. The general effect of these simple processes is pronounced by the same critics to be good. The "attitudes are not without grandeur, nor the masses of light and shade without breadth, nor the drapery without simplicity." The artists were evidently capable of much better things.

With the lapse of time and the general decay of artistic power in Rome, corresponding to the universal deterioration of taste and genius which characterized the later days of the empire, we notice a very sensible decline in the decorations of the catacombs. The design becomes increasanother and always unlike nature" (Northeote, u. s. p. 197). In fact, as Dean Milman has truly remarked (Lat. Christ. vi. 605), the characteristic of Christian painting was not art but worship, and its highest aim was to awaken religious emotion and suggest religious thought. Thus imitation took the place of invention, and imagination was crushed by precedent. The gradual decadence of the art may be clearly traced in the chronological series given in Agincourt's plates (Peinture, pl. v.-xii.). The excellence of design, freedom of drawing, and harmony of colouring which mark the earlier frescoes gradually disappear as we advance. We find proofs of declension at the end of the 3rd century (Pl. viii.). The drawing is not bad, but ingly rude and clumsy, and the execution shows greater carelessness and neglect of detail. The figures are ill-proportioned—sometimes square and short, at others inordinately elongated. The free play of the earlier designs is succeeded by a lifeless rigidity. This mechanical stiffness was fostered by the narrowness of the cycle of Scriptural subjects represented, and the unimaginative sameness of the mode of representation. Each subject had received a well-defined traditional type, consecrated by repetition, from which it was deemed irreverence to deviate. Thus Christian art became "almost hieratic in its character, as in ancient Egypt or modern Greece, so fixed and immovable were its types; always like one there is no movement and little expression, and the treatment is monotonous. In the two succeeding centuries the deterioration proceeds, though the decline is not so rapid as might have been anticipated. Classic forms continued till the end of the 5th and first half of the 6th centuries. Cavalcaselle instances as an example of the art of this period a chapel in the catacomb of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus (otherwise called St. Helena). The vault is decorated with a large figure of Christ seated in a curule chair, in the act of benediction. The head is very fine and pure. Below, above the tomb, are figures of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus and two others ranged on either side of the Holy Lamb standing on a rock, whence issue the four rivers of Paradise. The frames are long and attenuated, the heads small, the hands and feet defective in drawing. Another typical example is the colossal head of Christ in the act of benediction, from the cemetery of St. Pontianus. For the first time the jewelled nimbus bears the Greek cross. The Saviour is of imposing aspect, but conventional. The execution is hasty, and the decline marked. It probably belongs to the 7th century, but is assigned by Martigny to Hadrian I. 772-775. The celebrated paintings which decorate the well or baptistery, the jewelled cross, and the Baptism of Christ are described in the articles BAPTISTERY, p. 174; and CATACOMBS, p. 313. These pictures, in their present state, are probably restorations of the originals, coarsely painted over an older underlying picture at the time of the repair of the catacomb by Hadrian I. (cf. Tyrwhitt, Art Teaching of Primitive Church, p. 173). These duces the original painting, and that any arguments founded upon such uncertain data must be precarious. The words of Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt, with regard to a particular instance, may be applied to a large number of these frescoes, "the workmanship is so grossly rude and careless, that one is led to suspect that ancient retouchings have taken place at some time in the baths of art; and the addition of the coarsest outlines, both on the lighted and shaded side of the objects, seems to show that the original painting had nearly vanished from the wall when some well-meaning and totally-ignorant restorer made an attempt at securing its meaning" (Art Teaching, &c., p. 130). The fact of these restorations has been lately made patent to those who have no opportunity of examining the originals by the invaluable series of photographs taken in the catacombs by the magnesium light, which we owe to the unwearied zeal and munificent liberestorations may be taken as examples of the retouchings and repaintings of earlier originals which prevailed so extensively when the catacombs became the objects of religious visits, and which render it so difficult accurately to determine the date of any particular picture. In the catacombs at Naples which have not been so much cared for, and are less tampered with by modern restorers, the wall-pictures may be seen in several instances peeling off, disclosing successive strata one behind another. There is no reason to question the good faith of the original restorers, who probably followed the outlines of the decaying subjects as far as they could make them out, and only supplied forms and details when the original had quite disappeared. But it must always be borne in mind, in examining the frescoes of the catacombs, that we are in all probability looking at a work of the 8th or even a later century, which only partially reproduces the original painting, and that any arguments founded upon such uncertain data must be precarious. The words of Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt, with regard to a particular instance, may be applied to a large number of these frescoes, "the workmanship is so grossly rude and careless, that one is led to suspect that ancient retouchings have taken place at some time in the baths of art; and the addition of the coarsest outlines, both on the lighted and shaded side of the objects, seems to show that the original painting had nearly vanished from the wall when some well-meaning and totally-ignorant restorer made an attempt at securing its meaning" (Art Teaching, &c., p. 130). The fact of these restorations has been lately made patent to those who have no opportunity of examining the originals by the invaluable series of photographs taken in the catacombs by the magnesium light, which we owe to the unwearied zeal and munificent libeality of Mr. J. H. Parker. The rude later touches and hard outlines are in many instances clearly to be traced over the original painting. It is needless to pursue the melancholy history of the decline of religious art any further. The power of drawing grew feebler and feebler, all sense of beauty of form perished, proportion was disregarded, the colouring became crude and inharmonious, until, with the close of the 8th century, a period of darkness set in, when Christian art was lost in the Western world, and only dragged on an unnatural and mechanical existence in the traditional Byzantine art of the East.

The remarkable series of frescoes which embellish the catacombs of Naples must not be passed over. They have, however, been so fully described in a previous article (CATACOMBS, p. 316), that it is needless to enlarge upon them here. The chief authorities for these paintings are the plates of Bellermann's work (Hamburg, 1839). The greater part there given are no longer visible. The vault of the vestibule is painted in the Pompeian style, and probably by pagan artists, some of the subjects being distinctly heathen. It belongs to the first half-century of the Christian era (No. 8). The vault has been subsequently plastered over, and a second set of subjects of the 8th century painted over it. But the new coat did not adhere well, and has fallen off to a large extent, exhibiting the first painting below it. There is also a good painting of a peacock, with vases and flowers, belonging to the first period. Among the paintings that decorate the chapels we may call attention to one presenting full-length figures of St. Paul with a scroll, and St. Laurence with his crown of martyrdom in his hand. They are not nimbed, and are assigned by Mr. J. H. Parker to the 5th century (No. 9). Half-lengths of St. Desiderius and St. Agutius, in another recess, deserve notice as exemplifying the bad drawing of the 8th century. The faces are elongated, the sockets of the eyes exaggerated in size, the hands enormous and clumsy, and the whole displays a barbaric ignorance of form and blindness to beauty.

II. Byzantine.—Up to the commencement of the 7th century there was no decided difference between Eastern and Western art. Wherever Roman civilization extended Christian art was essentially the same. It was not till the middle of the 7th century that the distinction between Roman and Byzantine art began to arise. That was the epoch of the greatest decadence of art in the West, crushed by the Lombard invasion, while in the East, under the emperor Justinian, a new and vigorous intellectual life was rapidly developing itself and manifesting its energy, as elsewhere, in the domain of art. This new influence rapidly made itself felt through the civilized world. The style of art universally prevailing in the latter part of the 7th and the 8th centuries and onward was that which, as distinguished from the Roman school, is known by the title of Byzantine (Kugler, Handbook of Painting, i. p. 47). The characteristic mental differences of the West and the East were reflected in their artistic works. The contemplative prevailed in the productions of the Byzantine art schools, as the practical did in those of Rome. The idea of dramatic historical painting was alien to the Byzantine genius. Even the movements of life were distasteful. Calm, motionless figures offered themselves to the devotion of the worshippers in dignified repose. Ease stiffened into rigidity, tradition usurped the place of invention, the study of nature was laid aside, and the artist followed a strictly prescribed type which allowed no scope for the play of the imagination, and ended in a system of mere mechanical copying, where, in Kugler's words (u. s. p. 56), "the capacity of the artist was only regulated by the number and quality of the tracings which he had been able to procure from the works of his predecessors." A fuller discussion of Byzantine art and the chief examples remaining, must be reserved for the article treating on mosaic decorations (MOZAICS). Byzantine frescoes of the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, it is believed do not exist; though, from the permanence of the traditional type, and the strict adherence to artistic rules, there is no doubt that later compositions enable us to realise their character with great accuracy. We have no account of catacomb paintings in the East, though it is possible that such are only awaiting more thorough research. One such was not long since discovered at Alexandria, and is described by De' Rossi (Bulletino, Novemb. 1864; Agost. 1865), and Northcote (Rom. Sott. p. 221). It contains a liturgical painting, apparently representing the participation in the eucharist, together with the miracle at Cana and the multiplication of the loaves and fishes, with Greek inscriptions over. But it belongs to a period anterior to the development of Byzantine art, and differs little, if at all, from the paintings of the Roman catacombs.

III. Lombardic.—The relics of the new style of art consequent on the Lombard invasion in the 6th and 7th centuries are very scanty, and quite insufficient to furnish data for determining its character with any minuteness. It is probable, however, that the "naturalism and insistence on fact, the vigorous imagination of truth and wild play of fancy in fiction, the delight in action, motion, and contest, the taste for hunting and battle, the irresistible or unresisted taste for the humorous grotesque," described so vividly by Mr. Ruskin (Stones of Venice, vol. i. append. 8), as characterizing their more lasting works in architecture and sculpture, were exhibited in their pictorial efforts, in which, with all their rudeness and total license of style, there lay, as Kugler remarks (p. 45), "a germ of freedom from which, later, a new school of development was to spring." The historical subjects which Queen Theodelinda caused to be painted on the walls of her palace at Monza, at the beginning of the 7th century, have unhappily perished, if, indeed, they were frescoes and not mosaics.

Some account is given by Von Rumohr (Ital. Forsch. vol. i. p. 193, Berl. 1827) of the examples of the Lombardic style still existing in the remains of the frescoes in the tribune of the subterranean church at Assisi, and in the crypt of SS. Nazaro e Celso at Verona. The former are placed by him in the 8th century. The lights are laid on in impasto, an art subsequently lost. The frescoes at Verona are very similar in design and execution. Several Biblical scenes are there rudely painted on a coarse white ground.

IV. Cycles of Scriptural Subjects.—Attention has been already drawn to the remarkable fact that out of the almost infinite wealth of historical subjects in the Old and New Testaments suitable for pictorial representation, by which important doctrines are set forth or holy lessons imparted, a comparatively small number were selected, and that the limits thus laid down were scarcely ever transgressed by the artists. Nor were these, generally speaking, precisely the subjects that we should have a priori expected to have been the object of exclusive preference. Many of the most striking events of the O. T., and the most characteristic incidents of the life of Christ are entirely passed over, while some which appear to us subordinate are repeated times without number. The explanation of this procedure is to be sought in the principle of typical parallelism which guided the church from the first in her choice of subjects for delineation. Her leading idea was to veil the great facts of Redemption "under the parallel and typical events of the patriarchal and Jewish dispensation—admitting no direct representations from gospel history but such as illustrated the kingly office of the Saviour and the miracles by which He prefigured the illumination of the spirit and the resurrection of the body" (Lord Lindsay, Christian Art, vol. i. p. 48). It followed therefore that even these events were not treated so much as facts of history, to be portrayed with any idea of reproducing the incident as it may be conceived to have occurred, but as types in which the spiritual meaning was predominant. Consequently, not the choice of the subject alone but the mode of treating it was matter to be regulated by authority. Nothing beyond the minor details and the mode of execution was left to the artist. The church dictated what should be painted and how. "The symbolical system of this hieratic cycle," says De' Rossi, "is established beyond all dispute, not only by the choice and arrangement of subjects, but also by the mode of representing them." "Christ's resurrection, with that of the church in His Person, is the theme on which in their peculiar language the artists of the catacombs seem never weary of expatiating" (Lord Lindsay, u. s. p. 51), and representing to the eyes and hearts of the beholders under every varied form of symbol, type, and allegory. The earliest allusion every sarcophagus of the early Christian church. The same events, with the others belonging to this cycle, are continually referred to in the writings of the early fathers, who thus evidenced the hold they had taken of the popular mind, as familiar illustrations of the truths of revelation.

We may select one or two of the subjects of most frequent recurrence in early Christian art to illustrate what has been said as to the adherence to a traditional type, even when quite at variance with all historical probability. No subject meets us more constantly than Noah in the ark receiving the dove with the olive-branch, in evident allusion to the sacrament of baptism and salvation in the church (1 Pet. iii. 31). But with slight modifications of detail the type never varies. As in the illustration given above (No. 10), the ark is always a small square box with an open lid, out of which a man many sizes too large for his receptacle appears, and welcomes back the dove. Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac is of perpetual recurrence.^f Both are usually clad in tunics. In an example from the cemetery of Priscilla, Abraham wears highpriestly robes.

to a cycle of this kind, not, it is true, containing any reference to pictorial representation, occurs in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. v. c. 7). Some of the Scriptural events there spoken of as types or pledges of the resurrection of man, viz. the deliverance of Jonah from the whale's belly, the preservation of the three children in the fiery furnace, and of Daniel in the lions' den, from the O. T., and the cure of the man sick of the palsy, and of the blind man on whose eyes Christ laid clay, the feeding of the five thousand, the miracle of Cana, and the raising of Lazarus, are those which meet us perpetually painted in almost every cubiculum, and carved on almost

The ram is a frequent accessory. The history of Jonah, the type of His work, death, and resurrection, chosen by Christ himself, in its three scenes, when once seen will be universally recognised, from the sameness of the form of the sea-monster and the details of the picture. In our illustration (No. 11) all these typical events are combined into one picture. Daniel in the lions' den, infinitely repeated, adheres on the whole to the same form and arrangement. One given by Perret represents him as wearing the Phrygian cap, which also usually distinguishes his companions the three children in the furnace, another of the most commonly occurring types of deliverance (No. 12). The permanence of one type sanctioned by ecclesiastical tradition exhibited in these and almost every other Scriptural representation in these early paintings, anticipates the authoritative statement of the church made some centuries later in the iconoclastic controversy, "Non est imaginum structura picturarum inventio, sed ecclesiae catholicae probata legislatio et traditio" (Conc. Nic. ii. art. vi., Labbe Concil. vol. vii. p. 831).

The same restriction to one cycle and adherence to one authorised pictorial form are seen in the frescoes from the N. T. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

The following may be accepted as a tolerably complete account of the cycle of the O. T. subjects found in the catacombs. We have only included those which had received a fixed traditional form, and were constantly repeated, excluding those only occurring once or twice:—

I. (1) The Fall, with Adam, Eve, the tree, and the serpent. (2) The Offering of Cain and Abel. (3) Noah receiving the Dove. (4) The Sacrifice of Isaac. (5) Moses removing his Shoes. (6) Moses striking the Rock. (7) David with his Sling. (8) Elijah's Translation. (9) The Three Children in the Fiery Furnace. (10) Daniel in the Lions' Den. (11) Jonah (a) Swallowed by the Whale; (b) Disgorged; (c) Reposing under his Booth. (12) Job on the Dunghill; to which may be added, though of much rarer occurrence, (13) Tobias with the Fish, and (14) Susanna and the Elders.

II. (1) The Adoration of the Magi. (2) The Miracle at Cana. (3) Christ and the Woman of Samaria. (4) The Healing of the Paralytic, the man carrying his bed. (5) The Healing of the Blind Man. (6) The Cure of the Woman with the Issue of Blood. (7) The Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes. (8) The Raising of Lazarus. (9) Zacchaeus. (10) The Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem. (11) Christ before Pilate, the latter washing his hands. (12) Christ and the Apostles on the Shore of the Sea of Galilee, after the Resurrection, with bread and fish. To these may be added, though not strictly belonging to the cycle, (13) the Annunciation (Bottari, loc. cit. 176), (14) Our Lord's Baptism, in the catacomb of St. Pontianus, and (15) the Five Wise Virgins, from St. Agnes (Perret, ii. 42).

We must not omit to mention the frescoes representing the Agape which so frequently meet us. In many of these there is nothing distinctively Christian, and Mr. Tyrwhitt remarks on the close resemblance between the Agape of the catacombs of St. Domitilla, and St. Callistus, and the confessedly heathen banquet of the seven priests in the Gnostic catacomb. That of which we give a woodcut (No. 13), from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter, already described (p. 312), presents nothing by which we can determine whether the feast depicted had a religious character or not. In others, however, the decussated loaves, the bread and fish in seven baskets, and the seven persons, in evident allusion to the interview between Christ and seven of his disciples at the sea of Galilee, evidence the Christian origin and purpose of the painting.

We have already lamented the entire absence of all examples of religious paintings derived from churches or basilicas, owing to the destruction of the buildings themselves, or of the decay or removal of the pictures. This want however is in some degree compensated for by contemporaneous lists of the subjects represented, and to some extent of the manner in which they were depicted, for which we are indebted to St. Ambrose and St. Paulinus of Nola.

In the latter half of the 4th century the Ambrosian basilica at Milan was decorated with a cycle of 21 Scriptural paintings, all but four of which represented O. T. subjects. They are described in the "Disticha ad picturas sacras in Basilica Ambrosiana," given in the "Inni Sinceri di Sant' Ambrogio," published by Biraghi (Milano, 1862). The subjects are (1) Noah and the Dove. (2) Abraham beholding the Stars. (3) Abraham entertaining the Angels. (4) The Sacrifice of Isaac. (5) The Meeting of Isaac and Rebecca. (6) Jacob craftily obtaining the Birthright. (7) Jacob and the Speckled and Ring-straked Flocks. (8) Joseph's Coat shown to Jacob by his Sons.

(9) Joseph sold by his Brethren. (10) Joseph and Potiphar's Wife. (11) Joseph's Dreams. (12) Absalom caught by his Hair. (13) Jonah swallowed by the Great Fish. (14) The Wolf lying down with the Kid. (15) Jeremiah's Prophetic Commission. (16) The Ascension of Elijah. (17) Daniel in the Lions' Den. (18) The Annunciation. (19) Zacchaeus in the Sycamore Tree. (20) The Transfiguration. (21) St. John reclining on Christ's Breast. This cycle is remarkable as including several subjects seldom or never occurring in existing remains. Subjects (1), (4), (13), (16), and (17) are among the most frequent, but all the rest are found most rarely, while of the majority it would be difficult to name an example.

The most detailed accounts of the decoration of a church with Scriptural paintings are those given by Paulinus of Nola in the early years of the 5th century, when describing the basilica erected by him in honour of St. Felix (Poem. xxvii.). We here find the first direct enunciation of the principle set forth by Joannes Damascenus (Orat. I. de Imagin. vol. i. p. 314), and constantly repeated since, that "pictures are the books of the unlearned." The festival of St. Felix, which occurred in the winter, gathered together an immense concourse of country folk, who thought to do honour to the tomb of the saint by passing the night in feasting, too usually resulting in a gross debauch:

Perfusis halante mero gaudere sepulchris."
(ib. v. 565.)

In the hope of beguiling the gross minds of these illiterate peasants from the sensual delights which were their chief attractions, and awakening purer thoughts and holier aspirations by the examples of the holy personages there depicted, and at the same time with the view of imparting to them some knowledge of the chief facts of sacred history, and at any rate of leaving them less leisure for their coarser pleasures, Paulinus adopted the somewhat unusual expedient (rare more) of embellishing the portico of the new basilica with a series of Scriptural paintings. They occupied either the ceiling or the upper portion of the wall, only to be seen with up-turned face and head thrown back (ib. vv. 511-513). The series embraced subjects from the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Ruth. Those particularised by Paulinus (ib. vv. 515-535, 607-635) are the Creation of Man, Abraham's Departure from Ur, the Angels received by Lot, Lot's Wife, the Sacrifice of Isaac, Isaac opening the Wells, Jacob's Dream, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, the Crossing of Jordan, Naomi and her Daughters-in-law, and the Passage of the Red Sea. The titles of the various pictures were written over them:

Quod manus exp. luit."—(ib. 534.)

The description of the last two subjects indicates, as Dean Milman remarks (Hist. of Christianity, vol. iii. p. 399 note), if it was drawn from the picture itself, considerable talent on the painter's part for composition and landscape as well as for the drawing of figures. Not content with these pictorial embellishments of his new basilica, Paulinus decorated the old basilica of St. Felix in a similar manner, selecting subjects from the

New Testament, that thus "that which was new might be an ornament to the old, and the old to the new." These occupied a lower position, and could be viewed "lumine recto" (Poem. xxviii. vv. 167-179). Three narrow chapels (cellae) opening out of the atrium, exhibited examples of male and female virtue. One was painted with the history of Job and Tobit; another with those of Esther and Judith. That in the centre commemorated martyrs of both sexes (ib. vv. 15-27). The paintings in the apse of the basilica at Fondi are also described by Paulinus in a letter to his friend Severus (Ep. xxxii. 17). The subjects were of the same nature as many still extant in the apses of basilicas; a crowned cross standing in the flowery meads of Paradise, and the Holy Lamb anointed by the Dove and crowned by the Father, with the sheep and goats on either hand. These may have been worked in mosaic.

There is abundant evidence that the walls of civil and domestic buildings were also decorated with paintings, sometimes secular, sometimes religious. Those of the palace of Queen Theodelinda at Monza have been already referred to. Sidonius Apollinaris describes the villa of his friend Pontius Leontius at Bourg, at the confluence of the Dordogne and Garonne, as profusely ornamented with wall-paintings, one series representing the Mithridatic campaign of Lucullus, another the early history of the Jewish nation, "recutitorum primordia Judaeorum." Sidonius expresses his astonishment at the lustre and durability of the colours (Sid. Apoll. Carm. xxii.). We learn from Ernandus Nigellus (lib. iv.) that the whole Scripture history was painted on the walls of Charlemagne's palace at Ingelheim. It is needless to say all these have perished.

FRIDAY, GOOD. [GOOD FRIDAY.]

FRIULI, COUNCIL OF (Forojulianse concilium), held at Friuli, A.D. 796, not 791, as Pagi shews (Mansi xiii. 854) under Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia, whose letter to Charlemagne, formerly misconnected with the synod of Altino, A.D. 802 (ibid. p. 827), assigns three causes for its meeting: (1) the orthodox faith; (2) ecclesiastical discipline, and (3) recent outrages, probably by the Huns. The first of these is explained in his speech, which is an elaborate apology for the reception into the Western creed of the "Filioque," which Charlemagne had attacked, and the pope vindicated, the 2nd Nicene council two years before for not having in theirs: Paulinus himself endeavouring to prove both right. The resemblance between parts of this speech and the Athanasian creed has been remarked and is very close. Besides which it is observable that all priests are required to commit to memory the entire exposition of "the Catholic faith," with which he concludes: while, for everybody else, the learning by heart of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer is prescribed. Of the canons, the 1st threatens simony; the 2nd drunkenness; the 4th and 5th deprecate secular employments and amusements for the clergy. By the 10th divorced couples are forbidden to remarry till one of the two dies; and by the 13th all are inhibited from working on Sundays and holidays (Mansi xiii. 830 and seq.).

[E. S. Ff.]

FRUITS, OFFERING AND BENEDICTION OF. I. The Eastern Rite.—In the so-called Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 29) the duty is inculcated of giving to the priests the first-fruits of the press and of the floor, of honey, grapes, shell-fruits, &c., and the firstlings of the flock and herd, that the stores of the giver and the produce of his land may be blessed (εὐλογηθῶσιν). As this precept or exhortation comes in the midst of others relating to the Holy Communion, we might, perhaps, infer from it alone that in the East those things were offered and blessed during the celebration of that sacrament.

They were at least brought to the altar, and at that time; for the third (or, as in some editions, the second) apostolical canon forbids anything but ears of new corn and grapes in their seasons, oil for the lamps, and frankincense, to be "brought to the altar at the time of the holy sacrifice." At a later period they certainly were blessed during the liturgy; for the council in Trullo (A.D. 691) found that in some churches the grapes brought to the altar were "joined to the unbloody sacrifice of the oblation, and both distributed together to the people;" whereupon it decreed that "the priests should bless the grape separately" (Can. xxviii.). In book viii. c. xl. of the Constitutions is a thanksgiving for first-fruits offered. In the book it follows the "morning laying on of hands;" but as it comes after the dismissal, it is clearly independent of that. It might, for aught that appears, be used, when occasion required, at the celebration or any other service. It begins thus, "We give Thee thanks, O Lord Almighty, Creator and Provider of all things, through Thine only begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord, not as we ought, but as we can, for the first-fruits offered unto Thee." The whole form, which is rather long, is a thanksgiving in this strain. Later forms, though apparently of very great antiquity, are conceived in a different spirit, and appropriately entitled, "Prayers on behalf of those who offer first-fruits" (Euchologion, pp. 655, 656, ed. Goar). They are, with one exception, rather petitions for a benefit, than ascriptions of praise. They are used at the benediction of "grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, apples, peaches, plums." Grapes, if ripe, were blessed in the Greek church on the 6th of August (Euchologion, p. 695).

II. The Western Rite.—One proof of the great antiquity of the benediction of grapes is that it took place in the West (as a rule) on the 6th of August, as well as among the Greeks (Sacram. Gregor. in Lit. Rom. Vet.; Muratori, tom. ii. col. 109). The earliest extant forms are in the Gelasian sacramentary, the substance of which is at least as old as the fifth century. There, among the Orationes et Preces for Ascension Day, we find this rubric and prayer: "Then a little before the end of the canon thou shalt bless the new fruits (fruges novas). The Benediction follows: Bless, O Lord, these new fruits of the bean, which Thou, O Lord, hast vouchsafed to ripen, &c., in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom Thou, O Lord, dost always create all these good things, &c. Finish the Canon" (Muratori, tom. i. col. 588). Elsewhere, in the same sacramentary, the prayer occurs again slightly altered, and with the alternatives, "grape or bean" (Ibid. col. 746). It is here followed by another benediction of first-fruits of any kind (primitias creaturæ Tuæ), and by a "Benediction of Apples." From some MSS. of the later Gregorian sacramentary, we learn that apples were blessed on the viii. Kal. Aug., i.e., on St. James' Day (Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. l. iv. c. xxxiii. § xi.). The prayer from which we have quoted above is preserved in the last-named sacramentary as a Benedictio Uvæ (Muratori, tom. ii. col. 109). The oldest MS. of the Gelasian does not reach beyond the eighth century, nor that of the Gregorian beyond the ninth; but we have proof that the custom was known in the West before the eighth century, and therefore that the recognition of it in the Roman sacramentaries was not an interpolation of that period. The prayer above cited from the Gelasian occurs with the title, Benedictio omni (sic) creaturæ (sic) Pomorum, in the manuscript Gallican sacramentary, written in the seventh century, if not earlier, found by Mabillon in the monastery at Bobio, in Italy, and probably carried thither from Luxeuil by its founder, St. Columbanus, A.D. 613, or by one of his followers (see the Musacum Italicum, tom. i. p. 390; or Muratori, u. s. tom. ii. col. 959). In the Lectiōnary of Luxeuil, another happy discovery of Mabillon, we find the Eucharistic lessons Ad Missam de novis Fructus (sic). The prophecy is taken from Joel ii. 21–27; the epistle from 1 Cor. ix. 7–15; and the gospel from St. John, vi. 49–52 (De Liturgiâ Gallicanâ, p. 161). From this coming after the Legenda of the Passion of St. John the Baptist, Sept. 24 (Liturg. Gall. p. 458), and from the internal evidence of the lessons, we infer that it is the benediction of the new corn for which provision is here made. The rite was probably carried by our countryman Boniface (Winfred), A.D. 723, with the common Roman offices, to his converts in Germany; for we find the Gelasian benedictions of fruit, &c., with certain others, among the Monumenta Veteris Liturgiæ Alemannicæ, published by Gerbert (Part I. p. 307). A very brief example peculiar to this collection may be given:—"Bless, O Lord, this fruit of new trees, that they who use thereof may be sanctified; through, &c." It is interesting to add that similar benedictions were practised in our own country. In the pontifical of Egbert, who became archbishop of York in 732, are the six following formularies:—(i.) Benedictio ad omnia que volueris; (ii.) Benedictio ad Fruges novas; (iii.) Benedictio Pomorum; (iv.) Alia; (v.) Benedictio Paris novi; (vi.) Alia. There is, of course, no mention of grapes, nor is the Gelasian prayer that we have cited given with any other application. Of the above, ii. and v. are not in the Roman sacramentaries. The last runs thus: "Bless, O Lord, this creature of bread, as Thou didst bless the five loaves in the wilderness, that all who taste thereof may receive health both of body and of soul; through, &c." (Pontificale Ecgberti, p. 115; ed. Surtees Society, 1854).

It will be perceived that in the West, as well as East, the offering of first-fruits as a token of gratitude to the Giver of All soon degenerated into a mode of asking for a blessing on the consumption of His gifts. It should be understood, also, that both in the East and West the first-fruits brought to be blessed were left for the use of the priests. "It is becoming and expedient," says Origen, A.D. 230, "that the first-fruits be offered also to the priests of the Gospel." "For if one believed that the fruits of the earth were given to him by God, he would surely know how to honour God from His gifts and benefits by giving thereof to the priests" (Hom. xi. in Num. § 2, tom. x. pp. 105, 106; ed. Lommatsch.). Similarly St. Jerome, commenting on Ezekiel xlv. 30: "The first-fruits of our foods are offered to the priests; that we may taste nothing of the new fruits, before the priest has tasted them. For we do this, that the priest may lay up a blessing and our offering in his house; or that the Lord may bless our houses at his prayer."

We have already quoted a rubric from the Gelasian sacramentary, which orders that the benediction of fruits shall take place "a little before the end of the canon." The prayer was inserted immediately after the words, "not weighing our merits, but pardoning our offences" (now in our first Post-Communion Collect), and immediately before the concluding clause, "through Jesus Christ our Lord." This clause (altered in this manner, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ") was thus made to close the benediction. After it the priest added, "Per quem haec omnia, Domine, semper bona creas, sanctificas, vivificas, benedicis et praestas nobis, Per ipsum," &c. These words are now a permanent part of the canon; but they do not seem to belong to it. The words, "haec omnia" cannot with any propriety be applied to the eucharistic elements alone. Hence some ritualists, as e. g. Grancolas (Anciennes Liturgies, p. 657), and De Vert (Explic. des Cérémon. tom. iv. Remarque xxx.), &c., suppose that this doxology was at first only used when other things were offered to be blessed, and formed no part of the service of the mass. Le Brun (Explication, p. iv. art. xvi.), Bona (Rer. Lit. l. 2, c. xiv. § v.), D'Achery (Spicil. tom. iv. Praef.), and others, maintain that it was a constant part of the liturgy, but that when there was a benediction of fruits, it applied to them as well as to the elements. [W. E. S.]

FRONTAL (Frontalis or Frontale) is defined by Lindwood to be "apparatus pendens in fronte altaris, qui alias dicitur Palla." [ALTAR-CLOTHS; ANTEPENDIUM.] The word is not uncommon in ancient documents. Thus, for instance, a charter of Chindasuintha, king of the Goths, of the year 645 A.D. (quoted by Ducange, s. v.) runs: "offerimus . . . vestimenta altaris omnia ad plenum, sive frontalia, sive principalia . . ." A later charter, quoted by the same authority, speaks of "quatuor frontales de serico." [C.]

FUGITIVES (from a monastery). Monastic codes shew that their framers had to guard on the one hand against a leniency which might encourage desertion on the part of monks tired of their seclusion and eager for the world, and on the other against a severity which might close the door too fast against deserters wishing to be readmitted. The rule of Benedict, as always, is very lenient on this point. A monk who escapes from a monastery, like one who is expelled, is to be received again if he vows amendment, even after three desertions (Reg. Ben. c. 29, cf. Reg. Cuj. ad Virg. c. 21), but only into the lowest grade (Reg. Ben. ib. cf. Reg. Pachom. c. 79, Reg. Fruct. c. 20, Reg. Cuj. ib.). Some commentators, indeed, take this rule as implying, that the abbat may readmit even after a fourth desertion, though the culprit has no right to require it (Martene, Reg. Comment. in loc.). But later commentators (e. g. Menard, Haeften) interpret it more strictly (Martene, Reg. Comm. ib.). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, censures abbats lenient to fugitive monks, or who receive monks from other monasteries (Conc. Aurel. i. c. 19). The second council of Tours, A.D. 567, allows fugitives to be re-admitted on doing penance.

In the same spirit of wise tolerance Benedict is silent as to the steps to be taken to bring back the fugitive, apparently judging it best to leave him alone, if without any desire to return (Mart. Reg. Comm. ib.). But Ferreolus prescribes that the fugitive is to be recalled (Reg. Ferr. c. 20), and Fructuosus forbids him to be admitted into another monastery; and orders him to be brought back, by force if necessary, as a criminal, with hands tied behind his back (Reg. Fruct. c. 20). It was enacted by Justinian that a monk returning to the secular life should be degraded by the bishop and governor of the province from his civil position, and be sent back with his worldly goods to his monastery; if he deserted again, he was to be drafted into the army (Novell. 123). A similar decree was passed by the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646 (Conc. Tolet. c. 5). The second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, sentenced an abbat who should be remiss in seeking to bring back the stray sheep into the monastic fold to deprivation.

Later enactments are very severe against fugitives. The Cistercian rule forbids the reception even into the lowest rank of a monk who has deserted twice, or has stayed away more than eleven days. The renegade is in any case to wear a distinctive dress, as badge of his disgrace, and to be excluded from the choir; the abbat who fails to enforce this rule is to do penance. The original statutes of the Carthusians unfrock the renegade; the modern compel him to resume the dress of his order. The Augustinian rule tempers severity with mercy. The renegade is to live outside the monastery itself, but under the care of the bishop, and the abbat is to shew kindness to him, if penitent (Mart. Reg. Comm. in loc. cit.). [I. G. S.]

FUNERAL. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; OBSEQUIES.]

FUNERAL-FEAST. [CATACOMBS, p. 312; CELLA MEMORIAE.]

FUNERAL-SERMONS (Epitaphia, λόγοι ἐπιτάφιοι). Christians followed the old custom of many of the heathen nations, of holding an oration over the remains of famous men departed [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, p. 253]. To say nothing of the discourses—triumphal rather than sorrowing—delivered over the remains of martyrs, Gregory of Nyssa held funeral orations on the death of the empresses Pulcheria and Placilla, and of bishop Meletius. On the death of Constantine the Great, several bishops celebrated his praises, conspicuous among whom was Eusebius of Caesarea. Gregory of Nazianzus exercised his pathetic eloquence over the bier of his brother Caesarius, of his father and his sister, and over that of Basil the Great; Ambrose preached on the death of his brother Satyrus, of Valentinian, and of Theodosius.^a The tone of these orations is, for the most, eulogistic of the "famous men" through whom "the Lord hath wrought great glory" (Ecclus. xlv. 1, 2).

Jerome (Epist. ad Heliod. c. 1) says that the old custom was for sons to speak the funeral orations over parents. He alludes here probably to a pagan custom, of which there are many examples (Kirchmann, De Fun. Rom. lib. ii. c. 18); but Christianity also (as we have seen) furnishes examples of a similar practice. Nor were the clergy the only orators in such cases; Constantine himself did not disdain to pronounce a funeral oration on one of his court, in which, says Eusebius (Vita Const. iv. 55) he spoke of the immortality of the soul, of the blessings of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked.

Funeral sermons were not always delivered at the time of the burial, though some—as several of Gregory Nazianzen's—contain indications that they were so delivered. Eusebius (Vita Const. iv. 71) gives us to understand that the funeral orations over Constantine were delivered while the remains of the departed lay in state on a lofty bier [FERETRUM]. Ambrose evidently delivered his sermon over Satyrus (see § 78) while the body was yet waiting to be carried to the grave. His oration on Valentinian, on the contrary, was delivered two months (see Opera, ii. 1170, ed. Bened.), that on Theodosius forty days, after the death of the person commemorated. The death of bishop Meletius was the occasion of sermons everywhere (Theodoret, H.E. v. 8); that of Gregory of Nyssa was probably delivered on the day when the remains of Meletius, brought from Constantinople, were received at Antioch. That of Chrysostom on the same bishop, was delivered on the fifth anniversary of his death. The oration of Gregory Nazianzen on Basil was delivered over his tomb on the first anniversary of his death, in the presence (it is said) of 150 bishops.

When the sermon took place at the time of a commemorative service for the dead, it probably took place at the point in the liturgy where the sermon was ordinarily introduced. The Pseudo-Dionysius (Hierarch. Eccl. c. 7) speaks of the funeral-sermon being delivered after the catechumens had departed, but while the penitents remained. The eulogy of Hilary of Arles on Honoratus (quoted by Binterim, v. ii. 442), which proves incidentally that the corpse was carried uncovered, and that the people pressed round to kiss the face, or the coffin of the illustrious dead—was probably delivered at the end of some office. The orations over the remains of Constantine were clearly delivered after the funeral service (Euseb. u.s. iv. 71; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. iii. 435, ff.). [C.]

FURNACE. In Bottari (clxxxvi. 6) the three Hebrew brethren are represented standing in something like a kiln or smelting furnace (see woodcut); also cxcv. and perhaps cxliii. lxi.; also in Parker's photographs from the catacomb of St. Marcellinus. The furnace is literally insisted on, in a way which, as it appears to the author, may possibly have been adopted from one of the ustrina (or ae) used for cremation in Rome. One of these, or its remains or traces, the author believes he saw in Pompeii, Christmas 1859. See Murray's Handbook for South Italy, p. 327.

GABALUM, COUNCIL OF (Gabilitanum concilium), at which the wife of the count of Auvergne was condemned for adultery, says Sir H. Nicolas (Chron. p. 222), A.D. 590. Gabalum, where it was held, was not far from Mende, on the river Lot (Gall. Christ. i. 83). [E. S. Ff.]

GABATHA or GABATA. A name of penile lamps suspended in churches. The word is of uncertain orthography and etymology. We find the forms Grabata, Gavata, and Cavata, which last points to the derivation given by Isidore Hispalensis (Etymol. lib. xx. c. 4) from cavus "hollow." The original meaning of the word is "a dish" or "bowl;" in which sense it is used by Martial (Epigr. vii. 47; xi. 32), and of which the Glossary of Ducange furnishes abundant examples. From its shape it came to be employed for a lamp, which is its most usual ecclesiastical signification. The annexed woodcut from Macri shows one of two bowl-shaped gabbathae preserved in the pontifical chapel of the Lateran, in which in his time a wax light was always burning before the sacrament. Gabbathae frequently occur in the catalogues of papal gifts to the churches of Rome contained in Anastasius. Thus Leo III. (A.D. 795-816) gave to the basilica of St. Peter's 15 gabbathae of purest gold set with gems, to hang on the screen (pergula) before the altar (§ 382), and 6 of silver with an appended cross to hang before the Arch of Triumph, 3 on each side (§ 389). These gabbathae were of different metals, gold, silver, brass, and electrum. They were frequently embossed (anaglypha § 392, &c.), or decorated in bas-relief (interrasilis), and ornamented with lilies (liliatae) heads of gryphons (§ 366) or lions (as in the woodcut), or even fashioned in the form of that animal "in modum leonis." Like the coronae used for lighting, they very often had crosses attached to them (signochristae, § 418, &c.). The epithet filopares is frequently applied to gabbathae in Anastasius, and would seem, from a comparison with the expression pari filo (Lucr. ii. 341), to signify of equal size or thickness. The epithet saxicae or saxiscae is interpreted by Ducange to mean of Saxon workmanship; but this interpretation is precarious. [E. V.]

GALILAEI. [FAITHFUL.]

GALILEE. [NARTHEX.]

GALNABIS (also Galnape, Galnapes [Isid. Hispal. Etym. xix. 25], Gawnape). This is a kind of rough blanket or rug, forming part of the furniture of a monk's couch, which according to the Rule of St. Isidore is to include "storea et stragulum, pellesque lanatae duae, galnabis quoque et facistergium, geminusque ad caput pulvillus" (Regula S. Isidori, c. 14; in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, part 2, p. 127, ed. Paris, 1663). Similarly the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Bracara in Spain, speaks of "calnabes yillatus" (c. 4; op. cit. part 2, p. 139). The galnabis was apparently used sometimes as an article of personal dress, for in the testament of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, we read "simul cum casula villosa et tunica vel galnape, quod melius dimiserō" (Patrol. lxxvii. 1140).

The etymology of the word is doubtful: we may perhaps connect it with the word gawnacum, used by Varro, and possibly also with the Greek γαννάκης, καννάκης, which is defined by Hesychius (under the latter spelling) στρώματα, ἡ ἐπιβόλαια ἑτερομαλλῇ. Another derivation has been suggested, connecting the word with galbanum, and making it descriptive of the colour, but this is very improbable. For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium s. v. [R. S.]

GALLERIES. The only galleries known in early ecclesiastical architecture were constructional integral parts of the building, not additions to it. In this they corresponded to the triforia of mediaeval churches, which in their original idea were galleries for the reception of worshippers or auditors, for which purpose they are still used in Germany, and where they exist in Italy (e.g. St. Ambrogio at Milan), and to some extent in England. The first Christian churches in the West were either basilicas, or buildings erected on the basilican plan, and they naturally retained the upper gallery, running entirely round the building above the principal colonnade, for the accommodation of spectators, men on one side and women on the other, which we know to have formed an essential portion of the basilican arrangement (Vitruv. v. 1). Like them the church galleries were reached by an outside staircase, and were protected towards the nave by a low wall or balustrade (pluteus). The only Roman basilican churches that exhibit this arrangement are those of St. Agnes (fig. 1), St. Laurence, in its more ancient portion, and the church of the Quattro Santi Coronati, on the Coelian. A similar upper gallery occurs also in the Lateran baptistery of Constantine. The passion for mosaic pictures of sacred subjects led to the abolition of this gallery in the basilican churches, the space it should have occupied being devoted to pictorial representations, as at St. Maria Maggiore, St. Paul's, and the old St. Peter's, at Rome (see illustrations on pages 370, 371), and S. Apollinare in Classe, and St. Apollinare Nuovo, at Ravenna. But it reappeared in the early Lombard churches, as at S. Ambrogio at Milan, and S. Michele at Pavia (fig. 2), where there are well developed triflorial galleries. But the arrangement never took root in Italy, and was soon lost.

In the East, when the "dromic" or basilican form was adopted, it carried with it the upper gallery above the side aisles. Of this we have an example in the church of St. John at Constantinople (A.D. 463), illustrated in Salzenburg's work. The domical church of the lesser Santa Sophia, (or SS. Sergius and Basilius,) erected by Justinian (fig. 3), also exhibits a gallery or upper story running all round it. In the churches, in what is commonly known as the Byzantine style, of which St. Sophia is the most magnificent example, the side gallery played a very important part. There is a good example in the church of St. Vitale, at Ravenna (see woodcut, p. 376).

Its usual designation was gynaecoonitis, from being the place where the women were accommodated. It was also called the catechumenium, because the women assembled there to listen to instruction (Leo. Novell. 73, apud Ducange Constantinopol. Christ.), or simply "the upper chambers," ὑπερῶνα (Paul. Silent. i. 256). These galleries ran along the side of the trapeza or nave, sometimes quite up to the sanctuary or bema. The Pseudo-Amphilochius records that St. Basil, having detected a woman making signs to the deacon attending upon him at the altar, gave orders that curtains should be hung over the gallery to prevent such indecorum.

The women's galleries at St. Sophia are of vast size (fig. 4), ranged to the north and south pillars. The galleries are vaulted and paved with marble, and protected towards the church by a low marble wall, four feet high, shaped like a desk, on which, according to Paul the Silentiary, the women reposed their arms.

of the cupola. On the same level as the women's galleries, further east, were two large vaulted apartments to the right and left of the bema, in one of which the empress had her position with became disused, the narthex serving its purpose. (Ducange, Constantinopol. Christ. lib. iii. c. 38-40; Willis, Arch. of the Middle Ages, p. 109, sqq.; Neale, Eastern Church, art. i.; Evag. Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. c. 31; Paul. Silentiar. i. 256-263; ii. 125.) [E. V.]

GALLICAN COUNCILS; councils known to have been celebrated in France, but at some place unknown.

1. A.D. 355. At Poitiers or Toulouse possibly: where St. Hilary, writing to the Easterns A.D. 360, says he five years before then with the bishops of France withdrew from the communion of the Arian bishops Ursacius and Valens, and of Saturninus of Arles, who had espoused their cause. The opening chapters of his work addressed to Constantius are thought, in short, to have emanated from this council (Mansi, iii. 251).

2. A.D. 376. At least there seems a reference to one such in a law of that year, dated Treves, in B. xvi. tit. ii. § 23, of the Theodosian code; but it is not known where or for what object (Mansi, iii. 499).

3. A.D. 444, in which Hilary of Arles presided, and Chelidonius of Besançon, where this council may have met therefore, was accused of being husband of a widow and deposed. On appealing however to St. Leo he was restored; as having been condemned on a false charge. Both their letter to him and his answer are preserved among his epistles (Ep. xcix. and cii.; comp. Mansi, vii. 873).

4. A.D. 678, at some place unknown: when St. Leodegar or Leger bishop of Autun was degraded as having been accessory to the death of king Childeric II. five years before (Sirmond, Conc. Gall. i. 510; comp. Mansi, xi. 173 and 1095).

5. A.D. 678 or 679, against the Monothelites: as appears from the reference made to it by the Gallican bishops subscribing to the Roman synod under pope Agatho, preserved in the 4th act of the 6th council (Mansi, xi. 175 and 306), but they do not say where.

6. A.D. 796, at Tours possibly, where Joseph, bishop of Mans and a suffragan of Tours, was deposed for cruelty (Mansi, xiii. 991).

7. Three more councils may be grouped under this head, usually called councils of Auvergne, but this name is misleading, as it means the town formerly so called, not the province. When, however, the town changed its name to Clermont, councils held there subsequently were styled by its new name, while the earlier retained its old. We may save confusion, therefore, by classing them under Gallican. Of these the first met 8th November, A.D. 535, in the second year of king Theodebert, and passed sixteen canons, to which fifteen bishops, headed by Honoratus, metropolitan of Bourges, subscribed: his suffragan of Auvergne subscribing second. Their canons deprecate lay influences in the appointment of bishops, and lay interference between bishops and clergy. No furniture belonging to the church may be used for private funerals or marriages. The appointment of Jews as judges, and marriages between Jews and Christians are denounced. Presbyters and deacons marrying are to be deposed. In a collective note to king Theodebert, the bishops entreat that neither the clergy, nor others, living in his dominions may be robbed of their rightful possessions, and in their fifth canon they declare all spoiliations of church property null and void, and the spoilers excommunicate, wherever it occurs. Several other canons are given to this council by Burchard (Mansi, viii. 859-67).

The second, A.D. 549, was attended by ten bishops, but only to receive the canons passed at the 5th council of Orleans (Mansi, ix. 141-4).

The third, A.D. 588, was occupied solely with a dispute between the bishops of Rodes and Cahors (Mansi, ix. 973). [E. S. Ff.]

GALLICIA COUNCIL OF, held A.D. 447 or 448, in the province of that name in Spain on the north-west against the Priscillianists: in consequence perhaps of the letter of St. Leo to Turribius, bishop of Asturia, who had appealed to him for advice (Ep. xv.; comp. Mansi, vi. 491); but is that letter genuine? [E. S. Ff.]

GAMALIEL, invention of his relics at Jerusalem, Aug. 3 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GAMING. [DICE.]

GAMING-TABLE (Tabula lusoria, πλινθίον). Besides the natural feeling which led the survivors to place in the tombs articles dear to the deceased in his lifetime, the comparison of the life of man to a game of chance was a familiar thought to the ancients. We may trace it through all their literature, whether Greek or Roman (see Raoul-Rochette, Mém. de l'Académ. des inscript. tom. xiii. p. 634). Hence astragali and dice occur more frequently in the Greek and Roman tombs of the Campagna than playthings of any other description, though the amusements of every age and condition are there represented. The dice (tali, tesserae), are usually made of ivory, occasionally of bone; the dice-box (fritillus, turricula) is generally of ivory, and the gaming-table marble.

Five of these gaming-tables have come down to our times with inscriptions which leave no doubt of their use. It is a curious circumstance that in several Christian cemeteries in Rome sepulchral niches have been found closed with these marble gaming-tables, as occasionally with other incised marbles. One of the tables taken from the cemetery of Basilla may be seen in the Kircher museum, and was first described by Lupi (Dissert. in nuper invent. Sævæ epitaph. p. 57, tab. ix. n. 6). An engraving of it is given above.

The inscription, which was turned inside the tomb, is easily read: VICTVS LEBATE || LVDERE NESCIIS || DA LVSORI LOCV ||.

Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 449) gives a second from the cemetery of St. Agnes bearing the following inscription: DOMINE FRATER || ILARIS SEMPER || LVDERE TABVLA ||—; also a dice-box found elsewhere, used for the same game. The interior of the box is here shewn, divided into three sections as a security against fraud in throwing; two dice are lying at the bottom.

A third table of the same kind from the Capponi museum is reproduced in Muratori's collection (I. DCLXI. 3), and bears an inscription almost identical with the foregoing: SEMPER IN HANC || TABVLA HILARE || LVDAVVS AMICI ||. The fourth table, from the cemetery of Calixtus, is given by Marangoni (Acta S. Victorini in append. p. 140). The words of the inscription, though evidently relating to play, are difficult of interpretation. Of the remaining table the place of discovery is uncertain. Cardinal Passionei (Inscr. Ant. appendix, p. 176) transcribes a gaming-table inscription which Raoul-Rochette quotes as an additional example, but it appears more likely to be that of the Kircher museum incorrectly copied.

These having all been discovered in Christian sepulchres, it seems natural to suppose that they were in use amongst Christians. Nothing in the gaming-tables themselves, nor in their inscriptions militates against such a supposition; and in fact it is well known that the business of making dice, and articles of a similar nature, was one followed by Christians. Boldetti, for instance, gives (p. 416) a Christian sepulchral inscription over an ARTIFEX ARTIS TESSALARIE, who is generally considered to have been a maker of dice. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., s. v. "Jeu, Tables de.") See DICE. [C.]

GAMMADIA (γαμμάδια, or γαμμάτια). A cruciform ornament, embroidered on the borders or woven into the texture of ecclesiastical vestments, both in the West and East. It takes its name from being composed of four capital gammās (Γ) placed back to back, thus forming a voided Greek cross. The gammās were also sometimes placed face to face, so as to constitute a hollow square, in the centre of which a cross was inscribed. Vestments so decorated were known by the name of polystauria (πολυσταύρια). St. Nicholas and St. Basil are depicted in robes (thus semée of crosses) in the illustrations to Ducange (Gloss. Graec. fig. vii.). Balsamon assigns, among other marks of the patriarchal dignity, the "robe distinguished by gammās," δια γαμμάτων στιχάριον (de Patriarch. p. 446). These crosses were peculiar to the white eucharistic vestments, those of a purple colour being destitute of them (Ducange, s. v. πολυσταύριον). In the Western church the word gammadia is of frequent occurrence in the later papal biographies in Anastasius, in the lists of offerings made to the basilicas and churches, e.g., Leo III., among gifts to the church of St. Susanna, gave a triple vestment, "habentem in medio crucem de chrysoclaro, . . . atque gammadias in ipsa veste chrysoclaris quatuor" (§ 366), and Leo IV. to the church of St. Mary at Anagni, "vestem . . . cum gammadiis auro textis" (§ 536). These gammadia were of gold, others were of silver (§ 397), or of Tyrian velvet (§ 462), (cf. Goar, Eucholog. p. 315, col. 2). Not gammās alone but other letters also are frequently seen embroidered on the borders of the robes of the sacred personages represented in early Christian mosaics and frescoes, especially H. I. T. X. The precise meaning of these marks has not been satisfactorily determined (cf. Bosio, Rom. Sott. c. xxxviii. p. 638). [LETTERS ON VESTMENTS.] [E. V.]

GANGRA (COUNCIL OF), for which widely different dates have been assigned; some placing it before that of Nicaea, some not long after; others indefinitely, between it and that of Antioch, A.D. 341 (see the notes of Valesius and Reading on Soc. ii. 43, and Mansi, ii. 1095): all which discrepancies may be traced to the fact that one of the Latin versions of the synodical letter addressed by the assembled bishops to their colleagues in Armenia contains the name of Hosius of Corduba amongst the former. But the episcopate of Hosius, as Cave shews (Hist. Lit. i. v.), extends over a period of seventy years, ending with A.D. 361: accordingly Pagi finds it possible to place this council as late as A.D. 358 and admit Hosius to have been there, on his way back to Spain. And this was unquestionably the year of the council, as we shall see from other considerations, so that the absence of his name in the Greek heading of the letter need not be pressed. His presence was always coveted by the Easterns; but as his name occurs among the last on the list, we may assume that he attended in no other capacity than that of a simple bishop. The object of holding the council is stated in its synodical epistle to have been to condemn the errors of Eustathius—otherwise written Eustasius or Eustachius—and his followers; and him Socrates and Sozomen are doubtless correct in making identical with Eustathius bishop of Sebaste in Armenia Minor—else why should the bishops of either Armenia have been addressed on the subject? The father of bishop Eustathius was Eulalius bishop of Caesarea, or rather Neo-Caesarea, in Pontus, and it was at a council held there under his own father this same year, according to Pagi, that he was first deposed. Sozomen indeed seems to say that he had been already condemned as a presbyter by his father; if so, this would account for the severity of the new sentence passed upon him, particularly had he been propagating his errors as bishop in his father's see. Then, on his resisting this sentence, as there seems fair reason for supposing he would, his father would naturally have recourse to the provincial synod, which we may assume to have met on this occasion at Gangra, as the first bishop on the list is Eusebius, clearly the metropolitan of Caesarea in Cappadocia, whom St. Basil succeeded, and in whose jurisdiction Gangra lay, while the name of Eulalius occurs further on. Dios (probably Dianius, the predecessor of Eusebius, is intended) whom the Libellus synod-

ius asserts to have presided, is not found in either version. Gangra therefore was held to confirm what had passed at Neo-Caesarea respecting Eustathius. The similarity of names seems to have led Sozomen to assert that he was first deposed by Eusebius of Constantinople, who died as far back as A.D. 342: and Socrates, who says in one place (ii. 43) that the synod of Gangra was subsequent to the Constantinopolitan synod of A.D. 360, contradicts himself in the very next chapter by telling us that Meletius succeeded Eustathius at Sebaste, and then either as bishop of Sebaste or Beroea—it does not much matter which—attended the council of Seleucia, which we know met A.D. 359, and in so doing fixes the true date of the synod of Gangra, namely, midway between it and that of Neo-Caesarea the year before. These places were not remote from each other; and it would appear that there had been synods held at Antioch, that, for instance, of A.D. 358 under Eudoxius, and at Melitine in Armenia, unfavourable to Eustathius, whose judgments he had set at nought equally with that of Neo-Caesarea. Hence the greater solemnity with which that of Gangra was convened, far enhanced however by the weight which has attached to it ever since; Pope Symmachus in a Roman synod A.D. 504 going so far as to say that its canons had been framed by apostolic authority, meaning that of his see—in other words, that his predecessors had received and approved them (Pagi ad Baron. A.D. 319, n. v.). Of these there are twenty in number, and almost all in condemnation of the errors ascribed to Eustathius and his followers in the synodical letter before mentioned, “forbidding to marry, commanding to abstain from meats,” and so forth. Their reception by Rome lends additional interest to canon 4, which says: “Should any separate himself from a presbyter that has married—as though it were not right to partake of the oblation when he is celebrant—let him be anathema.” And the epilogue, reckoned in some collections as a 21st canon, is worth transcribing, not only for “the admirable temper and good sense” which distinguishes it, as Mr. Johnson remarks (Vade Mecum, ii. 86), but because it may well be thought to account for their having been incorporated into the code of the universal church. The rulings of fifteen, or, if Hosius was there, sixteen bishops only, must have owed their place there to some great intrinsic excellence. “We commit these canons to writing,” so they terminate, “not as if we would cut off those who exercise themselves in works of severity and mortification in the church of God according to the Scriptures: but those, who under pretence of such exercise, do insult those who live in a more plain and simple manner, and would bring in innovations contrary to the Scriptures and the canons of the church. We therefore admire virginity, if attended with humility and a regard for continence, if accompanied with true piety and gravity, and a retreat from worldly business, with a modest humble temper. But at the same time we honour honest marriage, nor do we despise riches when employed in good works and in doing justice. We commend a plain and coarse habit, without art or gaudiness, and have an aversion to all luxurious ostentation of apparel. We honour the houses of God, and affectionately embrace the assemblies made therein as holy and beneficial; not as if we confined religion within those houses, but as having a respect to every place that is built to the name of the Lord, and approve of the church assemblies as being for the public good; and pronounce a benediction upon signal acts of charity done to our brethren, as being done to the poor of the church according to tradition; and to say all in a word, we cannot but wish that all things may be done in the church according to the traditions of Holy Scripture and the apostles.” [E. S. Ff.]

GARDEN OF EDEN. Represented by trees in various bas-reliefs of the Fall of Man, as on the tomb of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tav. xv. &c. &c.). A most ancient MS. picture of the Garden of Eden occurs in the Vienna MS. of the Book of Genesis which is given by D'Agincourt. Professor Westwood has shown the present writer an extraordinary representation of the Fall of Man, from a Greek MS. of the Old Testament now in the Vatican of the 7th or 8th century, where the garden is much dwelt on. There is a quadruped serpent or dragon looking up at the tree of knowledge. These pictures were brought to this country in facsimile by bishop Forbes. [R. St. J. T.]

GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE. During the first four centuries and a half at least the subject of our Lord's passion seems to have been approached, but not entered upon—as by representations of the betrayal, the scene before Pilate, &c. In No. 90 of Professor Westwood's ivory carvings, he is brought before Pilate and Herod together, or perhaps Annas and Caiaphas. This is a part of the great casket of the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia, and is referred to the 5th or 6th century, to the period immediately preceding that of the Rabula MS. when the crucifixion began to be represented (see CRUCIFIX). The Garden of Gethsemane is one of the earliest of these approaches to actual delineation of our Lord's sufferings. The MS. Gospel of St. Augustine, very possibly made use of by the bishop himself, contains a most interesting picture of the betrayal in the garden, which is represented not only by trees, but by a curious serpentine representation of the brook Kedron, bursting out of a rock like the Barada at Ain Fifi, or the Jordan at Tell-el-Khady. This subject is carved on the casket of the Brescian library (Westwood, ivory casts, No. 90), dating from the 5th or 6th century.

Indications of a garden occur in various Greek representations of the crucifixion combined with the resurrection. See crucifixion in the Rabula MS. in Assemani, Bibli. Laurent. Catalogus, where olive-trees are certainly intended.

In later MSS. it occurs in the Bible of Alcuin, and in a MS. given by count Bastard, which belonged to Drogon, grandson of Charlemagne. [R. St. J. T.]

GATES OF CHURCHES. Our Lord's designation of Himself as “the Door” of His church (John x. 7, 9) impressed a deep religious signification in the minds of the early Christians on the entrances to their sacred buildings, which they evidenced by the care displayed in their construction and the richness of their ornamentation. As a rule the actual gates (valvae) of churches were of wood of the most excellent and durable kind. The doors of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome were, until its destruction by fire in 1823, of wood, roughly chiselled, and were reported to have been brought from Constantinople. The doors of the church of St. Sabina on the Aventine are of cypress wood, carved in relief with subjects from the Old and New Testaments. They are of great antiquity, though Mamachi, the annalist of the Dominican order, gives them too early a date in placing them before the 7th century. The church of the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai retains the ancient richly-carved doors of cypress wood erected by the emperor Justinian, stated by Mr. Curzon to be as perfect as when first set up (Neale, Hist. of East. Ch. Introd. p. 258). Doors of wood were very commonly overlaid with plates of the precious metals and inlaid with ivory (Hieron. Ep. ad Demetr. viii.), for the purpose of decoration. These plates were frequently richly sculptured with scriptural subjects in relief. Thus Paulinus of Nola speaks of "aurea limina" (Poem. xiv. 98), and commends the piety of those who covered the doors of the church of St. Felix with metal plates—(Poem. xviii. 34).

"Sanctaque praeifixis obducant limina lamnis."

The papal memoirs of Anastasius supply repeated references to this mode of ornamentation. [DOORS, § 3, p. 574.] The "portae argenteae" of St. Peter's are often mentioned. These were overlaid by pope Hadrian (A.D. 772-795) with silver-gilt plates embossed with the effigy of our Lord and others (Anastas. § 332). Pope Hilary (A.D. 461-467) erected silver gates at the Confessio of the basilica of Holy Cross, and gates of bronze inlaid with silver at the oratory of St. John Lateran (Ib. § 69). This last is an early example of those doors of bronze of which we have in later times so many magnificent examples, bearing representations of Biblical events in high relief, which reached their artistic climax in the western doors of the cathedral of Pisa and those of the baptistery, "le porte del Paradiso" at Florence. We have another early example in the gates of the "eso-narthex" of St. Sophia. These are of bronze exquisitely embossed with floriated crosses set in doorcases of marble. The great central doorway has above it an image of Christ in the act of giving benediction to a kneeling emperor with the virgin and St. John the Baptist on either hand. The chief entrance of the cathedral of Novgorod has bronze doors of very early date. They are described by Adelung (die Korsun'schen Thüren zu Novgorod) as 11 feet high by 3 feet broad, divided into 24 compartments containing scriptural reliefs.

Church doors were often furnished with inscriptions either upon or above them. These included texts of Scripture, doxologies, prayers, pious aphorisms, &c. Paulinus of Nola (Ep. xxxii. § 12) gives the following inscription placed by him over the principal entrance of the basilica of St. Felix:—

"Pax tibi sit quicumque Dei penetralia Christi Pectore pacifico candidus ingrederis."

Above the entrance, he informs us, was a crowned cross with these lines:—

"Cerne coronatam Domini super atria Christi Stare crucem duro spondentem celsa labori
Praemia. Tolle crucem qui vis auferre coronam."

The door of the outer basilica, which was entered through a garden or orchard, he also tells us, has these inscriptions on the outer face:—

"Coelestes intrate vias per amoena vireta
Christicolae: ei laetis decet huc ingressus ab hortis Unde sacrum meritis datur exitus in paradisum."

And this on the inner:—

"Quisquis ab aede Dei perfectis ordine votis Egrederis, remea corpore, corde mane."

Church doors were also often inscribed with the names of the builders and the date of the building. [E. V.]

GAZA in PALESTINE (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 541, to which Pelagius the first pope of that name, then a deacon and envoy from Rome, came by order of the Emperor Justinian, with letters ordering the deposition of Paul bishop of Alexandria, which was accordingly carried out (Mansi, ix. 706). [E. S. Ff.]

GAZOPHYLACIUM. The treasury or storehouse attached to a church, for the reception of the offerings of the faithful, made either in bread and wine, or in money, for the service of the altar, the sustentation of the ministers, or distribution among the poor (Possid. Vit. S. Augustin. c. 24). These oblations were deposited in the gazophylacium either after having been offered on the altar, or until enquiry had been made by the deacons whether the offerers were orthodox and persons of good life, that the table of the Lord might not be profaned by the gifts of the unholy (Binus in Can. iv. Apost. Labbe i. 53). By the 93rd canon of the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 399, the reception before enquiry even into "the gazophylacium or sacrarium" (the modern sacristy) was forbidden. Chrysostom (Homil. 22 de Eleemos.) speaks of treasures in the churches, τὰ γαζοφυλάκια τὰ ἐν ταῖς κεϊμένα; Augustine appears to recognize their existence "quid est gazophylacium? Arca Dei ubi colligebantur ea quae ad indigentiam servorum Dei mittebantur" (Homil. in Ps. 63); and Possidius in his life of that father (u. s.) records his having warned his hearers, as Ambrose had also done, of the neglect of the "gazophylacium and secretarium, from which the necessities for the altar are brought into the church." Cyprian refers to the place of offering as corbona (de Op. et Eleemos. c. 5), and Paulinus of Nola, as mensa, which he complains stood too often for sight rather than use, "visui tantum non usui" (Serm. de Gazophyl. Ep. 34). [E. V.]

GELASIUS, martyr at Rome with Aquilinus, Donatus, Geminus, Magnus; commemorated Feb. 4 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GEMELLIONES. Among the vessels to be borne before the pope in the great Easter procession are mentioned (Ordo Rom. I. c. 3) "gemelliones argentei." The purpose of these is uncertain, but it seems probable that (like the "urceola argentea" mentioned elsewhere) they were water-vessels (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. i. 184). [C.]

[W. F. G.]

GEMS were employed in very early times for a great variety of ecclesiastical purposes, some articles being made wholly of stones more or less precious, and others being decorated therewith. Thus CHALICES and other sacred vessels were occasionally made of precious stones, but more frequently ornamented with them; and little crystal FISH, probably used as hospitable emblems, have been found in the catacombs of Rome. The walls, the ALTARS, the ALTAR-CLOTHS, the service-books [LITURGICAL BOOKS], and other furniture of churches were from the fourth century onward often ornamented with gold, silver, and precious stones, as were also CROSSES and the CROWNS and diadems of Christian sovereigns. In the following article, however, account will be taken of such gems only as are engraved, and these were mostly used as ornamental or signet rings, more rarely for other purposes.

The following passage of Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedag. iii. 11, p. 246D) is the locus classicus relating to Christian signet gems:—"A man should not wear the ring on the finger joint, for this is effeminate, but upon the little finger, as low down as possible; for the hand will thus be most free for action, and the seal least likely to slip off, as being guarded by the larger joint. But let our signet devices be a dove or a fish, or a ship coursing against the sky, or a musical lyre, which Polycrates employed, or a ship's anchor, which was the seal of Seleucus, or if it be a fisherman, it will remind us of an apostle and of boys saved from water." Subjects derived from heathen mythology or representations of weapons and drinking vessels he condemns as unfit for Christians. A little before he allows Christians only one ring as a signet, saying that all other rings should be eschewed: a wife also may have a gold signet ring for the safe keeping of her husband's goods.

The number of engraved stones which can be securely referred to the early Christian centuries is not very considerable, but their rarity has perhaps been somewhat exaggerated.*

The principal subjects of extant works of this kind, including all those mentioned by Clement, are as follows; various specimens of each type are described at length, others more briefly.

(i.) Christ as the Good Shepherd.—This type, though not mentioned by Clement, deserves to hold the first place, being so often found in very early Christian works of art of different kinds. Mr. Fortnum, who observes that forgeries of this subject are frequent, describes and figures a red jasper in his own possession (purchased at Rome) in its original octagonal bronze setting: the shepherd is standing on his left leg, the right leg being bent; he supports himself by a staff in his hand, and holds out a branch (perhaps of olive, as a symbol of peace) to two sheep at his feet. Behind him is an olive (?) tree. Christian work of the third or fourth century (Archaeological Journal, xxvi. 141 [1869]; xviii. 275 [1871]). The British Museum has seven intagli in which the Good Shepherd bears a lamb on his shoulders. In one of them (a tiny onyx) he stands between two fish, or rather perhaps between a fish and a palm-branch; in two others (red and brown jaspers) he holds a staff, having a dog at his feet, which looks up at him, a tree being behind; in a fourth (cornelian) are two dogs at his feet, looking up, and an obscure and barbarous legend, which has been read ESIVKEV (Hertz, Cat. n. 2344; King, Ancient Gems, p. 353), "in which the name of Jesus appears to be intended, together with some other appellation or title," perhaps Lord (Κύριε) Jesus (King, Gnostics, p. 142), or Jesus, Son of God (IESSV VE TEV, Greek in Latin letters and barbarised); another of the same type (niccolo) has no legend: the sixth has only the shepherd bearing the lamb, but is inscribed IH. XP. (plasma); in the seventh (red jasper) he is accompanied by sheep and a dove on a tree. One in the Bibliothèque Impériale, in niccolo, set in a silver

Among them are several which may be referred with little or no doubt to a period later than that with which we are concerned; and as nothing is said about the probable antiquity of almost all of them, it has been necessary to employ the work with some caution. Possibly the books referred to under the particular gems may give some information upon this point. In the British Museum are contained upwards of twenty early Christian gems seen by the writer, and there may probably at this time (1874) be more.* In various private collections in this country (as of Messrs. Fortnum, King, and Lewis) are contained a fair number of others. The Bibliothèque Impériale at Paris contained, in 1858, only eight purely Christian engraved stones, excluding Byzantine camel (Chaboullie, Catal. pp. 191, 282, who says that Christian intagli are "d'une grande rareté"). About fifty casts of Christian gems have been received from Signor Saulini, Via Babuino, Rome, some of which are in the Vatican, others in the Museo Vettori, now acquired for the Vatican; but the general absence of indication either of the collection or the kind of stone employed greatly detracts from their value: fourteen of them give the Good Shepherd, eight have an anchor (with or without accompaniments), three have a boat or ship, five bear a dove, others have fish (written in Greek, or depicted), the chrisma, or the Cross. Others which are of large size, exhibiting the Crucifixion, or the figure of Christ or the Virgin, are probably later than 800 A.D. Among some casts from gems in Rome, received from Signor Odelli of Rome, are a few which are evidently Christian, the most remarkable being an intaglio representing the raising of Lazarus in a style of art like that which we have in the catacombs, where the same subject is represented.

* "Intagli representing purely Christian subjects are of the rarest possible occurrence, that is in works of indubitable antiquity" (King, Antique Gems, p. 352, London, 1860). Some that have been published are now known to be false (Martigny, Dict. p. 39). The Christian gems bearing Greek inscriptions have been published by Kirchoff in Böckh's Corp. Inscr. Graec. n. 9077-9109.

ring, has the Good Shepherd as before bearing a sheep on his shoulders, with two other sheep at his feet (Chabouillet, Cat. p. 282, n. 2166). Another example, in red jasper, represents the shepherd still as before, having two dogs, or rather perhaps having one dog and one sheep, at his feet and a star and crescent in the field, with retrograde legend IAHN, perhaps for Jah is his name. This fine gem is considered by Mr. King, who possesses it, to be a work of about the end of the second century. He considers "the Sun and Moon conjoined" as "emblems of the Divine presence" (Precious Stones, pp. 160, 431); they may, however, be indications of astral genii, and if so, the gem may be the work of a Christian Gnostic. "The most interesting of all examples of this type," however, he observes (Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. ii. p. 30, London, 1872), "occurs on a large cornelian brought recently from the North of India (Col. Pearse), on which the Good Shepherd stands, bearing his lost and found lamb across his shoulders, surrounded by the mystic letters I.X.Θ.Y.C., the reverse engraved with XPICTE CΩZE KAPITIANON AEPOTE (sic): 'O Christ, save Carpianus for ever.' This is cut in exactly the same coarse lettering and similarly arranged in consecutive lines as the Gnostic legends of the fourth century." Three others are mentioned in Böckh's Corp. Inscr. Graec. One (n. 9084) figured by Perret (Catac. de Rome, iv. t. xvi. n. 12), where the shepherd bears a lamb accompanied by a dove and branch, and by an anchor and fishes, with legend IXΘYC; another (n. 9098), figured by Paciaudi (De Balm. Christ. on the title-page) in a square hematite, having on one side the Good Shepherd with two crosses, and a legend on the other, seemingly meant for 'Αγθωβα βοήθη; and a third (n. 9107), figured by Le Blant (Bull. de l'Athén. Franc. Feb. 1856, t. 1, n. 10), on plasma, where the Good Shepherd is accompanied by the legend ΔΟΤΚ[OT], the owner of the gem. There are several other gems on which this subject is represented slightly differing from the preceding. (See note at the beginning.)

(ii.) The following five types are mentioned by Clement; of which Christ as the Fish occurs perhaps more frequently than any other. The examples here given may suffice, but the enumeration might be extended. One on some burnt stone, figured by Mr. King, is of good early work, representing some large-headed fish, and reads bou-strophedon HA EIC | 9X HI, i.e. Jesus Christ is one God (El); see his ingenious remarks in Ant. Gems and Rings, ii. 27. A similar fish, accompanied by a crook and palm branch is on a sard preserved in the British Museum, which also contains the following intagli: A fish on which rests a cross; a dove on each limb IHCOTC above and

below, in a broken cornelian: ^b a fish upon which is a dove, a sprig behind her; to the left is the chrisma (✠) to the right the owner's name, RVFI, in cornelian: also a fish well engraved, in an emerald set in a massive gold ring of angular form; on the opposite side, a dove seated on a branch between the letters AE | MI | LIA, cut on the bezel itself. An intaglio, the stone is not particularised, in the Kircherian Museum at Rome bears the engraving IXΘC MT "around an anchor in the loop between its lower arms, which are recurved, and upon the stem of which a fish is placed" (Archaeol. Journ. xxviii. 288 [1871]). A sard published by Le Blant has a representation of a fish, with IXΘYC (retrograde) below it: the Copenhagen Museum possesses a gem having the same type and legend, but written in the usual way: and the legend only, the X being converted into the chrisma, is found on a gem in the Vatican (Böckh, nos. 9083, 9085, 9086). The legend IXΘC inclosed in a wreath is inscribed on a cornelian in the British Museum. A sard, figured by Ficoroni (Gemm. litt. t. xi.), has IXΘYC only. A very curious ancient gem, which is best mentioned in this place, is figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 546). It represents an episcopal chair with legend IXYΘ (for IXΘC) inscribed upon it, besides a monogram on either side, as being the chair of Christ, in which the bishop sits. The same chalcedony is figured by Passeri, who has a dissertation upon it (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. iii. 221), and is now, having undergone various fortunes, in the Berlin Museum (Böckh, n. 9080).

Other gems which are of this type, but without any suggestive adjuncts, are either known or suspected to be Christian. Mr. King (Gnostics, pl. v. n. 3) figures a fish neatly engraved on a niccolo, bearing the owner's name, T. ACI. AGLAVS, whom he regards as a Christian. The Uzielli Collection (Robinson's Catal. n. 293 [277]^c) had an intaglio of bloodstone in its original bronze setting, bearing a dolphin, which is considered to be "probably early Christian;" and Signor Castellani possesses a fine amethyst cameo^d about 1½ inch by ¾, presumed to be Christian, from one side of which, the more convex, a fish of the form of a carp projects boldly, the other side bearing the name of the possessor, VALERIAE, in incised letters. But the most interesting example of this kind is the episcopal ring of Arnulphus, consecrated bishop of Metz in A.D. 614, now preserved in the cathedral treasury; it is set with "an opaque milk-white cornelian," about half an inch in diameter, representing a fish whose head appears above the containing basket, on either side of which is a smaller fish: the work is presumed to be earlier than the fourth century. This is regarded by Cav. de Rossi as a curious illustration of a passage in Tertullian (De Bapt. c. 1): "Nos pisciculi secundum Piscem nostrum in aquis nascimur, nec nisi in aquis permanendo salvi sumus" (Pitra, Spicil. Solesm. tom. iii. p. 578, tab. iii. n. 4. Paris, 1855. Waterton in Arch. Journ. xx. 237 [1863]; Fortnum, ibid. xxviii. 274 [1871]; Marriott, Test. of Catac. p. 123 [with a figure], Lond. 1870). This type occurs also in subordination to that of the anchor, about to be mentioned. Besides the gems of the fish type here enumerated, the writer is acquainted with the casts of some others, and would also direct the reader to Didron, Christ. Icon. p. 345 (Millington's transl. in Bohn's Scient. Libr.); Perret, u. s.; Martigny, Dict. s. v. "Poisson"; and Fortnum, Arch. Journ. xxviii. 274, for further information and references. "De Rossi alone" [in his De Christ. monum. IXΘΥΝ exhib. in Spicil. Solesm. iii. 555, 576, 577; see Pitra's Auct. 578, Paris, 1855], says the last-named author, "describes about thirty genuine gems on which the fish and variations of the word IXΘΥC occur. Some others have since been found. . . . It is moreover," he tells us, "more frequently forged than perhaps any other." A remarkable sard intaglio, in the possession of the writer, may be mentioned as a kind of postscript. The device is a fan-would seem, to christianize such a heathen production. See IXΘΥC.

(iii.) Anchor.—The anchor, originally as Ciment observes, the signet of Seleucus (see Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. iii. 212), and frequently occurring on the coins of the Seleucidæ, whence it passed over to the Jewish money, was frequently employed as a gem type by the Christians, and so much the more readily from its resemblance to the cross; whence the motto, Crux mea anchora. This type occurs both in connection with the preceding and also independently of it. Of the former sort the British Museum contains the four following examples, all probably of Christian work: anchor between two fish, around it the letters ΑΡΙ, in black jasper; another with dolphin twisted round it, like the modern Aldine device, about it the preceptive legend ΕΠΙΤΥΧΑΝΟΤ (Lay hold) in red jasper; anchor between two fishes, in niccolo; another between two branches and two fishes, on whose arms two doves are seated, in chalcedony. But the following are more important and unquestionably Christian. A sard figured by Münster (Antiq. Abhandl. 1816, p. 57, t. i. n. 3), of an octagonal form, gives an anchor with two fishes and the legend ΙΧΘΥ (Böckh, n. 9090). The Berlin Museum has recently acquired a gem bearing an anchor and a sheep and the legend ΙΧΘΥC: upon the anchor sits a dove with an olive branch in its mouth (Böckh, n. 9081). Passeri (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. iii. 278) figures a ring cameo in the Vettori Museum, inscribed ΙΧΘΥC above, ΧΡΕΙCΤΟC below, having between the words an anchor, with a fish hanging from each end of the stock. An opal in the same museum, figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 545), has on one side a cruciform anchor, on the other, enclosed in an ornamented border, the legend ΙΧΘΥC written κρυπτόν. The Berlin Museum has a red jasper having the word ΙΧΘΥC and the letters MT, perhaps the owner's initials, disposed around an anchor (Böckh, n. 9079). But the anchor has also other accompanying symbols. Thus another gem in the same museum (Böckh, n. 9082) has around the figure of an anchor the boustrophedon legend ΙΗ | Χ (Jesus Christ), and also the accompanying symbols of a tree, a sheep, doves, a palm, and a human hand. (For others see above under the Good Shepherd.) There are also gems, presumed to be Christian, of which casts have been received from Signor Saulini, in which the anchor is figured by itself alone.

Anchor and Dolphin. (British Museum.)

^c The number in the brackets is that of the sale catalogue (compiled from Mr. Robinson's privately printed catalogue), London, 1861.

^d A drawing has been sent by the Rev. C. W. Jones. With the exception of late Byzantine works Christian camei are very rare. Signor Saulini sends a cast of a cameo (?) gem, stone not specified, of a still larger size, representing two similar fishes, looking opposite ways, the lower inverted; it is also figured by Perret, u. s.

(iv.) Dove.—This type, usually symbolical of the Holy Spirit, has been already mentioned as occurring on gems in conjunction with other Christian types. Besides these, Passeri (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. iii. 235) describes and figures, after Mamachi, a gem in which occurs the dove on a palm branch, a star above, and the chrisma (✠) on the left. The British Museum has a garnet with the same device, but no chrisma; and also a portion of a cornelian ring, on the flat bezel of which is engraved a dove holding a branch, considered by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian work of the second or third century (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 140). A sapphire in the same collection bears the same device. The French collection contains a cornelian, the work of which appears to be of the sixth century, on which is engraved a dove, a palm, and a crown, with a monogram of Veranus (?), in style resembling those of the Ostrogothic kings of Italy (Chabouillet, Catal. n. 2167). The dove occurs also on Christian gems found in Rome or preserved in the Roman collections, in most cases accompanied by the chrisma (Saulini, Perret). A pale sard* intaglio in the possession of Mr. Ready has two rudely-engraved doves with a cross between them. "One of the prettiest devices of the class that has come to my knowledge," says Mr. King (Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. ii. p. 26, note), "shews the dove with olive twig in beak, perched upon a wheat-sheaf, apt emblem of the Church, having for supporters a lion and serpent. It pictorially embodies the precept to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. (In possession of F. Taylor.)" The British Museum, in fine, has a gem of large size and late work, reading in minuscule letters αναστασι. + του δημου; below the legend is a sheaf of corn, and two doves with olive branches below, indicating that the ingathering of the harvest of souls will be in peace. Other examples are named by Martigny, u. s.

(v.) Fisherman.—The type alludes to the Saviour and the apostles as fishers of men. It is rarely found on Christian gems, but we have a few examples. M. de Belloc, in his work entitled La Vierge au Poisson de Raphael (Lyon, 1833), figures an engraved cornelian, which he considers to be Christian, upon which is a fisherman holding a basket in one hand, and in the other a line from which a fish is suspended; the word ΙΧΘΥΣ is written near the fish (Didron, Christian. Iconogr. pp. 345, 364 in Bohn's Illustr. Libr.). This would seem to be a different gem from a cornelian mentioned by Vallarsi in his notes on St. Jerome (i. 18), of the same type with the same inscription (Didron, u. s. p. 349); Martigny speaks of it as excellent in workmanship and probably of great antiquity: he regards the fisherman as the Saviour (Dict. p. 518; Garrucci, Hagiogr. p. 111). A sard intaglio, regarded by Mr. King as "purely Christian," in his own collection is figured in his Gnostics, pl. x. n. 7; it gives two winged figures, probably Cupids, in a boat, one fishing, the other steering; "the mast with the yard, making a true cross, forms a significant and conspicuous feature in the design" (p. 224). Its Christianity, however, seems rather questionable.*

(vi.) Boat or Ship.—These occur on Christian gems, as being typical of the church, and then sometimes resting on a fish, or of the voyage of the soul to the harbour of eternal rest. Mr. Fortnum describes and figures a fragment of a ring of dark green jasper, probably of the second or third century, purchased in Rome, on the bezel of which is engraved a boat bearing a bird and a branch, probably a cock and palm branch. The boat is supposed to be the church, and the victory of the soul over the world to be indicated by the other types† (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 140). Aleander (Nav. Eccles. Ref. Symb. p. 13, Rom. 1626) figures a ring-stone;‡ and Ficoroni gives another (Gemme Antiq. p. 105, t. xi. 8), on which the ship seems to rest on a fish. A ring figured by cardinal Borgia (De Cruce Velit. p. 213) is set with an antique jasper intaglio, the subject of which is a ship, having six rowers on one side, which, supplying the corresponding six on the other, would represent the twelve apostles; there is also a pilot, or helmsman, and the name IHCOT inscribed on the reverse (Fortnum in Arch. Journ. 1871, pp. 274, 275; Mart. Dict. p. 432). A cornelian in the British Museum (intaglio) has a ship with mast and yard-arm in the form of a cross, bearing also a cross at the prow. A fine black jasper intaglio, in the possession of Rev. S. S. Lewis, shows a boat with a Greek cross in the centre. A cornelian, belonging to count Marcolini, an impression of which is published by Lippert (iii. 361), bears a trireme with the labarum, on which is the chrisma and two palm trees; the prow is in the form of a bird's head; the vessel enters into port, and the sea is marked by a fish: in the field are two stars and the unexplained letters E. T. RA.; below, VGBP. (Raspe's Cat. of Tassie's Engraved Gems, n. 2715). Other gems, whose impressions have been sent from Rome, bear a boat with the chrisma, or the chrisma accompanied by a palm above. A sard (intaglio) with the same type is set in a ring in the Naples Museum (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 280).

* The gem reproduced by Martigny (u. s.) from Costadoni, showing a fish in human form holding a basket, which Polidori interprets to be the Saviour, is rather, to judge by the figure, an Assyrian or Babylonian gem, representing Dagon (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 381).

† With this may be compared an antique paste in the Hertz Collection (No. 2525), having a ship with cock-shaped prow, rowed by four benches of sailors; a butterfly above. The allusion to the immortality of the soul can hardly be doubted, but the emblem is pagan rather than Christian.

It will now be seen that we have examples of all the types mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus, the lyre only excepted, occurring on gems which are either certainly known or reasonably presumed to be Christian. This type also occurs, but it is uncertain whether any gem on which it is found is to be considered of Christian work.

(vii.) Lyre.—Employed probably as the type of harmony and concord. The only example known to Martigny (Des Anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens, Mâcon, 1858) which he could regard as Christian is one in the Royal Library of Turin, of very indifferent work, in a style like many Christian gems, figured by Perret, Catacombes (vol. iv. pl. xvi. n. 60). Nor can he add another in his Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, written seven years later (p. 40).^b

The following types are not mentioned by Clemens; the first three of them have been already indicated in connection with those gems which have been described; but they occur on other gems also.

(viii.) Palm.—This symbol of victory, among Pagans, Jews, and Christians, occurs frequently on engraved stones and metal rings, and it is sometimes difficult to decide whether a given engraving is to be considered Pagan or Christian (Arch. Journ. 1871, pp. 275, 276, 280, 282). It has already been noticed that the palm occurs as an accessory type on some of the Christian gems above described; it occurs also in other combinations. On a cornelian in the British Museum a hand holds a palm branch erect, the chrisma is above and MNHMONETE below. In the same museum is a cornelian, presumably of Christian work, on which is a palm branch placed vertically, inclosed in a wreath of laurel: on opposite sides of the branch are the proper names ΖωΤΙΚΟΚ and ΤΕΡΤΥΛΛΑ, who may possibly have been martyrs. A sard in the Rev. C. W. King's collection bears a palm branch placed horizontally, and below it the acclamation (probably Christian), SVLE VIVE (letters partly inverted). The palm branch occurs also by itself or accompanied by inscriptions on various other gems and rings, which are reasonably supposed or suspected to be of Christian work, which is distinguished, in Mr. Waterton's opinion, by the rude manner of the representation, more truly figuring the natural object

^b Among those bearing this type described by Ra-pe (u.s. Nos. 3032-3044), or contained in the Hertz Collection (Nos. 1094-1097), there is not one which can safely be pronounced to be Christian, but there are two antique pastes in the latter (Nos. 1094, 1095) in which the sides of the lyre are formed of dolphins or fishes. The sound-board of one of these has the form of a sleeping animal. The original, as it would seem, of this, a plasma intaglio, is in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis. The occurrence of fish in this connection suggests that the gems may be Christian, but as the dolphin is connected with Apollo the inference is hazardous.

(Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 276). For some of these see King's Cat. of Leake's Gems in Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, p. 9. Fortnum in Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 142; and 1871, p. 276.

(ix.) Cross.—This type, in connection with the dove, or in a disguised form as yard and mast, has been more than once described above. But it occurs on other gems without disguise.¹ A Greek cross in conjunction with a lion, supposed to allude to the church of St. Mark at Alexandria, occurs on an onyx intaglio in the possession of Mr. Fortnum (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 147). An iron ring, set with a cornelian intaglio (burnt), is contained in the British Museum; the device is a cross, accompanied by some animal very rudely engraved (Fortnum, Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 146). Beger (Thes. Palat.) figures a gem, having a tall Latin cross, from the arms of which hang two fishes.² Garrucci (Numism. Costantin. p. 261, (at the end of his Vetri Ornati, Rom. 1864) mentions other gems with the cross type, three of which are in the possession of M. Van den Bergh. Mr. Fortnum describes a massive gold ring in the Castellani collection, embossed with figures of doves in the shoulders, which is set with a garnet, on the face of which is engraved a draped figure seated between two Greek crosses potent (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 281). It is now in the British Museum, and seems late work. The Museum has also a burnt cornelian inscribed ΤΑΥΡΙΝΟC, where a female holds a cross. A gem is figured by Garrucci (Hagioglypta, praef. p. v.), where a Greek cross is prefixed to the acclamation VIVAS IN (DEO, sc.), Martigny, in fine, observes that on several gems (one is figured by Perret, vol. iv. pl. xvi. n. 74), some of which appear to be considerably older than Constantine, we have engraved representations of the cross¹ (Dict. p. 185). See also § xvii.

(x.) Chrisma, or Monogram of Christ.—This emblem (✠), which is thought by high authorities to be earlier than Constantine (Mart. Dict. p. 416), is found either by itself or in various combinations upon a considerable number of gems, and somewhat varying in form. A fine spherical sapphire, "where the preciousness of the material attests the rank, perhaps patriarchal, of the possessor" (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 28), in the British Museum gives the monogram, having a straight line at right angles to the P on its summit (P), which forms a Tau, allusive to the cross. This is also the case with a crystal signet ring, "annulus vetustissimus," formerly in cardinal Barberini's museum (its resting-place being now unknown, Fortnum, in Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 272), figured by De Corte (Syntax. de Ann. p. 120), where a serpent, pecked by two cocks, entwines itself about the base of the Tau: on either side of the upper part are the letters A and ω , and the stone is also inscribed beneath the bezel with the word SALVS.

² Referred to by King (Gnostics, p. 142).

¹ It may perhaps just be worth mentioning here that certain large pieces of crystal bearing the figure of the cross may be as early as the period embraced in the present work. Douglas (Noen. Brit. t. xx. f. 11) figures a crystal exhumed in 1753 in a barrow near Lowestoft along with coins of Avitus (A.D. 456) and other money of the Lower Empire, now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. It is a boat-shaped piece (1 × 1½ in.), on which is engraved in intaglio a Latin cross potent. It may probably be of the Saxon period, and it looks as if it might once have been inserted in a liturgical book cover or in the lid of a box. But it is not easy to speak of the dates of these crystals and other stones, some of which, engraved or plain, have been also found in Ireland (Valancey, Coll. de Reb. Hibern. vol. iv. pl. 11. n. 13; Wilde, Cat. of Mus. of Roy. Irish Acad. pp. 127, 128). Most of them appear to have been amulets.

Mr. Fortnum has a ring of excellent workmanship, purchased at Athens, of massive gold, set with an onyx intaglio bearing the chrisma, "the P being crossed with the third stroke" (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 142). Mr. King (Gnostics, p. 142) mentions a ring cut out of crystal, bearing the chrisma alone, on the face of an oblong tablet, said to have been found in Provence. The same author (l. c. p. 141) mentions an elegant device given in Gorl. Dactyl. 211, where the sacred monogram, cut on the face of a solid crystal ring, rests upon the head of a Cupid (or angel?) on each side of whom stands a dove. This style he considers to have been derived from the Sassanian stone rings. Passeri (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. vol. ii. p. 220, t. cc.) figures a gem on which the chrisma is surmounted by a star, the X being formed by two branches of palm. This symbol is also sometimes accompanied by inscriptions both Greek and Latin. Martigny (Dict. p. 418) mentions a cornelian given by Macarius (Hieroglypta, p. 235, ed. Gar.), inscribed with the word IXOTC, the X being combined with a P to express the chrisma; possibly the same gem as that described above under § ii. The Berlin Museum has a heliotrope in which the chrisma is accompanied by a fruit-bearing tree and the following inscription: $\epsilon\kappa\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\alpha\iota\ \iota\eta\sigma\omicron\nu\ \chi\rho\epsilon\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\nu\ \nu\alpha\zeta\alpha\rho\eta\nu\delta\nu\ \pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha$. . . (Böckh, n. 9094; the fragment is here given in part only and in minuscules). The British Museum contains a cornelian bearing the acclamation, DEVSEDI VIVAS IN DEO, to the right of which is the chrisma, and to the left a small wreath. Mr. King figures a gem in the Vernon Collection (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 28, 37) where the chrisma of a not quite usual form appears in the middle of an olive-

of the possessor, $\Phi\omicron\text{IBE}\iota\omega\text{N}$, Pheobion (like Hephæstion, from Hephæstus), of which the work is unusually fine. The sacred monogram under various forms is found, as Mr. Fortnum observes (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 271), "more frequently than any other on Christian rings. . . . We find it alone and accompanied by almost all the other emblems, with inscriptions and monograms."^m

(xi.) Animals.—It has been already noticed that "a lion," which Mr. Fortnum connects with St. Mark, occurs on an onyx accompanied by a Greek cross. Ennodius, bishop of Pavia about 511, has an epigram, De annulo Firminæ, from which we learn that it bore a lion:

"Gestandus manibus sævit leo."

Whether the lion was intended to have any Christian significance is uncertain. The phoenix occurs on an engraved stone in conjunction with the palm, a combination which occurs on other monuments which are indubitably Christian, Perret (vol. iv. pl. xvi. 68; Martigny, Dict. p. 534). In the British Museum are more than one gem bearing sheep, from the collection of the abbé Hamilton, of Rome, which are presumed to be Christian. On one are two sheep, on each side a dolphin; on another are two sheep and palm branches. It might not be difficult to increase the enumeration of these ambiguous types; but they are scarcely worthy of a more extended notice.ⁿ

Before proceeding further we may observe that the British Museum contains a large pale sard in which the pastor, the chrisma, dove and branch, fish, dolphin, ship, and various adjuncts are combined; another, of smaller size, in two compartments, has the pastor, dove, anchor, fishes, with other figures and animals; they were formerly in the Hamilton Collection, and are figured (with several others from the same collection, which is now in the British Museum) by Perret (iv. pl. xvi. figs. 5, 8).

The following subjects appear to have been introduced upon gems at a later period than the types already mentioned.^o have been sent from Rome by Signor Saulini: on one the X is formed of two fishes, one holding a wreath (crown of thorns?) the other having a dove on its tail; palm on either side of the monogram.

ⁿ Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. p. 28) mentions that the frog, whose body passes through so many stages, was employed for a Christian signet as an emblem of the Resurrection; he does not however refer to any authority for this. In Raspe's Catalogue of Tassie's Gems (No. 13,355) is a gem bearing a frog with a palm and a serpent; these adjuncts rather suggest that the work may be Christian. See GLASS.

^o The first place would be due to representations of God the Father, if such really existed in the period embraced in this work, abhorrent as such images may appear to many. Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 32) mentions "a large niccolo in an antique massy gold ring, engraved with the Heavenly Father enthroned amidst the twelve patriarchs, the work carefully finished and well drawn." This gem, which he saw in the possession of the late Mr. Forrest, appeared to him to date from the times of the Western Empire. But there seems to be some error here. "During the first centuries of Christianity," says Didron (Christian Iconogr. p. 201, Engl. trans.), "even as late as the 12th century, no portraits of God the Father are to be seen." The hand seems to have been the only permitted symbol. Either, therefore, the work is likely to be later than the 12th century, or (more probably) the interpretation of the group is erroneous. One might suspect the Saviour and the apostles to be intended. Upon a cornelian formerly in the possession of Dr. Nott, the Saviour is represented on a column, with extended arms, having six figures on each side, in the exergue a sheep: in the field and exergue EHCO (sic, for IHCOYC) XPECTOC. It is obvious that these are the twelve apostles, but the Jewish and Gentile churches, as symbolised by them, are most probably intended. See § xiii. and GLASS. (A cast sent from Rome by Signor Saulini.)

^m Various impressions of gems bearing the chrisma, which are more or less similar to those described above,

(xū.) The Saviour.—In the earlier gems the Saviour appears only in the form of emblems, as the Good Shepherd and the Fish, and (more rarely) as the Fisherman; but from about the fourth century onwards the representations become more realistic. Le Blant has a sardonyx, bearing a dead Christ, with the inscription, SALVS RESTITVTA, ascribed to the fourth century (Martigny, Des anneaux chez les prem. Chrét. p. 36). An ancient onyx, figured by Perret (iv. pl. xvi. 85), exhibits the Saviour reaching out his hand to St. Peter as he is about to sink in the waves; their names (in an abbreviated form) are written near them in Greek characters: ΙΗC. ΠΕΤ.; the boat is seen tossed by a storm, a fish just below (Mart. Dict. p. 539. See also Aleander, u. s.; Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq. Christ. t. iv. p. 260, ed. Matr., and Garrucci in Macarius, Hagioglypta, p. 237). A green jasper intaglio in the British Museum, considered by Mr. King to belong most probably to the date of the Western empire, exhibits Christ's entry into Jerusalem, the Saviour being accompanied by three figures, one bearing a palm (Gnost. p. 140). When the coffin of bishop Agilbert, of Paris (seventh century) was opened, De Saussay, who was present, saw on his finger a gold ring with a jewel, on which was a likeness of our Lord and St. Jerome (Marriott, Vestiar. Christ. p. 222, London, 1868). A cameo in agate, probably early mediaeval Italian work of uncertain date, represents the Saviour teaching the three favoured disciples, one by his side, the others fronting him; two angels behind: the disciples are bearded, the Saviour beardless; in the Bibl. Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 294; King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 35, 36). With the exception of Byzantine cameos, and of one or two gems presumed to be Gnostic, "no ancient portraits of the Saviour exist on gems" (King's Gnostics, p. 137).^p Among the earlier Byzantine camei is to be mentioned a fine oval plaque of lapis-lazuli, probably the gift of the emperor Heraclius to king Dagobert (A.D. 628-638), which remained in the Treasury of St. Denys for a thousand years: on one side was the bust of the Saviour, on the other that of his mother (King, Handbook, p. 104; id. in Arch. Journ. 1870, p. 185).

The French collection contains several Byzantine camei bearing portraits of Christ. Some of these on amethyst and jasper, with legend, ΙC. XC. (i.e. Ἰησοῦς Χριστός), represent Him with a cruciform nimbus, in a long robe, holding the gospels in the left hand, and giving the benediction with the right (Chabouillet, Cat. nos. 258-260). These remind us of the coins of Justinian II. (A.D. 685-711), and may perhaps be earlier than A.D. 800. So much can hardly be said of a large bloodstone in the British Museum, which represents the bust of the Saviour in high relief; the style rather resembles that of the age of John Zimisce (tenth century), (King's Gnostics, p. 141). A chalcedony in the same museum, representing the Saviour, half-length, holding a book, and in the act of blessing ($1\frac{1}{2} \times \frac{7}{8}$ inches) appears to be earlier.

^p For the Emerald Vernicle of the Vatican (now lost), said to preserve a true likeness of the Saviour, executed by command of Tiberius, which Bajazet II. gave to pope Innocent VIII. about A.D. 1488, see C. W. King in Arch. Journ. 1870, pp. 181-190, and A. Way in Arch. Journ. 1872, pp. 109-119. The gem was probably a plasma of the early Byzantine school. Paintings copied from the Vernicle in the 16th century exist; and also engravings professedly copies of the same gem, from which photographs have been made which are now everywhere in circulation. But the engraving is in fact a mere reproduction of the Saviour's head in Raphael's cartoon of the Miraculous Draught of Fishes, which, however, may have been influenced by these paintings.

(xiii.) Christ as the Lamb of God.—Garrucci (in Macar. Hag. pp. 222, 244; Martigny, Dict. p. 226, with figure) has published an annular engraved stone, representing the Lamb of God surrounded by a nimbus which includes the chrisma, standing on a column, the symbol of the church; twelve gems (Rev. xxi.) on it represent the twelve apostles; at the base of the column on either side are two lambs, the Jewish and Gentile believers, looking up at Him: around is the acclamation, IANVARI VIVAS. For the same subject see GLASS.

(xiv.) The Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin.—The British Museum has a small sardonyx cameo of black and white strata (from the Hertz collection, n. 1825), of very neat Byzantine work, and possibly of very high antiquity,^a representing the Annunciation. The Virgin stands inclining towards the winged Cupid-like angel: above is the legend, O XAIΠETICMOO, and the names of the figures, ΓΑΒΡΙΗΛ and ΜΡ. ΘΥ. (μήτηρ θεοῦ, i.e. mother of God) are written near them. The British Museum, the Hertz collection (n. 1824), and the Paris collection (Chabouillet, nos. 262, 263), have other larger camei on sardonyx (an inch or more wide), representing the same subject, bearing the barbarous legend, XAIPE (or XEPE), KEXAPITOMENH (or KAI-XAPITOMENH), O KC. META COT (Luke i. 28). The second of these is referred to "the oldest Christian period" (Hertz, Catalogue, p. 125);

^a Mr. King (Ant. Gems and Rings, ii. 31) thinks that it may probably date as far back as Constantine's reign. But it may be doubted whether the title, μήτηρ θεοῦ, goes so far back. See Pearson, On the Creed, Ari. III. With regard to the style of the gem itself, the writer is inclined to put it considerably later than the fourth century.

^r This gem passed into the Uzielli Collection (Robinson's Cat. No. 1119 [646, a.]), where it is called "Byzantine Greek work of uncertain period."

the others are considered by Chabouillet to be of the fifth century. Perhaps they may be rather regarded as early mediaeval (see King's Handbook, p. 111).

(xv.) The Virgin and Child.—An intaglio in the British Museum, green jasper, of very rude workmanship, "executed with the peculiar technique of Gnostic work," and, if this be admitted, apparently about the fourth century* (see King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 31), represents the Virgin and Child seated, with an angel on each side, two others hovering overhead. The Madonna and child in her arms (both with nimbus), accompanied by their names, $\overline{\text{IC}}$, $\overline{\text{XC}}$, and $\overline{\text{MP}}$. $\overline{\text{OT}}$, is represented on a Byzantine cameo of red jasper, in the Paris collection (Chabouillet, n. 265). A similar one on bloodstone ($1\frac{3}{8} \times 1\frac{1}{16}$ inches) is in the British Museum. These may perhaps be early mediaeval.

In the Uzielli collection (n. 284 [300]) was an intaglio on cornelian ($\frac{5}{8}$ by $\frac{3}{8}$ of an inch), with the Virgin and Child, with $\overline{\text{XAIP}}$ and $\overline{\text{MP}}$. $\overline{\text{OT}}$, which Mr. J. C. Robinson calls "Byzantine or mediaeval Greek work of uncertain date." A gem, published by Oderico, gives the Virgin and Child with legend, $\overline{\text{MP}}$. $\overline{\text{OT}}$. $\overline{\text{H}}$ $\overline{\text{PIH}}$, i.e. the image of the Madonna in the church of the Fountain, erected at Constantinople by Justinian, but this gem may be of much later date (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9109). It is probable that this general type would be engraved on Byzantine gems during a great part of the middle ages, from the sixth or seventh century onwards.

(xvi.) Saints or persons unknown.—Bosio and Mamachi (Dei costumi dei primit. Crist. Prefaz.)

figure a cornelian, on which are engraved the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul (Mart. Dict. pp. 40, 539). A red jasper intaglio, a graceful new year's gift, exhibits a female saint, perhaps St. Agnes, kneeling before an executioner, who is about to cut off her head with a great razorlike sword; before her a dove holds a branch; above is the chrisma, to declare the presence of her Redeemer in the hour of trial; in the field are the letters ANFT (Annum norum felicem tibi): good work, probably about the age of Constantine† (King, Anc. Gems, pp. 352, 353, figured).

A cameo in the British Museum, cut in a beautiful sardonyx, possibly as early as the fourth century,‡ gives a full-length figure of St. John the Baptist with his name (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 31). The same saint is represented on a cornelian, published by Vettori (pars ii. c. ix.). The Berlin Museum has a black jasper intaglio, reading EIC $\overline{\text{ΘEOC}}$, and having rudely engraved upon it a female with hands uplifted in prayer (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9103). The British Museum has a Virgin, half-length, with circular nimbus, and uplifted hands, a cameo on bloodstone, with the legend $\overline{\text{MP}}$. $\overline{\text{OT}}$; which may perhaps be early mediaeval. Besides these examples still existing, we have the following literary notices of rings bearing similar types being worn by bishops and others.

St. Chrysostom tells us that in his time many Christians of Antioch wore in their rings the likeness of St. Meletius (who died A.D. 381), and impressed it on their seals (Hom. de S. Melet. t. ii. p. 519, ed. Venet. 1734). St. Augustine, writing to bishop Victorinus, says that his epistle is sealed "annulo qui exprimat faciem hominis attentantis in latus" (Epist. 59 [217]). Ebreghislaus, bishop of Meaux in 660; wore in his ring an intaglio representing St. Paul, the first hermit, on his knees before a crucifix, and above his head the crow, by which he was miraculously fed (Annal. S. Benedict. t. i. p. 456; Waterton in Arch. Journ. 1863, p. 225).^x

To the above should perhaps be added a Byzantine cameo, nearly two inches in diameter, of streaked jasper, representing St. John the Evangelist, with the nimbus, seated, and holding the gospel in his hand. In the field O A ($\delta \alpha \gamma \iota \sigma$) $\overline{\text{Iω}}$ O $\overline{\text{ΘEOC}}$ $\overline{\text{ΑΓΙΟC}}$; in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, C. d. n. 266). This gem may possibly fall within our period, and is classed near to some that probably do so; but the difficulty of fixing the particular age of mediaeval Byzantine camei is almost insuperable. The greater part of them, in Mr. King's skilled judgment, belong to the age of the Comneni (Ant. Gems and Rings, i. 307).

(xvii.) Imperial or Royal Personages with Christian Accessories.—The art of cameo-engraving, which had fallen into complete abeyance from the time of Septimius Severus, who has bequeathed to posterity many fine cameo-portraits of himself and his family, sprang into a new but short life under Constantine. Camei portraits of himself and his sons, "admirable for the material, and by no means despicable for the execution," are found in various private and public collections, on sardonyx stones of large, sometimes very large, dimensions (King, Ant. Gems and Rings, i. 304). One fine gem, at least, marks the change of the imperial religion; it is not however exactly a cameo, but a solid

* A sardonyx, published by F. Vettori, has on the obverse a portrait of the Virgin with the usual letters $\overline{\text{MP}}$. $\overline{\text{OT}}$, and on the reverse a cross with contracted legend KEB. (for $\overline{\text{Κυrie βοηθει}}$), $\overline{\text{ΛΕΟΤΙ}}$ $\overline{\text{ΔΕΟΠΟΤ}}$, i.e. O Lord! help Lord Leo! Conjecturally referred to Leo (the Wise) A.D. 886-911, but without sufficient reason; it is just possible that the gem may have been executed within the period embraced in this work. See Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9100. A very interesting gem is inserted in a silver plate (gift of the age of Justinian: the great martyr ($\overline{\text{μεγαλομάρτυρ}}$) Demetrius is invoked as a mediator with God ($\overline{\text{μεσιτεύειν πρὸς θεόν}}$) to aid Justinian, "king of the Romans upon earth," and in the midst of the plate, just above a picture of St. Demetrius, "opere tessellato," is "amethystus insculpta, more carnelae facie imberbi." This may probably be meant for Demetrius also, but as $\overline{\text{IC}}$ $\overline{\text{XC}}$ (Jesus Christ) NIKA ($\nuικα$) occurs higher up, it is not very clear whether it may not be a portrait of the Saviour. The inscription is given at length in Böckh's C. I. G. n. 80+2, from Martini's papers, published by Mai. (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. v. 30, no figures.)

* In this case also it seems possible that the date may be much later.

† In his latest work (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 33) Mr. King thinks that it "can hardly be placed lower than the age of Theodosius, whose best coins it certainly resembles both in style and workmanship."

‡ It seems, however, that it may, with at least equal probability, be assigned to about the tenth century.

bust. An agate, measuring nearly four inches, in the Bibliothèque Impériale, shows its bust with the paludamentum and cuirass, on the latter is a cross. His head is naked, and his eyes are raised to heaven, as on some of his coins. Formerly the ornament of the extremity of the choir-staff (15th-century work) in La Sainte-Chapelle. Chabouillet, Cat. n. 287, who refers to Morand's Hist. de la Sainte Chapelle du Palais, (p. 56) for a figure of the gem incorporated with the baton.) Besides this noble piece we have several others also, but of inferior execution.

Passeri describes and figures a gem, preserved at Venice, representing a horseman spearing a dragon with a long lance terminating in a cross above: he regards it as a representation of a Christian emperor, conquering his enemies with the cross; a star, an emblem of Divine providence, in his judgment, is seen above (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. t. 2, pp. 289-297). This interpretation is somewhat confirmed by the types of certain coins of the fourth century, to which age this coin may probably be assigned.

The Mertens-Schauffhausen collection possessed an agate intaglio, which passed into the Leturcq cabinet, exhibiting a full-faced bust of the emperor Mauritius, wearing the imperial crown of the lower empire, and holding a globe, on which rests a Greek cross inscribed, D. N. MAVRITIVS P. P. A. Supposed to be a work of the sixth century, Leturcq, Catal. n. 210. The Leturcq collection contained also a green jasper intaglio, giving full-faced portraits of Constant II. (crowned) and of his son Constantine IV. (Pogonatus), both bearded, with a Greek cross between their busts, having a scorpion engraved on the back in the rude style of the so-called Gnostic gems (n. 211). The same collection in fine had an agate intaglio bearing busts of Leo IV. and his son Constantine VI. (Flavius), inscribed, D. N. LEO ET CONSTANTINVS P. P. A., both full-faced and crowned, and holding between them a double-handled cross (n. 212). These rare portraits of the Byzantine Caesars, of the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, appear to be in the same general style as those which appear on their money (see Sabatier, Monn. Byz. pl. xxiv. xxxiv. xli.).

There is one more gem of this class, which falls a few years later than the chronological limits of this work, but which ought hardly to be passed over here in consequence of its extreme interest in helping to fix the limits of gem-engraving in the West before the age of the Renaissance. The magnificent gold cross of king Lotharius, said to be of about the date 823, now preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, is remarkable for the variety of gems, rubies, sapphires, amethysts, and emeralds with which its surface is studded. At the intersection of the arms is inserted a very fine onyx cameo of Augustus, probably a contemporary work, and just below this an oval intaglio of rock crystal, of Frankish work and of very tolerable execution, two inches long and an inch and a half wide, giving the bust of Lotharius,

Mr. King, however, has some doubt about its genuineness (Antique Gems, pp. 163, 164). The Leturcq Cabinet was sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, in 1874, the accompanying catalogue by the owner being in French and English.

"his head covered with a close-fitting helmet, with a slightly-projecting frontlet, like those of the latest Roman period; around the bust is the legend, in well-formed Roman letters, + XPE ADIVVA HLOTHARIVM REG." (figured in Cahier et Martin, Mél. d'Arch. vol. i. pl. xxxi.; King's Ant. Gems, p. 305; King's Handbook of Engraved Gems, p. 116).

There still remain to be considered some ancient gems bearing manifest traces of Christianity, which may be separately classed, viz., the Gnostic and the Sassanian.

Gnostic Gems.—A Gnostic origin has been hesitatingly assigned to one or two gems already mentioned, and a great number of gems called Gnostic have been described in Chabouillet's Catalogue. (See also ABRASAX in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.) Of these, a considerable number bear the word ABPA-CAE, more rarely (in the Greek) ABPAEAC, (variously written in Latin); and this in itself, in the judgment of some, proves a Gnostic origin. Assuming that Basilides, a Christian Gnostic of the second century, be the inventor of the word,* as St. Jerome evidently thought and as several other Christian writers appear to intimate (see the authorities collected by Jablonski, Opusc. t. iv. pp. 82-86, and Bellermann, Ueber die Gemmen der Alten mit dem Abraxas-Bilde, Erst Stück, pp. 10-28), the numerous stones on which the word is written must either be looked on as Gnostic or else as derived through Gnosticism to other forms of faith or superstition. The latter view seems on the whole to be the more probable; for there is no doubt that the word, as transformed into the magical Abracadabra, passed over to the pagans, and was even employed in Christian times until quite lately as a charm against various forms of disease (Passeri, De gemm. Basilid. in Thes. Gemm. Astrif. vol. ii. p. 236, sq.; King in Ar. h. Journ. 1869, p. 33; Halliwell, Dict. of Archaic Words, s. v. Abracadabra). We have Abraxas occurring in connection with the names, ΙΑΩ (Jehovah), CABAOΘ, ΑΔΩΝΑΙ, and with the titles or representations of Harpocrates, Mithras, Mercury, &c. (see Passeri, u. s. &c.), but in no single instance known to the writer, though very possibly such may exist,† does this word occur on any engraved stone in any connection which can be safely counted upon as Christian. These stones consequently, as well as all others which have been called Gnostic, but shew no manifest sign of Christianity are passed over in this article. Very few of them, if any, can be fixed to any particular Gnostic sect or to Gnosticism generally, by much the greater part appear to have been charms. The following very scanty list, however, of unmistakably Christian gems may be with some reason looked on as Gnostic:—

* Some, as Mosheim (De Reb. Christ. ante Constant. p. 350) have thought that the word is probably older than Basilides: on what grounds we know not. This matter deserves a searching examination.

† A very few monuments, which must needs be Christian, bear the word ABPAEAC. A large ivory ring, found at Arles, bears the monogram of Christ between Α and Ω (as it appears on the coins of Constantine II. &c. of the fourth century), but accompanied by the title ABPAEAC, "a sufficient proof of the identity of the two personages in the estimation of its owner" (King's Antique Gems, p. 358). A copper amulet found at Kuff (Sicca Venera), which is very distinctly Christian, contains the same word apparently, but in a corrupt form (PAXCACA). See INSCRIPTIONS.

(1.) A portrait of Christ, beardless, to the right; XPICTOT above, a fish underneath. Figured by Raoul-Rochette (Tableau des Catacombes de Rome, frontispiece, Paris, 1853) who regards it as Gnostic (p. 265) from the original in the possession of the marquis de Fortia d'Urban, formerly in the Lajard collection. The stone is white chalcedony, the form is oval; ascribed to the second or third century (Mart. Dict. p. 40).

(2.) Another portrait with the same types and legend, on a truncated cone of white chalcedony, in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1334). This gem, probably of Eastern fabric, is considered to be not later than the middle of the fourth century, and "presents the combination of the ancient Oriental form and of Greek decoration in the same monument" (King, Gnostics, p. 143). Figured by Perret, u. s. n. 47; very similar to the preceding.

Epiphanius makes it a charge against the Carpocratians that they kept painted portraits and images in gold and silver, and other materials, which they pretended to be portraits of Jesus (Haeres. c. 27, § 6). These gems, therefore, may probably be the work of some Gnostic sect.^c

^b The seven vowels, the "Music of the Spheres" occur frequently on this class of stones, and are also mentioned in the lately discovered Gnostic work entitled Pistis Sophia; but their veneration or magical use can hardly be regarded as exclusively Marcsonian or Gnostic (see Walsh, Essay on Ancient Coins, Medals, and Gems, pp. 48-51; King's Gnostics, p. 93; King in Arch. Journ. 1868, pp. 105-107). From the names of the angels mentioned Matter (Hist. Crit. du Gnost. Pl. p. 16, t. i. E. 9) thinks that a gem which he figures after Chifflet (fig. 24) may belong to the sect of the Ophites. One of the very few gems which really appear to savour of the Gnostic philosophy is a sard, of which an impression has been sent by the Rev. W. T. T. Drake; reading $\sigma \delta \alpha \pi \alpha \nu \tau \omega \nu \nu \omega \varsigma$. $\alpha \theta \eta \rho$. $\pi \rho$. $\pi \nu \mu \alpha$. $\epsilon \lambda \omega \epsilon \iota \nu$; i. e. Elohim; there was also an inscription round the edge which has been a good deal broken: in the field are monograms or mystic characters. The letters may be of the third or fourth century.

If indeed we could with Bellermand (Gemmen mit dem Abraxas-Bilde, iii. pp. 11, 12) interpret the letters CEMEC EIAAM (misread by him) occurring on gems with the ABPACAE legend or figure, to mean, This is the Messiah of God, זה משיח יי , the number of Gnostic gems might be increased considerably; but in truth the words signify in Hebrew Eternal Sun (Matter, u. s. pp. 17, 29, t. i. F. 5; King, Gnostics, p. 76).

^c The numerous portraits of the Saviour which existed in St. Augustine's time differed much from each other; so that his face "innumerabilium cogitationum diversitate variatur et fingitur, quae tamen una erat, quaecumque erat" (Aug. De Trinit. viii. 4). A portrait quite different from the above is rudely engraved, apparently by a much later hand, on the back of a tiny ancient cornelian in the possession of M. Forget, which bears on the other side a fish only: it is figured by Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, vol. i. p. 371. The realistic representation is here, as in both the preceding gems, combined with the symbol.

CHRIST. ANT.

(3.) The sun between two stars, EICVVC. P. FABPIE[A.] ANANIA. AME[N.] in two lines (Passeri, Thes. Gemm. Asirif. ii. p. 277, who does not name the stone). The names of angels, as planetary or astral genii, were invoked by the Ophites, and probably by other Gnostic sects; Gabriel presided over the serpent (King, Gnostics, p. 88). This gem (n. 155 in the Cappello Museum), which is doubtless magical, may well have been produced by some Christian Gnostic, perhaps of the fourth century, when similar barbarous orthography occurs.

(4.) Four-winged deity, standing on a circle formed by a serpent, holding two sceptres; legend obliterated. R The chrisma in the midst of a circle formed by a serpent biting its tail. Hematite, in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 2178). The figure is a good deal similar to one on another gem, bearing the inscription ABPAEAC (Chabouillet, n. 2176); the reverse shows it to be the work of a Christian, perhaps of a later Basilidian.

(5.) Iao (Jehovah) under the form of a four-winged mummy, which has the heads of a jackal, a vulture, and a hawk; in the field three stars, legend effaced; below on a cartouche, IAO. R. Trophy between a monogram made up of I and N (possibly for Jesus of Nazareth) and the chrisma; at the base of the trophy is another chrisma. In the Bibliothèque Impériale; serpentine (Chabouillet, n. 2220).

Chabouillet regards the trophy as a figure of the cross triumphant, and thinks the gem belongs to one of the Gnostic sects, who especially revered the Saviour.

Later Persian and Sassanian Gems.—This is a class of engraved stones, which may best be treated separately as being of a different form, conical or hemispherical, to those already named; and bearing legends, when legends are present, in the Pehlevi character. The following meagre list consists wholly of intagli; those in the French collection are thought by Chabouillet to be earlier than the middle of the fourth century; but some appear to be later.

(1.) The Sacrifice of Abraham.—The patriarch holds the knife to slay his son lying on an altar (shaped like a Persian fire-altar); he turns back and sees the angel pointing out the ram; striped sardonyx. Bibl. Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1330). Another gem, of which Mr. King sends an impression, represents an aged Jew, in the field a child: whether this be the same subject or not, is uncertain.

(2.) The Visitation of the Virgin.—St. Elizabeth and the Virgin standing, joining hands; star and crescent (sun and moon) between them: Pehlevi legend, characters connected; cornelian; French collection (Chabouillet, n. 1332). Same subject probably, but without legend; long cross between the figures; sard (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. p. 45, pl. iv. n. 13). The latter gem is supposed by Mr. King, its owner, to be "the signet of some Nestorian Christian."

(3.) The Virgin and Child.—The Virgin Mary seated, holding the infant Saviour: Pehlevi legend; garnet; Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1331). The cursive form of the Pehlevi character indicates a late age, i.e. that it is probably of Nestorian work (King, Handbook, p. 103).

(4.) The Fish.—Fish placed in the middle of the Christian monogram, which is formed of the letters IX (Jesus Christ). Annular seal; cornelian; same collection (Chabouillet, n. 1333).

Before bringing this account of Christian gems to a close, it remains to be mentioned that some of them bear inscriptions only, both Greek and Latin, and these may better be named here than under the article INSCRIPTIONS.

(1.) Greek Inscriptions.—A red jasper in the British Museum, in an antique gold setting of corded wire, is inscribed, ΘΕΟC ΘΕΟΤ ΤΙΟC ΤΗΡΕΙ, i.e. O God, Son of God, guard me! A gem, figured by Ficoroni, has ΧΡΙCΤΟΤ, sc. δοῦλος (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9091). On a sardonyx, published by Le Blant, we read—ΧΡΕΙCΤΟC ΙΗCΟΥC ΜΕΤ ΕΜΟΤ, i.e. Jesus Christ be with me! (Id. n. 9096). A broken gem in the Copenhagen Museum, reads more at length to the same effect (Id. 9095). An inscription on a gem published by Quaranta, at Naples, whose date, though uncertain, may be suspected to be late, very possibly later than the period embraced by the work, reads, ΙCΘΦ CΥΝΗΡΑCΤΑΘΗΤΙ | ΕΜΟΙ ΚΑΙ ΤΟΙC ΕΡΓΟΙC | ΜΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΔΟC ΜΟΙ ΧΑΡΙΝ, i.e. O Joseph, aid me and my works, and grant me grace! (Id. 9099). A few other unimportant gems bear inscriptions, sometimes in raised letters, which may probably be Christian, such as ΜΑΡΙΑ ΖΗCΑΙC ΠΟΛΛΟΙC ΕΤΕCΙΝ, and the like (see Böckh, nos. 9104–9106).

(2.) Latin Inscriptions.—The acclamation VIVAS IN DEO occurs (varied) on several engraved stones, figured by Ficoroni (Gemm. Ant. Lit. tabb. vii. xi.; Martigny, Dict. p. 8); we have also MAXSENTI VIVAS TVIS F. (for cum tuis felicitatibus). (Perret, vol. iv. t. xvi. n. 58; Martigny, u. s.)^d On a cameo sard found in a Christian grave we read ROXANE D (dulcis), B (bene), QVESQVAS (quiescas). (Buonarrotti, Vetr. Cim. p. 170, t. 24). Occasionally the inscription is figured in metal round the stone, as in a gold ring inscribed VIVAS IN DEO ASBOLI, found in the Soane, the stone of which is lost; supposed to be of the third or fourth century (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, tom. i. p. 64, pl. n. 6). It was not uncommon from the sixth century onwards for signet rings, both in stone and metal, to be marked with the owner's name in monogram. Avitus, bishop of Vienne, had such a signet in iron; and a red jasper of the Lower empire, in the Bosanquet collection, reads, ANTONINVS, in monogram, which may not improbably be Christian (King, Handbook, p. 107). One of the earliest episcopal gems extant is probably one which was found at Villaverde in Spain, set in a bronze ring, inscribed FEBRVARIVS | EPISCOPVS (the stone is not specified); it may in all likelihood be referred to the Visigothic period (Hubner, Inscr. Hispan. Christ. n. 205). The series may fitly close with a red cameo gem, preserved in the public library at Madrid, reading in three lines, the text of Joh. xix. 36. OS NON COMINVEĀS ES (sic) EO. (Hubner, u. s. n. 208).

The preceding enumeration, though professionally incomplete, is more full, it is believed, than any hitherto published; the great rarity of Christian gems renders an apology for a detailed catalogue unnecessary. A few words in conclusion on the materials and the style of art and uses of these gems. The most usual material is the sard, of which the cornelian^e is only an inferior form, and the allied stones, the onyx, sardonyx, and chalcedony; next to these in point of number may be placed other kindred stones, the jaspers, whether red, green, or black. Sometimes the stone is heliotrope (or bloodstone), niccolò, crystal, amethyst, plasma, emerald, opal, lapis lazuli, serpentine, and, very rarely, sapphire. Garnet is occasionally found, a stone in which the Sassanian gem-engravings are often formed, and among these we have a Christian example. The hematite is especially the material on which the syncretistic designs, commonly called Gnostic, are engraved; and one of the few Christian gems of that class in this enumeration is of that material.

In engravings which range in all likelihood from the second to the ninth century^f (and some of those here mentioned, being of uncertain date, may be later even than that), we must expect that there will be a considerable amount of variation in the style and excellence of the workmanship. When the work is fine, the fact has been recorded, if known to the writer. Much more commonly the work is mediocre. "The art exhibited in early Christian gems is almost invariably of a low order," observes Mr. Fortnum; "they were for the most part the production of a period of decadence. The greater number have been cut by means of the wheel. Hence arises an additional difficulty in distinguishing the genuine from the false. Their rude workmanship is easy to copy with the same instrument as that with which they were cut; antique stones are abundant at hand, and Roman artists are apt and facile in imitation" (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 292).

^e These are not well distinguished in the preceding enumeration; the nomenclature here adopted is that of the author who names the gem; and this remark must be extended to the other stones mentioned. For much information in a small space on the materials of gems Prof. Story Maskelyne's Introduction to the Marlborough Gems (pp. xxvii.—xxxvi. 1870), may be consulted; as well as Mr. King's elaborate work on Precious Stones and Gems, London, 1865.

^f It is but rarely that anything save the work of the stone itself supplies date for conjecturing its age. However the fine emerald bearing a fish, described above, is enclosed in an hexagonal gold setting, which Mr. King calls "a pattern announcing for date the early years of the third century" (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 29). De Rossi admits the great difficulty of fixing the age of Christian gems, but thinks that a good many of those which bear the fish (type or legend) and anchor are of the fourth and fifth centuries, none being later (in Pitra's Spicileg. Solesm. iii. 555, 556).

^d This gem bears three heads, doubtless those of Maxentius and his family: it does not strictly fall within this section, but is placed here to accompany the other similar acclamations.

By much the greater part of the gems mentioned were used for finger-rings, those in intaglio being also employed as seals. Others, however, especially the Gnostic, were amulets, and carried about the person, suspended or otherwise, as charms. The larger camei, of the Byzantine period, appear to have been made for the purpose of decorating church plate or other ecclesiastical objects. (Martigny, Des anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens et de l'anneau épiscopal en particulier, Mâcon, 1858; Fortnum in Arch. Journ. 1869 and 1871; Early Christian Finger-rings; and King, Antique Gems and Rings, vol. ii. pp. 24-37 (Early Christian Glyptic Art), Lond. 1872, as well as his earlier books referred to above.) Much information also is to be gleaned from various catalogues of gems and other books, to which reference is made in the above works and in this paper.) [C. B.]

GENETHLIACI, says Augustine, who condemns all such arts (De Doc. Christ. ii. 21), were so called on account of their founding their predictions on the planets which ruled a man's birthday (γενέθλια); a more common name was Mathematici [ASTROLOGERS; DIVINATION]. He again refers, in the Confessions (iv. 3; vii. 6), to the folly and impiety of supposing that a man's vices were attributable to the fact that the planets Venus, Mars, or Saturn presided over his birth. The passage relating to this matter given in the Decree of Gratian (causa 26, qu. 4, c. 1) as from Augustine, is in fact from Rabanus Maurus De Mag. Proestigi., and was by him compiled mainly from Augustine and Isidore. In another passage of Augustine (Conf. iv. 3, quoted in De ret. can. 26. qu. 2, c. 8) Gratian seems to have read "planetarios" for the "planos" of recent editions. All augurs, aruspices, mathematici, and other impostors of that kind were condemned by a law of Constantius, A.D. 357 (Code, lib. v.; De Maleficiis et Mathematicis, in Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum, p. iii. tit. iv. cc. 12-14). [C.]

GENIUS OF THE EMPEROR. In the early centuries of the church, one of the tests by which Christians were detected was, to require them to make oath "by the genius or the fortune of the emperor;" an oath which the Christians, however willing to pray for kings, constantly refused as savouring of idolatry. Thus Polycarp (Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 18) was required to swear by the fortune (τύχην) of Caesar. And Saturninus (Acta Marti. Scillit. c. 1, in Ruinart, p. 86, 2nd ed.) adjured Speratus, one of the martyrs of Scillita, "tantum jura per genium regis nostri;" to which he replied "Ego imperatoris mundi genium nescio."

Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 29) reprobates the deification of the emperor, and the heathen practice of swearing by his "genius" or "daemon;" and Tertullian (Apol. c. 32) says that, although Christians did not swear by the genius of the Caesars, they swore by a more august oath, "per salutem eorum." We do not, says Origen (c. Celsum, bk. 8, p. 421, Spencer), swear by the emperor's fortune (τύχην βασιλέως), any more than by other reputed deities; for (as some at least think) they who swear by his fortune swear by his daemon, and Christians would die rather than take such an oath (Bingham's Antiquities, xvi. vii. 7). GENII. [FRESCO, p. 693.]

GENOFEVA or GENOVEFA, virgin-saint, of Paris († circa 514 A.D.); commemorated Jan. 3 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi); translation Oct. 28 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GENTILLY, COUNCIL OF (Gentiliacense Concilium), held A.D. 767, at Gentilly, near Paris, but authentic records of its proceedings are wanting. Annalists of the next age say that it was assembled by Pepin to consider a twofold question that had arisen between the Eastern and Western churches respecting the Trinity and the images of the saints (Pertz, i. 144). Quite possibly the iconoclastic council of Constantinople, A.D. 754, may have been discussed there, but there is no proof that the dispute between the two churches on the procession of the Holy Ghost had commenced as yet. The letter of pope Paul to Pepin (Mansi, xii. 614) is much too vague to be relied on, and what embassies are recorded to have come from the east in his reign are still less to the purpose (Id. p. 677; comp. Pagi, ad Baron. A.D. 766, n. 3). [E. S. Fr.]

GENUFLECTENTES. [PENITENTS.]

GENUFLEXION, PROSTRATION, ETC.

The early Christians used five different postures in their worship. They stood upright, or with the head and back bent forward, they knelt on both knees, and they prostrated themselves at length (prostrato omni corpore in terrâ; said of penitents at their reconciliation, Sacram. Gelas. lib. i. nn. xvi. xxxviii. in Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. i. coll. 504, 550).

Standing had been the more common posture in prayer among the Jews (Neh. ix. 2-4; St. Matt. vi. 5; St. Luke xviii. 11, 13); but they knelt (2 Chron. vi. 13; Dan. vi. 10; Ezra ix. 5) and prostrated themselves also (Num. xiv. 5;

* To the last-named author the writer is deeply indebted for impressions of several gems and for the loan of his beautiful plates for the present article: they are drawn, like all the others (when not copied from other books) to twice the diameter of the originals.

Josh. v. 14; 1 Kings xviii. 39, &c.); and the first converts to the gospel imported their former customs into the church. Thus Stephen knelt in his last prayer (Acts vii. 60); St. Peter knelt when he besought God for the life of Dorcas (ix. 40); St. Paul, when at Ephesus he prayed for the elders (xx. 36); the brethren at Tyre and their wives and children knelt with him on the shore, when he left them to go to Jerusalem (xxi. 5). In the language of the same apostle, "bowing the knee" to God is synonymous with "praying" to him (Eph. iii. 14). The Christian knelt in prayer more than the unconverted Jew; and this was natural, for the greater knowledge of God produced a stronger sense of unworthiness, and thus led to more marked and frequent expressions of humility in drawing nigh to him. "The bending of the knees is as a token of penitence and sorrow" (Cassian. Coll. xxi. c. xx. p. 795). This was the recognized principle, and it ruled the occasions on which the posture was employed. "The knee," says St. Ambrose, "is made flexible, by which, beyond other members, the offence of the Lord is mitigated, wrath appeased, grace called forth" (Hexameron, lib. vi. c. ix. n. 74).

Before we proceed it should be explained that the early church made no distinction in language between "kneeling" and "prostration." It is evident that men did not kneel upright, but threw themselves more or less forward, so that the posture might have either name. Sometimes indeed they so supported themselves by putting their hands or arms on the ground, that "kneeling" was a position of rest compared with standing. Thus Cassian complains that some western monks, when prostrate on the ground, "often wished that same bowing of the limbs (which he expressly calls genu flectere) to be prolonged, not so much for the sake of prayer as of refreshment" (Instit. lib. ii. c. 7). The same inference may be drawn from the fact that the third class of public penitents were indifferently called kneelers or prostrators, were said either γόνυ κλίνειν, genu flectere, or ἑνὸς ἑστέιν, se substernere. Thus in a canon made at Neocaesarea in Pontus about A.D. 314, we read, can. v., "Let a catechumen . . . who has fallen into sin, if he be a kneeler (γόνυ κλίνων), become a hearer." Similarly the eighty-second canon of the so-called fourth council of Carthage held in 398: "Let penitents (the prostrators were especially so called) kneel even on days of relaxation." But the same class were far more frequently described as prostrators. For example, in the eleventh canon of Nicaea, A.D. 325, it is decreed that certain offenders "shall be prostrators (ὀπισθοσύνται) for seven years." (Compare can. xii.; Conc. Ancy. can. iv. v. &c.; Greg. Thaum. viii. ix.; Basil. ad Amphilo. lvi. lvii. &c.; and many others.) A more direct piece of evidence comes from the 7th century. Pseudo-Dionysius (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. v. sed. iii. § 2, tom. i. p. 364) says that "the approach to the Divine altar and the prostration (of candidates for holy orders) intimates to all who are admitted to priestly functions that they must entirely submit their personal life to God, from whom their consecration comes," &c.; whereupon his scholiast Maximus, A.D. 645, explains "prostration" to mean "kneeling" (p. 375). So in the West, as late as the 9th century, in the same canon, "fixis in terram genibus" and "humiliter in terram prosterni" (Conc. Turon. A.D. 813, can. 37) are employed to describe the same posture. Other indications of similar usage will be observed in some passages below.

Kneeling or prostration was probably the general posture of the early Christians in prayer not regulated by public authority. Thus Clemens Romanus, in a general exhortation, "Let us fall down before the Lord, and beseech Him with tears," &c. (Epist. i. ad Cor. c. 48). When St. Ignatius prayed for the churches before his martyrdom, it was "cum genuflexione omnium fratrum" (Martirium S. Ign. c. vi.). Hermas represents himself, before his first vision, "kneeling down and beginning to pray to God and confess his sins" (lib. i. vis. i. § 1). Hegesippus, A.D. 170, relates that St. James the Just "used to enter the temple alone, and to be found lying on his knees (κείμενος ἐν τοῖς γόνασι)" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. xliii.). He adds that his knees from continual kneeling became callous like those of a camel. When Eusebius relates the story of the Melitine legion in the Marcomannic war, about 174, he says of the Christian soldiers, "They put their knees on the ground, as our custom is in prayer" (Ibid. lib. v. c. v.). Tertullian, having referred to the same event some sixteen years after its occurrence, asks, "When have not even droughts been driven away by our kneelings and fastings?" (Ad Scapulam, c. iv.). We read in the Life of St. Cyprian, by Pontius his deacon, that on his way to death he "knelt on the earth, and prostrated himself in prayer to God" (Vita Opp. praeixa). Eusebius tells us that Constantine the Great used "at stated times every day, shutting himself up in secret closets of his palace, there to converse alone with God, and falling on his knees to ask importunately for the things whereof he had need" (Vita Constant. lib. iv. c. xxii.). In his last illness, "kneeling on the ground, he was a suppliant to God," &c. (Ibid. c. lxi.). Gregory Nazianzen, speaking of his sister's habits of devotion, mentions "the bowing of her knees become callous, and as it were grown to the ground" (Orat. viii. § 13. Compare St. Jerome in Epist. ad Marcellam de Asellâ). Augustine, relating a miraculous answer to prayer in the healing of a sick person, says, "While we were fixing our knees and laying ourselves on the ground (terrae incumbentes) in the usual manner, he flung himself forward, as if thrown heavily down by some one pushing him, and began to pray," &c. (De Civ. Dei, lib. xxii. c. viii. § 2). Elsewhere the same father, speaking of private prayer, says, "They who pray do with the members of their body that which befits suppliants, when they fix their knees, stretch forth their hands, or even prostrate themselves on the ground" (De Curâ pro Mortuis, c. v.). Only in this last passage, it will be observed, are kneeling and prostration distinguished from each other.

But the early Christians knelt or prostrated themselves as each chose, in the stated common worship of the church also. Thus Arnobius:—"To Him (i.e. Christ) we all by custom prostrate ourselves: Him with united (collatis) prayers we adore" (Adv. Gent. lib. i. c. 27). Epiphanius: "The church commands us to send up prayers to God without ceasing, with all frequency, and earnest supplications, and kneeling on the appointed days, by night and in the day, and in some places they celebrate synaxes even on the sabbath," &c. (De Fide, § 24). St. Jerome says that it is according to "ecclesiastical custom to bend the knee to Christ" (Comm. in Isai. c. xlv. v. 23). St. Chrysostom (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor. viii. 24), of the celebration of the Holy Communion:—"Again, after we have shut out from the sacred precincts those who cannot partake of the Holy Table, there must be another kind of prayer, and we all in like manner lie on the floor (δυοίως ἐπ' ἐδάφους κείμεθα), and all in like manner rise up." We understand this better on a reference to the liturgy in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions. There we find (lib. viii. c. ix. Cotelier. tom. i. p. 396) that the "first prayer of the faithful" was said by all kneeling, the deacon crying out, "Let us, the faithful, all kneel." During the rest of the liturgy all stood.

At other times of service the rule was for all to kneel in prayer, except on Sundays and between Easter and Whitsuntide. Few customs are more frequently mentioned by early writers, and none perhaps more frequently said to be derived from the age of the apostles. The earliest witness is Irenæus, in a fragment of his work on Easter preserved in the "Questions and Answers to the Orthodox," Quæst. 115, ascribed to Justin Martyr. Irenæus traced it to the apostles. In answer to a question respecting the reason and origin of the custom, the latter writer says, "Since it behoved us always to remember both our own fall into sins and the grace of our Christ through which we have arisen from the fall, therefore our kneeling on the six days is a sign of our fall into sins, but our not kneeling on the Lord's day is a sign of the rising again, through which, by the grace of Christ, we have been delivered from our sins and from death, their due, now itself put to death." Ibid. Other witnesses are Tertullian, speaking both of Sunday and the paschal season (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.; similarly, De orat. c. xxiii.); Peter of Alexandria, A.D. 301, can. xv. of Sunday only. The council of Nicaea, 325, both of Sunday and the days of Pentecost, can. xx.; St. Hilary, also of the "Week of Weeks" and the Lord's day both (Prolog. in Psalm. § 12), who refers it to the apostles. His expression is, "No one worships with his body prostrated on the ground." Epiphanius, also of both (De Fide, § 22). St. Basil, of both, as an apostolical tradition (De Spiritu Sancto, c. lxvi., al. xxvii.). St. Jerome, likewise of both (Diad. contr. Luciferianos, c. iv.); and again, of the fifty days, in Proem. in Ep. ad Eph., "We neither bend the knee nor bow ourselves to the ground." St. Augustine, after giving the Scriptural reason, says, "On this account both are fasts relaxed [during the paschal quinquagesima] and we pray standing, which is a sign of the resurrection, whence also the same is observed at the altar on all Lord's days." (Ep. lv. ad Januar. c. xv. n. 28. Compare c. xvii. n. 32.) From St. Maximus of Turin, A.D. 422, we learn the same facts and the reason (Hom. iii. De Pentec.). Cassian, A.D. 424, mentions the restriction on kneeling at those times (Instit. lib. ii. c. xviii.; Collat. xxi. c. xx.). In the collection of canons put forth by Martin, a Pannonian by birth, but bishop of Bracara in Spain, A.D. 560, the same prohibition occurs, borrowed from a Greek or oriental source (can.

lvii.). His words are, "non prostriati, nec humiliati." The 90th canon of the Trullan council, held at Constantinople in 691, forbids kneeling "from the evening entrance of the priests to the altar on Saturday until the next evening on the Lord's day." The council does not mention the longer period, and its object seems to have been merely to settle the hours at which the observance should begin and end.

From the fact that the 20th canon of Nicaea is not found in the abridgement of canons by Rufinus (Hist. Eccl. lib. x. c. v.), nor in an ancient codex supposed to be the authorised collection of the church of Rome, Quesnel (Diss. xii., at the end of St. Leo's Works, c. v.) supposed that the custom of not kneeling on Sunday, &c. was never received at Rome. See Routh, Opuscula, tom. ii. p. 444, or Reliquiae Sacrae, tom. iv. p. 75, ed. 2. We find, however, that the prohibition was enforced in the dominions of the Frankish princes after they had imposed the Roman office on their subjects. Those times were excepted from the general order for kneeling at prayer made by the third council of Tours, A.D. 813, can. 37. It was forbidden by a capitulary of Louis the Godly, A.D. 817 (Capit. Reg. Franc. tom. ii. col. 586, cap. li.) during "the Pentecost week." Rabanus Maurus, also, at Mentz, A.D. 847, says, as if vouching for a present fact, "On those days the knees are not bent in prayer." "On the Lord's day we pray standing" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii. cc. 41-2). It is very improbable, therefore, that the custom was not known and observed at Rome.

In all the ancient liturgies except the Roman, if, indeed, that be an exception (see Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 579), the bishop gave a blessing before the communion. In all but the Clementine this was preceded by a monition from the deacon: e.g., in St. James and St. Basil, "Let us bow down our heads unto the Lord;" in St. Chrysostom, "Bow down your heads unto the Lord" (Liturg. PP., pp. 32, 66, 102); in St. Mark, "Bow your heads to Jesus Christ" (Renaud. tom. i. p. 160); in the Mozarabic, "Humiliate vos benedictioni" (Missale, Leslie, pp. 6, 246); in a Roman Ordo, early, but of uncertain date, "Humiliate vos ad benedictionem" (Ord. vi. § 11, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 75). Several liturgies had a benediction after the communion also, for which the people bowed themselves. In some, indeed, the deacon here repeated his direction. See St. James (Lit. PP. p. 39); the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil and of St. Cyril (Renaud. tom. i. pp. 85, 125). In Egypt, for this reason, benedictions were usually called "Prayers of Inclination," or "Of Bowing the Head" (Renaud. u. s. pp. 35, 36, 50, 77, &c.). The same gesture, similarly bidden by the deacon, was employed in other parts of the service. See St. James, u. s. p. 9, and Renaud. u. s. pp. 77, 79, 105, &c. In particular, the catechumens bowed while the prayer proper to them was said before their dismissal. Thus the deacon, in St. Basil and in St. Chrysostom: "Ye catechumens, bow down your heads unto the Lord" (Lit. PP., pp. 48, 87). The Malabar: "Incline your heads for the laying on of hands, and receive the blessing" (Hist. Eccl. Malab. Raulin, p. 304).

Two sermons of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, A.D. 602, illustrate our subject, as regards the habits of the people, in a graphic manner:—"I intreat and admonish you, dearest brethren, that as often as prayer is said by the clergy at the altar, or prayer is bidden by the deacon, ye faithfully bow, not your hearts only, but your bodies also; for when I often, as I ought, and heedfully take notice, as the deacon cries, 'Let us bend our knees,' I see the greater part standing like upright columns." "Let it not be grievous to him, who from some weakness cannot bend his knees, either to bow his back or incline his head." Again: "In like manner I admonish you of this, dearest brethren, that as often as the deacon shall proclaim that ye ought to bow yourselves for the benediction, ye faithfully incline both bodies and heads; because the benediction, though given to you through man, is yet not given from man." (Serm. Caes. lxxxv. §§ 1, 5; Sim. lxxxiv. §§ 1, 2.)

The priest himself often inclined his head during the prayers. (See St. James, u. s. pp. 7, 13, 17, &c., and St. Mark, u. s. pp. 150, 153.) Many observances of this kind are lost to us from the want of rubrics in the ancient liturgies, or from their incompleteness. This is especially the case with those of the West; but there is one Ordo of the age of Charlemagne in which the priest is directed to say the prayer In spiritu humilitatis "bowed before the altar." (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. v.) We might here also cite the Mozarabic and Milanese missals, if the antiquity of their rubrics were not generally uncertain.

From pseudo-Dionysius we learn that while bishops and priests at their ordination knelt on both knees, deacons knelt on one only (De Eccl. Hier. c. v. § ii. tom. i. p. 364.) [W. E. S.]

GERMANICA CONCILIA, councils celebrated in Germany, but at places unknown.

1. A.D. 743, probably, being the first of five said to have met under St. Boniface by his biographer, but great obscurity hangs over their date, number, and canons, to say the least.

Mansi really settles nothing (xii. 355 and seq.), and the Oxford editors of Wilkins still less (iii. 382, note). Again, in the preface to this council it is Carloman, mayor of the palace who speaks, and its seven canons, besides running in his name form the first of his capitularies (Mansi, ib. 366, and App. 104). Certainly, the first of them constituting Boniface archbishop over the bishops of his dominions cannot have been decreed but by him. True, there is a letter from Boniface to pope Zachary requesting leave for holding a synod of this kind, which was at once given (Mansi, ib. 312-19), and in another, purporting to be from Boniface to archbishop Cuthbert (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 376), three sets of canons are quoted as having been decreed by the writer, of which these form the second. Still, even so, when and where were the other two sets passed? What Mansi prints (xii. 383) as "statutes of St. Boniface" in one place, were probably the work of a later hand, as he says in another (ib. 362).

2. A.D. 745, at Mayence possibly, where Aldebert and Clement were pronounced heretics, and Gervilion of Mayence deposed to be succeeded by Boniface (Mansi, ib. 371).

3. A.D. 747, at which the first four general councils were ordered to be received. Possibly the tenth of the letters of pope Zachary may relate to this (Mansi, ib. 409 and 342).

4. A.D. 759, at which Othmar, abbot of St. Gall, was unjustly condemned (Mansi, ib. 660). [E. S. Ff.]

GERONA, COUNCIL OF (Gerundense concilium), held A.D. 517, at Gerona in Catalonia, and passed ten canons on discipline, to which seven of the ten bishops present at the synod of Tarragona the year before subscribed. By the first the order laid down for celebrating mass and saying the psalter and ministering in general throughout the province of Tarragona is to be that of the metropolitan church. By the last the Lord's prayer is to be said on all days after matins and vespers by the priest. By the second and third rogation days are to be kept with abstinence twice a year: viz., the three last days of Whitsun week, and the first three days in November; or, one of them being a Sunday, the three last days of the week following (Mansi, viii. 547 and seq.) [E. S. Ff.]

GERONTIUS, bishop of Sevilla la Vieja in Spain (saec. I.); commemorated Aug. 25 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GERTRUDIS, virgin, martyr in Ireland; commemorated March 17 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GERUNDENSE CONCILIUM. [GERONA, COUNCIL OF.]

GERVASIUS, martyr at Milan with Protasius, his brother, under Nero; commemorated June 19 (Mart. Bedae, Hieron., Cal. Carthag., Cal. et Sacrament. Frontonis, Mart. Adonis, Usuardi); also with Nazarius, and Celsus, June 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet.), and Oct. 14 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

GERVASIUS AND PROTASIIUS, SS., IN ART. The basilica of St. Ambrose in Milan was dedicated by him, June 19th 387, to these martyrs, whose bones he transferred to it. The name of the church has, however, been derived by posterity from that of its founder. The author may refer to the personal testimony of Father Ambrose St. John of the Oratory, as to a late discovery of bones in the Basilica of St. Ambrose, which seems strongly to confirm the tradition of the burial of actually martyred persons among its foundations.*

St. Gervasius appears repeatedly in the paintings of the Ambrosian basilica, especially in the great mosaic of the apse (Sommerard, Album des Arts, pl. xix. 9 série). St. Protasius is with him, as in other parts of the church. This mosaic cannot be later than the 9th century, and may probably be of the same date as that in the great church of St. Apollinaris in Classe at Ravenna, 7th century. (See Ciampini Vet. Monumenta, tom. ii. pl. xxv. No. 11, and p. 95 in text.) Two portrait medallions of these saints are to be seen in the church of St. Vitale in the same city. [R. St. J. T.]

GETULIUS, martyr at Rome with Aman-tius, Cerealis, and Primitivus, in the time of Adrian (circa 124 A.D.); "passio," June 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GIDEON or GEDEON, the prophet; commemorated with Joshua, Sept. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GIFTS. [ARRHAE; ELEMENTS, p. 600.]

GILBERTUS, "in territorio Parisiacensi, vico Christoilo;" commemorated with Agodas, and innumerable others of both sexes, June 24 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GILDARDUS, bishop of Rouen († post 508); "natalis" June 8 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GILDING. A frequent mode of decorating the interiors of churches was by gilding. The earliest reference we have to it is in the letter of the emperor Constantine to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, relating to the church of the Holy Sepulchre, which he was about to have built, consulting him, among other points, as to the character of the ceiling he wished to have constructed. The emperor evidently inclined to a ceiling divided into panels (λακωναρια, laqueata), inasmuch as it could be decorated with gold (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. c. 32). This plan was carried out on the most magnificent scale, and, "by means of compartments, stretched its vast expanse over the whole basilica, covered throughout with resplendent gold, so as to make the whole temple dazzling as with a blaze of light" (Ib. c. 36). The beams of the roof of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome were originally, A.D. 386, covered with gold-leaf.

"Bracteolas trabibus sublevit. ut omnis aurlenta

Lux esset intus. ceu jubar sub ortu."

(Petron. Passio Beat. Apost.)

The church built by St. Paulinus at Nola had also a panelled ceiling, "alto et lacunato culmine" (Paulin. Epist. xxxii. 12), but gilding is not expressly mentioned. References to these ceilings of gilded panelling are frequent in Jerome, who speaks of "the laquearia and roof gleaming with gold," "the gilded ceilings," and the like, with some expression of regret that so much that might have been devoted to Christ's poor was lavished on architectural decoration (Hieron. lib. ii. in Zach. viii.; Epist. ii. ad Nepot.; Epist. viii. ad Demetriad.). From the last-quoted passage we learn that the capitals of the pillars were also gilt, and that the altars were ornamented with gold and jewels. In the more magnificent churches erected in Justinian's reign, the altars were often of silver plated with gold. The altar given by Pulcheria, A.D. 414, to the church at Constantinople was elaborately constructed of gold and precious stones (Soz. H. E. ix. 1). This was surpassed by the altar given by Justinian to St. Sophia, which was all of gold resplendent with gems (Ducange, Constantinop. Christ. lib. iii. p. 47). The altar at St. Ambrogio, at Milan, made A.D. 835, is covered with plates of gold and silver, with subjects in high relief [ALTAR, p. 64]. The domes which crowned the early churches in the East were often gilt externally. (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. VIII. viii. 5; Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 182.) [E. V.]

GIRDLE (ζώνη; balteus, cingulum, zona). Among nations who wore long flowing robes, it is obvious that the use of the girdle would be necessary for convenience in walking, or in active work. This very way, however, of using the girdle would cause it to be more or less hidden by the dress; and thus we are à priori prepared for the fact that, while in the early Christian centuries we continually meet with the girdle used as a matter of practical convenience, it is not till the eighth century that we find it recognized as an ecclesiastical vestment strictly so called. The use of it in these earlier times seems not unfrequently to have carried with it the idea of an imitation of the ancient Jewish prophets, and thus to have been worn by those who followed a monastic life, and those who professed, in reality or in seeming, to imitate their austerities. We find, for example, pope Celestinus I. (ob. 432 A.D.) finding fault with those who, by affecting this style of dress ("amicti pallio et lumbos praecincti"), seemed to claim for themselves a sanctity of life not rightly theirs (Epist. 4 ad Episc. Vienn. et Narb. c. 2; Patrol. I. 431). Salvianus (ob.

* See note, p. 433, J. H. Newman's Historical Sketches, Pickering, 1872. A letter of the greatest interest, which seems to leave little room for doubt as to the authenticity of the bodies of St. Ambrose and the two martyrs.

circa 495 A.D.) refers to the same idea, in the words addressed to an unworthy monk, "licet fidem cingulo afferas" (Adv. avaritiam iv. 5; Patrol. liii. 232). See also Basil (Epist. 45 ad monachum lapsum; Patrol. Gr. xxxii. 366). To take an instance of a different type, Fulgentius (ob. 533 A.D.) on his elevation to the see of Ruspe, is said in his biography (formerly attributed to Ferrandus Diaconus) to have retained the girdle with the rest of the monastic habit—"pelliceo cingulo tanquam monachus utebatur" (c. 37; Patrol. lxxv. 136). The Rule of St. Benedict forbade the laying aside of the monastic girdle even at night; for the monks were to sleep "vestiti . . . et cincti cingulis aut funibus" (Regula S. Benedicti, c. 22: see also Regula S. Donati, c. 65).

It may further be remarked that the girdle was commonly worn as an ornament by sovereigns and nobles. Thus, in a homily once assigned to Chrysostom, but now generally believed to be a work of the sixth century, the girdle is spoken of as an ordinary ornament of kings, and with this royal use of it is compared the girdle of our Lord (Hom. de Uno Legislatore, c. 3; vol. vi. 409, ed. Montfaucon). It will readily be seen how important a bearing the above facts have on the main general question, to which we can only refer thus in passing, as to whether the dress of the early Christian ministry was derived from that of the Levitical priesthood. In this last, it will be remembered, the girdle was a very important element.

It has been said that it was not till the 8th century that we meet with the girdle as an ecclesiastical vestment in the strict sense of the word. It is true that we do meet with references to it at an earlier period, as to that worn by Gregory the Great, which later generations are said by his biographer to have regarded as a precious relic (Joannis Diaconi Vita S. Greg. Magni, iv. 80; Patrol. lxxv. 228). Still, it must be remembered, the use of an article of dress by ecclesiastics is a totally different thing from their use of it because they are ecclesiastics; and for instances of this latter we must pass on to a later period.

Perhaps the earliest reference of this kind is one by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (ob. 740 A.D.), in his description of the various priestly vestments (Historia Ecclesiastica et Mystica Contemplatio; Patrol. Gr. xcviii. 394), in which he also alludes to the napkin attached to the girdle worn by deacons (ὡς ἐγγέλριον τὸ ἐπὶ τῆς ζώνης). Rabanus Maurus, in his treatise de Institutione Clericorum (i. 17; Patrol. cvii. 306), a work probably written about the year 819 A.D., refers to the girdle as one of the regular Christian vestments, and dwells on the symbolism of it at some length. A curious injunction, for which a curious reason is given, as to the wearing of the girdle, is found in one of the so-called Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea, edited by Abraham Ecchelenensis (can. 66; Labbe ii. 335). According to this, the clergy are forbidden to wear a girdle during divine service.

In earlier times the girdle was often doubtlessly richly adorned: the reference we have already given to its regal use is illustrative of this, and we may further cite Chrysostom (Hom. in Psal. 48; vol. v. 521), where, inveighing against various articles of luxury in dress, he speaks of golden girdles. Apparently, too, this state of things prevailed after the girdle became a recognized ecclesiastical vestment, the excessive ornamentation being, it would seem, viewed as a secular element in the ecclesiastical dress. Thus we find Durandus (ob. 1296 A.D.) speaking of the clergy in the time of the emperor Louis I., the son of Charlemagne, as laying aside "Cingula auro texta, exquisitas vestes, et alia secularia ornamenta" (Rationale Div. Off. iii. 1). A further illustration of this is furnished by the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. 915 A.D.), in which he bequeaths, among other precious articles, "zonas quinque, una cum auro et gemmis pretiosis, et alias quattuor cum auro" (Patrol. cxxiii. 468).

Later liturgical writers [e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis (Gemma Animae, i. 206; Patrol. clxxii. 606), Innocent iii. (de Sacro Altaris mysterio, i. 52; Patrol. ccxvii. 793), and Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. iii. 4)] speak further of an under girdle (subcingulum, subcinctorium, succinctorium), and generally as a vestment peculiar to bishops. So in the ancient mass given by Menard (Greg. Sacr. col. 249) from the C^d. Ratoldi, the bishop puts on both a cingulum and a baltus, the former perhaps the unseemly and simple primitive girdle, the latter the elaborate ornament of later times. This subject, however, falls beyond our limits; reference may be made to Bona de Rebus Liturg. i. 24. 15.

A brief remark may be made in passing as to the special significance of the girdle in reference to the bestowal or deprivation of office. Thus Gregory the Great congratulates a friend "praefecturae vos suscepisse cingula" (Epist. x. 37; Patrol. lxxvii. 1094). Atto, bishop of Verceilae (ob. circa 960 A.D.), writing to one bishop Azo, orders that a man who should contract a marriage within the prohibited degrees "cinguli sui patiatu amissionem" (Epist. 5; Patrol. cxxxiv. 107). Similar references are often found in the Theodosian code, and elsewhere (see e.g. Cod. Theodos. lib. viii. tit. i. l. 11; lib. x. tit. 26, l. 1), in a way that often suggests the belt of knighthood of later times.

For further references to the subject of the girdle in its different aspects, see Ducange's Glossarium s. vv.; Marriott's Vestitium Christianum, p. 213, etc.; Hefele, Die liturgischen Gewänder, pp. 178 sqq.; Bock, Geschichte der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, ii. pp. 50 sqq. [R. S.]

GLADIATORS. A passion for gladiatorial combats had a strong hold upon the popular mind of pagan Rome; and under the empire magnificent amphitheatres were built for such exhibitions, and others of an almost equally barbarous nature, which seem to have presented a peculiarly fascinating attraction both to men and women in those times.

Augustine mentions a case in which even a Christian, having been induced to be present at one of these exhibitions, and having kept his eyes closed for a time—on opening them, at a sudden outcry which he heard, instead of being shocked or disgusted at the sight, was hurried along with the spirit of the assembled people—was overcome with a wild and savage delight at beholding the scene of bloodshed and death, and carried away with him an inextinguishable desire to witness the same spectacles again (August. Conf. vi. 8).

Some pagan moralists expressed more or less strongly their disapprobation of the gladiatorial shows, as being inhuman and demoralizing (Seneca, Ep. vii. and Pliny, Ep. iv. 22); but they were too popular to be checked by such remonstrances; and nothing effectual was done to stop them until they were opposed and finally suppressed by the intervention of Christian principles and Christian heroism.

The church expressed its abhorrence of these barbarous games as soon as it came in contact with them, not only by discountenancing attendance at them, but by refusing to admit gladiators to Christian baptism (see Constit. Apostol. viii. 32). In this canon, charioteers, racers, and many others, are included in the same condemnation; probably because the public exhibitions in which they took a part were more or less connected with idolatry. And for the same reason such persons, if they had already been received into the church, were to be punished by excommunication (Concil. Arelat. i. 4).

The first imperial edict prohibiting the exhibition of gladiators was issued by Constantine in A.D. 325, just after the council of Nice had been convened (Cod. Theod. xv. 12, 1). Forty years later Valentinian forbade that any Christian criminals should be condemned to fight as gladiators; and in A.D. 367 he included in a similar exemption those who had been in the imperial service about the court (Palatini) (Cod. Theod. ix. 40, 8 and 11).

Honorius, at the end of this century, ordered that no slave, who had been a gladiator, should be taken into the service of a senator (Cod. Theod. xv. 12, 3).

All these edicts resulted from the operation of Christian principles and feelings, and they show the rise and growth of a more civilized opinion, which these imperial utterances also helped to promote; but they produced little or no direct effect in putting a stop to such exhibitions.

The decree of Constantine seems to have applied only to the province of Phœnicia—to the prefect of which it was addressed; or, at any rate, it very soon became a dead letter; for a few years later Libanius alludes to gladiatorial shows as still regularly exhibited in Syria (Libanius, de vita sua, 3). And although they were never seen in Constantinople—where a passion for chariot races seems to have supplied their place—yet at Rome and in the Western empire they continued unrestricted, except by some trifling regulations. Even Theodosius the Great, though in some things very submissive to church authorities, compelled his Sarmatian prisoners to fight as gladiators; for which he was applauded by Symmachus, as having imitated approved examples of older times, and having made those minister to the pleasure of the people, who had previously been their dread (Symmachus, Ep. x. 61).

Thus these sanguinary games held their place among the popular amusements, and afforded their savage gratification to the multitude until their suppression was at last effected by the courage and self-devotion of an individual Christian.

In the year 404, while a show of gladiators was being exhibited at Rome in honour of the victories of Stilicho, an Asiatic monk named Telemachus, who had come to Rome for the purpose of endeavouring to stop this barbarous practice, rushed into the amphitheatre, and strove to separate the combatants. The spectators—enraged at his attempt to deprive them of their favourite amusement—stoned him to death. But a deep impression was produced. Telemachus was justly honoured as a martyr, and the emperor Honorius—taking advantage of the feeling which had been evoked—effectually put a stop to gladiatorial combats, which were never exhibited again (Theodoret, H. E. v. 26).

GLASS. (i.) Window glass.—The use of glass in windows in Roman times was much more common than was formerly supposed, and examples of such glass have been met with not only in Pompeii, but in our own country in various places. It was also used by Christians in early times, though perhaps not very commonly, for the windows of their churches, and then it was sometimes coloured. Thus Prudentius, speaking of the Basilica of St. Paul, built by Constantine, says: "In the arched window ran (panes of) wonderfully variegated glass: it shone like a meadow decked with spring flowers."^a Glass, probably of the church destroyed A.D. 420, has been lately found at Trèves (Archæol. xl. 194). Venantius Fortunatus (circa 560) thus speaks (lib. ii. poem. 11) of the windows of the church in Paris:

"Prima capit radios vitreis oculata fenestris; Artificisque manu clausit in arce diem."

From Gaul artists in glass were first introduced into Britain (A.D. 676) by Benedict Biscop for the church windows at Weremouth in Durham, "ad cancellanda ecclesie porticuunque et coenaculorum ejus fenestras" (Bed. lit. S. Benedict. § 5). Other early examples may be seen in Ducange, s. v. Vitreae, and Bentham's Hist. and Antiq. of Ely, p. 21 (ed. 2). Pope Leo III. (circa 795) adorned the windows of the apse of the basilica of the Lateran with glass of several colours, "ex vitro diversis coloribus" (Anastasius Vitæ Pontific. p. 208, C. ed. Murat.); and this, as some think, "is the earliest instance of the kind that can be cited with confidence" (Winston, Anc. Glass Paint., p. 2; Fleury, H. E. xlii. 20).

Painted glass belongs apparently to an age a little later than the present work embraces. "It is a fact," says M. Labarte, "acknowledged by all archaeologists, that we do not now know any painted glass to which can be assigned with certainty an earlier date than that of the 11th century"^b (Handbook, p. 69). The invention itself, however, may perhaps have been somewhat earlier.^c

Sic prata vernis floribus reudent."

Perist. ph. xii. 53, 54.

The above interpretation, which is substantially that of Emeric David and Labarte, seems much preferable to that which makes hyalo mean mosaic. (Labarte, Handbook of Arts of Middle Ages, c. ii. p. 66, Engl. trans.)

^b Two examples only, belonging to this century, are figured by M. Lasteyrie in his great work, Histoire de la Peinture sur Verre.

^c The art is described with many details by the monk Theophilus, whose age is unfortunately uncertain. Lessing

(ii.) Glass vessels.—These were used by the Christians as well as by the heathen for interment with the dead, and the so-called lacrymatories, which are really unguent bottles, have been found in the catacombs of Rome (Seroux d'Agincourt, Hist. de l'Art par ses Monum. t. viii. f. 21, "Sculpture"), and elsewhere, as Todi, Villeja, and Sardinia: the vessels are of various kinds, and are sometimes ornamented with letters and sometimes with palm-branches (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 89). Perret figures a long drinking-glass, copied here, ornamented with palms (incised), from the catacombs; at the bottom is some red substance: see below. The Slade Collection, recently acquired by the British Museum, contains a vessel of the same general form, of white glass, found at Cologne, probably of the 4th or 5th century, with incised figures of Adam and Eve, and of Moses striking the rock.

Glass incised Cup. (Perret.)

The Sloane Collection in the same museum has a plain glass beaker from the catacombs embedded in the original plaster: likewise a glass ampulla marked with a cross and on each side, also from the catacombs. At the bottom of some of these small vessels has been found a dark crust, and it has been made a question whether this is the sediment of the blood of the martyr buried there or of some other substance. There are even some vessels inscribed SANGVIS, or SANG, or SA (Aringhi, Rom. Subt. t. i. p. 499); but De Rossi, Garrucci, and Martigny (Dict. p. 592 q. v.) are agreed that they are forgeries. These, however, do not necessarily prove that the substance found in genuine glass vessels is never in any case blood; and according to Martigny, the chemical researches of Broglia in 1845, supposed that he wrote in the 9th century; if this were so, the invention may have been before 600; but it is now generally admitted that his age must be later: Labarte thinks that he probably lived in the 12th century. His Diversarum artium Schedula does not speak of the art of glass as being a new invention. See Labarte u. s. pp. 48–51.

and others, have shewn that at the bottom of glass vessels found in Christian tombs at Milan blood is still to be recognised. Without impugning the honesty or the correctness of these researches, although as regards the latter it would be satisfactory if some confirmatory evidence should be discovered, it is allowable to suppose that the usual unguents (or perhaps wine) may have been contained in other of these vessels. The early Christians also employed glass as one of the materials for chalices.^d See CHALICE. Their most remarkable glass vessels, however, are those which have figures in gold leaf inside their flat bases; and these have hitherto been found almost exclusively in the Roman catacombs, and are generally considered to have been made in Rome alone. Of these some (about thirty) are in the British Museum, a smaller number in Paris, a few others in various Italian museums and in private continental and English collections, more particularly that of Mr. Wilshire; from which last the South Kensington Loan Court, and the Leeds Art Exhibition in 1868, having been largely enriched, these curious relics have become tolerably familiar to many of our countrymen. It is, however, in the Kircherian Museum and in that of the Propaganda, and above all, in the Vatican at Rome, that the greatest number are preserved. From these various sources, and from the works of Aringhi, Buonarrotti, Boldetti, &c., Padre Garrucci drew up his great work on the subject, entitled Vetri ornati di figure in oro, fol. with 42 plates, comprising figures of about 320 specimens,^e many, however, being quite fragmentary and of little value. The first edition appeared in Rome in 1858, the second (much enlarged) in 1864. As nearly all that is known of them is contained in this one work, which has been also used in illustration of various articles in this Dictionary, a somewhat slight notice may suffice for this place. The greater part of these glasses are manifestly the bottoms of drinking cups (the inscriptions on many of them implying as much), some few have been plates. "Their peculiarity," say Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow, "consists in a design having been executed in gold leaf on the flat bottom of the cup, in such a manner as that the figures and letters should be seen from the inside. . . . The gold leaf was protected by a plate of glass which was welded by fire, so as to form one solid mass with the cup. These cups, like the other articles found in the catacombs, were stuck into the still soft cement of the newly closed grave; and the double glass bottom imbedded in the plaster has resisted the action of time, while the thinner portion of the cup, exposed to accident and decay by standing out from the plaster, has in almost every instance perished. Boldetti informs us that he found two or three cups entire, and his representation of one of them is given in Padre Garrucci's work, t. xxxix. 7^a, 7^b" (Roma Sotterranea, p. 276).

^d The far-famed Sacro Citorio of Genoa, taken by the Crusaders at Caesarea in 1101, made of glass (not, as formerly supposed, of a single emerald) has been fabled to be the dish used at the Saviour's Last Supper; but although it is undoubtedly very ancient, its history is quite unknown. Some account of it is given in Murray's Hand-book of Northern Italy, under "Genoa."

^e About twenty others are described only; the genuineness of some of them is suspected.

The cup, whose figure is referred to, is a species of cylix, with two small handles (their bases being recurved) at the sides, without a stem: upon its flat bottom are two three-quarter-length figures in a medallion, inscribed PETRVS, PAVLVS, the two apostles who, above all persons, are by far the most frequently represented in the glass of the catacombs. Garrucci figures a fragment of another vessel with channelled ribs, which must have been nearly of the shape of our tumblers (t. xxxviii. f. 9, b). He thinks that others must have been in the form of a half-egg (Pref. p. vii.). Many of the medallions found in the catacombs are of very small size, little more than an inch in diameter; these were long supposed to be centres of the bottoms of small drinking-cups, but the discovery in 1864 and 1865 of two flat gilded glass plates at Cologne (both broken) has revealed their real character.

On one of these plates, found near the church of St. Severinus,^f about 10 inches in diameter, made of clear glass, were "inserted, while in a state of fusion, a number of small medallions of green glass exactly similar to those found in Rome, and which together form a series of scriptural subjects.^g These medallions being of double glass

^f "The patena found near the church of St. Ursula differs from the other discovered two years before, in having the subjects depicted in gold and colours on the surface of the glass instead of being within medallions of double glass. The drawing is also of a better style of art. It is now in the Slade Collection" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. pp. 277-294; figured in Catalogue of Slade Collection, p. 50). The subjects represented on this glass are Moses at the Red Sea, Jonah, Daniel in the lions' den, the three children in the fiery furnace, the sacrifice of Isaac, the Nativity, and the healing of the man sick of the palsy.

^g A figure of the two fragments of this plate is given by Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 290. They have resisted the ravages of time and accidents, which have destroyed the more thin and fragile glass of the patena. De Rossi has seen in the plaster of loculi in the catacombs the impression of large plates of this description, which have probably perished in the attempt to detach them from the cement" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 291).

The cups, whose bottoms (or parts of them) now remain, were of various dimensions; the largest hitherto found have medallions of about five inches in diameter, others are about half that size: around the painted part there was a margin of plain glass. Sometimes, but very rarely as it would seem, the side of the cup as well as the bottom was ornamented with figures in gold leaf. Garrucci figures one fragment of such a side which is preserved in the Kircherian Museum^h (t. xxxix. f. 9). The figures on the gold leaf were rendered more distinct by edging the outlines and other parts with dark lines; and other colours as green, white, and red of various tints were sparingly introduced: also on the outside of the glass bottoms various colours are found, especially azure, also green, violet, indigo, and crimson (Garrucci, Pref. p. vii.).ⁱ

The subjects represented on these glasses may now be considered. A few of them are taken from the classical mythology or represent secular subjects, whether games or trades, and these may probably not have been the works of Christian artists at all.^k It is indeed an unexplained contain twenty medallions. Eight of these have only a star in the centre. Three others appear to have the three children in the Babylonian furnace, one figure in each medallion. Four others have the history of Jonah in as many parts;—in the ship; under the gourd; swallowed by the whale; and vomited out by the same. Another gives Adam and Eve, the serpent round the tree being between them. The interpretation of the others is less certain. One has a figure holding a rod, which is supposed to be the Saviour; probably another medallion contained Lazarus. It is in the possession of Mr. Pepys of Cologne. See De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, pp. 89-91, and a beautiful figure in gold and colour.

ⁱ The figures in Garrucci's work are uncoloured, at least no coloured copy has been seen by the writer. In Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote's work, so often laid under contribution, are two beautiful plates (xvii. and xviii.) shewing the pale bluish colour of the glass and the pencilling of the gold leaf with deep green. Martigny gives examples of the use of colour in the following specimens, figured by Perret, vol. iv. Purple in bands on the drapery (pl. xxxiii. 114): green in the sea-waves (xix. 76): flesh-colour in the face of the Saviour (xxxiii. 102). Silver is occasionally used for white garments and the bandages of a corpse (Lazarus). In other cases we have gold or silver figures on an azure ground (Dict. p. 279).

^k Garrucci and Wiseman consider this art to have been exercised by the Christians alone; but this is both primâ facie improbable and does not very well accord with the existence of pagan types on some specimens "such as no Christian artist of the early ages would ever have thought of depicting," being wholly incapable of any Christian adaptation. See Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 278. It must be confessed, however, that Garrucci (pref. p. xiv.) is able to refer to a silver casket bearing Christian emblems and also a triton and a nereid; as well as to Sidonius difficulty how such glasses as represent Hercules, Minerva, Serapis, and the like should have been found in Christian catacombs at all; if indeed it be certain that they were found there.¹ It is beside the present purpose to say more of these.^m The greater part of the designs, however, are connected with the Jewish or Christian religion; and, as has been already seen in part, subjects from the Old and New Testaments are sometimes grouped together on the same glass. A description of two perfect bottoms of cups, forming in each case a circular medallion, will show the mode of treatment.

(1) A bust draped in the centre, enclosed in a circle with legend ZESES (Live! i.e. enjoy life!). Around without distinction into compartments, but with leaves and pellets interspersed, are: Jesus turning the water into wine; Tobit and the fish; Jesus ordering the man sick of the palsy to carry his bed; Jesus present with the Three Children in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace (Garrucci, t. i. f. 1).

(2) Two busts (a man and his wife?) draped in the centre, enclosed in a circle as before, with legend PIE ZESES (Drink! live!). Around, in the same style as before, are the following sub-Apollinaris and Ennodius for examples of the same kind of thing: yet without dwelling on the fact that the monument no less than the authors very possibly belongs to a period when paganism had no longer any vigorous life (Visconti, Opere varie, t. 1, p. 212, thinks it is of the fourth or fifth century, the latter, to judge from the monument itself, which now reposes in the British Museum, seems at least as probable as the former), and might therefore, as now, afford subjects for Christian artists, yet the paganism on these glasses is more seriously pronounced: e.g. t. xxxv. 1. "In nomine Herculis Acherontini (wrongly written Acherontino)... felices bibatis." See also t. xxxv. 8.

^m They are figured in Garrucci, t. xxxiii.-xxxvi, and are briefly noticed in Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 278.

jects: Christ foretelling redemption to Adam and Eve; the sacrifice of Isaac; Moses striking the rock; Jesus telling the sick man to carry his bed; Jesus raising Lazarus (id t. i. f. 3).

More usually, however, a single subject occupies the bottom of the glass. Thus we have on one (t. vi. f. 1) Christ as the Good Shepherd bearing a lamb on his shoulders, with a sheep and tree on each side, all enclosed in a circle; and the Greek legend enclosed in another circle outside, POTHE PIE ZHCAIC META TWN CWN ΠANTWN BOIT (for BIOT?), i.e. Drink, Rufus, may you enjoy life with all yours! long life to you! On another glass (t. vi. f. 9) occurs the same subject treated a little differently, with the nearly equivalent Latin legend: DIGNITAS AMICORVM VIVAS CVM TVIS FELICITER, i.e. Here's to our worthy friends! may you live happily with all yours! Dignitas amicorum, a frequently recurring acclamation on these glasses, is thought to be equivalent to digni amici, the form in which a Roman host drank his friends' health. On another (t. vi. f. 7), bearing the same subject enclosed in a square, we have the legend: BIBEAS (doubtless for vivas) IN FACE DEI CONCORDI, a double border of dentels being enclosed in another outside square. On another, Christ is represented at full length in the midst of seven water-pots (for the six of the Gospel are invariably changed into seven, probably from a symbolical feeling, and with a secret reference to the eucharist), surrounded by the legend DIGNITAS AMICORUM VIVAS IM (sic) PACE DEI ZESES: where vivas may either be taken for bibas, or (which seems better) zeses may be regarded as a superfluous repetition of vivas (t. vii. f. 2).

The Good Shepherd. (Garrucci.)

It will now probably be thought sufficient to indicate briefly the subjects from the Old Testament including the Apocrypha and from the New, which can be recognised with certainty or probability upon these glasses, excluding those on the Cologne fragments. They are all contained in the first eight plates of Garrucci's work, but are here set down nearly in their Biblical order. Adam and Eve; Noah in the Ark; Sacrifice of Isaac; Joseph in the pit (?); Moses striking the rock; Moses lifting up the brazen serpent (?); the candlestick and other instruments of Mosaic worship; the Spies bearing the grapes of Canaan; Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still (?); Jonah's history (in several parts); the Three Children in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace; Daniel and the lions; Daniel destroying the Dragon; Susannah and the Elders (?); Tobit and the Fish.

The Wise Men offering gifts (?); Christ turning water into wine; Christ healing the sick of the palsy; Christ multiplying the seven loaves; Christ raising Lazarus; Christ as the Good Shepherd.

The chrisma or monogram of Christ is also of frequent occurrence, sometimes in connection with Saints, sometimes interposed between a husband and wife, sometimes between α and ω (tavv. i. vii. xi. xiv. xvii. xx. xxv. xxvi. xxix. xxxix.).

The only representation of the Crucifixion (t. xl. 1) is considered to be false.

"The Blessed Virgin is represented sometimes alone, with her name (MARIA) over her head, praying between two olive-trees, sometimes with the apostles Peter and Paul on either side of her; sometimes accompanied by the virgin martyr St. Agnes" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 280). The apostles most frequently represented (on more than seventy glasses) are St. Peter and St. Paul, their names being added; sometimes singly, more often conjointly. "The two apostles are represented side by side, sometimes standing, sometimes seated. In some instances Christ is represented in the air . . . holding over the head of each a crown of victory; or in other instances a single crown is suspended between the two, as if to show that in their death they were not divided. This crown becomes sometimes a circle surrounding the labarum or chrisma, which is often supported on a pillar, thus symbolising 'the pillar and ground of the truth'" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 285).^a We have also single examples of the names of John, Thomas, Philip, and Jude, most probably the apostles; and two or three other names which occur in the New Testament, are also found: Lucas, Silvanus, Timotheus, Stephen (written Istephanus); these are probably the same persons whose names are mentioned in the New Testament. (For the glasses on which these names occur, see Garrucci's Index, p. 109.)

There are, besides the persons mentioned in Scripture, a good many others which are of note in ecclesiastical history. St. Agnes occurs more than a dozen times, St. Laurence seven times, and St. Hippolytus four times; the following among others occur less frequently, St. Callistus, St. Cyprian, and St. Marcellinus, the last of whom was martyred under Diocletian, A.D. 304 (see Garrucci's Index, as above). Besides these, many other proper names, probably of the possessors, occur either along with their miniatures or without them (see Garrucci's Index, as before). There is nothing which deserves to be called a real portrait in any of these representations, which are mostly, perhaps all, executed in the debased style of the 4th century; and as the saints have no emblems attached their figures have but little interest. We have also on these glasses scenes of domestic Christian life—married life, and family life. The occurrence of the chrisma makes their Christian character certain: where this or the name of Christ or God does not occur, it is rash to say anything definite (Garrucci, tavv. xxvi.—xxxix.).

A few more words may suffice for the inscriptions. The acclamations, of which several specimens have been given, are mostly of a convivial character, and either in Greek (rarely), or in Latin (most usually), or in a mixture of the two (not unfrequently):^o none of them at all favour the supposition that they were used as chalices. Other acclamations, as VIVATIS IN DEO; and MARTVRA EPECTETE VIVATIS, express good wishes to the married couple (id. t. xxvi. 11, 12). On a very few of the glasses we have, as it appears, invocations of saints or legends which acknowledge their patronage. Thus a broken fragment has PETRVS PROTEG.; whether any letters followed, it is impossible to say: the word may either be protegit or protegat or even protege (id. t. x. f. 1). Another fine but meagre fragment exhibits the Saviour (apparently) with the chrisma and the α and ω , bearing a Latin cross with legend, . . . ANE (Salviane, or some other proper name) VIVAS IN CR[ISTO ET] LAVRENTIO (id. t. xx. f. 1). Another (u. s. f. 2), which is also broken, but slightly, has VITO (or perhaps VICTOR) [VIV]AS IN NOMINE LAVRETI (for Laurenti). The inscription PETRVS, written in two instances against Moses striking the rock (id. t. x.

Nov. 1861), thinks it is of the second or third century. Notwithstanding these high but somewhat discordant authorities, the writer ventures to express his own strong suspicion that the style of the medal bespeaks the age of the Renaissance: it is most probably of the 15th century or thereabouts.

^o We give here two or three of this mixed character: CVM TVIS FELICITER ZESES (Garr. t. xii. 1); DIGNITAS AMICORVM PIE ZESES CVM TVIS OMNIBVS BIBE ET PROPINA (t. xii. 2). (Both the above glasses have figures of Peter and Paul, with their names added.) On the same plate are other examples of bilingual redundancy: such as—VIVAS PIE ZESES, VIVAS CVM TVIS ZESES.

f. 9; Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. pl. xvii. 2, and p. 287), is also of some theological importance as indicating that Peter was then looked upon as the Moses of the new Israel of God, as Prudentius speaks. The honour, however, appears to be divided between Peter and Paul on another glass, unfortunately mutilated. Christ stands on a hill between Peter and Paul. Above is the common legend PIE Z[ES]ES: below are the words IERVSALE . IORDANES . BECLE (for Bethlehem, C = Θ?). Peter is here the apostle of the Jews, Paul of the Gentiles, who first worshipped the Saviour at Bethlehem. Below are sheep adoring the Lamb on a hill between them, symbolising both churches (Garrucci, t. x. f. 8.).

The orthography of the legends is sometimes barbarous.^p Thus Jesus is written ZESVS (viii. 5); ZESVS (vii. 17), &c. CHRISTVS is spelt CRISTVS (viii. 5, xii. 1, &c.); TIMOTHEVS becomes TIMOTEVS (xvii. 2); HIPPOLYTVS, EPO-LITVS (xix. 7), or IPPOLYTVS (xxv. 5); CYPRIANVS, CRIPRANVS (xx. 6); SVCINVS, TZVCINVS (xxviii. 6); SEVERE, SEBERE (xxix. 5); PHILIPPVS, FILPVVS (xxv. 6). We have also BIBAS for VIVAS (vi. 7); VIBATIS for VIVATIS (xxix. 4); IM PACE for IN PACE (vii. 2, xv. 3); PIE for PIIE

The Adoration of the Saviour. (Garrucci.)

(i. 3, &c.); PIEZ for PIVS (xxvi. 10). There are a few other instances of similar orthographic changes, to say nothing of such blunders as DIGNTAS for DIGNITAS, and CRITSVS for CRISTVS (Christus) (Garr. p. 53).

The dates of these works are defined to some extent by their subjects. On one of them (xxxiii. 5) a heap of money is depicted, among which we recognise the coins of Caracalla and one of the Faustinas. On another, as has been said, occurs the name of Marcellinus, probably the bishop of Rome, martyred A.D. 304.^a The martyrdom of St. Agnes, who is so often represented, probably took place about the same time. The appearance of the dress, arrangement of the hair, and of the general art and orthography induces Garrucci (Pref. p. ix.) to consider them all anterior to Theodosius (A.D. 380). De Rossi attempts a more precise limitation, and thinks that they range from the middle of the 3rd to the beginning of the 4th century (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 279). We shall probably be not far wrong in saying that few or none of them are much earlier or later than the 4th century.^r The art of the coins of that century, as well as of the MS. illuminations which are assigned to about the same age, strongly remind us of these glasses, more especially of those on which the chrisma is depicted.^s The execution of some glasses is indeed better than that of others, and occasionally reaches considerable excellence; but to speak generally, they belong to a period in which taste and vigour and correctness of drawing have sensibly declined. They possess, however, apart from their main subjects, much interest as showing the styles of borders and other ornamentations then prevalent, besides giving costume and a variety of domestic objects.^t

^p Garrucci lays stress on this orthography for fixing the date: "questa maniera di scrittura così costante rinvia al secolo quarto" (pref. p. ix.). He appears to consider that these glasses all belong to that century.

^a The martyrdoms of Vincentius and of Gnesius, whose names similarly occur, also took place under Diocletian (Garrucci, pref. pp. viii. ix.).

With regard to the uses of these glasses a consideration of the types, coupled with the inscriptions, will lead us to secure conclusions. Even if it were well established^u that in Tertullian's

^r Mr. Marriott (Testim. of the Catacombs, p. 16), after observing that "these glasses, with few exceptions, belong to a period of very degraded art," considers that "there are very strong reasons of a technical kind, in reference to the use of the nimbus, for assigning many of them to the 5th, if not to the 6th century." But if these glasses were found in the catacombs, it is hardly possible to place any of them later than the first quarter of the 5th century: after the year 410 no inscriptions occur in the catacombs, and they have become rarer and rarer from the beginning of the last quarter of the 4th century. See INSCRIPTIONS. It is true that "Popes Symmachus Vigilius and John III. did their best to repair the damage which had been done in the catacombs by the Lombards and others" in restoring the inscriptions of Pope Damasus, but they would scarcely have replaced the glass vessels which had been stuck into the cement which closed the graves. See Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 170.

^s The chrisma with the α and ω (xxxix. 1) is identical in treatment with the same types upon the coins of Constantius II., Magnentius, and Decentius. And this monogram, whenever it occurs, with scarcely an exception (see, however, xvii. 7, where the general style and art differ also), is of the same form (P) that is usual on the coins of the fourth century: another form (Q) is said to occur on a coin of Licinius Jun. (Garrucci, Numism. Constantin. p. 102; appendix to his Vetri Ornati).

^t Martigny observes that those of the best work (instancing the Good Shepherd, Garr. vii. 1, reproduced here, which is perhaps the best executed of all and the oldest) have Greek legends, being probably the work of Greek artists (Dict. p. 279).

^u Is it altogether certain that calices are chalices for the communion? St. Ambrose speaks of those "qui calices ad sepulchra martyrum deferunt atque illic in vesperam bibunt" (De obtest. et sacr. potant.). If not, it may then well be that Tertullian is alluding to some such glasses as these: but scarcely any which remain to us can be so early as A.D. 200. Chrysostom (Homil. in S. Melet.) says that the portrait of Meletius was depicted ἐν ἐκνώμασι καὶ φιάλαις; such vessels may possibly have been similar to those of which we have specimens; if so, the art will probably be Asiatic as well as European. We have indeed a bottom of a small glass vessel which simply reads MLRTI (for Meleti probably) DVLCTIS ANIMA (xxxviii. 4): yet this can hardly be the same person; it may be a present from a parent to a child, or the like. The remark of Cardinal Wiseman appears to be well founded, that "not a single author, certainly not a single profane author, mentions the time the Good Shepherd was depicted on chalices, possibly glass chalices ("procelant ipsae picturae calicum vestrorum, si vel in illis perlucebit interpretatio," De pudicit. c. 7; see also c. 10), there is certainly nothing in these glasses bearing that type or any other type, which would bear out the conclusion that they were chalices for the communion.* They were at once sacred and convivial, and must therefore have been used in meetings which were both one and the other. Such were the agapae, such were the commemorations of martyrs, such were Christian marriages. On all such occasions, and perhaps others, these glasses were used; more especially, it may be, in the commemorations of St. Peter and St. Paul (so often represented thereon), which were "observed as a general holiday in Rome during the fourth century, very much as Christmas now is among ourselves" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 283). In a well-known passage of St. Augustine (Confess. vi. 2), he mentions that his mother Monica never took more than one cup (pocillum) to the commemoration of the various martyrs—implying that some took more; perhaps bearing effigies of the particular martyrs to be commemorated.

With regard to the plates, large fragments of which have been found at Cologne and smaller ones at Rome, as well as impressions in mortar of entire plates at the latter place, the most obvious and natural interpretation of them would be that they were made use of in the same festivities as those in which the glass cups were employed. Monica, at Milan, as her son informs us, "brought to the commemorations of the Saints, as was the custom in Africa, pulse and bread and wine" (Confess. vi. 2). We may then reasonably suppose that these plates were for the purpose of holding the bread or other solid food used in the same commemorations as those in which wine was drunk. A different view, however, as was perhaps to be expected, is taken of them by those who (like Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote) think that "it is quite possible that some of our glasses may be fragments of chalices" (u. s. p. 293). Anastasius in the Vitae Pontif. s. v. Zephyrinus, says "that he made it a constitution of the church, that ministers should carry glass patens (patenae vitreae) into the church in front of the priests, while the bishop celebrated mass with the priests standing before him, and that in this manner . . . the priest should receive the bread to administer it to the people." Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, commenting on this passage, say (u. s. p. 293): "The fragments of the two large patenae discovered at Cologne, correspond exactly to the kind of glass here mentioned. The scriptural subjects and the absence of any allusions to secular feasting" there are no inscriptions at all on these glasses "accord well with so sacred a purpose, and we may therefore fairly presume that those other smaller glasses" found in Rome, "of which we have also spoken, may also be remains of the patenae used to convey the Blessed Sacrament from the pope's altar to the parish churches of Rome. Padre Garrucci thinks this not improbable, although he does not admit that any of our catacomb glasses ever formed portions of eucharistic chalices." The reader must be left to form his own opinion, but the subjects on the patenae being much the same as those on the bottoms of the cups, it seems to be by far the most probable supposition, that the purpose of the plates and of the cups was one and the same, whatever that purpose was. (Garrucci, Vetri ornati di figure in oro, Roma, 1858 and 1864 (ed. 2), fol. 42 plates: the preface contains an account of the literature of the subject, pp. xvii. xviii. and a discussion of the date and use of these vessels; De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. for 1864 and 1866; Brownlow and Northcote, Roma Sotterranea, c. vii. 1869. Wiseman (Card.), Lecture delivered in Dublin, 1858, published by M. Walsh, Dublin, 1859; certainly not revised by the Cardinal himself, but giving a fair view of the subject in a short space.)

(iii.) Glass pastes.—Another use of glass among Christian as well as other artists was to make imitations or copies of gems therein. A few such have come down to our times. A paste in imitation of red jasper, published by Le Blant, which exhibits a Pastor Bonus of the usual type, with the legend ΔΟΤΑΟC ΧΡΙCΤΟΤ, may serve as an example (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9093). Other gem pastes in imitation of niccolo and garnet exhibit varieties of the chrisma (British Museum, Castellani Collection). Of more importance are the following. A Nativity, in green glass, published by Venuti (Acad. di Cortona, t. vii. p. 45), and described and figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 431), which is ascribed to the 6th century; it is a semicircular plaque, bearing the words H FENNHCIC above, and a defaced legend below: the Magi adore the Saviour, at whom an ox and an ass are gazing; Mary is lying on a bed, and Joseph is seated in meditation. The Vettori Museum, now in the Vatican, has a large oval plaque of coloured glass (Vettori, Num. Aer. expl. p. 37; Martigny, Dict. p. 431, with a figure), which seems to be early medieval; it is also a Nativity: the infant Saviour has a cruciform nimbus; two oxen look at him in the manger; Joseph and Mary are seated near him; the moon and the star of the Magi are in the field. (A cast sent from Rome; the British Museum has three other examples cast from the same mould; one is red, in imitation of jasper; the others are of deep colour.) See NATIVITY. A large glass plaque of the same general form, but less regular (1½ by 2½ inches), now, it is believed, in the Vatican, of uncertain date, represents a dead saint prostrate; in the centre a semiaureole resting upon her, including the Virgin with cruciform nimbus and Child without any nimbus, a glorified head with circular nimbus (Joseph?) near the Virgin's knees, IC XC in field: outside the aureole on both sides saints and angels (both with circular nimbus) in the act of adoration; perhaps early medieval. (A cast sent from Rome.) We have also glass pastes nearly an inch in diameter which are supposed to have been pendants for necklaces, and are considered to go back to the early Christian centuries: one in green glass shews two Israelites contemplating the brassen serpent; another, a red paste, has the Saviour existence of this art" (Lecture, p. 7). The most that can be said is that Tertullian and Chrysostom may possibly allude to it. The passage quoted by Garrucci from the monk Theophilus (Div. Art. Sched. c. 13), who probably lived about the 12th century, refers to a different mode of decoration, as he himself observes (pref. p. vi.).

* As Boldetti and various others have thought. Their arguments are discussed by Garrucci (pref. pp. x.-xiii.)

blessing the twelve apostles; a third, probably Christian, has a frog, which was sometimes taken as a symbol of the Resurrection, being found on a Christian lamp, accompanied by a cross and the inscription, ΕΓΩ ΕΙΜΙ ΑΝΑΚΤΑΚΙC (Chabouillet, nos. 3474, 3475, 3453). M. Le Blant has a small oblong glass plaque, which he acquired in Rome, which was once, he thinks, part of an ancient Christian necklace; it bears in golden characters the word in two lines, enclosed in a parallelogram and a crenulated outer margin. He regards it as a "concise expression of the charity which should unite all men" (Insc. Chrét. de la Gaule, vol. i. p. 43, with a figure). The British Museum and the French Collection contain various other Christian works in this material, some of which are more or less similar to those which have been already described, or to the Byzantine cameo named under GEMS; but as they are of uncertain date (perhaps none of them being earlier than the 9th century) while some may probably be much later) they need hardly be mentioned here.

(iv.) Mosaics.—Glass, in fine, was employed from very early times in the construction of mosaics. The cubes were sometimes coloured; sometimes, in the ages of the Lower Empire, underlaid with a ground of gold or silver leaf, "by this means shedding over the large works of the artists in mosaic a splendour before unknown" (Labarte, u. s. p. 94). See MOSAICS.

[C. B.]

GLEBE. The word Gleba is used for a farm or estate in the Theodosian Codex (Leg. 72, De Decurion.); but the technical sense in which it is used by English writers, to designate certain lands belonging to an ecclesiastical benefice, is later than our period. See ENDOWMENT, PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

GLORIA. [NIMBUS.]

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS. There is considerable difficulty in tracing out the history of this hymn, because at one period both it and the SANCTUS were entitled indiscriminately Hymnus Angelicus. In later years the latter is called Hymnus Seraphicus; whilst the title Hymnus Angelicus or Hymnus Angelorum is confined to the former. The hymn is found in various forms.

1. We have simply the words of St. Luke, ii. 14. This is of course the primitive form, everything that has been added to it having been composed,—as the 4th council of Toledo (A.D. 633, Mansi, x. 623) reminds us,—by the ecclesiastical doctors. For this reason the council would not allow any expanded form to be sung in the churches. In this short form the words were recited by the priest, according to the liturgy of St. James, when the priest "sealed" the gifts. (Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, iv. 103.) The same simple form may be seen elsewhere: and is continued to this day in the morning service of the Horology (p. 35, ed. Venice, 1870).

2. The seventh book of the Apostolic Constitutions, c. 47, contains an enlarged form of the hymn,—without any introduction in the oldest manuscript; but two, of the 14th and 16th century respectively, entitle the chapter "Morning Prayer." (Lagarde, p. 229.) This version has a peculiar reading: "We worship Thee through the great High Priest, Thee who art one God, unbegotten, alone, inapproachable." We read too "O Lord, only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, and Holy Spirit." The hymn ends "Thou only art holy, Thou only art Lord, Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father. Amen."

3. The treatise which is ascribed to Athanasius "de Virginitate" (Migne, xxviii. 251) is undoubtedly spurious, but it gives some insight into the life of a Greek virgin, within our chronological limits. In § 20 (Migne, ut sup. 275) we read "In the morning, say the Psalm O God, my God, early will I seek Thee (Psalm lxii.). At dawn, the 'Benedicite' and Glory to God in the Highest, and the rest." This is the reading of the Basle and English MSS. But others proceed with the first three clauses: "We hymn Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee, and the rest." As this difference of the text may be due to a late interpolation, we are left in uncertainty as to the words of the hymn when this treatise was composed. (Mr. Palmer, Orig. Liturg. i. 158 does not note the doubts regarding this passage.)

4. The famous Codex Alexandrinus in the British Museum, of the close of the 5th century, puts some of our doubts at rest. This manuscript, after the psalms, contains the thirteen canticles of the Greek church: i. the song of Moses in Exodus; ii. ditto in Deuteronomy; iii. the prayer of Hannah; iv. prayer of Isaiah. (xxvi. 9–20); v. prayer of Jonah; vi. of Habakkuk; vii. of Ezekiah (Isaiah, xxxviii.); viii. of Manasseh; ix. prayer of the three children (εὐλόγητος, Daniel iii. 26); x. hymn of the three children (our Benedicite) entitled "Hymn of our fathers;" xi. prayer of Mary, the Mother of God; xii. of Symeon; xiii. of Zachariah (compare CANTICLES). These conclude with the Gloria in Excelsis in Greek, the hymn being entitled ὕμνος ἐξωθινός. This version has been often printed, as by Usher, in his tract De symbolo Romano: Bunsen, Analecta ante-Nicaena, iii. 86; Dr. Campion, Interleaved Prayer Book, 1873, p. 321. It differs slightly from the version of the Apostolic Constitutions, and proceeds with words which distinctively mark it as a morning hymn, some of which words have passed into our Te Deum. It is thus found in the beautiful Zurich psalter reprinted by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Sacra, and in other great psalters; and, in a form very nearly resembling this, it is used in the Greek communion to this day (Horology, ut sup. pp. 69, 70).

5. A Latin translation of this Greek version of the "Gloria in Excelsis," adapted for evening prayer, is contained in the book of hymns of the ancient Irish church, which once belonged to Archbishop Usher, and which has been edited for the Irish Archaeological and Celtic Society by Dr. Todd (part ii. p. 179). In the famous Bangor antiphonary discovered at Milan by Muratori, and reprinted imperfectly by him in his Anecdota, tom. iv. pp. 121, &c. (see Migne, tom. 72) we find at the very end "ad vesperum et ad matutinum: Gloria in Excelsis Deo et in terra pax &c." but Muratori unhappily did not copy it out. Thus we are ignorant of the text. However, the hymn given by Thomasius (Psalterium cum canticis, Rom. 1697, p. 760, or Oper. tom. iii. p. 613) as the Hymnus Aurelius of the Ambrosian breviary, is another and independent translation of the Greek form of the hymn. It was directed to be used daily at matins.

6. Thus it seems clear that when the well known Latin form of the hymn was inserted in the Latin psalters, it was used in the daily or weekly hour services of the clergy. We have additional evidence of this in the rule of Caesarius, c. xxi. and in that of Aurelian. It is there ordered to be used at matins on Sundays.

7. This Latin form Bunsen considered to have been as old as Hilary of Poitiers, to whom indeed Alcuin ascribed the additions to the scripture words. The Roman Catholic ritualists are not satisfied with the testimony of Alcuin, and seem to consider that the hymn in the modern Latin form is of more recent origin. Yet it is found in this form in a very interesting manuscript in the British Museum—Royal 2 A xx.—which is of the eighth century: in the famous Codex Bobiensis, from which Mabillon extracted the "Sacramentarium Gallicanum" (Museum Italicum, i. 273; Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 776; or Migne, 72, p. 455): in the so-called Mozarabic liturgy ascribed to St. Isidore (see Migne, 85, p. 531) and in a form very slightly different in the Gothic breviary (Migne, 86, p. 886).

8. The first introduction of the "Gloria in Excelsis" into the Eucharistic service has been ascribed to Telesphorus, but no confidence can be placed in the tradition. The sacramentary of Gregory directed that a bishop might use the "Gloria in Excelsis" on all Sundays and festivals: a presbyter only at Easter. This rule continued long in the Roman church, and constituted one point of difference between the Roman and Gallican churches, in the latter of which no such difference between bishop and presbyter had been observed. Etherius and Beatus shew that in Spain they always sang it on Sundays and festivals; but they quote only the scriptural words, and if we bear in mind the decree of Toledo, we may suppose that only these words were used (the Mozarabic liturgy shews many marks of interpolations). In the liturgies the hymn was generally sung at the commencement of the service; but Mr. Palmer notes that in the Gallican sacramentary (see above) it was used amongst the thanksgivings after communion.

9. The absence of the hymn from St. Germanus's account of the Gallican liturgy has been noted. He says that the words at the end of the gospel, "Glory be to Thee O Lord," were uttered in imitation (?) of the angels' words "Glory to God in the highest" (clamantibus clericis Gloria tibi Domine in specie angelorum qui nascente Domino Gloria in excelsis pastoribus apparentibus cecinerunt. Migne, 72, p. 91). St. Germanus died about the year 585 or 587. This seems to give a superior limit to its introduction into the eucharistic service.

10. It is worthy of notice that whilst the Alexandrine manuscript has in the text of St. CHRIST. ANT.

Luke εὐδοκίας (the reading of N* B* D) yet in the morning hymn it as well as all the other copies of the hymn read εὐδοκία. [C. A. S.]

GLORIA PATRI. [DOXOLOGY.]

GLOVES. (χειροθήκη: Chirotheca, Gantus, Gwantus, Vantus, Wantus, Wanto.) It would seem that gloves in the strict sense of the word were unknown to the early Greeks and Romans. (See on this point Casaubon's Animadv. in Athenaeum, xii. 2.) That they were in use, however, among the ancient Persians appears from Xenophon (Cyropaedia, viii. 8. 17). The European custom of wearing them seems to have originated with the German nations, as the Teutonic origin of the common Latin word for them clearly shews; and although, as an ecclesiastical vestment, properly so called, gloves do not appear till the 12th century (the first extant mention of them in that character being in Honorius Augustodunensis, ob. circa 1152 A.D.), they had been used for centuries as articles of practical convenience. Thus we find them mentioned in the life of St. Columbanus, by Jonas Bobbiensis (formerly included among the works of Bede)—"tegumenta manuum quae Galli wantos vocant" (Vita S. Columbani, c. 25; Patrol. lxxxvii. 1026). In the above instance, the gloves are spoken of as used "ad operam laboris," but sometimes they were obviously of a costly nature, for in the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. 915 A.D.), in a long list of valuable articles, he mentions "annulum aureum unum cum gemmis pretiosis et vuantos paria unum" (Patrol. cxxxii. 468).

The employment of a glove in connection with the granting or bequeathing of land, is a custom which hardly falls within our present limits: an example may, however, be given. (See Notgeri Leodiensis [ob. 1008 A.D.] Vita S. Hadulini, c. 10; Patrol. cxxxix. 1146: also Martene, Anecd. i. 57.) GOD THE FATHER, REPRESENTATIONS OF.* For the first four centuries, at least, no attempt was made at representing the actual Presence of the First Person of the Trinity. It was indicated invariably by the symbolic HAND proceeding from a cloud. Martigny quotes the words of St. Augustine (Epist. cxlviii. 4), "Quum audimus manus, operationem intelligere debemus," from which it would seem that the great father saw a tendency to anthropomorphic misapplication of the words hand and eye, or ear of God, as they are frequently used in the Old Testament. The distinction between analogy and similitude has been so often neglected, that bodily parts as well as passions (like those of anger, repentance, &c.) are often attributed to the incorporeal and infinite being. This has been repeatedly noticed, as (e. g.) by Drs. Whately and Mansel. St. Augustine's expressions show that he was thoroughly awake to the misconception, and consequent irreverence, involved in the forgetful use of such terms as the Divine hand or eye, for the Divine power or knowledge. "Quidquid," he says, "dum ista cogitas, corporeae similitudinis occurrerit, abige, abne, nega, respue, fuge."

The symbolic hand appears in Christian representations of several subjects from the Old Testament, principally connected with events in the lives of Abraham and Moses. The two are found corresponding to each other in Bottari (Sculture e Pitt. sagre, vol. i. tav. 27; also i. tav. 89). Moses is receiving the book of the law in ii. tav. 128. Elsewhere Abraham is alone (vol. ii. tav. 59, and i. tav. 33, from the Callistine catacomb). In vol. iii. 37 (from cemetery of St. Agnes), the Deity appears to be represented in human form. He is delivering to Adam and Eve respectively the ears of corn and the lamb, as tokens of the labours of their fallen state, and their sentence to "delve and spin." See also Buonarrotti, p. 1. Cardinal Bosio, and latterly M. Perret (vol. i. 57 pl.), give a copy of a painting of Moses striking the rock, and also in the act of loosening the shoe from his foot. Ciampini's plates (Vet. Mon. t. ii. pp. 81, tav. xxiv. also tavv. xvi. and xx. tav. xvii. D.) are important illustrations of this symbol, more especially those of the mosaic of the Transfiguration in St. Apollinaris in Classe, and of the Sacrifice of Isaac in St. Vitale. The author does not find the hand as representing the First Person of the Trinity in pictures of the baptism of our Lord; but it probably occurs in that connexion.

The hand proceeding from clouds appears in the Sacramentary written for Drogon bishop of Metz, and son of Charlemagne, above the Canon of the Mass.

GOLDEN NUMBER. [EASTER.]

GOOD FRIDAY. The anniversary of Christ's Passion and Death was from very early times observed with great solemnity by the church. It was known by various names, ἡμέρα τοῦ σταυροῦ, σωτηρία, or τὰ σωτήρια; πάσχα σταυρώσιμον, in contrast to πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον, Easter Day; or, adopting the Jewish designation (Joh. xix. 14, 31, 42), παρασκευή, either alone, or with the adjectives μεγάλη, or ἁγία: in the Latin church Parascève, FERIA Sexta in Parasceue (Antiphonar. Gregor.), Sexta FERIA Major. in Hierusalem (Sacramentar. Gregor.). The day was observed as a strict fast, which was continued by those who could endure it to beyond midnight on the following day (Apost. Constit. v. 18). The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, severely condemned those who ended their fast on this day at 3 P.M. and then indulged in feasting, and ordered that all save the very young and the very old and the sick should abstain from all food till after the services of the day were concluded. All who refused obedience to this rule were denied a participation in the Paschal Eucharist (can. viii.; Labbe, Concil. v. 1707). Not food alone, but the use of oil and the bath were forbidden by a canon of Gangra (Nomocanon, can. 434, apud Cotelier. Eccl. Graec. Monum. i. 138) with the indignant apostrophe, Ὁ Χριστὸς ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ καὶ οὐ ἐν τῷ βαλανεῖω; In process of time the day came to be distinguished by a peculiar ritual and customs marking the solemn character of the day. The bells were silent from the midnight of Wednesday (Ordo Roman. apud Muratori, ii. 714). The kiss of peace was prohibited (Tert. de Orat. 18). The altar was stripped of its ornaments, and even of its covering. The processions were without chanting (Sacram. Gelas. Muratori i. 559). The lamps and candles were gradually extinguished during matins (Ordo Roman. u. s.). A long series of intercessory collects was used. A cross was erected in front of the altar, blessed, and adored (Sacram. Gelas. u. s.). There was no consecration of the Lord's Supper, but the reserved eucharist of the previous day was partaken of by the faithful.

This communion subsequently received the name of "the Mass of the Presanctified," Missa Praesancificatorum, but incorrectly, the term Missa usually implying consecration. Thus Amalarius states that on Good Friday "the mass is not celebrated" (de Eccl. Offic. iv. 20; Rab. Maur. de Instit. Cler. ii. 37; pseudo-Alcuin, Hittorp col. 251). The reason of this prohibition of celebration is evident. The eucharist being the highest Christian feast, was deemed out of harmony with the penitential character of the day, for "how," says Balsamon (Bevereg. Pandect. i. 219), "can one mourn and rejoice at the same time?" As early as the council of Laodicea, c. A.D. 365, this prohibition was extended to the whole of Lent, with the exception of Saturdays and Sundays (can. 49; Labbe Concil. i. 1506). In the letter to Decentius ascribed to Innocent I. c. A.D. 402, but probably not to be placed so early, the restriction is limited to Good Friday and Easter Eve, on which days the tradition of the church was that the sacraments were not to be celebrated at all; "isto biduo sacramenta penitus non celebrari" (Labbe Concil. ii. 1246). At this period there was no communion of any kind on Good Friday. How early the natural desire to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Body and Blood on the day when it was offered for us on the cross, led to the reservation of the previously consecrated elements for the purpose of communion, we have no certain knowledge. It is evident from a decree of the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, that in the first half of the seventh century, there was no celebration of the Lord's Supper on Good Friday in Spain. At that time it was a wide-spread custom, which the council condemned, to keep the doors of the churches closed on Good Friday, so that there was no divine service, nor any preaching of the Passion to the people. The council ordained that the Lord's death should be preached on that day, and that the people should pray for the pardon of their sins, that so they might be better fitted to celebrate the resurrection and partake of the eucharist at Easter (can. viii. Labbe Concil. v. 1707). We learn also from the acts of the 16th council, held sixty years later, A.D. 693, that on that day "the altars were stripped and no one was permitted to celebrate mass" (Id. vi.

1355). In the Greek church the custom of communicating in the previously consecrated elements was established before the middle of the seventh century, for we find it mentioned as a general practice during the whole of Lent, in the acts of the Trullan (or Quinisext) council A.D. 692 (can. 52, Labbe vi. 1165). It first appears in the West in the Regula Magistri, a monastic rule compiled probably in the seventh century, printed by Brockie (Codex Regul. I. ii. p. 269). It was established in Rome before the end of the eighth century, when the ritual of Good Friday is prescribed in the Ordo Romanus (Muratori Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 995). The observance of Good Friday commenced at midnight, when all rose for service. Nine Psalms were said with their responsions, these were followed by three lctions from the Lamentations, commencing Lam. ii. 8, "Cogitavit Dominus dissipare;" three from the Tractatus of St. Augustine on Psalm 63, and three from the Epistle to the Hebrews, beginning c. iv. 11, "Festinemus ergo &c." Mattins then followed, during which the lights in the church were gradually extinguished, beginning at the entrance, until by the end of the third nocturn only the seven lamps burning at the altar were left alight. These were also put out, one by one, alternately right and left at the commencement of each Psalm, the middle lamp, the last left burning, being extinguished at the gospel. At the third hour all the presbyters and clergy of the city assembled in expectation of the pontiff. On his arrival the subdeacon commenced the lection from Hosea v. 15, "Haec dicit Dominus Deus; in tribulatione sua, &c.," and then was sung as an antiphon Hab. iii. 1-3, "Domine audi, &c." After some prayers said by the pontiff, and the second lection, Exod. xii. 1, "In diebus illis dixit Dominus ad Moysen et Aaron, &c.," Ps. xci. or cxi. was sung, and the Passion according to St. John was recited by the deacon. This over, two deacons stript the altar of the white linen cloth, previously put on "sub evangelio," in a stealthy manner, "in modum furantis." The pontiff came before the altar and recited a series of eighteen prayers, a portion of which form the basis of the Good Friday collects of the church of England. The first and last collect stand alone. The other sixteen are in pairs. Before each pair the deacon warned the people to kneel and after it to rise. "Adnuntiat diaconus flectamus genua; iterum dicit levate." These collects are—(1) for the peace and unity of the church; (2) for perseverance in the faith; (3) for the pope and chief bishop (antistes); (4) for the bishops of their diocese; (5) for all bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, &c.; (6) for all orders of men in the holy church; (7) for the emperor; (8) for the Roman empire; (9) (10) for catechumens; (11) against sickness, famine, pestilence, and other evils; (12) for all in trouble; (13) (14) for heretics and schismatics; (15) (16) for Jews; (17) (18) for pagans and idolaters. A direction is given that the prayers for the Jews are not to be said kneeling. The collects are given in the Sacramentary of Gregory, as printed by Pamelius, and in that of Gelasius, as well as in the old Gallican missal. This last contains the direction to the celebrant "eadem die non salutat (i.e. does not say pax vobiscum), nec psallet." These collects finished, all were to leave the church

"Adoration of the cross succeeds." The cross is placed a little distance in front of the altar, supported on either side by acolytes. A kneeling stool being placed in front, the pontiff kneels, and adores and kisses the cross, followed by the clergy and people in order. The Ambrosian missal given by Pamelius contains four prayers for the ceremony: "Oratio super crucem;" "Benedictio crucis;" "Oratio ad crucem adorandam;" "Oratio post adoratam crucem." In the Antiphonarium of Gregory also given by Pamelius we have an "Antiphon ad crucem adorandam." The adoration of the cross was followed by the communion of the pre-sanctified. "Two presbyters enter the sacristy or other place in which the Body of the Lord which remained from the previous day was placed, and put it in a paten, and let a subdeacon hold before them a chalice with unconsecrated wine, and another the paten with the Body of the Lord. One presbyter takes the paten, the other the chalice, and they carry and set them on the stript altar" (Ord. Rom. u.s.). The cross is meanwhile saluted by the laity, while the hymn Ecce ignum Crucis is sung, and Ps. cxix. recited. The salutation of the cross being completed, the Lord's Prayer is recited, "and when they have said Amen the pontiff takes of the holy thing, and puts it into the chalice saying nothing (nihil dicens), and all communicate cum silentio." The rubrics of the Gelasian Sacramentary agree in the main with the Ordo, except that they speak of the reservation of the Blood as well as of the Body of the Lord, and direct that the reserved sacrament be brought out of the sacristy and set on the altar by deacons instead of presbyters. The adoration of the cross by the clergy succeeds the placing of the consecrated elements on the altar, and is followed by the actual communion (Muratori u.s. i. 559, sq.) It merits notice that all early authorities prescribe a general communion on Good Friday, "all communicate silently." This custom had entirely ceased in Rome at the beginning of the 9th century (Amalar. de Eccl. Off. i. 15), and though it lingered for a long time in some parts, it gradually died out in the West, and at the present day in the Roman church no one but the celebrant communicates on Good Friday. The pontiff pronounces peace to them "in the name of the Father, &c." The people answer, "and with thy spirit." "After a little space each says his vespers privately, and so they go to table" (Muratori ii. 995-996). [E. V.]

GOODS, COMMUNITY OF. The idea that all property should belong to a community and not to individuals may be traced to a very high antiquity. The Pythagorean society is commonly supposed to have been constituted on the basis of a community of goods, though probably only those who had reached the highest grade of the initiated renounced all private possessions (Ritter and Preller, Hist. Phil., p. 58). Plato, also, in his imaginary Republic, condemns the institution of private property in the strongest manner, as the source of all greed and meanness; he therefore allows it only to the third and lowest class of his citizens—those who are by nature qualified to seek only low and material ends in life, and are consequently excluded from all share in the government of the state. The two higher classes are to live wholly for the state, a condition—the philosopher holds—incompatible with the possession of private property (Politia, iv., p. 421 c ff.; Leges, v. p. 739 B.).

To turn from heathen to Jewish social institutions, Josephus tells us (Bellum Jud. ii. 8, § 3) of the Essenes, that each member on entrance threw his goods into the common stock, so that there was found among them neither poverty nor riches. In like manner the Therapeutae on Lake Moeris had all things in common.

It was while the Therapeutae and Essenes were still flourishing communities that the gospel of Christ was first proclaimed. And here, too, we read of the earlier church of Jerusalem; that they "had all things common" (Acts ii. 44)—a passage which has often served fanatical sects as a justification of their communism. And yet it is clear from the book of the Acts itself that property made over to the community was of the nature of a voluntary gift; those who entered the church were not deprived of the right to possess property (Acts v. 4); Ananias was not punished for failing to contribute the whole of his property, but for fraud and lying in pretending to give the whole while he only gave part.

In the apostolic age generally it is past all controversy that nothing like a community of goods existed in the church. The churches are evidently contemplated as containing the same variety of wealth and station as ordinary society; contributions are made of freewill; the rich are charged to "be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;" the cheerful giver is commended (2 Cor. ix. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18). The disturbed state of the Thessalonians, and their unwillingness to labour while they expected the immediate advent of Christ, had (so far as appears) no connexion with any communistic views. Nor does the testimony of the next age favour the idea that the earliest Christian society was communistic. The writer of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5) speaks of a "common table," and no more. Tertullian, indeed (Apolog. c. 39), says, in so many words, that Christians had all things in common except their wives (omnia indiscreta sunt apud nos praeter uxores); but it is evident that this is nothing more than a characteristically violent expression for their mutual love and charity; for in the very same chapter he states expressly, that the contributions of the brethren to the common fund were wholly voluntary (modicam unusquisque stipem menstrua die, vel quum velit, et si modo velit, et si modo possit, apponit). Lactantius (Epit. Div. Instit. c. 38) especially condemns communism as one of the cardinal vices of Plato's Republic, which he would hardly have done if he had supposed the same principle to have animated the first society of believers. The interpretation of Acts ii. 44 as relating to an absolute community of goods seems in fact to have taken its rise from Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in Acta App.). Some writers in modern times have seen in this supposed communism of the early Christians at Jerusalem an indication of an Essene influence. (See against this view Von Wegnern, in Illgen's Zeitschrift xi. 2. p. 1 ff.).

As, however, within the church so strong an expression was given to the duty of mutual love and succour, and of the brotherhood of man in Christ, it could scarcely fail but that here and there enthusiastic sects would exaggerate and develop these principles into absolute renunciation of property. This was in fact the case. During the ecclesiastical troubles in Africa in the 4th century, the Donatists were never weary of reproaching their orthodox opponents with the wealth and power which they derived from their connexion with the state. Some of their own adherents, in consequence of these denunciations, renounced private possessions altogether—a renunciation which led to vagabondage and mendicancy rather than to holiness. These CIRCUMCELLIONS—as they came to be called—became the nucleus of a band of discontented peasants and runaway slaves, whose excesses at last required the forcible interference of the government to put them down. And other sects also rejected the idea of property; the Apotactici or Apostolici, as they arrogantly called themselves (says St. Augustine, De Haeres. c. 40), admitted none into their community who lived with wives or possessed private property (res proprias habentes); and, a common characteristic of heresy, denied salvation to all outside their own sect. The Eustathians also, who were condemned at the council of Gangra about the year 370 (Conc. Gangr. Praef.) held that those who did not give up their private wealth were beyond all hope of salvation. The laws of the empire imposed upon Apotactici the same penalties that were laid upon other heretics, except the confiscation of goods; they could not be deprived of that which they had already renounced (Codex Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 5, de Haeret. ll. 7 et 11).

When Pachomius († 348) first drew together into one body [COENOBIVM] a number of anchorites and wandering mendicants at Tabennae in Upper Egypt, he instituted a system of organized labour and common participation in the fruits of labour. Stewards [OECONOMUS] managed the property of the society for the benefit of the whole, and distributed the excess of income to the poor and needy of the neighbourhood. St. Basil, St. Benedict, and other founders of monastic orders, enjoined the same rule of individual poverty on the members of their societies, and so there arose throughout Christendom, in East and West, religious societies of celibates organized on communistic principles [MONASTICISM]. From the 8th century onward the secular clergy also, who lived the canonical life, adopted, to some extent, the principle of community of goods [CANONICI]. [C.]

GOSPEL, THE LITURGICAL. I. Introduction.—Among the Jews, certainly from the time of the Maccabees, and probably before, one lesson from the Pentateuch and another from the "Prophets" (i.e. from some of the later historical books, and from those more properly called prophetic) were read in the synagogues every sabbath day. Fifty-four portions from the Pentateuch (called Paraschioth), and as many from the "Prophets" (Hapthoroth), were appointed for this purpose. As the Jews intercalated a month every second or third year, this number was required. When there were not fifty-four sabbaths in a year, they read two of the shorter lessons together, once or twice in the year, as might be necessary; so that the whole of both selections was read through annually. The Paraschioth are generally very long, some extending over four or five chapters; but the Hapthoroth are as a rule short, often only a part of one chapter. Tables of both may be seen in Horne's Introduction to the Scriptures, pt. iii. ch. i. sect. iv. The foregoing facts will enable the reader to judge how far the first Christians were indebted to the traditions of the synagogue for the practice of reading Holy Scripture in their synaxis, and for the method of reading it. At all events we may be certain that the Old Testament, so long the only known repository of the "oracles of God," and still acknowledged to be "able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. iii. 15), would be no more neglected in their common exercises of religion than it was in their private study. At the same time it was inevitable that, when the New Testament came to be written, lessons from that should be read either in addition to or instead of those from the Old. There was, however, a short period during which the Old Testament only would be read in Christian assemblies, viz. before the events of the Gospel were committed to writing; and there is in the most ancient liturgy, that of St. James, a rubric, evidently genuine, which appears to have been framed during this interval. "Then the sacred oracles of the Old Covenant and of the Prophets are read at great length (διεξοδικώτατα, some understand "consecutively," but the Jewish precedent favours the former reading); and the incarnation of the Son of God, and His sufferings, His resurrection from the dead, and ascension into heaven, and, again, His second coming with glory, are set forth." As Mr. Trollope points out (The Greek Liturgy of St. James, p. 42), we have here the Old Testament read, but the great events of the Gospel related to the people as if not yet in writing.

II. Evidence of use.—Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, describing the celebration of the Eucharist, says, "The commentaries of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as time permits" (Apol. i. c. 67). A lesson from the gospels was without doubt included under the former head. St. Cyprian, A.D. 250, speaks of a confessor whom he had ordained lector, as "reading the precepts and the gospel of the Lord" from the stand (pulpitum) (Ep. xxxix.). Eusebius, A.D. 315, says that St. Peter authorised the use of the gospel of St. Mark "in the churches." For this he refers to the Hypotyposes of Clemens of Alexandria (not of Rome, as Bona and others) and to Papias; but elsewhere he cites both passages, and neither of them contains the words "in the churches." What he says, therefore, does not, as many have imagined, prove from Papias the custom of the apostolic church, but is only a proof of the practice of his own age, in the light of which he read those earlier writers

copy of which, nearly complete, in Merovingian characters, was found by Mabillon in the monastery at Luxeuil. It provides a gospel for every mass (Liturg. Gall. lib. ii. pp. 97-173). Luxeuil is in the province of Besançon; but the eucharistic lessons (of which the gospel is always one) in the Sacramentary found at Bobio, which is believed to be of the use of that province, and is certainly of about the same age as the lectionary, differ nevertheless from those in that book. From this we may perhaps infer that although the lessons were then generally fixed, every bishop was at liberty to make his own selection. There is another ancient lectionary, ascribed to St. Jerome, and known as the Liber Comitis, or Comes Hieronymi; but from internal evidence shown to be the work of a Gallican compiler in the 8th century. This has been printed from two MSS., one of which provides three lessons for above two hundred days and occasions; the other for the most part only two; but the gospel is never omitted in either. The shorter recension may be seen in the Rituale SS. Patrum of Pamelius, tom. ii. pp. 1-61. The longer is printed by Baluze in the Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. ii. coll. 1309-1351.

III. Provision for use.—In the West, generally, a gospel has been always provided for every Sunday and for other holy days. The number of gospels (and other lessons) in the Liber Comitis already mentioned suggests that at one time there was a partial attempt to assign proper lessons to every day in the year. However this may be, the Roman use retained them for every day in Lent, and the Mozarabic for every Wednesday and Friday (except the first) during that season (see Missale Mixtum, Leslie, pp. 89-154). There was no such provision in the Gallican Sacramentary found at Bobio (see Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. ii. coll. 815-835, or Mus. Ital. tom. i. pp. 301-319), nor, so far as we can judge in the Lectionary of Luxeuil (Mabillon, Liturg. Gall. p. 124). Eight leaves are missing in this MS. between Ash Wednesday and Palm Sunday, but they could hardly have contained more than the Sunday lessons. The ancient Irish Sacramentary, of which but one copy exists in manuscript, probably of the 6th century, is singular in the West in having but one gospel and epistle for the whole year, the former being the sixth chapter of St. John, the latter the eleventh chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians. See O'Connor's Append. to vol. i. of the Catal. of the MSS. at Stowe, p. 45. The fact is also attested by Dr. Todd (see Pref. to the Liber. Eccl. de B. Terrenani de Arbutnott, p. xxiv.).

In the West the gospels appear to have been chosen without any reference to their place in the books of the New Testament. But, in the Greek church, those four books have been divided into lessons (τμήματα, μέρη, περικοπὰς, ἀναγνώσματα, ἀναγνώσεις); so that they may be read through in order, only interrupted when a festival with its proper lesson intervenes (Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccl. Gr. Diss. i. p. 35). It is probably in accordance with this arrangement that the canon of Laodicea, already cited, does not order lessons from the gospels, or sections, or portions, or the like, to be read on Saturday with other scriptures, but the gospels themselves, i.e. the four books so called. From this it may be inferred that the Greek method was the normal practice of the whole Eastern church before the separation of the Nestorians and Monophysites. There was an exception, however, at one period, whether beginning before or after that separation, in the church of Malabar, the ancient liturgy of which presents but one epistle and gospel for every celebration—the former composed from 2 Cor. v. 1-10, and Heb. iv. 12, 13; the latter taken from St. John v. vv. 19-29. As neither have any special reference to the Eucharist, it may be inferred that the peculiarity was, unlike that of the Irish missal, unintentional, and resulting, probably, from the destruction of sacred books in a season of persecution, and from the ignorance that followed it.

IV. The Book of the Gospels.—The book which contained the four gospels as divided for eucharistic use was called by the Greeks Εὐαγγέλιον. The oldest writer cited as using the word in this specific sense is Palladius, A.D. 400: "He brings the 'gospel' to him and exacts the oath." (Hist. Lausiac. c. 86.) Another proof of the antiquity of the usage is the fact that the Nestorians, who were cut off from the church in the 5th century, retain the term Euangelion in this limited sense to the present day (Badger's Nestorians, v. ii. p. 19). The book is similarly called "the gospel" in the liturgy of St. Mark (Renaud. tom. i. p. 136) and others.

V. By whom read.—In Africa the eucharistic gospel was read by those of the order of readers in the 3rd century (see Cypr. Ep. xxxix. and Ep. xxxviii.). It was generally, however, assigned to a higher order: "After these (i.e. the other lessons), let a deacon or presbyter read the gospels" (Constit. Apostol. lib. ii. c. lviii.). Sozomen, A.D. 440, tells us that among the Alexandrians the "archdeacon alone read that sacred book (of the gospels); but among others the deacons, and in many churches the priests only" (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. xix.). He adds that "on high days bishops read it, as at Constantinople, on the first day of the paschal feast." The liturgies of St. Mark (Renaud. tom. i. p. 138), St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom (Goar, pp. 161 and 69) give this office to the deacon. This was also the common practice in the West. Thus St. Jerome says to Sabinian, "Thou wast wont to read the gospel as a deacon" (Ep. xciii.). St. Isidore of Seville, writing about the year 610, is a witness to the same practice (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 8). We observe it also in the most ancient "Ordines Romani" (Mus. Ital. tom. ii. pp. 10, 46); and it became the rule throughout Europe, when a deacon was present.

VI. Where read.—The gospel was perhaps generally read from a stand called Ambo (Ἀμβων) or Pulpitum even in the earliest ages. It certainly was so when the celebrant himself did not read it. Thus St. Cyprian, as before quoted, speaks of Celerinus, the reader, as officiating "on a pulpit, i.e. on the tribunal of the church," and generally of confessors raised to that order as "coming to the pulpit after the stocks" (Epp. xxxviii., xxxix.). The Ordo Romanus in use in the 8th century orders the gospel to be read from the higher step of the ambo, the epistle having been read from a lower (Ord. ii. nn. 7, 8). In some churches there was a separate ambo for the gospel. An example occurred in the church of St. Clement at Rome, where also the gospel ambo was a "little higher and more ornate" (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. iv. n. iii.). This became to some extent a rule (Scuamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 222). We hear of the ambo in the East also. Thus Sozomen, speaking of a tomb over which a church had been built, says that it was "near the ambo, that is to say, the rostrum (βήμα) of the readers" (Hist. Eccl. lib. ix. c. ii.). The same historian tells us that St. Chrysostom, that he might be better heard, used to preach at Constantinople "sitting on the rostrum of the readers" (lib. v. c. v.), and Socrates, referring to a particular occasion, speaks of him as "seated on the ambo, from which he was wont also before that to preach in order to be heard" (Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. v.). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, forbade any who had not received the proper benediction to "proclaim the words of God to the people on the ambo" (can. xxxiii.). In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, the deacon who reads the gospel "stands elevated on the ambo or in the appointed place" (Goar, p. 69).

VII. Read towards the South.—It was an early, but we think not primitive, custom in the West for the gospel to "stand facing the south, where the men were wont to assemble" (Ord. Rom. ii. c. 8). Amalarius, an early commentator on the Ordo Romanus, suggests that this was because the men were supposed to receive the gospel first, and to teach it to their wives at home (1 Cor. xiv. 35). See his Ecloga, n. xv. Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 553. It is probable, however, that a different custom prevailed at the same time in France, or very soon after. For in the latter part of the 9th century Remigius of Auxerre tells us that "the Levite (deacon), when about to pronounce the words of the gospel, turns his face towards the north," as defying Satan, who was supposed (from Isai. xiv. 13) to dwell there (De Celeb. Missae, ad calc. Libri Pseudo-Alcuini, de Div. Off. Hittorp, col. 280).

VIII. Attendant rites.—From a very early period the reading of the gospel was attended with circumstances of solemnity. In the Greek church it has for many ages been brought into the church out of the chapel of Prothesis in a rite known as the Little Entrance, the bringing in of the gifts being the Great Entrance. While the choir is singing the Glory at the end of the third antiphon the priest and deacon, after bowing thrice before the altar, go out for the book of the gospels. They return into the church, the deacon carrying the gospel, preceded by lights, and welcomed by a special anthem. After a circuit of some length on the north side of the church they stop at the holy doors, where the priest says, secretly, the "Prayer of the Entrance." The deacon then asks for, and the priest gives, a "blessing on the Entrance," troparia being sung meanwhile. When they are ended, the deacon shows the gospel to the people, saying, "Wisdom. Stand up." They then enter the bema, and the book is laid on the holy table till required for use (Euchologium, Goar, pp. 67, 124, 160). This is found in the older liturgy of St. Basil, as well as that of St. Chrysostom, but it is impossible to say how much of it was practised in the age of those great bishops. There is no trace of the Little Entrance in the liturgy of Jerusalem, from which that of Caesarea (St.

Basil) was derived, nor in the Nestorian liturgies, which came from an independent source before the 5th century. On the other hand, there is a simpler form of the rite in the Armenian liturgy, which was borrowed from Caesarea in the time of St. Basil, and influenced in its subsequent growth by the residence of St. Chrysostom in Armenia, where he died (Le Brun, Diss. sur les Liturgies, x. art. iv. xiii.). We observe, also, an elaborate rendering of the same rite in liturgies that can hardly have been indebted to those of the Greek church after the 6th century at least. "As the book of the gospels," remarks Renaudot, "is carried to the ambo with great ceremony among the Copts, so it is certain that it is in like manner done among the Syrians; and they received it from the Greeks" (tom. ii. p. 69). For the Coptic Entrance see tom. i. p. 210. A short rubric in the liturgy of St. Mark tells us when the Entrance takes place; but it is not described (Renaud. tom. i. p. 136).

Another proof of the antiquity of the Little Entrance is found in its resemblance to a ceremony practised at Rome in certain pontifical masses of the 7th and 8th centuries. The gospel was brought in a case or casket from the basilica of St. John Lateran to the regionary church in which the celebration took place by an acolyte in attendance on the bishop, but under the care of the archdeacon. It was made ready by the reader at the door of the Secretarium, while the bishop was within preparing for the service. The acolyte then carried it "into the presbytery to before the altar," preceded by a subdeacon, who then took it from him, and "with his own hands placed it with honour upon the altar" (Ord. Rom. i. §§ 3, 4, 5; ii. 2, 4, 5).

As an example of the ritual when the gospel was to be read, we may, for the East, cite St. Mark: "The deacon, when about to read the gospel, says, 'Bless, sir.' The priest, 'The Lord bless and strengthen, and make us hearers of His holy gospel, who is God blessed now and ever, and for ever, Amen.' The deacon, 'Stand, let us hear the holy gospel.' The priest, 'Peace be to all.' The people, 'And to thy spirit.' Then the deacon reads the gospel" (Renaud. tom. i. p. 138). At Rome, in the pontifical masses before mentioned, the deacon having received a blessing from the bishop, "The Lord be in thy heart and on thy lips," after kissing the gospels, took the book off the altar, and went towards the ambo, preceded by two subdeacons—one with incense—and followed by a third. There the acolytes made a passage for the preceding subdeacons and the deacon. The latter then rested his book on the left arm of the subdeacon without a censor, who opened it at the place already marked. The deacon then, with his finger in the place, went up to that stage of the ambo from which he was to read, the two subdeacons going to stand before the steps by which he would descend. The gospel ended, the bishop says, "Peace be to thee," and "The Lord be with you." Resp., "And with thy spirit." As the deacon came down, the subdeacon who had opened the book took it from him, and handed it to the third subdeacon who had followed. He, holding it on his planeta, before his breast, offers it to be kissed by all engaged in the rite, and then puts it into the case or casket before mentioned, held ready by the acolyte who had brought it into the church (Ord. Rom. i. § 11). An Ordo, somewhat later, but not lower than the 8th century, tells us that "the candles were extinguished in their place after the gospel was read" (Ord. ii. § 9). The custom of lighting candles at the reading of the gospel came from the East, where it prevailed in the 4th century. "Through all the churches of the East," says St. Jerome, "when the gospel is to be read, lights are burned, though the sun be already shining" (Contra Vigilant. § 7). St. Isidore of Seville, in a work written in 636, says that "acolytes in Greek are called ceroferrarii in Latin, from their bearing wax candles when the gospel is to be read," &c. (Etymol. lib. vii. c. xii. § 29). This is probably the earliest notice in the West, though the first Ordo Romanus belongs almost certainly to the same century. The symbolism of the lights needs no explanation (see St. John i. 9; viii. 12).

IX. Heard standing.—It was probably from the very first the custom for the people to hear the gospel standing, out of reverence. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. ii. c. lvii.: "When the gospel is being read, let all the presbyters and the deacons and all the people stand with great quietness." Philostorgius, A.D. 425, says that Theophilus the Indian, when visiting his native country, about the year 345, found that the people "performed the hearing of the gospel lessons sitting, and had some other practices which the Divine law did not sanction" (Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. § 5). His language shows how important the rite was considered. Isidore of Pelusium, 412, says, in the same spirit, "When the True Shepherd becomes present through the opening of the adorable gospels, the bishop both rises and lays aside the habit (the ἀμφοβόριον) which he wears symbolical of Him" (Ep. cxxvi. Hermينو Comiti). In accordance with this, Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. xix.) tells us that there was "a strange custom among the Alexandrians, for, when the gospels were read, the bishop did not stand up, which," he adds, "I have neither known nor heard of among others." The same rule prevailed in the West. Amalarius, writing about 827, says: "During the celebration of these, i.e. the lesson (epistle) and the prophecy, we are wont to sit, after the custom of the ancients." Then, when he speaks of the gospel: "Up to this time we sit; now we must rise at the words of the gospel" (De Eccl. Off. lib. iii. cc. 11, 18). At the same time all turned to the East, and laid down the staff on which, at that period, they commonly leaned, "nor was there crown or other covering on their heads" (Ord. Rom. ii. § 8; Amal. u.s. c. 18).

X. The Doxologies.—The doxology now common after the announcement of the gospel is mentioned by writers within our period. Thus Heterius and Beatus, in Spain, A.D. 785: "The deacon commands all to be silent, and says, 'The lesson of the holy gospel according to Matthew.' All the people answer, 'Glory be to Thee, O Lord'" (Adv. Elipmnd. lib. i. c. lxvi.). Compare the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, pp. 2, 45, &c.). Amalarius only recommends it. After advising the people to pray for a profitable hearing, he adds: "Let him who is not quick to take in the words of the gospel, at least say, 'Glory,'" &c. (lib. iii. c. 13). The practice probably came through Spain, like several other rites, from the East. In the homily De Circo, ascribed incorrectly to St. Chrysostom, we read, "When the deacon is about to open the gospel, we all fix our eyes on him and keep silence; but when he begins the course of reading, we forthwith stand up, and respond, 'Glory be to Thee, O Lord'" (Opp. St. Chrys. tom. viii. p. 723, ed. Gaume). Compare the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom (Goar, pp. 161 and 69). The use of this form was probably not very extensive before the 6th century, or we should have found it in all the Nestorian and Eutychian rites. The liturgy of Malabar (Nestorian), however, does give "Glory to Christ the Lord" (Hist. Eccl. Malab. Raulin, p. 306); the Ethiopic, "Glory be to Thee alway, O Christ, our Lord and God," &c. (Renaud. tom. i. p. 510); and the Armenian, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord, our God" (Neale's Eastern Church, Introd. p. 414).

There is no very early evidence of a doxology after the gospel. The liturgy of Malabar repeats that given above. The Ethiopic has, "The cherubim and seraphim send glory up to Thee." The Armenian, like the Malabar, has the same after as before. There was none in the early Roman liturgy, and Amen seems to have been the common response in the middle ages (Notitia Eucharistica, p. 228).

XI. In what language read.—As the first converts to the gospel spoke Greek, all the liturgies were originally in that language. It is not known when Latin was adopted in the services at Rome, but the church there had been founded more than a century and a half before it produced a single Latin writer. It was, therefore, natural that Greek should be occasionally and partially used in the services after the general use of Latin had begun. In particular the eucharistic lessons were on certain days read in both languages. The chief evidence of this is the fact that it continued as a traditionary custom throughout the middle ages (see Notitia Euch. p. 207); but we also find some early testimony to the usage. Thus Amalarius: "Six lessons were read by the ancient Romans [on the Saturdays of the Ember weeks] in Greek and Latin (which custom is kept up at Constantinople to this day), for two reasons, if I mistake not; the one, because there were Greeks present, to whom Latin was not known; the other, because both people were of one mind" (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 1). This statement obtains collateral support from the earliest Ordo Romanus, in which the four lessons used at the general baptism on Easter Eve are ordered to be read in Greek and Latin (§ 40). Nicholas I., A.D. 858, writing to the emperor Michael, confirms the statement of Amalarius as to the practice at Constantinople. He affirms that "daily, or any how, on the principal feasts," the church there was "reported to recite the apostolic and evangelic lessons in that language (the Latin) first, and afterwards pronounce the very same lessons in Greek, for the sake of the Greeks" (Ep. viii., Labbe Conc. tom. viii. col. 298). When John VIII., in the same century, gave permission for the celebration of the Holy Communion in the Slavonic tongue, he made this proviso, that, "to show it greater honour, the gospel should be read in Latin, and afterwards published in Slavonic in the ears of the people who did not understand Latin; as appears to be done in some churches" (Ep. cclvii.; Labb. Conc. tom. ix. col. 177). In the churches of Syria the gospel and epistle are still read both in the old Syriac and in the better understood Arabic (Renaud. tom. ii. p. 69); and in Egypt in both Coptic and Arabic (Renaud. tom. i. pp. 5-8). When they were first read in Arabic we do not know; but it was probably before the 9th century, as both countries were conquered and overrun by the Arabs in the former half of the 7th.

XII. From the 6th century downward we meet with repeated instances of a custom of inclosing the gospels in cases, covers, or caskets, adorned with gems and the precious metals. The first Ordo Romanus, in giving directions for the pontifical mass, to which we have referred above, orders, that on festivals the keeper of the vestry at St. John's Lateran shall give out "a larger chalice and paten, and larger gospels under his seal, noting the number of the gems that they be not lost" (§ 3). Childebert I., A.D. 531, is said by Gregory of Tours to have returned from an expedition into Spain, bringing with him, among other spoils, "sixty chalices, fifteen patens, twenty cases for the gospels (evangeliorum capsas), all adorned with pure gold and precious gems" (Hist. Franc. lib. iii. c. x.). The same writer tells us that one of the emperors of Rome caused to be made for the church at Lyons "a case for inclosing the holy gospels and a paten and chalice of pure gold and precious stones" (De Glor. Confess. cap. lxiii.). Gregory the Great gave to the king of the Lombards "a lectionary (lectionem) of the holy gospel inclosed in a Persian case (theca)" (Epp. lib. xii. Ep. vii. ad Theodel.) [W. E. S.]

GOPELLER. [GOSPEL, § V. p. 742.]

GOSPELS, BOOK OF. [LITURGICAL BOOKS: GOSPEL, § IV. p. 742.]

GOSPELS IN ART. [See FOUR RIVERS, EVANGELISTS.] The sources of the four rivers, represented continually on the sarcophagi (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. xvi. and passim) have doubtless reference to the four gospels, as well as to the streams which watered the garden of Eden. See also the woodcut of the Lateran Cross s. v. CROSS.

Rolls of the gospels, or other sacred books are often represented on glasses and cups (Buonarrotti, Vetri, tav. ii. viii. 1, xiv. 2). A case containing the gospels is represented in the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna (see Ciampini, Vet. Mon. I. lxvii.). They are generally rolls, sometimes with umbilici and capsae. In Buonarrotti, Frammenti di vasi antichi, tav. viii. 1, the rolls of the four gospels surround a representation of the miracle of the seven loaves, with probable reference to Matt. iv. 4, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

The portraits or symbolic representations of the Evangelists very commonly bear the gospels from the earliest date: indeed the symbol of four scrolls or books, placed in the four angles of a Greek cross, are asserted by Mrs. Jameson to be the earliest type of the Four Evangelists, and must certainly be among the earliest. In the baptistery at Ravenna (Ciampini, V. M. I. p. 234), there is a mosaic of the four gospels resting on four tables, each with its title. This dates from A.D. 451.

The figures of apostles, passim in ancient mediaeval and modern art, bear rolls or volumes in their hands; but Martigny remarks very ingeniously and thoughtfully, that in the earliest examples of apostles the volume must be considered to be that of the Law and the Prophets, to which and to whom they referred all men in their preaching, even from the day of Pentecost. In one instance a picture at the bottom of a cup representing an adoration of the Magi (Buonarrotti ix. 3) the book of the gospels is placed near one of the three, in token of their being the first, with the shepherds, to bear the good tidings of the Saviour of Mankind.

A symbol of the gospel, and of the evangelists, of the highest antiquity (indeed, as Mr. Hemaans thinks, of the Constantinian period) is the painting of four jewelled books at the juncture of the arms of a large cross, also jewelled, on the vault of a hall belonging to the Thermae of Trajan; consecrated for Christian worship by pope Sylvester in the time of Constantine, and still serving as a crypt-chapel below the church of SS. Martino e Silvestro on the Esquiline Hill.

GRACE AT MEALS. The Jews were wont to give thanks at table, one of the company saying the prayer "in the plural number, Let us bless, &c.," and the rest answering Amen (Beracoth cap. vii.; Lightfoot Horae Hebr. in St. Matt. xv. 36). When our Lord was about to feed the multitudes He took the loaves and fishes, and "blessed" (St. Matt. xiv. 19; St. Mark vi. 41; St. Luke ix. 16) or "gave thanks" (St. Matt. xv. 36; St. Mark viii. 6; St. John vi. 11) before He distributed them. This was in accordance with the Jewish custom, which thus, with the sanction of our Lord's example, passed into His church. St. Chrysostom, commenting on Matt. xiv. 19-21, says that He then "taught us that we should not touch a table before giving thanks to Him who provides this food" (Hom. xlix.). In commenting on the account of the Last Supper, he refers to the "Grace" said after meat also:—"He gave thanks before distributing to the disciples, that we may give thanks too. He gave thanks and sang hymns after distributing, that we may do the same thing" (In St. Matt. xxvi. 30; Hom. lxxxii.). That this was the general practice of the early Christians is proved by many testimonies. St. Paul, to whatever else he may allude beside, certainly recognizes it in 1 Tim. iv. 3-5. Meats, he there teaches, were "created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." Clemens of Alexandria, A.D. 192, both owns the principle, and vouches for the observance. "As it is meet that before taking food we bless the Maker of all these things, so also does it become us, when drinking, to sing psalms unto Him; forasmuch as we are partaking of His creatures" (Poedag. lib. ii. c. iv. § 44; see also § 77). Of the model Christian, he says, "His sacrifices are prayers and praises, and the reading of Scripture before the banquetting; psalms and hymns after it" (Strom. lib. vii. c. vii. § 49). Again: "Referring the reverent enjoyment of all things to God, he ever offers to the giver of all things the first-fruits of meat and drink and anointing oil, yielding thanks," &c. (Ibid. § 36). Tertullian, writing probably in 202: "We do not recline (at an entertainment) before prayer be first tasted . . . After water for the hands and lights, each, as he is able, is called out to sing to God from the Holy Scriptures, or from his own mind. In like manner prayer puts an end to the feast" (Liber Apol. adv. Gentes, c. xxxix.). St. Cyprian, writing in 246: "Nor let the banquetting hour be void of heavenly grace. Let the temperate entertainment resound with psalms, and do ye each undertake this wonted duty according to the strength of your memory or excellence of voice" (Ad Donat. sub fin.). St. Basil, A.D. 370: "Let prayers be said before taking food in meet acknowledgment of the gifts of God, both of those which He is now giving and of those which He has put in store for the future. Let prayers be said after food containing a return of thanks for the things given, and request for those promised" (Ep. ii. ad Greg. Naz. § 6). Sozomen, A.D. 440, says of the younger Theodosius, that he would eat nothing "before he had blessed the Creator of all things" (Hist. Eccles. Orat. ad Imp. libro i. praeixa).

Examples remain of the early Graces, both of the East and West. E.g. the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vii. c. 49) furnish the following Εὐχὴ ἐν ἀποτίμῃ, Prayer at the midday meal: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who feedest me from my youth up, who givest food to all flesh. Fill our hearts with joy and gladness; that always having a sufficiency we may abound unto every good work, in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom be glory and honour and power unto Thee, world without end, Amen" (Patres Apostol. Cotel. tom. i. p. 385). This prayer (slightly varied) is also given to be said after meals in the treatise De Virginitate ascribed (most improbably) to St. Athanasius. The writer first gives it and then proceeds as follows: "And when thou art seated at table and hast begun to break the bread, having thrice sealed it with the sign of the cross, thus give thanks, 'We give thanks unto Thee, our Father, for Thy holy resurrection [i. e. wrought and to be wrought in us, if the reading be correct]; for through Thy Son Jesus Christ hast Thou made it known unto us; and as this bread upon this table was in separate grains, and being gathered together became one thing, so let Thy church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy kingdom; for Thine is the power and the glory for ever and ever. Amen.' And this prayer thou oughtest to say when thou breakest bread and desirest to eat; but when thou dost set it on the table and sittest down, say Our Father all through. But the prayer above written (Blessed art Thou, O God [Lord, Const. Apost.]) we say after we have made our meal and have risen from table" (§§ 12, 13, inter Athanas. Opp.). A short paraphrase, as it appears, of an Eastern Grace at meals may also be seen in the anonymous commentary (probably of the sixth century) on the Book of Job printed with the works of Origen (lib. iii.).

The following examples from the Gelasian Sacramentary are probably the most ancient Graces of the Latin church now extant: Prayers before Meat. (1) "Refresh us, O Lord, with Thy gifts, and sustain us with the bounty of Thy riches; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." (2) "Let us be refreshed, O Lord, from Thy grants and gifts, and satiated with Thy blessing through, &c." (3) "Protect us, O Lord our God, and afford needful sustenance to our frailty: through, &c." (4) "Bless, O Lord, Thy gifts, which of Thy bounty we are about to take; through, &c." (5) "O God, who dost always invite us to spiritual delights, give a blessing on Thy gifts; that we may attain to a sanctified reception of those things which are to be eaten in Thy name; through, &c." (6) "May Thy gifts, O Lord, refresh us, and Thy grace console us; through, &c." Prayers after Meals.—(1) "Satisfied, O Lord, with the gifts of Thy riches, we give Thee thanks for these things which we receive from Thy bounty, beseeching Thy mercy that that which was needful for our bodies may not be burdensome to our minds; through, &c." (2) "We have been satisfied, O Lord, with Thy grants and gifts. Replenish us with Thy mercy, Thou who art blessed; who with the Father and Holy Ghost livest and reignest God for ever and ever. Amen." Muratori, Liturgia Rom. Vetus, tom. i. col. 745. Compare the Benedictio ad Mensam, and Benedictio post Mensam levatam in the Galician Sacramentary of the 7th century found at Bobio (Ibid. tom. ii. col. 959).

GRACILIANUS. [FELICISSIMA.]

GRADO, COUNCIL OF (Gradense concilium), held A.D. 579 at Grado for the transfer thither of the see of Aquileia, supposing its acts genuine, but Istria was at this time out of communion with Rome for not accepting the 5th council, and the part assigned to Elias, bishop of Aquileia, throughout is suspicious. A legate from Rome at his instance exhibited a letter as from pope Pelagius II. to him authorising this change, which was accordingly confirmed. Then he requested that the definition of the 4th council might be recited, which was also done. In the subscriptions which follow his own comes first, after him that of the legate, nineteen bishops or their representatives follow, and last of all twelve presbyters in their own names. Mansi regards it as a forgery (ix. 927).

GRADUAL (Responsorium Graduale or Gradale; or simply Responsorium or Responsum; or Graduale. In mediaeval English Grayl spelt variously).—I. This was an anthem sung after the epistle in most of the Latin churches. Originally, it seems that a whole psalm was sung, at least in Africa, as we gather from several allusions in the Sermons of St. Augustine. Thus in one he says, "To this belongs that which the apostolic lesson (Col. iii. 9) before the canticle of the psalm presignified, saying 'Put off, &c.'" (Serm. xxxii. c. iv.). "We have heard the apostle, we have heard the psalm, we have heard the gospel" (Serm. clxv. c. i.). Again:—"We have heard the first lesson of the apostle, 'This is a faithful saying, &c.' (1 Tim. i. 15) Then we sang a psalm, mutually exhorting one another, saying with one voice, one heart, 'O come, let us worship,' &c. (Ps. xc. 6). After these the gospel lesson showed us the cleansing of the ten lepers" (Serm. clxxvi. c. i.). In his Retractions (lib. ii. c. xi.) St. Augustine speaks of a custom which began at Carthage in his time of "saying hymns at the altar from the Book of Psalms, either before the oblation or when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people." The hymn before the oblation has been understood by some to be the psalm before the gospel; but a hymn sung before the catechumens left would hardly have been called by so precise a writer as Augustine a hymn before the oblation. He must rather have meant the offertory which immediately preceded the offering of the elements. Nor was the Gradual sung at the altar, but, as we shall see, from the lector's ambo. We infer, therefore, that the psalm after the epistle was a custom of the church before the age of St. Augustine. Gennadius of Marseilles, A.D. 495, tells us that Musaeus, a presbyter of that city, A.D. 458, at the request of his bishop, selected "from the Holy Scriptures lessons suitable to the feast-days of the whole year, and besides, responsory chapters of psalms adapted to the seasons and lessons" (De Viris Illust. c. lxxix.). Another witness is Gregory of Tours, who relates that on a certain occasion in the year 585, his deacon "who had said the responsory at the masses before day" was ordered by king Guntram to sing before him, and that afterwards all the priests present sang a responsory psalm, each with one of his clerks (Hist. Franc. L. viii. § iii.). The Antiphonary ascribed to Gregory I. must have undergone changes down to the 11th or 12th century, if it was not originally compiled then. It contains Graduals (there called Responsories) for use throughout the year; but from our uncertainty about their age, we need only state the fact. It was printed by Pamelius (Liturgicon, tom. ii. p. 62), and by Thomasius at Rome in 1683. The earliest Ordo Romanus extant, which describes a pontifical mass of the 7th century, fully recognizes the use of the Gradual: "After he (the subdeacon) has read (the epistle) the cantor ascends [the steps of the ambo] with the cantatory, and says the Response" (§ 10; Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 9). Again: "With regard to the Gradual Responsory, it is [in Lent] sung to the end by him who begins it, and the verse in like manner" (§ 26, p. 18). Compare Ordo ii. § 7. Amalarius (Prol. in Lib. de Ord. Antiph. Hittorp. col. 504) explains the term 'cantatory.' "That which we call the Gradual (Gradale) they (the Romans), call Cantatorium; which in some churches among them is still, according to the old custom, comprised in one volume." It was, in fact, a book containing all the Graduals for the year.

II. Strictly only the first verse of the anthem was called the Gradual. The rest was technically called the "verse." The mode of singing it was not everywhere the same; but Amalarius describes at some length how this was done at Rome, whence, he assures us (De Eccles. Off. L. iii. c. 11; De Ord. Ant. u.s.), the Gradual was derived to other churches:—"The precentor in the first row sings the Responsory to the end. The succentors respond (i. e. sing the Responsory) in like manner. The precentor then sings the verse. The verse being ended, the succentors a second time begin the Responsory from the first word, and continue it to the end. Then the precentor sings, 'Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost.' This being ended, the succentors take up the Responsory about the middle, and continue it to the end. Lastly the precentor begins the Responsory from the first word and continues it to the end. Which being over the succentors for the third time repeat the Responsory from the beginning and continue it to the end." Amalarius also tells us that "the Gloria was not sung with Responsories from the first" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 18); from which we infer with probability that they were in use before that doxology was composed.

III. The mode of singing adopted for the Gradual, in which one sang alone for a while and many responded was probably in use from the very infancy of the church. In the Apostolical Constitutions the apostles are made to direct that at the celebration of the holy eucharist one of the deacons shall "chant the hymns of David, and the people subchant the ends of the verses" (L. ii. c. lvii.). When St. Athanasius (A.D. 356) found his church surrounded by more than 5000 soldiers, and a violent crowd of Arians, he placed himself on his throne and "directed the deacon to read a psalm, and the people to respond, 'For His mercy endureth for ever'" (Apol. de Fugâ suâ, § 24). Eusebius, too, citing Philo's account of certain "Ascetae" in Egypt, among other of their customs which he declares to belong to the Christians, mentions that one would "chant a psalm in measured strains, the rest listening in silence, but singing the last parts of the hymns together" (Euseb. Hist. L. II. c. xvii.). Whether those ascetics were Jews or Christians the narrative of Philo shows that the practice must have been known to the Jewish converts of the 1st century, and may even then have been adopted by them.

IV. From Easter Eve to the Saturday in Whitsun week inclusively the Gradual was followed, and at last supplanted by the Alleluia. This had been long known in the West and used, though not prescribed, on public occasions of religious joy. At Rome it was only sung on Easter day, as Sozomen informs us (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. cap. xix.), and his statement is copied by Cassiodorus (Hist. Eccl. Tripart. L. xiii. c. xxxix.), who lived at Rome, A.D. 514. Their authority, however, can only prove the fact for an age before their own; for Gregory I. affirms that it was introduced at Rome in masses by St. Jerome (who had learnt it at Jerusalem) in the time of Damasus, A.D. 384 (Epist. lib. vii.; Ep. lxiv.). This, of course, refers to its use between Easter and Pentecost; as Gregory himself extended it "beyond the time of Pentecost" (ibid.). In the Antiphonary ascribed to him it is only omitted between Septuagesima Sunday and Easter (Pamel. Liturg. tom. ii. pp. 81-110). Amalarius (u.s. cap. 13) speaks of it as "sung on feast days."

V. The Tract was another anthem sometimes sung after the epistle. Originally it was always from the Book of Psalms; and like the Gradual was a remnant and evidence of their early use in celebrations as a part of Holy Scripture. The Tract and Gradual differed at first, in all probability, only in being sung differently; or in other words the Tract was nothing more than the Gradual as it was chanted in seasons of humiliation. It is for this reason that we treat of them together. Very soon, however, a Tract was often sung after the Gradual; or, as it would, we presume, be then viewed, a third verse was added to the anthem, which was sung tractim; i. e. continuously by the cantor without any assistance from the choir. Although the language is obscure, we may perhaps infer that they were sometimes sung together under the first Ordo Romanus. "If it shall be the time for the Alleluia to be said, well; but if for the Tract, well again; but if not let the response (Gradual) only be sung" (§ 10). The Tract is never used without a responsory in the so-called Gregorian Antiphony. Though properly penitential (Amalarius De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 3), the Tract was not always of a mournful character. "Sometimes," says Amalarius, "the Tract expresses tribulation, sometimes joy" (Ibid. lib. iii. c. 13). It was sung from the same place as the Gradual (Ord. Rom. I. § 10; II. § 7), and at first by the same cantor (Ord. I. § 7); but later on by another (Ord. III. § 9). The origin of the name, from cantus tractus, a sustained unbroken chant, appears certain. Honorius of Autun, A.D. 1130, is the earliest extant authority for it (Gemma Animae, lib. i. c. 96); but it is approved by all the best ritualists.

The mode of chanting the Tract was probably borrowed from the early monks, who sang the psalms by turns, one at a time. Thus Cassian, A.D. 424, "One rises to sing psalms unto the Lord before the company" (De Coenob. Instit. lib. ii. c. v.). "They divide the aforesaid number of twelve psalms in such a manner that if two brethren be present, they sing six each; if three, four; if four, three" (Ibid. c. xi.; see also c. xii.). St. Jerome has an allusion to it when, writing to a monk (Ep. xiv. ad Rustic. Mon.), he reminds him of the obligation to rise before sleep would naturally leave him and "say a psalm in his turn."

VI. The Gradual and Tract were sung from the same step of the ambo from which the epistle was read. According to the second Ordo Romanus (§ 7), the Epistoler "went up on to the ambo to read, but not on to its upper step (or stage, gradum), which only he who read the gospel was wont to ascend. After he had read the cantor ascended with the cantorium (=cantatorium) . . . not to a higher place; but he stood in the same place as the reader." It was for this reason that the anthem was called Gradual: it was the chant from the step of the ambo. This explanation of the term is given by Rabanus Maurus, A.D. 847, and is accepted by Bona, Le Brun, Gerbert, Martene, and perhaps all the great writers on ritual.

VII. The fact that the Gradual and Tract were both sung from the lesson desk, and that by a single cantor, detached thither, like the readers, from the choir, seems to indicate their common origin in that extended use of the Book of Psalms with the rest of Holy Scripture which we know to have prevailed during the first ages. Both arrangements were appropriate and natural if the psalms were said in some sort as a lesson; but inappropriate as well as inconvenient for a mere anthem. The sense of this at length led to the Gradual being sung by the cantor in his usual place. Amalarius, indeed, exhibits the cantor as a teacher and preacher no less than those who read the other Scriptures. "By the office of the cantor we may understand that of a prophet . . . By the responsory we may understand the preaching of the New Testament . . . The cantor discharges the functions of a faithful preacher,"

&c. (De Eccl. Off. l. iii. cap. 11). This was, we presume, the traditional view. It is suggested by St. Augustine's manner of referring (see above) to the psalms which in his day formed part of the eucharistic service in Roman Africa, as well as to the epistles and gospels. The same thought underlies the mystical comment of Pseudo-Dionysius. The psalms sung, according to him, put the soul into harmony with things divine, and then those things which have been mystically shadowed forth in them are plainly and fully taught in the lessons from the other parts of Holy writ (De Eccl. Hier. c. iii. n. iii. § 5). Psalms are to this day sung before the gospel in the Coptic rite (Renaud. tom. i. pp. 7, 210). In the Armenian "a suitable psalm is recited" immediately before the first eucharistic lesson (the prophecy) is read (Le Brun, Diss. x. art. xiv.). In the Milanese a Psalmellus (Pamellii Liturgicon, tom. i. p. 295), and in the Mozarabic an anthem headed Psallendo (Leslie, Miss. Moz. pp. 1, 222), in Lent a Tractus (ibid. pp. 98, 101, &c.) is sung between the prophecy and the epistle. In these psalms or anthems we find the evident remains, akin to the Roman Gradual and Tract, of the psalmody which accompanied the reading of the other Scriptures in the primitive church. There was also, we may mention in conclusion, a substitute for it left in the Old Gallican liturgy in the Hymn of Zacharias, often called the prophecy, which was sung before the Old Testament Lesson (S. Germani Expos. Brev. in Martene De Ant. Eccl. Rit. l. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. i.; Mabill. Liturg. Gall. l. ii. pp. 251, 322, &c.), and in the Song of the Three Children (Germanus, u. s.; Mabill. ibid. p. 107) which was sung between the epistle and gospel. [W. E. S.]

GRANATARIUS, in a monastery, one of the four deputies or assistants of the house-steward ("suffraganei cellerario," quaintly styled "solatia cellerarii" in the old Benedictine rule), the receiver of the yearly corn-harvest of the monastery, and keeper of the granary (Mart. Reg. Bened. Comm. c. 31) and of the farm stock (Isidor. Reg. c. 19). In some monasteries his office was to provide all household necessities (Ducange Gloss. Lat. s. v.). The word is also spelt "granarius" or "granetarius." [I. G. S.]

GREETING-HOUSE, a reception-room (ἀσπαστικός οἶκος, receptorium, salutatorium, salle d'entrée, parloir) next to the proaula or proaulium (Ducange Gloss. Lat. s. v. salutatorium). In the narrative of the famous interview between Ambrose and Theodosius, the bishop is described as sitting in his reception-room before going to the church (Theodoret, Ecc. Hist. v. 18), and Gregory the Great speaks of a bishop as proceeding from his reception-room to church (Greg. M. Ep. iv. 54). Bingham corrects the opinion of Scaliger that the place spoken of by Theodoret was a part of the bishop's palace used for entertaining strangers, and pronounces it "a place adjoining the church" ("exedra ecclesiae adjuncta," Ducange, v. s.) for the bishop "to receive the salutations of the people" coming for his "blessing," or on "business" (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. viii. vii. 8; cf. Vales. Annotat. in Theodoret. l. c.). It is recorded of St. Martin of Tours that he sat on a three-legged stool in a room of this kind, in preference to using the bishop's throne which was there (Sulp. Sev. Vit. S. Mart.); and that on his visitations he spent night and day in this room (Sulp. Sev. Ep. 1). In this "salutatorium" the rule of the convent was read over to candidates for admission (Reg. Aurel. ad Virgines, c. 1). The nuns, and even the abbess, were forbidden to see any stranger here alone (Reg. Donat. ad Virg. c. 57; Reg. Caesarii ad Virg. c. 35); and by the council of Macon, A.D. 581, bishops, priests, and deacons, as well as laymen, were prohibited from entering the reception-room of a nunnery, Jews especially being excluded (Conc. Matiscon. c. 2).^a On the same principle, women, even nuns, were excluded from the bishop's "salutatorium" (Ducange, s. v.). In a Benedictine monastery this chamber was usually on the east side of the quadrangle, between the chapter-house and the south transept of the church (Whitaker's Hist. of Whalley, p. 124, 4th ed. 1874).

A room of this kind was used, according to Mabillon, for robing, for hearing causes, for synods, for keeping relics in, and sometimes for temporary residence (Mabill. Ann. Bened. Saec. iv. i. p. 370, cited by Ducange Gloss. Lat. v. s.; cf. Sulp. Sev. Ep. i.). According to Menard, there was a similar room for the use of the priests (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. v. 25; cf. Sulp. Sev. Dial. II. i.).

This receiving-room, or audience-chamber, seems identical with the "sacrarium," or vestry, where the vessels for use in church were kept (Ducange Gloss. Lat. s. v.) See DIACONICUM, GAZOPHYLACIUM. [I. G. S.]

GRIFFIN. See "Cherub" in DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, vol. i. pp. 300 sqq.; and Ruskin's Modern Painters, vol. iii. p. 112.

The connexion between the various symbolism of Cherub and Griffin in Biblical and Northern tradition is strengthened by the etymological resemblance of the words. There is certainly a great likeness between the names γερων (with s affirmative) and קרוב. Both are titles of the most ancient existing symbols of Divine omnipotence and omniscience; as it cannot be doubted that the sphinxes of Egypt and winged bulls or lions of Assyria conveyed kindred ideas to the hieratic, or indeed the popular mind. It would seem that all the chief races of men have been taught to set forth such mysterious forms; as this composite idea is so nearly universal. Some figure of this kind must have been the popular shape of the cherub or gryps known to the children of Israel: and the fact that it was a permitted and prescribed image, taken together with the command to make the brazen serpent, forms a very large portion of the substructure of iconodulist arguments. See Johannes Damascenus De Imaginibus, Orat. ii. Such instances of griffin forms as appear in the earliest Christian decoration seem to the writer to be in all probability merely ornamental; as, in fact, unmeaning adaptations of Gentile patterns. See, however, Guénébault, Dictionnaire Iconographique, s. v. "Griffon." The use of the symbolic griffin by the Lombard race, however, dates from well within our period; though the great Veronese works so frequently mentioned by Professor Ruskin are probably as late as the 11th century. Those of the duomo of Verona and the church of San Zenone deserve especial mention.

That the griffin is the Gothic-Christian representation of the cherub, the "Mighty one," or the "Carved Image" of Hebrew sculpture, seems highly probable, further, from the following connexion of ideas in different ages.

The glorified forms of living creatures and of wheels in the great opening vision of Ezekiel have necessarily been always connected with those of the Zōa, the Beasts of the Apocalypse [See EVANGELISTS, p. 633]. The latter, as representing the writers of the four gospels, are an universal symbol after the fifth century. It did not escape the eye of Professor Ruskin that the marble wheel by the side of his Veronese griffin is an indisputable reference on the part of the unknown Lombard artist to the first chapter of Ezekiel (Ezek. i. 21): "When those (Living Creatures) went, these went: and when those stood, these stood, and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the Living Creatures was in the wheels." And this is fully confirmed (were that necessary) by Dr. Hayman's researches in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. But the wheels appear in a more ancient work by a great and mystical genius whose name and date alone remain to us, the monk Rabula, scribe and illustrator of the great Florentine MS., A.D. 586 (See Assemani's Catalogue of the Laurentian Library). A woodcut of this is given in this work, p. 85. It represents the Ascension; our Lord is borne up by two ministering angels on a chariot of cloud, under which appear the heads of the Four Creatures: the flaming wheels are on each side, with two other angels, who are apparently receiving His garments, the vesture of His flesh. The sun and moon are in the upper corners of the picture; which is one of the most important works in Christian art as a specimen of imaginative symbolism of the highest character, and also as a graphic illustration of the connexion between Hebrew and Christian vision, or Apocalypse of the Unseen. And to this the Veronese griffin and its wheel, and the whole Christian usage of that composite form as a symbol, really refers. "The winged shape becomes one of the acknowledged symbols of Divine power: and in its unity of lion and eagle, the workman of the middle ages always meant to set forth the unity of the human and Divine natures. In this unity it bears up the pillars of the church, set for ever as the corner stone."

In its merely ornamental use it is derived simply from Heathen or Gentile art and literature.

GROTESQUE. We have the authority of Prof. Mommsen for assigning the word κρύπτω as the original derivation of this adjective, formed, probably, immediately from grot or grotto, a cavern or subterranean recess, and therefore connected in its use, as a word of Renaissance origin, with ideas of Pan, the Satyrs, and other cavern-haunting figures, combining noble with ignoble form. The very numerous and various meanings of the word all point to the idea of novel contrast; either between the noble and ignoble, or less noble, or of the beautiful with the less beautiful. In Christian art, moreover, both of earlier and later date, a large number of works may be called grotesque in the general or popular sense of the word, because they are very singular in their appearance. This may arise in one or in two ways, or be caused by one or both of two conditions: either by the difficulty of the subject, or the archaic style of the workmen, or by a mixture of originality of mind and imperfect skill in craft. Many heathen grotesques of the earlier empire, as those of Pompeii, the Baths of Hadrian, and the newly-discovered frescoes of the Doria Pamphili Villa (see Parker, Antiquities of Rome, and appendix by the present writer) are extremely beautiful and perfect in workmanship, and come under the first or second classes mentioned, where the less pleasing form is contrasted with the more beautiful; this is the principle also of much cinque-cento grotesque. Early Christian work of this kind is not unfrequent in the catacombs, as in the "Seasons" of the catacombs of SS. Domitilla and Nereus, in many of the mosaic ornaments of St. Constantia and the other Graeco-Roman churches. The employment of actual ugliness for surprise or contrast seems to be a characteristic of the art of the Northern races, found in Italy only in the earlier work of the Lombard race, and then always distinguishable in its manner from that of the French or Germans. Excepting the carvings of St. Ambrogio at Milan, and the churches of St. Michele at Pavia and Lucca, this species of grotesque is not part of our period; but the most characteristic and important of all these buildings, St. Zenone at Verona, cannot be altogether omitted. It seems as well to classify the various meanings of the Grotesque as follows, according to the examples found in various places and periods.

1. Grotesque, where more elaborate or serious representations are contrasted with easier and less important work by the same hand, as in ornamental borders round pictures, fillings-up of vaultings or surfaces round figures, &c. This embraces all the earlier grotesque of ornament, as in the frescoes of Hadrian's villa, or the Doria Pamphili columbarium.

2. Grotesque where the importance of the subject, and the workman's real interest in it, are for a time played with; he being led to do so by the natural exuberance of his fancy, by temporary fatigue of mind, or other causes—this includes the Lombard work.

3. Grotesque where either the imperfection of the workman's hand, or the inexpressible nature of his subject, render his work extraordinary in appearance, and obviously imperfect and unequal. This applies to the productions of all times and places where thoughtful and energetic men have laboured. Among its greatest and most characteristic examples are the Triumph of Death by Orgagna at Pisa, and the Last Judgment of Torcello; its most quaint and absurd appearance may be in the strange Ostrogothic mosaic in the sacristy of St. Giovanni Evangelista at Ravenna; or see Count Bastard's Peintures des MSS. passim; but this description of grotesqueness applies to almost all the Byzantine apses and arches of triumph where the spiritual world is depicted, and indeed to all Byzantine work in as far as it attempts naturalist representation, unless it be in the single pictures of birds, found in MSS., and occasionally in mosaic, as at St. Vitale at Ravenna.

Few of the works of the catacombs have any pretence to beauty. The birds and vine ornament of the tomb of Domitilla (perhaps the earliest Christian sepulchre, which is known by dated bricks to be certainly not later than Hadrian, and is very probably the actual grave of a granddaughter of Vespasian) are of the same date as the tomb, which is anterior to the catacomb. These, with some remains of the paintings in the catacomb, and the 2nd century paintings of the catacomb of St. Praetextatus, are beautiful examples of playful naturalistic ornament, probably the work of heathen hands, under Christian direction, and taken in the Christian sense. They are mentioned here, rather as parallel works to the beautiful secular-Roman grotesques, than as true grotesques themselves. They are symbolic in the strict sense (see J. H. Parker's Photographs and Antiquities of Rome, and art. 'SYMBOLISM' in this Dictionary).

The grotesqueness of the early mosaics is of the same nature as that of the forms and figures in the best glass-painting. In both, the advantages of light and shade, correct drawing and perspective, are sacrificed entirely to colour and graphic force of impression. To express the plainest meaning in the brightest and most gemlike colour is the whole object of the artist. Of course in the works from the 5th to the 8th century, down to the bathos of Graeco-Roman art, the rigid strangeness of the mosaics may have much to do with the incapacity of the workmen. Nevertheless the gift of colour is seldom wanting; and this, together with the painful asceticism of faces and forms in these works, points to an Eastern element in the minds and education of these artists. The great Medici MS. of Rabula is perhaps the central example of the genius and originality of design and graphic power, possessed by some of the unknown ascetics of Syria and the East. The mosaic of the Transfiguration at Mount Sinai, of the age of Justinian and many of those in Rome, as the apses of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, of St. Venantius, and above all St. Prassede, are instances giving evidence of necessarily imperfect treatment of a transcendent subject. Those of Ravenna have been already mentioned; but their workmanship greatly excels that of the Roman mosaics, and their quaintness strikes one less than their beauty.

The Lombard invasion of Italy dates 568 A.D., and it is in the earliest work of this extraordinary race that the Christian grotesque, properly speaking, may be said to arise. The best account of some of its examples, in Pavia, Lucca and Verona, is to be found in Appendix 8 of Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. i. p. 360-65, accompanied by excellent descriptive plates, and comparisons between the Lombard subjects and workmanship in St. Michele and St. Zenone, and the Byzantine masonry and carvings of St. Mark's at Venice. Invention and restless energy are the characteristics of the new and strong barbarian race; graceful conventionalism and exact workmanship, with innate but somewhat languid sense of beauty, belong to the Greek workmen. Neither of them can ever be undervalued by any one who is interested in the bearings of art on history; for there can be no doubt, that as the Lombard churches are the first outbreak of the inventive and graphic spirit which grew into the great Pisan and Florentine schools of painting and sculpture, so the Romano-Greek or Eastern influence, generally called Byzantine, extended over all the Christian world of the early mediaeval ages. To trace the Christian grotesque northward and westward through early MSS., bas-reliefs, and church decoration would be to write a history of Christian art in the dark ages. One of the first accomplishments of the denizens of a convent would of course be calligraphy, and to multiply Evangelaria and missals was a part even of the earliest missionary work.

On the edge of every wave of progress made by the Faith, the convents arose first of all things, and the monks at once employed themselves on copies of the Holy Scriptures. Now it cannot be doubted, that a Schola Graeca, a regular set of artists working according to Greek traditions of subject and treatment in art, existed in Rome from the 6th century, if not before, and received a great accession of strength in the 8th during the Iconoclastic struggle in Constantinople, when many ecclesiastical artists must have withdrawn thence to Rome. There in fact, as elsewhere, the first faint revival of Christian art took place entirely in churches and convents, and under what are called Byzantine forms. Whether Byzantinism be considered as the last embers of Graeco-Roman art, kept alive by Christianity for the Northern races, or as the first sparks of a new light feebly struggling for existence through all the centuries from the 6th to the 11th, there is no doubt that the characteristics of Byzantinism

No. 2. Carolingian, 8th century. (Bastard, vol. i.)

—many of them characteristics of weakness, no doubt—prevailed in Christian ornamental work of all kinds, and were grotesque in all the senses of the word. The beautifully illustrated works of Prof. Westwood on Saxon, Irish and Northern MSS. in particular, are of the highest value in this connection, and are in fact almost the only works generally accessible in this country, which illustrate the connection between the Eastern and English churches through the Irish, by way of Iona and Lindisfarne (see MINIATURE).

The splendid works of D'Agincourt and Count Bastard are the best authority and sources of information on the Southern Grotesque in miniature carving within the limits of our period, and the art of photography is now bringing the remains of the ancient Lombard churches within reach of most persons interested in them. Descriptions fail in great measure without illustration, and few pictures or drawings are really trustworthy for details of ornamental work (see Stones of Venice, App. vol. i. ubi sup.). Mr. Ruskin has secured many valuable records by his own pencil and those of his trusted workmen. Didron's Annales Archéologiques contain much excellent illustration; and a parallel work of equal value is still, we believe, carried on in Germany, called the Jahrbuch des Vereins von Alterthums-freunden in Rheinlande. Mr. Parker's photographs and Roman Antiquities above mentioned, are of great value to the historical student of art or of archaeology. The Northern Teutonic grotesque of actual sport of mind, ultra-naturalism, and caricature extends far beyond the limits of our period. But the term grotesque is generally applied to so many things within it, that some early specimens of Gothic humour seem necessary for the purposes of this Dictionary; and three selections from Count Bastard's work are accordingly given. No. 1 is a Merovingian initial letter; No. 2 Carolingian of the 8th century; and No. 3 is the initial portrait of a monk-physician in a lettres-à-jour MS. of the 8th century of the medical works of Orbases, Alexander of Tralles, and Dioscorides. All will be found in colour in Count Bastard's first volume, with innumerable others. [R. St. J. T.]

GUARDIANS. The duties and liabilities of guardians as defined by the old Roman laws, were but slightly affected by the Christian religion [See Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiq. s. v. Tutor].

The principal church regulation, which concerned them, arose from the generally admitted maxim, that the clergy ought not to be entangled in secular affairs. Hence a guardian was not allowed to be ordained to any ecclesiastical function, until after the expiration of his guardianship. (Concil. Carthag. I. c. 9, A.D. 348.) For the same reason none of the clergy were allowed to be appointed guardians; and those who nominated any of them to such an office were liable to church censures. Thus Cyprian mentions the case of a person named Geminus Victor, who having by his will appointed a presbyter as guardian to his children, had his name struck out of the DIFTYCHS, so that no prayer or oblation should be offered for him. (Cyprian Ep. 66, ad Clerum Furnit.)

Under the old Roman law a guardian was forbidden to marry his ward, or to give her in marriage to his son, except by special license from the emperor (Cod. Justin. v. 6).

But Constantine altered this restriction, so far as to allow such marriages, provided that the ward was of age, and that her guardian had offered her no injury in her minority, in which case he was to be banished and his goods confiscated. (Cod. Theod. ix. 8.) [G. A. J.]

GUTHBERTUS. [CUTHBERT.]

GYNAECONITIS. [GALLERIES.]

GYROVAGI, vagabond monks, reprobated by monastic writers. Benedict, in the very commencement of his rule, excludes them from consideration, as unworthy of the name of monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1). He pronounces them worse even than the "sarabaitae," or "remoboth" (Hieron. Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 34), who, though living together by twos and threes, without rule or discipline, at any rate were stationary, and built themselves cells; whereas the "gyrovagi" were always roving from one monastery to another. After staying three or four days in one monastery, they would start again for another; for after a few days' rest it was usual for strangers to be subjected to the discipline of the monastery, to the same fare, labour, &c., as the inmates (Martene Reg. Comm. ad loc. cit.); always endeavouring to ascertain where in the neighbourhood they would be most likely to find comfortable quarters (Reg. Magist. c. 2; cf. Isidor. Pelus. I. Ep. 41, Joann. Climac. Scal. Grad. 27). Martene (v. s.) and Ménard (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. iii. ii.) identify these "gyrovagi" with the "circumcelliones," or "circelliones." [v. CIRCUMCELLIONES.] They were of importance enough to be condemned in one of the canons of the Trullan council, A.D. 691, and are there described as wandering about in black robes and with unshorn hair: they are to be chased away into the desert, unless they will consent to enter a monastery, to have their hair trimmed, and in other ways to submit to discipline (Conc. Quinisextum c. 42). Bingham (Origin. Eccles. vii. ii. 12) and Hospinian (de Orig. Monach. ii. i.) merely repeat what is contained in the rule of Benedict. [I. G. S.]

HABAKKUK, the prophet; commemorated Ginbot 24=May 19, and Hedar 3=Oct. 30 (Cal. Ethiop.); also Dec. 2 (Cal. Byzant.). See also ABACUC. [W. F. G.]

HABIT, THE MONASTIC. (Habitus monasticus, σχῆμα μοναδικόν or μοναχικόν). A distinctive uniform was no part of monachism originally. Only it was required of monks that their dress and general appearance should indicate "gravity and a contempt of the world" (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. vii. iii. 6). Hair worn long was an effeminacy (August. de Op. Mon. c. 31. Hieron. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch. c. 28, cf. Epiphan. adv. Hæres. lxxx. 7), the head shaven all over was too like the priests of Isis (Hieron. Comm. in Ezek. c. 44. Ambros. Ep. 58 ad Sabin.). In popular estimation persons abstaining from the use of silken apparel were often called monks (Hieron. Ep. 23 ad Marcell.). The same writer defines the dress of a monk merely as "cheap and shabby" (Ep. 4 ad Rustic., Ep. 13 ad Paulin.). And the dress of a nun as "sombre" in tint, and "coarse" in texture (Ep. 23 ad Marcell.). He warns the enthusiasts of asceticism against the eccentricity in dress, which was sometimes a mere pretence of austerity, a long untrimmed beard, bare feet, a black cloak, chains on the wrists (Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 28, cf. Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 52). So Cassian protests against monks wearing wooden crosses on their shoulders (Coll. viii. 3). Hair closely cut, and the cloak (pallium), usually worn by Greek philosophers and lecturers, were at first badges of a monk in Western Christendom; but even these were not peculiar to him. The cloak was often worn by other Christians, exposing them to the vulgar reproach of being "Greeks" and "impostors" (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. i. ii. 4), and any one appearing in public with pale face, short hair, and a cloak, was liable to be hooted and jeered at by the unbelieving populace as a monk (Salv. de Gubernat. viii. 4).

Cassian is more precise on a monk's costume, and devotes to it the first book of his Institutes. But he allows that the sort of dress suitable for a monk in Egypt or Ethiopia may be very unsuitable elsewhere, and he condemns sackcloth, or rather, a stuff made of goats' hair or camels' hair (cilicina vestis) worn outside as too conspicuous. He speaks in detail of the various parts of a monk's dress; the HOOD (cucullus), which is to remind the monk to be as a little child in simplicity; the sleeveless tunic (COLUBIUM), in Egypt made of linen, which reminds him of self-mortification; the GIRDLE or waist-band (cingulum), to remind him to have his "loins girded" as a "good soldier of Christ"; the cape over the shoulders (mafors, palliolium); the sheepskin or goatskin round the waist and thighs (melotes, pera, penula); and for the feet the sandals (CALIGAE), only to be worn as an occasional luxury, never during the divine service (Cassian Instit. i. cc. 1-10 cf. Ruffin. Hist. Mon. c. 3).

questions of colour and material, as indifferent, to be decided by climate and other circumstances. He lays down the general principle, that there are to be no superfluities, adding, that a tunic and hood, or, for outdoor work, a sort of cape to protect the shoulders (scapulare), instead of the hood, ought to suffice generally; two suits of each being allowed for each monk, and some suits of rather better quality being kept for monks on their peregrinations. The worn out articles of dress are to be restored to the keeper of the wardrobe, for the poor. Benedict, however, "to avoid disputes" appends a short list, corresponding very nearly to Cassian's, of things necessary for a monk, all which are to be supplied to the brethren, at the discretion of the abbat, and none of them to be the property or "peculiare" of any one. The only addition to the Egyptian costume is that of socks (pedules) for the winter; the Benedictine "bracile" apparently corresponding with "cingulum," and the "scapulare" with "palliolium." Benedict allows trowsers [FEMORALIA] on a journey, and on some other occasions; underclothing he is silent about; consequently commentators and the usages of particular monasteries differ on this point. To the list of clothing Benedict adds, as part of a monk's equipment, a knife (cultellus) a pen (graphium), a needle (acus) a handkerchief or handcloth (mappula), and tablets for writing on (tabulae). He specifies also as necessities for the night, a mattress (matta), a coverlet (sagum), a blanket (laena), and a pillow (capitale) (Bened. Reg. c. 55). Martene quotes Hildemar for the traditional custom, by which each monk was provided with a small jar of soap for himself and of grease for his shoes (Reg. Bened. Comment. ad loc.).

Laxity of monastic discipline soon began to provoke fresh enactments about dress, sometimes more stringent and more minute than at first (e.g. Reg. Isidor. c. 14, Reg. Mag. c. 81). Councils re-enact, and reformers protest. The council of Agde, A.D. 506, and the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, repeat the canon of the 4th council of Carthage A.D. 398, "ne clerici comam nutriant" (Conc. Agath. c. 20; Conc. iv. Toletan. c. 40; Conc. iv. Carthag. c. 44). Ferreolus, in southern Gaul, A.D. 558, repeats the old edict against superfluities, and forbids his monks to use perfumes, or wear linen next the skin (Ferreol. Reg. cc. 14, 31, 32). In Spain, Fructuosus of Braga, A.D. 656, insists on uniformity of apparel. Irregularity about dress seems with monks, as in a regiment, to have been an accompaniment of demoralisation. (See, further, Menard Conc. Regul. lxiii.; Alteserr. Asceicon. v.; Middendorp. Origin. Ascet. Sylva. xiii.)

The Greek Euchologion gives an office for the assumption of the ordinary habit of a monk (ἀκολουθία τοῦ μικροῦ σχήματος), and another for assuming the greater or "angelic" habit distinctive of those ascetics who were thought to have attained the perfection of monastic life (ἀκ. τοῦ μεγάλου καὶ ἀγγελικοῦ σχήματος). HAGIOSIDERON. One of the substitutes for BELLS still used in the East is the Hagiosideron (τὸ σιδηροῦν, κρούσμα) [see SEMANTRON]. These usually consist of an iron plate, curved like the tire of a wheel, which is struck with a hammer, and produces a sound not unlike that of a gong. They are occasionally made of brass. The illustration is taken from Dr. Neale's work (Neale's Eastern Church, Int. 217, 225; Daniel's Codex Lit. iv. 199). [C.]

HAIL MARY or AVE MARIA. An address and prayer commonly made to St. Mary the Virgin in the unreformed Western churches.

What it is, and when used.—It consists of two parts: 1. The words used by the angel Gabriel in saluting St. Mary, as rendered by the Vulgate, slightly altered by the addition of St. Mary's name, "Hail Mary, full of grace; the Lord is with thee;" followed by the words of Elizabeth, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." 2. A prayer, subsequently added to the salutation, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now, and at the hour of our death."

This formula is ordered by the breviary of pope Pius V. to be used daily, after the recitation of compline, and before the recitation of each of the other canonical hours, i.e., matins, prime, terce, sext, none, and vespers. It is also commanded, on the same authority, to be used before the recitation of the "Office of the Blessed Virgin," and before each of the hours in the "Little Office." It is also used nine times every day in what is called the "Angelus." It is also used sixty-three times in the devotion called the "Crown of the Virgin," and one hundred and fifty times in the "Rosary of the Virgin." It also occurs in many of the public offices, and is used before sermons, and it most commonly forms a part of the special devotions appointed by bishops for obtaining indulgences.

Its date.—Cardinal Baronius and Cardinal Bona have used an expression which, while not committing them to a declaration of fact, or a statement of their own belief, has yet led subsequent writers (see Gaume, loc. inf. cit.) to claim their authority for the assertion, that the second, or precatory, part of the Ave Maria was adopted in, or immediately after, the council of Ephesus, at the beginning of the 5th century. "At that time," says Baronius (loc. inf. cit.), "the angelical salutation is believed to have received that addition, 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, &c.,' which came to be constantly repeated by the faithful." "The angelical salutation," says Bona (loc. inf. cit.), "is believed to have received this addition in the great council of Ephesus." It is quite certain that the two cardinals and their followers have ante-dated this part of the Ave Maria by more than a thousand years. The first, or Scriptural, part, consisting of the words of the angel and of Elizabeth, is older by some five hundred years than the second, or precatory, part, which has been attached to it, and the first part did not become used as a formula until the end of the 11th century. The earliest injunction authorising its being taught together with the previously existing formulas of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, is found in the Constitutions of Odo, who became bishop of Paris in the year 1196. The Benedictines of St. Stephen of Caen, in 1706, maintained the following thesis: "The angelical salutation began to be in use in the 12th century, but these words 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, &c.,' seem to have been added a long time afterwards, in the 16th century;" a thesis which was denounced by the then bishop of Bayeux as scandalous, but was defended and maintained against him by Père Massuet. The earliest known use of the first, or scriptural, part, is in the Liber Antiphonarius, attributed by John the Deacon to St. Gregory the Great, and generally published with his works. If St. Gregory is the author of the Liber Antiphonarius, and if the antiphon in which these words occur (p. 657, Ed. inf. cit.) is not a later insertion (the same words in the previous page are undoubtedly a modern insertion), the angelical salutation, as found in the Bible, was used as early as the beginning of the 7th century; not, however, as a formula of devotion, but as we might use an anthem on one day of the year. This passage from St. Gregory is the only thing which brings the Ave Maria within the chronological limits assigned to this Dictionary, for it is allowed (see Mabillon, loc. inf. cit.) that similar words in the so-called liturgy of St. James the Less are of late introduction there.

The addition of the second, or precatory, part of the Ave Maria, is stated by Pelbertus to have been made in consequence of a direct injunction of St. Mary, who appeared to a pious woman, and gave her instructions to that effect. The use of it sprang up in the 15th century, and is first authorised in pope Pius Vth's breviary, in the year 1568.

The "Crown of the Virgin" consists of sixty-three recitations of the Ave Maria, one for each year that St. Mary was supposed to have lived, with the recitation of the Lord's Prayer after every tenth Ave Maria. Its institution is attributed by some to Peter the Hermit. It appears to have sprung up and spread in the 12th and 13th centuries.

The "Rosary, or Psalter of the Blessed Virgin" consists of one hundred and fifty Ave Marias, after the number of the Psalms of David, together with fifteen Pater Nosters, distributed at equal intervals among the Ave Marias. Its institution is attributed by some to St. Dominic, and to the year 1210.

The "Angelus" consists of three recitations of the Ave Maria at the sound of the Angelus bell in the morning, three at midday, and three at night. On each occasion the first Ave Maria is to be preceded by the sentence, "The angel of the Lord announced to Mary, and she conceived or the Holy Ghost;" the second, by "Behold the handmaid of the Lord. Be it unto me according unto thy word;" the third, by "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." The Angelus appears to have been originated in the year 1287, by Buonvicino da Riva, of Milan, of the order of the Humiliati, who began the practice of ringing a bell at the recitation of the Ave Maria. In 1318 John XXII. gave an indulgence of ten days for saying an Ave Maria to the sound of a bell rung at night. In 1458, Calixtus III. gave three years and one hundred and twenty days' indulgence for reciting the Ave Maria and the Pater Noster three times a day. In 1518, Leo X. ordered that the Angelus bell should be rung three times a day, and he gave 500 days' indulgence for saying the Angelus morning, mid-day, and evening. Finally, Benedict XIII. and Benedict XIV. gave a plenary indulgence, to be obtained once a month, to all who recited it three times daily.

The dates, therefore, are as follow :—

The earliest known use (in the form of an antiphon, or anthem) of the Scriptural words, afterwards adopted as the first part of the Ave Maria—the 7th century.

The earliest known use of the same part as a formula—the 11th century.

The earliest authoritative recommendation of the said formula—the 12th century.

The Crown of the Virgin—the 12th century.

The Rosary or Psalter of the Virgin—the 13th century.

The Angelus—the 14th century.

The earliest known use of the prayer which forms the second part of the Ave Maria—the 15th century.

The earliest authoritative recommendation and injunction of the same—the 16th century.

HAIR, WEARING OF. The regulations of the ancient church on this subject may be divided into three distinct classes, as relating—i. to the clergy; ii. to penitents; iii. to believers in general.

i. The hair in ancient times appears to have been sometimes worn at great length. Thus Eusebius (H. E. ii. 23), speaking of James the Apostle, notes that a razor never came upon his head. But shortened hair appears to have been considered a mark of distinction between the heathen philosopher and the Christian teacher. Thus Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 28) says of Maximus, that he brought no qualification to the pastoral office except that of shortening his hair, which, before that time, he had worn disgracefully long. It is also recorded of one Theotimus, bishop of Scythia, that he still retained the long hair which he had worn when a student, in token that, in becoming a bishop, he had not abandoned philosophy (Soz. H. E. vii. 26). But this liberty was restricted by various decrees of councils. The fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 44), provides that the clergy shall neither permit their hair nor beards to grow. Another reading of this decree is, that they were neither to let their hair grow nor shave their beards. The first synod of St. Patrick, A.D. 456 (c. 6), provides that the hair of the clergy should be shorn according to the Roman fashion, and (c. 10) that any who allow their hair to grow, should be excluded from the church. The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 20), ordains that clergy who retain long hair, shall have it shortened, even against their will, by the archdeacon. The first council of Barcelona, A.D. 540 (c. 3), provides that no clergyman shall let his hair grow nor shave his beard. The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 11), provides that lectors shall not have love-locks (granos), hanging down, after the heathen fashion. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572 (c. 66), decrees that the clergy ought not to discharge their sacred functions with long hair, but with closely-cut hair and open ears. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 41), denounces certain lectors in Galicia, who, while retaining a small tonsure, allowed the lower portion of the hair to grow. The council in Trullo, A.D. 692 (Conc. Quinisex. c. 21), ordains that clergy who have been deprived of their office, should, on their repentance, be shorn after the fashion of the clergy; if they refused this, their hair was to be left long, in token of their preference of a worldly life. At a council held at Rome, A.D. 721 (c. 17), anathema was pronounced against any of the clergy who should allow his hair to grow. The same was repeated at another Roman council, held A.D. 743 (c. 8).

These decrees, however, appear to have been difficult of enforcement. Heretical sects especially appear to have been fond of adopting eccentric fashions of wearing the hair and beard as badges and tokens of their opinions. Epiphanius (Haeres. in Massil. n. 6, 7) denounces certain heretical monks, dwelling in Mesopotamia, in monasteries which he calls "Mandras," who were in the habit of shaving the beard and letting the hair grow, and contends that such practices are contrary to the apostolic injunctions. Jerome (Comm. in Ezek. c. 44) says that the clergy should neither have their heads closely shaven, like the priests of Isis and Serapis, nor let their hair grow to an extravagant length, like barbarians and soldiers, but that the hair should be worn just so long as to cover the head. In another place (Epist. 18, al. 22, ad Eustoch.), he denounces certain monks who indulged in beards like goats and ringlets like women. In his 'Life of Hilarion,' he commends the saint for cutting his hair once a year, at Easter. Augustine (De Op. Mon. c. 31) speaks of certain monks who, fearing lest they might lose reverence by their shorn heads, "ne villior habeatur tonsa sanctitas," allowed their hair to grow, in order to suggest to those who saw them a resemblance to Samuel and the elder prophets. Against these he quotes the saying of the apostle, that in Christ the veil shall be taken away (2 Cor. iii. 14). Gregory the Great (Pastor. l. p. 2, c. 7) says that priests are rightly forbidden either to shave their heads, or to let their hair grow long. The hair on the head of a priest, is to be kept so long that it may cover the skin, and cut so close that it may not interfere with the eyes. The practice seems to have been, to wear the hair short and the beard long. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. iv. 24) speaks of one Maximus Palatinus, a clergyman, as wearing his hair short and his beard long. Gregory the Great is described as wearing a beard of the old fashion and of moderate size, a large round tonsure, and his hair neatly curled, "intorto," and hanging to the middle of his ears (Joann. Diac. Vita Greg. Maz. c. 4, c. 83). Bede (Eccles. Hist. l. 4, c. 14), describing a vision of SS. Peter and Paul, says that the one was shaven (attonsus), as a clergyman, the other wore his beard long. For other particulars regarding the hair of the clergy, see TONSURE.

ii. Closely-cut hair was always enjoined on penitents, as a condition of their reception into the church. The council of Agde (c. 15) provides that no penitents shall be received unless they have parted with their hair, "comas deposuerint." The first council of Barcelona (c. 6) speaks of the shaven heads of male penitents. The third council of Toledo (c. 12) provides that the first step to the admission of a male penitent, shall be to shave his head. So Optatus (Contra Donatist. l. 23) finds fault with the Donatists for having shaven the heads of certain priests whom they had admitted to penance. With regard to women, Ambrose (Ad Virg. Laps. c. 8) speaks of cutting off the hair, which by vain glory had tempted to the sin of luxury; but Jerome, in describing the repentance of Fabiola (Ep. 30, al. 84, ad Ocean.), speaks of her dishevelled hair. But before their restoration, penitents and excommunicated persons were obliged to let the hair and beard grow. Thus a certain Ursicinus, bishop of Cahors, being excommunicated, was forbidden to cut either his hair or his beard (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. l. 8, n. 20). In general, neglected hair appears to have been a sign of mourning. Chrysostom (Serm. 3, on Job) says that many in time of mourning let the hair grow, whereas Job shorn his. The reason being, that where the hair is honoured, it is a sign of mourning to cut it short, but where it is worn short, it is a sign of mourning to let it grow. Baronius (Annals. A.D. 631, n. 4) speaks of a certain bishop, named Lupus, exiled by Clothaire, who came mourning to the king with long dishevelled locks, and the king, in token of forgiveness, commanded his hair to be shorn.

iii. The laity were sometimes recognised as usually wearing their hair long. The council in Trullo (Conc. Quinisext. c. 21) ordains that delinquent and impenitent clergy should wear their hair long, as the laity. Yet immoderately lengthened hair appears to have been considered a token of effeminacy and luxuriousness. When the emperor Heraclius succeeded to the throne, his hair was immediately cut short (Baronius, Annal. A.D. 610, n. 5). Many attempts were therefore made to restrain the liberty of the laity, in this respect, within due bounds, founded partly on a sense of what was decent and becoming, partly on the principle that it is not right either for men or women to obliterate the characteristics of the sex. The council in Trullo (c. 96) asserts that it is inconsistent with the baptismal profession, that baptised men should wear their hair in cunningly woven parts or tresses, and orders that such as would not obey this admonition, should be excommunicated. The council of Gangra (c. 17) anathematizes any women who, through pretended asceticism, should cut close the hair which was given to them as a token of subjection. The decree was confirmed by the emperor Theodosius, with the addition that any bishop who should admit such women into the church, should be deprived of his office (Soz. H. E. vii. 26). In the Apostolic Constitutions (i. 3), the followers of Christ are ordered not to promote the growth of their hair, but rather to restrain and shorten it. Men are forbidden to wear ringlets, or to use ointments, or in any way to imitate the adornments in use among women. They are also forbidden to collect their hair into a knot or crown, ποιεῖν εἰς ἓν ὃ ἐστὶ σπαγγίον, or to indulge in tresses, either artfully dishevelled or carefully arranged, ἢ ἀποχύμα ἢ μεμερισμένην, or to curl and crisp it, or dye it yellow. They are also forbidden to shave the beard, as if thereby obliterating the peculiar distinction, τὴν μορφήν, of manhood. Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedagog. ii. c. 8) speaks of the folly committed by aged women in dyeing their hair; and (Ib. iii. 3) reprehends the folly of which some men were guilty, in eradicating the hair, apparently not only from their beards, but from all parts of their bodies, with pitch plaisters. He also (Ib. iii. 11) gives full directions for the arrangement of the hair. The hair of men is to be cut close, unless it is crisp and curly, ὀδῶς. Long curls and love-locks are strictly forbidden, as effeminate and unseemly. The hair is not to be allowed to grow over the eyes, and a closely-cropped head is alleged not only to be becoming a grave man, but to render the brain less liable to injury, by accustoming it to endure heat and cold. The beard is to be allowed to grow, since an ample beard becomes the male sex; if cut at all, the chin must not be left quite bare. The moustache may be clipped with scissors, so that it may not be dirtied in eating, but not shorn with a razor. Women are to wear the hair modestly arranged upon the neck, and fastened with a hair pin. The habit of wearing false hair is strongly denounced, since, it is said, in such cases, when the priest, in bestowing his benediction, lays his hand upon the head, the blessing does not reach the wearer of the hair, but rests upon the person to whom the hair belongs. [P. O.]

HAIR-CLOTH (Cilicium). The rough hair-cloth for which Cilicia was anciently famous was used in several ways, both as an actual instrument, and as a symbol, of mortification.

1. The hair-shirt has frequently been worn, as is well known, as a means of mortifying the flesh without ostentation. Thus Jerome (Epitaph. Nepot. c. 9) says that some other may narrate how the young Nepotianus, when in the imperial service, wore hair-cloth under his chlamys and fine linen. And Paulinus Petricordiensis (Vita S. Martini, ii. p. 1019 D, Migne) says of the monks of St. Martin:

"Multis vestis erat setis contexta camel."

So in Hucbald's Life of St. Rictrudis, who died about A.D. 688 (c. 9, in Mabillon's Acta SS. Bened. Saec. ii.), we read that the saint wore an inner garment of hair-cloth (esophorio amictur cilicino). One of the saints who bore the name of Theodore was distinguished as τριχίνας from his constant habit of wearing a hair-shirt (Macri Hierolox. s. v. Trichinas).

Monks frequently used the hair-shirt. Cassian, however (Instit. i. 1) does not consider it suitable for their ordinary garb, both as savouring of over-righteousness and as hindering labour [HABIT, THE MONASTIC]. In his time—Cassian died about A.D. 430—few monks seem to have used it; in after times we find it constantly used, at any rate by those who claimed superior sanctity. On the whole subject, see O. Zöckler, Krit. Geschichte der Ashese, p. 82 [Frankf.-a.-M. 1863].

2. Of the symbolic uses of hair-cloth the following are the principal:—The candidates for baptism anciently came to the preliminary examination [SCRUTINUM] with bare feet, and standing on hair-cloth (Augustine, De Symb. ad Catech. ii. 1; compare iv. 1). Penitents in the ceremonies of Ash Wednesday were clothed with a hair-cloth, as well as sprinkled with ashes (Martene, Rit. Ant. IV. c. xvii.; Ordd. 7, 16, etc.). The altar was sometimes covered with hair-cloth in times of affliction (ib. III. iii. 2). The dying were covered with a hair-cloth blessed by the priest (ib. I. vii. 4, Ordo 19). The bodies of the dead were sometimes wrapped in hair-cloth; as, for instance, that of Bernard of Hildesheim (Life, c. 43; in Surius, Nov. 20). Charles the Great was buried in the hair-shirt which he had worn in life (Life by the monk or Angoulême, c. 24; quoted by Martene, lll. xii. 13). In an ancient form for the reception of penitents on Maundy Thursday, given by Martene (IV. xxii. § ii. Ordo 6) from a Sarum missal, a banner of hair-cloth (vexillum cilicinum) is directed to be borne in the procession to the church. [C.]

HALLELUJAH. [ALLELUIA.]

HAND, THE, is used as symbolic of the manifested presence of the First Person of the Holy Trinity, GOD THE FATHER.

The declining skill of the earliest Christian workmen, and their utter technical incapacity after the time of Constantine, appears in the strongest light in their attempts to delineate the extremities of the human figure. Martigny remarks that the hands of the martyrs presenting or receiving their crowns in heaven are covered or concealed in token of adoration; but this applies only to the left hand. The comparative skill, or want of skill, with which these parts of the body are treated, might possibly be a test of ancient work in the catacombs, could paintings be discovered of very ancient date, and thoroughly ascertained authenticity without modern retouch.

The hand representing God occurs in the great Transfiguration of St. Apollinaris in Classe at Ravenna (Martigny, p. 639, s. v. Transfiguration). Also in a carving of the same subject on the Ivory Casket of the Library at Brescia (Westwood, Fictile Ivory Casts, 94, p. 37, catalogue). [R. St. J. T.]

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF. [IMPOSITION OF HANDS.]

HANDS, THE LIFTING OF IN PRAYER.

I. The strict observance of this custom, and the importance attached to it among the early Christians, will hardly be understood, unless we take into consideration the habits and opinions of their Jewish and heathen forefathers. It was a rite that had descended to them from both. Among the children of Israel it accompanied acts of praise as well as prayer. Witness the Book of Psalms:—"Thus will I bless Thee while I live: I will lift up my hands in Thy name" (Ps. lxxiii. 4); "Lift up your hands in holiness, and bless the Lord" (Ps. cxxxiv. 2). Before Ezra read the law to the people after their return from Babylon, he "blessed the Lord, the great God, and all the people answered Amen, Amen, with lifting up of their hands" (Neh. viii. 6; compare 1 Esdr. ix. 47). In prayer the gesture was so universal that to pray and to lift up the hands were almost convertible terms. Thus in Lamentations, "Lift up thy hands towards Him for the life of thy young children" (Ch. ii. 19). Again in Psalm xxviii. 2: "Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto Thee; when I lift up my hands toward Thy holy oracle." When Heliodorus came to take away the treasures in the temple, the inhabitants of Jerusalem "all holding their hands toward heaven, made supplication" (2 Macc. iii. 20; comp. xiv. 34; Ps. cxli. 2; Is. i. 15; 1 Esdr. viii. 73; Eccus. li. 19). This gesture in prayer was without doubt so highly valued among the Jews, partly in consequence of the victory obtained over the Amalekites, while the hands of Moses were held up (Exod. xvii. 11); but it was nevertheless "not of Moses, but of the fathers." We might infer this from the manner in which the story is related; but more conclusively from the fact that the same rite prevailed among the Gentiles. "All we of human kind," says Aristotle, "stretch forth our hands to heaven, when we pray" (De Mundo, c. vi. comp. Hom. Il. viii. 347; Virg. Aen. iii. 176; x. 667). Minutius Felix proves that it was still common among the heathen in the 3rd century, "I hear the common people, when they stretch their hands towards heaven, say nothing but God" (Octavius, c. 5).

II. A practice thus universal and of such antiquity, could not fail to have a place in the received ritual of the first Christians. It is more than once recognized in the New Testament itself; as when St. Paul says, "I will therefore that men pray everywhere lifting up holy hands" (1 Tim. ii. 8). Clemens of Alexandria, A.D. 192, is an early witness to the continued observance of the rite. After defining prayer to be "converse with God," he proceeds to say that therefore, as if reaching up to Him, we "raise the head and lift the hands towards heaven" (Strom. vii. c. vii. § 40). Tertullian, his contemporary:—"Worshipping with modesty and humility we the more commend our prayers to God, not even lifting up our hands too high, but with self-restraint and becomingly" (De Orat. c. xiii.). Again: "We Christians, looking upwards, with hands outspread, because free from guilt; with head bare, because we are not ashamed; lastly, without a remembrancer [of the names of the gods], because we pray from the heart" (Apol. c. xxx.). Origen, A.D. 230, says that among the many gestures of the body, we ought without doubt in prayer to prefer "the stretching forth of the hands and the lifting up of the eyes" (De Orat. c. 31); and that when the devout man prays he "stretches forth his soul towards God, beyond his hands, as it were, and his mind further than his eyes" (Ibid.). According to Eusebius, Constantine had himself represented on coins and in pictures "looking up to heaven, and stretching forth his hands like one praying" (Vita Constant. l. iv. c. xv.). See the epitaph of Petronia, under TOMB.

III. The hands when thus lifted up were often, and perhaps generally, so extended on either side as to make the figure of a cross with the body. See the boy in the group on p. 661. "We" (Christians), says Tertullian (in contrast with the Jews), "not only lift up our hands, but spread them out too, and disposing them after the mode of the Lord's Passion and praying, (so) confess Christ" (De Orat. c. xi.). In allusion to this he says elsewhere, "The very attitude of a Christian at prayer is prepared for every infliction" (Apol. c. xxx.). Asterius Amasenus, A. D. 401: "The erect attitude of prayer, in which one holds the hands outstretched, by its figure represents the passion of the cross" (Hom. de Pharis. et Publ. in Photii Biblioth. cod. 271). St. Maximus of Turin: "We are taught to pray with uplifted hands that by the very gesture of our members we may confess Christ" (De Cruce; Hom. de Pass. ii.). St. Ambrose, when dying, "prayed with hands spread in the form of a cross" (Vita, a Paulino conscr. § 47). Prudentius, describing the death by fire of certain martyrs, relates that, when their bonds were burnt, they lifted up the hands thus set free "to the Father in the form of a cross" (De Coron. Hymn vi. l. 107). Many Christian writers believed that this was the manner in which the hands of Moses were held up during the battle with the Amalekites, and that the victory was thus granted to the cross. See Ep. Barnab. c. xii.; Justin M. Dialog. cum Tryph. cc. 91, 111; Tertull. Adv. Jud. c. x.; Cyprian Adv. Jud. l. ii. c. xxi.; Maximus Taur. u. s. Gregory Nazianzen:—"They held up the hands of Moses that Amalek might be subdued by the cross so long before shadowed forth and figured" (Orat. xii. § 2; Sim. Carmina, lib. ii. § 1, c. 1).

IV. At baptism the early Christians lifted the hand as in defiance of Satan. Thus Cyril of Jerusalem, addressing the newly-baptized: "Standing with your face to the West, ye heard yourselves commanded to stretch forth the hand and renounce Satan as present" (Catech. Mystag. l. c. ii.). Pseudo-Dionysius describes the same thing; but from him we learn further that after the candidate had thrice renounced Satan, the priest "turned him towards the East, and commanded him to look up to heaven, and lifting up (ἀνατείναντα) his hand to enter into compact with Christ" (Ecl. Hierarch. cap. ii. § 6; comp. c. iii. § 5). St. Basil, when exhorting catechumens not to defer their baptism, appears to allude to this second lifting of the hands: "Why dost thou wait until baptism becomes the gift of a fever to thee, when thou wilt not be able to utter the salutary words . . . nor to lift up thy hands to heaven, nor to stand up on thy feet?" (Hom. xiii. Exhort. ad S. Baptism. § 3). The office of the modern Greek church (Euchol.

Goar, p. 338) still witnesses to the lifting up of the hands at the renunciation; but they are now held down when the desire to take service under Christ is professed. The reader will observe that the authorities now cited all belong to the East. There is no evidence so far as the present writer knows, to show that the custom before us prevailed in the West also. [W. E. S.]

HANDS, WASHING OF. I. In the law of Moses (Exod. xxx. 18–21) it was ordained that "between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar" there should stand a brazen laver full of water, at which the priests were to "wash their hands and their feet" before they entered. When the temple was built, this laver was replaced by the "molten sea," "for the priests to wash in" (2 Chron. iv. 2, 6). Again, when murder had been committed by an unknown person, the declaration of innocence made by the elders of the nearest city was associated with a ceremonial washing of the hands (Deut. xxi. 6). These two provisions of the law would, it is conceived, be quite sufficient of themselves to create among those subject to it a general custom of washing the hands before drawing near to God in the more solemn acts of worship and religion. That such a rite prevailed and was held to be of a highly sacred character may be inferred from more than one allusion in the Book of Psalms. "I will wash mine hands in innocency; so will I compass Thine altar" (Psal. xxvi. 6); "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency" (lxxxiii. 13). The metaphor of "clean hands" to denote righteousness could not have come into such frequent use (Job ix. 30; xvii. 9; xxi. 7; Ps. xviii. 20, 24; xxiv. 4), if there had been no familiar rite of washing the hands before entering into God's presence. To give an example of later usage, Josephus tells us that the seventy-two who translated the Old Testament into Greek at the instance of Ptolemy were wont each morning to "wash their hands and purify themselves," before they entered on their sacred task (Antiq. b. xii. ch. ii. § 13). It is most probable, however, that the custom before us was much older than the law of Moses, for it appears to have been general among the heathen at an early period. Thus Hesiod gives a warning "never with unwashed hands to pour out the black wine at morn to Zeus or the other immortals" (Opera et Dies, line 722). He also forbids the passage of a stream on foot before washing the hands in it with prayer (ibid. l. 735). According to some ancient authorities temples were called delubra from deluo, because they generally had fountains, or pools so called, attached to them for the use of those who entered (Servius ad Virg. Aen. ii. 225). Nor was the kindred rite before mentioned unknown to the heathen. Pilate "took water and washed his hands before the multitude," when he protested his innocence of the blood of Christ (St. Matt. xxvii. 24). Compare Virg. Aen. ii. 719. Generally, indeed, "it was a custom with the ancients, after the killing of a man or other slaughters, to wash the hands with water to remove the pollution" (Scholiast. in Sophocl. Ajac. l. 664, vol. i. p. 80; Lond. 1758).

II. A rite thus familiar to all classes of the early converts, and so patient of a Christian adaptation, was certain to be retained in some form or other. To facilitate its observance there was in the ATRIUM of many churches a FOUNTAIN or reservoir of water resembling those with which the temples had been furnished. Thus Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, at the beginning of the 4th century, in an open space before a church which he built in that city, caused to be made "fountains opposite the temple, which by their plentiful flow of water afforded the means of cleansing to those who passed out of the sacred precincts into the interior" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. l. x. c. 4). In the West, Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 393, gives a poetical description of a basin (cantharus) in the court of a church built by him. "With its ministering stream," he says, "it washes the hands of those who enter" (ad Sever. Ep. xxxii. § 15). From the same writer we learn that there was a cantharus in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome, which "spouted streams that ministered to the hands and faces" of the worshippers (ad Pam-mach. Ep. xiii. § 13). St. Chrysostom says, "It is the custom for fountains to be placed in the courts of houses of prayer, that they who are going to pray to God may first wash their hands, and so lift them up in prayer" (Hom. de Div. N. T. loc. n. xxv. on 2 Cor. iv. 13). Socrates tells us that in a riot at Constantinople in the reign of Constantius "the court of the church (of Acacius the martyr) was filled with blood, and the well therein overflowed with blood" (Hist. Eccl. l. ii. c. 38).

III. Frequent allusions to the practice for which public provision was thus made occur in Christian writers. For example, Tertullian, A.D. 192: "What is the sense of entering on prayer with the hands, indeed, washed, but the spirit unclean?" (De Orat. c. xi.). This is said of all prayer, private as well as public. With regard to private prayer in the morning, the Apostolical Constitutions give the following direction: "Let every one of the faithful, man or woman, when they rise from sleep in the morning, before doing work, having washed [not bathed the whole body, but νιψάμενοι, having washed parts of it, especially the hands] pray" (lib. viii. c. 32). St. Chrysostom in the following passage is speaking of public worship in general: "I see a custom of this sort prevailing among the many, viz., that they study how they may come (into church) with clean clothes, and how they may wash their hands, but consider not how they may present a clean soul to God. And I do not say this to prevent your washing hands or face, but because I wish you to wash, as is befitting, not with water only, but with the virtues correlative to the water" (Hom. li. in St. Matth. Ev. c. xv. 17-20).

More frequently it is spoken of as part of the preparation for Holy Communion. For example, St. Chrysostom: "Tell me, wouldst thou choose to draw near to the sacrifice with unwashed hands? I think not; but thou wouldst rather not draw near at all than with filthy hands. Wouldst thou, then, while thus careful in the little matter, draw near having a filthy soul?" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. i. 20-23). Similarly in the West, Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502: "All the men, when they intend to approach the altar, wash their hands, and all the women use fair linen cloths on which to receive the body of Christ . . . As the men wash their hands with water, so let them wash their souls with alms," &c. (Serm. cccix. § 5 in App. iv. ad Opp. S. August.). Again: "If we are ashamed and afraid to touch the eucharist with filthy hands, much more ought we to be afraid to receive the same eucharist in a polluted soul" (Serm. cccii. § 6; ibid.).

IV. The celebrant and his assistants washed their hands between the dismissal of the catechumens and the offering of the gifts. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions: "Let one subdeacon give water to the priests for washing their hands, a symbol of the purity of souls consecrated to God" (lib. viii. c. 11). Cyril of Jerusalem: "Ye saw the deacon who gave to the priest and to the elders surrounding the altar of God (water) to wash (their hands, νίψασθαι) . . . The washing of the hands is a symbol of guiltlessness of sins" (Catech. Mystag. v. § 1). Pseudo-Dionysius: "Standing before the most holy symbols the high priest (i.e. the bishop) washes his hands with the venerable order of the priests" (De Eccl. Hierarch. cap. iii. sect. 3, § 10; sim. sect. ii.). We find the same rite in the West. Thus in one of the Questions out of the Old and New Testaments, probably compiled by Hilary the deacon, A.D. 354, it is implied that at Rome the deacons did not "pour water on the priest's hands, as" (adds the writer) "we see in all the churches" (Qu. ci. On the Arrogance of the Roman Levites in App. iii. ad Opp. Aug.). We may remark, in passing, that the Clementine liturgy, as above quoted, assigns the office to a subdeacon. In the earliest Ordo Romanus extant, probably of the 7th century, it is ordered that, after the reception of the gifts, the bishop "return to his seat and wash his hands," and that "the archdeacon standing before the altar wash his hands, when the receiving (of the oblations) is completed" (Ord. i. § 14; Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 11; compare Ord. ii. § 9, p. 47).

Since the clergy, as well as the people, washed their hands before they entered the church, it may be asked, how they came to do so a second time? Ancient writers give only a symbolical reason, but it is not probable that the custom originated in that. The words of the Ordo Romanus suggest that the hands might be soiled by the oblations, which at that time were large and various in kind. They certainly were washed immediately after these were taken from the offerers, and before the celebrant proceeded to offer the elements selected out of them for consecration. Another reason which might make it necessary is suggested by Sala (Nota (1) in Bona, Rer. Lit. l. ii. c. ix. § 6), viz., that a little time before the bishop and priests had laid their hands on the heads of the catechumens and penitents. The washing of the hands, or rather fingers, by the celebrant after his communion, now ordered in the church of Rome, was not practised for more than a thousand years after Christ. [W. E. S.]

HANGINGS. Some few notices may be added to those already given under CURTAINS. The curtains which closed the doors of the chancel screen in later times often bore the pictorial representation of some saint or angelic being. At the present day St. Michael is often represented upon them as prohibiting all access to the bema (Neale, Eastern Ch. i. 195). It was on the curtain of the bema of the church at Anablatha that St. Epiphanius saw the painted figure which gave him so much offence, and caused him to tear the curtain, and desire that it should be replaced by one of a single colour (Epiphanius, Epist. ad Joann. p. 319). The censure passed by Asterius of Amasia on the excessive luxury displayed in the textile fabrics of his day proves that at the end of the fourth century representations of sacred facts were woven in the stuffs in ordinary use for hangings, and even for dresses. The same author also describes the painted hangings of the sepulchre of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon representing the martyrdom of that saint (Aster. Amas. Homil. de Divit. et Lazaro; Enarrat. in marty. Euphem.). Paulinus of Nola is another authority on the decoration of these vela with pictorial designs:—

A velum concealing the altar from the gaze of the laity is mentioned in the office for the dedication of a church in the Sacramentary of Gregory. When the bishop, having brought the relics which were to be deposited within it, had arrived at the altar, he was to be concealed from the sight of the people by a veil, before he proceeded to anoint the four corners with the chrism (extenso velo inter clerum et populum, Muratori, ii. 481). An offering of hangings vela was made to the church of St. Peter's by a lady of rank named Rusticana, which were carried to their destination by the whole body of the clergy chanting a litany (Greg. Magn. Epist. ix. 38). The supposititious Second Epistle of Clement to James the Lord's brother, “de sacratis vestibus et vasis,” gives minute directions for the washing of the altar cloths and other vestments of the church by the deacons and other ministers of the church, in vessels specially set apart for the purpose, near the sacristy. The door-keepers are also enjoined to take care that no one thoughtlessly wiped his hands on the curtain of the door, and to remind those who were guilty of such irreverence that “the veil of the Lord's Temple is holy” (Labbe, Concil. i. 99). Gregory of Tours informs us that on the conversion of Clovis, solemn processions were instituted in the streets, which were shaded with painted veils, while the churches were adorned with white curtains (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. ii. 31). According to Hefele (Beiträge zur Archäologie, ii. 252), tapestry curtains were employed to protect the apertures of windows in churches before the general introduction of glazing. [E. V.]

HARE. The boy who represents Spring among the Four Seasons frequently carries a hare in his hand. The idea of speed in the Christian course was associated with it. It is sometimes connected with the horse (Perret v. lvii.) or with the palm (Boldetti, 506). Its presence in Christian decoration seems to be connected with the Roman taste for ornamenting their rooms with domestic, agricultural, or hunting subjects. Many places of assembly, no doubt, contained pictures by Pagan hands in the earliest days; and the ingenuity of Christian preachers would in all probability make use of them for type and metaphor; and so the animal or other object would become a recognized and customary subject of Christian ornament, acquiring a symbolical meaning. In such examples as the vine or shepherd, that meaning of course existed before; and the distinction between scriptural and all other symbols is on the whole sufficiently well-marked in early work. [R. St. J. T.]

HARLOT. [ASTROLOGY; DIVINATION.]

HARLOTS. Compare FORNICATION. The maintaining and harbouring of harlots was severely punished by the laws of the empire; a man who permitted his house to become a place of assignation for improper purposes was punished as an adulterer (Pandect. lib. xlviii. tit. 5, l. 8); if a man discovered his wife to be a procuress, it was a valid ground of divorce (Codex Theod. lib. iii. tit. 16, l. 1); careful provision was made against fathers or masters prostituting their children or slaves (Codex Just. lib. xi. tit. 40, l. 6). Socrates (H. E. v. 18) commends Theodosius the Great for demolishing the houses of ill fame in Rome. Theodosius the younger performed the same service for Constantinople, enacting that keepers of infamous houses should be publicly whipped and expelled the city, while their slaves were set at liberty (Theodos. Novel. 18, de Lenonibus). All these laws were confirmed by Justinian (Novel. 14) who also increased the severity of the punishments.

The church, as was natural, visited prostitution with the severest censure. Baptism was denied to harlots (πόρνας) and to those who maintained them (πορνόβορκοίς). (Const. Apost. viii. 32). The council of Elvira, A.D. 305, ordains that if a parent, or any Christian whatever, exercise the trade of a procurer, so far as they set to sale the person of another, or rather their own, they shall not be admitted to communion, no, not at their last hour; and the same penalty is denounced (c. 70) by the same council against a wife who prostitutes herself with her husband's connivance. [C.]

HATFIELD, COUNCIL OF (Hæthfeldthense, or Heltfeldense, Concilium), 17 Sept. A.D. 680, at Bishop's Hatfield in Hertfordshire, attended by all the bishops of Britain, Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, presiding, held for making a declaration against Eutychianism and Monothelism. Pope Agatho wished that Theodore should have attended his council of 125 bishops at Rome, March 27 of the same year, preliminarily to the 6th general council, and had sent John, precentor of his church of St. Peter, with the acts of the Lateran council under pope Martin I., A.D. 649, against Monothelism, to invite him thither. But Theodore, being either unable to leave for other reasons, or unwilling to come from knowing that Wilfrid, bishop of York, whose case had caused so much strife, was already there, collected this council instead, and despatched a copy of its synodical letter to Rome by John, where it was read with great satisfaction, and probably before the 6th council, which met Nov. 7, had commenced. Bede, who was about eight years old when this synod took place, gives three different extracts from its letter, in substance as follows:—

1. The bishops declare that “they have set forth the right and orthodox faith, as delivered by our Lord to His disciples, and handed down in the symbol of the holy fathers, and by all the sacred and universal synods, and by the whole body of approved doctors of the Catholic church. Following whom, they also confess the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the Holy Trinity in Unity, consubstantial, and the Unity in Trinity, one God in three consubstantial Persons of equal honour and glory."

2. They "receive the five general councils," mentioning each by name.

3. "Likewise the synod of Rome, A.D. 649, under Martin I.," after which they say: "We receive and glorify our Lord Jesus, as they glorified Him, neither adding nor subtracting anything. We anathematise from the heart all they anathematized, and receive all they received: glorifying God the Father without beginning, and His only begotten Son, born of the Father before all worlds, and the Holy Spirit proceeding ineffably from the Father and the Son, according to the preaching of the above-named holy apostles and prophets and doctors, to all which we have subscribed, who with archbishop Theodore have expounded the Catholic faith." This assertion of procession from the Son as well as the Father, which is not found in any document received by the 6th council, may seem to indicate that the interpolated form of the creed had got into Britain by then; but it may be explained in another way. We are told in another place by Bede, that when Theodore was consecrated at Rome by Vitalian, it was expressly stipulated that abbot Adrian should accompany him into England: "Et, ut ei doctrinæ cooperatori existens, diligenter attenderet, nequid ille contrarium veritati fidei, Græcorum more, in ecclesiis cui præset, introduceret" (E. H. iv. 1). Adrian remained in that capacity till his death, A.D. 710, and Theodore commenced work, "per omnia comitante et cooperante Adriano" (ib. c. 2). Now Adrian was a foreigner, as well as Theodore. He was a learned African, and Africa was the country that boasted of the clearest authorities as yet, for procession from the Son as well as the Father, in SS. Austin and Fulgentius. In conclusion, Bede tells us that John the preceptor also took part in this synod, and was flocked to by the whole country for instruction in the Roman chant (Mansi, xi. 175-80; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141-51).

HAWKING. [HUNTING.]

HEAD, COVERING OF THE. Christian men in ancient days prayed with uncovered head, according to the apostolic injunction (1 Cor. xi. 4, 5). Chrysostom's comment on the passage shows clearly that this was the practice of his own time, as well as of the apostolic age. Tertullian (Apol. c. 30) says that Christian men prayed with bare head, as having no need to conceal a blush, insinuating that the heathen might well blush for some of the prayers which they uttered; and Cyprian may perhaps be alluding to the same custom, when he says (De Lapsis, c. 2) that the head of a Christian was uncontaminated by the head-covering of the heathen sacrificer. On the other hand, as both the apostolic precept and the custom of the East made it indecent for women to be seen with uncovered head, the women of the Oriental and African churches covered their heads not only in the congregation, but generally when they appeared in public. The breaking in upon this custom led Tertullian to write his treatise De Virginitas Velandis, in which he contends that not only matrons, but maidens—who had been allowed a somewhat greater licence—should cover their heads effectually. He is especially severe (c. 17) on those who wore a simple band or fillet, which did not cover the top of the head; or laid a mere slip of linen on the top of the head, which did not reach even to the ears; he insists that the veil or head-covering should at any rate come down to meet the top of the dress; the whole space which would be covered by the hair if it were let down should be covered by the veil; and he holds up for admiration and imitation the Arab women, who so covered the head and face as to leave only one eye visible. Contrary to Roman practice, they preferred to see rather than to be seen. But most of all does he inveigh against those women who, even when psalms are said and the name of God named, continued uncovered, or with veils thrown back (retectæ perseverant); who even in prayer fancied themselves covered with a strip of lace or fringe on the top of the head. But Tertullian's rigorous views were not those of the Church at large; as a general rule Christian women have worn the head-dresses of their country and station, and have covered their heads in the place of assembly. Men, to speak generally, have always prayed with uncovered head. Yet about the 8th century the Ordo Romanus II. (c. 8, p. 46) says that at the reading of the Gospel neither crown nor any other covering is kept on the head, an expression which seems to imply that during the saying of some portions of the office crowns or other coverings were retained.

2. With regard to the head-covering of clerics, the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 38) lays down the rule, that no cleric stands in the church at any time with covered head, unless he have an infirmity. In spite, however, of the generality of the expression "ullo tempore," the meaning of the sentence is probably limited by the words which stand at the head of the rubric, "per totam Quadragesimam." That some kind of ceremonial head-dress was worn by bishops and priests from the 4th century onward seems certain. See INFULA, MITRE.

3. For the head-covering of monks, see CUCULLA, HOOD.

HEAD OF ALL CHURCHES. The emperor Justinian in a rescript (Codex, lib. 1, tit. 2, l. 24) gives to the patriarchal church of Constantinople the title of "Head of all the Churches"—"Constantinopolitana ecclesia omnium aliarum est caput." See PATRIARCH; POPE. [C.]

HEARERS. [AUDIENTES; CATECHUMENS; DOCTOR.]

HEATHEN, THE, in relation to the Church.

1. The duty of praying for the heathen was amply recognized by the early Christians. Thus in the Ignatian letter to the Ephesians (c. 10) we find the exhortation, "pray also without ceasing for the rest of mankind; for there is in them a hope of repentance, that they may attain to God." St. Augustine (Epist. 217, ad Vitalem, c. 2) declares that one, who did not believe that the seed of faith was sown in the heart by God, must needs mock at the words of the priest at the altar exhorting the people to pray for unbelievers, that God may turn them to the faith. And again (De Dono Persev. c. 22, § 63) he asks, "When was not prayer made in the Church for unbelievers and for its enemies, that they might believe?" Prosper (De Vocat. Gentium, i. 12) tells us that "the Church prays to God everywhere, not only for the holy and those already regenerate in Christ, but also for all unbelievers and enemies of the cross of Christ, for all worshippers of idols. . . . And what does she ask for them, but that leaving their errors they may be converted to God?" Such prayers occur in the liturgies; in that of St. Mark, for instance, we have (Renaudot, Litt. Orient. i. 153), "Turn back those who have gone astray, enlighten those who are in darkness." So the Clementine (Const. Apost. viii. 15): "We beseech Thee on behalf of those who hate us and persecute us for Thy Name's sake, for those outside the Church and in error, that Thou mayest turn them to good and soften their hearts." In the West, the conversion of the heathen was an especial subject of prayer—as it is still in the English church—on Good Friday. Thus, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (i. 41; Migne's Patrol. lxxiv. 1105 B) the deacon, after bidding prayer for heretics, schismatics, and Jews, proceeds, "Let us pray also for the pagans, that Almighty God may take away the wickedness from their hearts, and that forsaking their idols they may turn to the true God and His only Son Jesus Christ." So in the Gregorian (p. 64), the prayers to be used on the Wednesday and Friday in Holy Week include one for the pagans.*

2. While it is clear that heathen were carefully excluded from the Christian mysteries, it is equally clear that from the earliest times they were admitted to that part of Christian worship which consisted mainly of instruction. St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 23) evidently contemplates the possibility of heathen entering the place where preaching took place, whether it were in the shape of an utterance in "tongues," or prophesying. At the end of the 2nd century, all portions of divine worship were not open to all alike; for Tertullian (De Praescript. c. 41) reproaches certain heretics with their want of order and discipline, in that not only catechumens were admitted to the same privileges as the faithful, but even heathen, if they chanced to enter the place, had equal access; so did the heretics cast their mock-pearls before swine! In this it is implied that the orthodox were more careful of their treasure. [DISCIPLINA ARCANI.] The words of Origen (c. Celsum, iii. p. 142, Spencer), where, speaking of the care bestowed upon catechumens, he says that Christians had in view to prevent persons of evil life from coming to their common assembly (ἐπὶ τὸν κοινὸν αὐτῶν σύλλογον), seem to imply that some kind of scrutiny took place before men were admitted to any Christian assembly whatever; for he contrasts the Cynic practice of receiving all comers to their harangues with that of the Christians, and the word σύλλογος does not appear to be taken (like συναξίς) in the limited sense of "the Eucharistic mystery." However this may be, it is certain that at the end of the 4th century the African canons (IV. Conc. Carth. c. 84) specially provide that the bishop is not to hinder any one, whether heathen, heretic, or Jew, from entering the church and hearing the word of God, as far as the dismissal of the catechumens (usque ad missam catech.); and a later Council (Conc. Valletanum, c. 1; A.D. 524) orders the Gospel to be read after the Epistle, before the bringing in of the gifts [ENTRANCE, § 2] or the dismissal of catechumens,^b in order that not only catechumens and penitents, but all who belong to the contrary part (e diverso sunt) may hear the wholesome precepts of the Lord Jesus or the sermon of the bishop (sacerdotis); for many had been drawn to the faith by the preaching of the prelates (pontificum). The liberty which was granted to heathen does not seem in all cases to have been allowed to heretics (Conc. Luod. c. 6). The liturgies themselves contain evidence that heathen were permitted to be present during the introductory portion of the Eucharistic office. In the Clementine, for instance (Const. Apost. viii. 12), the deacon proclaims before the offertory, "Let no one of the catechumens, no one of the hearers, no one of the unbelievers (τῶν ἀπίστων), no one of the heterodox [be present];" from which it appears that heathens had not been excluded during the whole of the previous service.

3. It does not appear that the infant children of heathen parents, remaining in the heathen family, were in ancient times ever baptized. It would have been held a profanation of the sacrament to baptize those who were likely to be brought up as pagans. But baptism was not refused to children of heathen slaves brought to baptism by their owners, who could of course ensure them Christian nurture; and orphans and foundlings—the latter at any rate almost always the offspring of heathen—were frequently presented for baptism by the virgins or others who had taken charge of them (Augustine, Epist. 23, ad Bonifac.; compare Pseudo-Ambros, de Vocat. Gent. ii. 18). We may probably discover in this presentation of infants for baptism by persons other than their parents the origin of SPONSORS.

When the time came that Paganism was proscribed and Christianity enjoined, special care was taken that whole families should be brought within the pale of Christianity, and that the head of a household should not undergo baptism pro formâ, while the household remained heathen. "As for those who are not yet baptized," says the Code of Justinian (lib. i. tit. ii. de Paganis, l. 10), "let them, with wives and children and all their households, betake themselves to the holy churches; and let them provide that their infants (parvuli) be baptized without delay; but let the older children (maiores) before baptism be instructed in the Scriptures according to the canons. But if any, with a view to entering the public service, or to acquiring an office or a property, go through a form of baptism (fingant baptizari) and leave in their error their children, wives, and others who belong to and depend upon them; they are to be punished by confiscation of goods and other penalties, and excluded from the public service." The special case of the Samaritans is provided for by another law (Novel. 144, c. 2); adults were to pass through two years' instruction and probation, while children not capable of instruction in the doctrines of the faith were to be admitted to baptism at once. Both these laws were included by Photius in his Nomocanon (tit. iv. c. 4, p. 907) [CODEX CANONUM, p. 400].

4. It does not appear that the Church in the earliest times had special organizations for the conversion of the heathen. It was of course the duty of the bishops and clergy of any church to endeavour to bring over to the faith those pagans who dwelt about them, and men were raised up from time to time who went forth into lands entirely heathen. The monastic orders, in particular, especially that of St. Columba, were constantly active in propagating the faith of Christ [MONASTICISM]. The lives of the great missionaries will be found in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.

It is worth observing, that in the Coronation-office given by Ménard with the Gregorian Sacramentary (Ad Reginam benedicendam, pp. 263, 264) the conversion of heathen nations is regarded as especially the work of a queen. After putting on the ring, the consecrating bishop prays that the queen on the point of being crowned "may be enabled to call barbarous nations to the knowledge of the truth."

5. The social intercourse of heathen and Christian, while paganism was still a flourishing system, was rendered difficult by two circumstances; the prevalence of more or less idolatrous practices in the family life of heathens—libations, feasts on sacrificial meats, songs implying the recognition of pagan deities, and the like; and afterwards by the horror and hatred with which the heathen came to regard the votaries of what they thought an "ill-omened superstition," destructive of the greatness of the empire. [FAMILY; IDOLATRY.]

Christians who feasted with the heathen in a spot appropriated to heathen festivities, even if for fear of defilement they took with them their own food and ate no other, were sentenced to a two-years' penance among the Substrati [PENITENCE]. (Conc. Ancyr. c. 7; A.D. 314.)

6. Until Christianity had developed a literature of its own, those Christians who studied literature at all, beyond the limits of Scripture, of course studied pagan literature; but at the end of the 4th century we find the peremptory prohibition (IV. Conc. Carth. c. 16), "that the bishop should not read the books of the gentiles." It is not to be supposed however that this precept was literally and universally observed; the vast pagan learning (for instance) of Jerome and Augustine is matter of notoriety, and it is not to be supposed that it was wholly acquired before they entered the Christian ministry. Jerome, indeed (Epist. 10 [al. 70] ad Maurnum), expressly defends Christian writers against the charge that they were ignorant of pagan writings, and points with pride to the long series of writers who had defended Christianity with weapons drawn from the pagan armoury. See further under PROHIBITED BOOKS. [C.]

HEAVEN. [See FIRMAMENT.] The veiled figure on the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tav. xv. and elsewhere a female head, id. tav. xxxiii.) is always held to represent the firmament of heaven. Considering the word as denoting the future spiritual state of happiness in the presence of God, we can hardly pass over the symbolic representations of the Lord in glory which seem from the 6th century to have been the accustomed decorations of Byzantine churches. The choir and apse of a church from that date were constantly made to symbolize heaven and earth: the churches triumphant and militant, the new heaven of glory, and the renewed earth of the soul regenerated in baptism. The churches of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, St. Venantius, and especially of St. Prassede, at Rome, may be taken as types of the Byzantine treatment of this great subject. In the former Our Lord stands on the firmament of clouds, a figure of indescribable grandeur. He is not only come to His sanctuary, and present with a congregation of the church, but he is also and at the same moment in heaven, apart from time, with the church triumphant. Accordingly, here, and in St. Prassede, the apse, and the upper part of the arch of triumph in advance of it, represent Him in glory with His own; saints and martyrs, in white robes on gold ground, casting their crowns before Him. But at their feet flows the mystic Jordan, the river of baptism into His death, and also the river of death, the Lethe of life and death. It separates the glorified church in heaven from the sheep of the fold below, who are yet militant on earth.

Parallel representations of the adoration of saints and martyrs in glory are, of course, universal from the 6th century; the great processions at St. Apollinare Nuova, in Ravenna, will be remembered as belonging to the time of Justinian. The Last Judgment of Torcello has its side of accepted souls (see s. v.). [R. St. J. T.]

HEBDOMADARIUS. The word signifies a weekly officer, and was applied in monasteries to those monks who served, a week in rotation, the office of cook or reader during refectio. In Egypt and the Thebaid it was customary in the 5th century for all the monks in turn to act as cooks, and Cassian traces the custom to the monasteries in the East (Cass. Instit. iv. 19, cf. Hieron. Reg. Pachom. Prol. Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 35). But see Cass. Instit. iv. 22. Similarly Benedict ordered that none should be excused from this duty except on the score of health or urgent occupations, intending thus to promote a fellowship of brotherly feeling; but with his usual consideration, he allowed those who might be unskilful in this sort of work to have assistants (Bened. Reg. c. 35).

By the rule called of Magister each "decad" or "decuria" (ten monks) under its two deans (praepositi), was to hold this office for five weeks together, two of the number in turn with one dean being told off each week for the kitchen, and the rest under the other dean working in the field (Reg. Mag. c. 17). Even abbats, though not unfrequently of illustrious birth, were not always exempt. By the rule of Ferreolus, written in the south of France during the 6th century, the abbat was to be cook on three great festivals in the year, at Christmas, at Pentecost, and on the Founder's Day (Reg. Ferreol. c. 38). It is recorded of Benedictus Anianis the compiler of the Concordia Regularum, that he would be intent on literary work while at work in the kitchen (Vita Bened. Anian.

c. 14). By the rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles in the 6th century, abbats and priors were excused altogether.

In some monasteries it was part of the duty of the hebdomadarii to prepare the dinner-table, and to act as waiters. Benedict indeed, distinguishes the "Septimanarii coquinae" from the "servitores" (Bened. Reg. cc. 35, 38); but the rule of Isidorus, bishop of Seville, in the 7th century, combines the offices (Isid. Reg. c. 11); and in the rule of "Magister" the cooks or their assistants are ordered not only to wait at table, but to carry water, chop wood, clean shoes, wash towels, dust the mats in the oratory, and perform various other menial tasks (Reg. Mag. c. 19). In the same rule it is provided, that if the weekly officers are negligent in having the table ready for the refectio, the abbat himself is to put them to the blush by doing it himself publicly (Ib. c. 23). In the Cluniac and Cistercian monasteries the hebdomadarii were waiters as well as cooks (Marten. Reg. Bened. Comm. ad loc. cit.).

The week of the hebdomadarii commenced on Sunday by a solemn form of admission in the oratory after "matins" (Reg. Bened. c. 35), or after "prime" (Reg. Mag. c. 19); the monks going out of office, as well as those just coming in, entreating the prayers of their brethren, and the blessing of their abbat. On the Saturday those, whose term of office was over, were to deliver up to the "cellarer" for the use of their successors all the utensils &c. under their charge in perfect order (Reg. Bened. v. s. Reg. Mag. v. s.). It was an old custom, symbolic of humility and brotherly love, for the hebdomadarii, closing and commencing their week, to wash the feet of their brethren, during which operation silence was to be kept, or psalms chanted (Cassian. Instit. iv. 19. Bened. Reg. v. s.). By the rule of "Magister," they were to set about preparing the refectio three hours before the hour fixed for it; immediately after "none" if, as was usual, the dinner was at midday, immediately after "sext" for a dinner at three in the afternoon (Reg. Mag. v. s.). The refectio was to be served on the stroke (Reg. Bened. v. s.); for any unpunctuality they were to be mulcted of the ration of bread or a part of it for certain days (Reg. Mag. c. 19); the Concordia regularum quotes an anonymous rule (not the "Regula Cujusdam," usually ascribed to Columbanus) sentencing hebdomadarii guilty of any trivial irregularity to twenty-five strokes of the open hand (Reg. Cujusd. c. 12), just as Cassian cautions them against losing even a pea (Cass. Instit. iv. 20). Benedict wisely arranged that the cooks should have some refreshment, a piece of bread and a small cup of beer, (panem ac singulos biberes) an hour before the refectio, on ordinary days; on festivals they were to wait till after the midday mass (Bened. Reg. v. s.). Various reasons are supposed by commentators for the latter part of this injunction (Martene Reg. Comm. ad loc.).

The "lector hebdomadarius" or reader aloud during refectio held office, like the "coqui," for a week; but Benedict ordered that only those brethren should be readers, whose reading was likely to edify (Bened. Reg. c. 38). On the Sunday commencing his week of office the reader was thrice to repeat in the oratory the

"Domine, aperi os meum," and before beginning to read was to ask the prayers of his hearers, lest he should be elated with pride (Ib.). Not a word was to be spoken during the lecture even by way of asking a question on what was being read; unless the prior (or abbat), should think right to interpose an explanation or exhortation; the monks were to help another to anything wanted without a word (Ib.). The reader was to have a little bread and wine (for so "mixtum" is to be understood, according to Martene, and not as wine and water), just before reading, for fear of faintness or exhaustion; he was to dine with the other hebdomadarii after the public meal (Ib.). The passages for reading were chosen by the abbat either from the Holy Scriptures or from lives of saints. Cassian derives the custom of reading aloud at refectio from Cappadocia (Cass. Instit. iv. 19). [See also, Alteser. Asceicon, ix. 10]. [I. G. S.]

HECATONTARCHAE. The council in Trullo (c. 61) condemns to six years' excommunication those who resort to "the so-called hecatontarchae, or such-like persons" (τοὶ λεγομένοις ἑκατοντάρχαις ἢ τισὶ τοιούτοις) with the view of learning from them what they may choose to reveal. The title of "hecatontarches," is said by Balsamon (quoted by Van Espen, iii. 415) to be equivalent to "Primericius;" and to have been conferred on certain old men who gave themselves out to be possessed of supernatural knowledge and deceived the simple. Gothofred (quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XVI. v. 6) thinks that these hecatontarchae are to be identified with the "centenarii" of the Theodosian Code (iik. xvi. tit. 10, l. 20), who were officers of certain corporations or companies for managing idolatrous pomps and ceremonies, and frequently claimed the power of divination. HEGIRA OR HIJRAH (الهجرة). The era commonly used by the Mohammedan historians is that of the Hijrah, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina. The epoch is the first day of the first month, Moharrem, of the year in which this took place (not the day itself, which was about sixty-seven days later). The epoch fell, according to the best Arabian authors and astronomers, cited in Ideler (Hundbuch, ii. 483), on Thursday, July 15, A.D. 622; but according to civil usage and the phase of the moon, a day later. This discrepancy has to be noted. We shall take as the epoch July 16, A.D. 622, or 5335 Julian Period, with interval days from Christian era [ERA], 227,014.

In Mohammedan authors the year is a lunar year of 30 and 29 days alternately, having 354 days. In intercalary years, of which there are 11 in every 30 years, viz., those marked * in Table I., the last month has one more day. In a complete cycle of 30 years there are 10,631 days.

To convert a Mohammedan Date into Old Style.—Find the number of cycles by dividing the Mohammedan year-date less 1 by 30. Let Q be the quotient, R the remainder. Multiply Q by 10,631, to which add the number of days corresponding to R in Table I. and the number of days corresponding to the months and days in Table II., and also 227,014, the interval days from the Christian era. The number of days divided by 1461 will give the number of quadriennia A.D., and table in ERA § 5, p. 623, will suffice to find the residual year and day of year.

Add 1 for the current year.

To convert an O. S. Date into Mohammedan.—Convert into days from Christian era, by same rule as in ERA, § 5. Subtract 227,014; divide remainder by 10,631. Let quotient be Q and remainder R. To $30 \times Q$ add the number of years corresponding to the number of days in Table I. next less than R, and with those over find the months and days in Table II.

Add 1 for the current year.

It may be worth noting that the Persian era of Yezdegrid commenced June 16, 632, ten years later. [L. H.]

HEGUMENOS. (ἡγούμενος) The Hegumenos of a monastery in the Greek church corresponds to the Latin ABBAT (see that word). He was also termed archimandrite. But, according to Helyot (Hist. des Ord. Monast. Diss. Prelim. c. 11), the term archimandrite passed in time from the superior of a monastery to the superior-general, originally called the exarch, whose office it was to "visit" all the monasteries in a province. Any monastery so desirous at its foundation was exempted from the bishop's jurisdiction and placed under the sole authority of the patriarch; and the superior general of these monasteries was a grand archimandrite (cf. Thomass. Disc. Eccles. I. iii. 23). The words Hegumene (ἡγουμένη), Hegumeneion (ἡγουμενέιον), and Hegumeneia (ἡγουμενεία) (all from the classical term for the headship of a confederacy) signify abbess, monastery

(or abbat's rooms), and office of abbat. (Suic. Thes. Eccles. s. v.) [I. G. S.]

HELL. A frequent subject of mediaeval Christian art in the sense of the appointed place or state of future punishment; but the writer is not aware of any such representation of unquestionable date and authenticity within the first eight centuries, unless the judgment-mosaic of Torcello may be considered an exception, which is very doubtful. See LAST JUDGMENT. The Book of Kells, and Saxon and Irish MSS. contain numerous dragons, and even grotesque devils; but they certainly seem to have more to do with the prevailing taste for lacertine or serpentine ornament, and general melancholy or ferocity of mind, than with any doctrinal idea of evil spirits. The regular Inferno begins with the early Florentine revival, in the baptistery of St. Giovanni. [R. St. J. T.]

HEMIPHORION (ἡμιφόριον), seemingly some kind of upper garment, worn by men and women. Epiphanius (Haeresis 69, § 3) describes Arius as wearing a colobion (see the word) and a hemiphorion; the latter probably over the former, which was a close tunic. And Palladius (Hist. Lausiac. p. 148) says that the younger Melania gave her silken hemiphoria to make "καλύμματα τοῖς θυσιαστηρίοις," hangings for the sanctuary, or altar-cloths, whichever it may be.

Hesychius and Suidas write the word ἡμιφόριον, connecting it with φάρος (a shawl or wrapper), and translating it "dimidium vestis," "dimidiata vestis." It was probably therefore one of the many forms of the pallium, smaller than that commonly worn. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.)

HEOTHINA (τὰ ἑωθινά). The Heothinon is an anthem sung in the Greek office of lauds (τὸ ἑσθρον), and occurs after the αἶνοι: (i.e. on ordinary days, Pss. cxlviii., cxlix., cl., on Sundays and important festivals, a short equivalent); and certain verses called Stichoi and short anthems called Stichera which follow them, and is placed between the clauses of the doxology, "glory, &c." (δόξα) and "both now, &c." (καὶ νῦν).^{*} The Heothinou varies with the musical tone of the week; there being one to each tone; and they are found in the Paractice, or book containing the various antiphons or troparia, arranged according to the different tones. The form of the Heothinon is that of any other Greek antiphon.

HERESY, considered as a delictum, or offence against the law of the church.

The Greek word αἵρεσις imports (1) a choosing (Lev. xxii. 18, LXX.; 1 Maccab. viii. 30); (2) that which is chosen, especially an opinion which one chooses to hold, as αἵρεσις ἀπωλείας (2 Pet. ii. 1); used by ecclesiastical writers for opinions deviating from the true Christian faith; (3) a body of men holding a particular opinion, as (e.g.) those holding particular opinions in philosophy (Diog. Laert. i. 13 etc.). In the New Testament it is used of the Sadducees (Acts v. 17), the Pharisees (Ib. xv. 5, and perhaps xxvi. 5), of the Christian community (Ib. xxiv. 5, 14; xxviii. 22). So Constantine (Euseb. H. E. i. 5, §§ 21, 22) speaks of the church as ἡ αἵρεσις ἡ καθολικὴ, ἡ ἀγιωτάτη αἵρεσις. We are concerned with the term mainly in the second of these significations.

The word was used by the early fathers with a good deal of latitude to designate systems which adopted, or professed to adopt, any Christian element whatever (Burton, Bampton Lect. p. 12); so the Trullan council (c. 95) applies the word "heretic" alike to those who were, and to those who were not, reckoned Christians; but it is generally applied to those who, holding the leading truths of the faith, deviate in some point or points.

To define heresy is, as St. Augustine says (De Haeret. Praef.), "altogether impossible, or at any rate most difficult;" and when first asked to write a book on heresy himself, he illustrated the difficulty by pointing out (Ep. 222, ad Quodvult.) that Philastrius bishop of Brescia, in his book of heresies, enumerated 28 which had origin 'ed among the Jews before Christ, and 128 afterwards, but that Epiphanius of Cyprus discovered only 80 altogether. But he is careful to note (Epist. 43) that, whatever be the definition, it is not the mere falseness of an opinion, but the spirit in which it is held, that constitutes heresy; they who do not defend a wrong opinion in an obstinate temper (pertinaci animositate), especially they who are in error mainly by the accident of birth, are not to be reckoned heretics. With which accords the common definition, that heresy is "pertinax defensio dogmatis ecclesiae universalis iudicio condemnati." See Decretum Grat. Cau. xxiv. qu. iii. c. 29 ff. The law of the emperor Arcadius, dated A.D. 395, and given in the Codex Theod. (XVI. v. 28), is the first legislative definition. "Qui vel levi argumento a iudicio catholicae religionis et tramite detecti fuerint deviare," which is modified by another expression of the same Arcadius (Code, L. 13, De Paganis), "qui a Catholicae Religionis dogmate deviare contendunt," where the word "contentundum" is held to refer to the same pertinacity in maintaining an opinion on which Augustine dwells (Van Espen, pt. iii. tit. iv. c. 22 ff.). Van Espen considers this, if not an absolutely accurate description, to be that which has governed the subsequent practice of the church. He maintains its soundness as a definition, because on the one hand it allows no deviation whatever from the Catholic creed, and on the other tolerates a reasonable latitude of speculation by taking no cognizance of constructive heresy. To constitute the canonical offence the heresy must consist—i., in a departure, not from the implied belief of Christianity, but from that which the church through her creeds and canons has declared to be a matter of faith; ii., the error must be persistent and wilful, and, as Augustine points out (De Civ. Dei, xviii. 51), after admonition; iii., it must not only be suspected but detected and adjudicated upon. (Van Espen, Jus Eccl. III. iv. 2; Field, Of the Church, iii. cc. 3, 4).

2. i. The cognizance of heresy was vested in the bishops separately, as well as collectively. It belongs exclusively to the spiritual office, says Ambrose (Ep. 21), addressing the emperor Valentinian, to decide on matters of doctrine.

* The Greek form of doxology after the Psalms does not contain the clause "Sicut erat in principio" (Goar Euchol. notae in Laud. Off.).

The episcopate was held to be one, where the faith was concerned, and each bishop was charged with maintaining it, although for practical convenience his government extended only over a single diocese. This jurisdiction granted to the bishop in matters of faith appears from the power possessed by him in the ante-Nicene church of varying the expressions of the creed in use in his diocese, in order to meet prevailing heresies; provided, of course, that the fundamental unity of the faith was unimpaired; instances of such variations are given in Bingham, Antiq. II. vi. 3. The reference to the belief of individual bishops as a standard of doctrine is further evidence in the same direction. Thus Theodosius in a rescript quoted in Sozomen (H. E. vii. 4) exhorts his subjects to keep the faith delivered by St. Peter, and by Damasus of Rome, and Peter of Alexandria. Other references of the kind are collected in Gothofred's commentary on Codex Theod. xvi. 1, de fide Catholicâ. It was an exercise of this authority by Gelasius bishop of Rome, A.D. 492-6, condemning in a decretal epistle the writings of Faustus the Semi-pelagian archbishop of Riez, which gave rise to the first Roman catalogue of forbidden books. After the empire became Christian, attempts were made by some of the emperors to arrogate to themselves this spiritual jurisdiction of the bishops. The first instance of the kind, unless the laws of Theodosius on heretics are to be regarded as such, is that of the usurper Basiliscus, emperor of the East, 475-7, who issued an encyclic letter condemning the council of Chalcedon, and laying down definitions of faith. An example followed with more success by Justinian, whose edicts on doctrine as well as discipline obtained acceptance by being promulgated through the patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops. The ecclesiastical legislation of Charlemagne also trenching upon the same prerogative; discussion was permitted in the synods summoned by him, but the emperor reserved the decision to himself, and issued the decrees in his own name. But no ecclesiastical authority superseded that of the bishops till A.D. 1204, when two Cistercian abbots were sent by Innocent III. to the south of France to investigate the Albigensian heresy; and in 1231 Gregory IX. issued a commission to the Dominicans to constitute a special court of heresy; this was the beginning of the Inquisition. (Van Espen, Jus. Eccl. I. xxii. 3.)

ii. The general power of each bishop to defend the faith was restricted, in dealing with an individual heretic, to his own diocese. If the accused was one of the clergy, the bishop was required in the African church to take neighbouring bishops to sit with him (1 Conc. Carthag. c. 11; 2 Conc. Carthag. c. 10); but this rule was not confined to accusations of heresy. With the bishop in some instances sat the presbyters—whether or not this privilege was universally conceded to them. The synod of Antioch, A.D. 264, which condemned Paul of Samosata, contained presbyters (Euseb. H. E. vii. 28). So the first condemnation of Arius was not pronounced by Alexander bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 319, till he had summoned the presbytery and some other bishops to hear the charge (Epiphanius, Haer. 69, c. 3). And the accusation against Pelagius was first heard before John, bishop of Jerusalem, and a synod of his presbyters, A.D. 415. If objection was made to the decision of the bishop, an appeal lay to a larger council, either of the province, or finally of the whole church; instances of which are too notorious to need citing. A bishop charged with heresy could be tried only by a synod of bishops. The officer charged with the preliminary investigation is designated by one of the laws of Justinian (Novel. 137, c. 5). "If any clergyman is accused in point of faith, if he is a bishop he shall be examined before his metropolitan, but if he is a metropolitan then before the patriarch."

3. The penalties attached to heresy were both ecclesiastical and civil.

i. By ecclesiastical law an obstinate heretic was excommunicated, and if he continued contumacious, his exclusion from church-membership was made more rigorous. The 6th canon of the council of Laodicea forbids those who continue in their heresy to enter the house of God. But this exclusion could not have been universal, for the 4th council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 84) distinctly prohibits the bishop from preventing Gentiles, Jews, or heretics from being present in church during the Missa Catechumenorum; and the council of Valentinia, A.D. 524 (c. i.) orders the gospel to be read before the oblations, so that heretics, among others, may have an opportunity of hearing [cf. HEATHEN]. Another stigma affixed to heretics was the rejection of their evidence in any ecclesiastical court against a Catholic. The Apostolical Canons (c. 74) say expressly that the evidence of a heretic shall not be received against a bishop. The 129th canon of the African code also mentions heretics among other infamous persons whose testimony was inadmissible (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 96). The so-called 6th canon of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, guards this disability from abuse by confining it exclusively to ecclesiastical causes; if a heretic had a civil cause of complaint against a bishop, the council allowed him his remedy; but the Justinian code deprived him even of this. Another class of penal enactments was directed to the protection of the orthodox from the infection of heresy. One of the Apostolical Canons (c. 45) forbids, under pain of suspension, any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to pray with heretics, or permit them to officiate; another (c. 63) inhibits either clergy or laity from worshipping in a synagogue of heretics. The council of Laodicea (c. 9) would not permit Catholics to frequent the cemeteries or celebrations of so-called martyrdoms of heretics, nor (c. 33) tolerate any devotions with them. The 4th council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 71), pronounces the assemblies of heretics to be not churches but conventicles; and (c. 72) prohibits both praying and singing psalms with them. The Spanish council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 13), rejects the oblation of any who has presented his children for baptism by a heretic; this must mean, not in a case of necessity, where it would be admitted, but deliberately. (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. i. 4). Social intercourse with heretics was also prohibited. "A clergyman must avoid both the entertainments and the society of heretics" (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 70; 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 15; 1 Conc. Turon. c. 8; Conc. Venet. c. 3). Augustine relates (Confess. iii. 11) that while he was a Manichaean his mother would not sit at the same table with him. The council of Laodicea (c. 32) forbids Christians to receive the EULOGIAE of heretics, and also (cc. 10, 31) to intermarry with them. This last prohibition appears to have been universally enforced (Conc. Eliber. c. 16; Conc. in Trull. c. 72). The laws of the church are not so strict as the civil edicts afterwards became in prohibiting the study of heretical books; there is one canon (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 16) which forbids a bishop to read heathen authors under any circumstances, and heretical ones unless time or necessity require.

ii. The civil proceedings against heretics began with some edicts of Constantine against the Donatists, A.D. 316; but a much more extensive series of laws was enacted by Theodosius the Great with a view to put an end to the divisions of the church arising from the controversies of the 4th century, and to enforce uniformity of belief by legal penalties. The first of these was passed immediately after the general council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and between that period and A.D. 394, fifteen other such edicts were published. A further law was enacted by Honorius, A.D. 408, and others in the East by Arcadius and the younger Theodosius, and others again by Justinian, A.D. 529. The laws are chiefly contained in book xvi. tit. v. de Haereticis of the Theodosian Code, although a few are to be found under other titles. Here it will be sufficient to give a bare abstract of the most severe of them. Heretics were deprived of all offices of profit or dignity in the state; they could neither receive nor bequeath property; no civil contract with them was binding; they were fined, banished, subjected to corporal punishments, and even sentenced to death. Other laws were designed to prevent the propagation of heresy. No heretical assemblies might be held, nor conventicles built, nor clergy ordained; their books were to be burnt and their children disinherited. These edicts were not directed against all heretics indiscriminately, but against various sects which were held to be most dangerous to faith or morals. From the account of Sozomen (H. E. vii. 12), they were intended to strike terror rather than to be executed; but heretics were always exposed to them, and, in one conspicuous instance, the most severe penalty, that of death, was inflicted on Priscillian and some of his adherents; the first example in the church of any one being put to death for his opinions.

4. i. The admission of heretics to the church is closely involved with the controversies of the 4th century on the validity of heretical baptism [BAPTISM, ITERATION OF, p. 172]. Their bearing on the reconciliation of heretics, and the further question of the relation in which the practice of anointing converts from heresy stands towards the rite of confirmation, are discussed in Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 7-11). This article is concerned only with any rites or terms of admission which indicate the course of canonical discipline. The council of Eliberis (c. 22) appoints ten years' penance to those who had deserted the faith and afterwards returned, with a proviso that if they had lapsed in infancy they should be received back without delay. Later councils (Conc. Agath. c. 60; Conc. Epaon. c. 29) deprecating this severity, reduce the term to two years, on condition that the penitent fasts three days a week and comes frequently to church. Longer penalties were exacted from those who had submitted to re-baptism among the heretics, the earlier practice in this too being more severe; the 1st council of Valence, A.D. 374 (c. 3), denies communion to them till the hour of death, that of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 9), only for nine years. In this, however, as in other points of discipline, much was left to the discretion of the bishop (Conc. Agath. c. 60; 4 Conc. Aurel. c. 8). In general the practice of the church, which is involved in some obscurity, appears to have been to admit converts without any actual penance, submitting them however to some outward form or ceremonial of penitence (sub imagine poenitentiae, Innocent: Ep. 18, ad Alexan. c. 3). A letter of Gregory the Great (Epist. ix. 61, ad Quirin.) directs that those who had once been baptized in the name of the Trinity should be received by imposition of hands, which was the Western use, or by unction, which was that of the East, or by a profession of faith.

Of these forms of reconciliation that by imposition of hands was the earliest. It is spoken of by Eusebius (H. E. vii. 2) as a practice which was ancient in the time of Stephen, bishop of Rome, A.D. 253-7; Cyprian also calls it the ancient custom in his time (Ep. 71 ad Quintum). It was prevailing in the time of Innocent (Epp. 2 ad Victric. c. 8, 22 ad Epis. Macedon. cc. 4, 5); it was known to Augustine (de Bapt. c. Donat. iii. 11, ibid. vi. 15), and was the subject of the decrees of various councils (1 Conc. Arelat. c. 8; Conc. Nicaen. c. 8). By a canonical epistle of Siricius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 384-98, heretics were to be admitted by imposition, together with invocation of the Spirit. But the statement of Gregory that imposition of hands was the Western custom, and unction the Eastern, is only partially correct. Unction was in use in both the Spanish and the Gallic churches (1 Conc. Arausic. c. 1; Conc. Epaon. c. 16), and it is likely that when Gregory wrote he was referring only to the principal church of the West, that of Rome (Martene de Lit. iii. 6).

ii. In the 4th century, converts from some heresies were received into the church by unction, with formal renunciation of their errors (Conc. Laud. c. 7; 1 Conc. Constant. c. 7). The Trullan council, following the 1st of Constantinople, describes the manner of admission; "We receive Arians, Macedonians, Novatians, Quartodecimans, and Apollinarians, when they give in written forms of belief (ἀποθέλous; for instances of this practice see Soc. H. E. iv. 12, Soz. H. E. iii. 22), and anathematize every heresy not according with the mind of the holy and apostolic church; sealing (that is, anointing) them with the holy ointment on the forehead, and eyes, and nostrils, and mouth, and ears; and as we seal them, we say, 'The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost.'" The Arabic version of the Nicene canons (c. 31, Hardouin, vol. i. p. 468) has another form of admission. "If any one is converted to the orthodox faith he must be received into the church by the hands of the bishop or presbyter, who ought to instruct him to anathematize all who oppose the orthodox faith and contradict the apostolic church. He ought also to anathematize Arius and his heresy, and openly and sincerely profess the faith. After this the bishop or priest whose office it is, shall receive him and anoint him with the unction of Chrism, and sign him three times while anointing him, and praying over him in the prayer of Dionysius the Areopagite, and prayer shall be made earnestly to God for him, and then he may be received." With regard to other heresies, the canon of the Trullan council already cited proceeds to make the following provisions. "About the Paulinists the Catholic church defines, that they are to be baptized anew; but as to the Eunomians, who baptize with one immersion, the Montanists . . . and the Sabellians . . . and all the other heresies . . .; all who will come over to orthodoxy from these we receive as converts from paganism (ὡς Ἑλληνας); and the first day we make them Christians, the second catechumens, and on the third day we exorcise them, after breathing thrice on the forehead and ears [EXORCISM]; and so we go on to catechise them, and cause them to tarry in the church and listen to the Scriptures; and then we baptize them. And the Manichaeans, and the Valentinians, and the Marcionites, and those who come from such-like heresies must give in libelli, and anathematize their own heresy, and Nestorius and Eutyches, and Dioscorus and Severus, and the other ringleaders of such-like heresies, and those who hold their own and the other aforementioned heresies; and so they may be admitted to Holy Communion."

iii. In the case of those who came into the orthodox faith from the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches, the church appears to have been satisfied with a solemn profession of faith by the convert. This is frequently insisted upon by Leo (Epp. i. 6; vi. 2; xiv. xxvii. 4). The 2nd council of Seville, A.D. 618, received in this form at its twelfth sitting an heretical Syrian bishop. The bishop made a solemn statement of his errors and of the truth, and confirmed it with an oath. In later periods an oath became an indispensable part of the ceremonial. A Roman synod under Leo III., A.D. 799, required a certain bishop Felix not only to abjure his heresy and write out a form of faith, but also to swear over the holy mysteries to observe his orthodox profession; he was then required to place it over the body of St. Peter, and swear he would never dare repeat his heretical opinions. Cotelierus (Apost. Const., v. 13, note) prints part of an ancient Eastern ritual containing a form of renunciation of the Armenian heresy, which concludes with the following imprecation: "If I make this profession with hypocrisy, or return to my heresy openly or secretly, may all calamities overtake me, the dread of Cain and the leprosy of Gehazi, and in the world to come may I be anathema and cata-thema, and may my soul be sent to Satan and his devils."

iv. The form of admission in use in the East in the 8th century is given by Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 9) from a very ancient Greek Euchologion. Those to be received must fast ten or fifteen days, and prostrate themselves in prayer morning and evening like the Catechumens; they may then be thought worthy of the orthodox faith and be initiated. The priest is to bring each into the baptistery, and say to him, "Curse N. and his doctrines, and those who agree with him, for I renounce him and every heretical doctrine, and I believe in the holy and consubstantial Trinity." And the priest shall say to the convert three times, "Dost thou believe in the holy and con-substantial Trinity?" and the convert shall reply "I do." He shall then kneel, and the priest shall lay his hand upon his head and pray as follows After which he shall anoint him with oil with the same form as if he were a neophyte, and say this prayer . . . The convert may then communicate, and he must be instructed not to eat flesh seven days, nor wash his face, but, as the baptized do, persevere for seven days, and on the 8th day wash and be dismissed.

The following example of a prayer used for those who were reconciled, after having been rebaptized by heretics, is from a ritual found at Toulouse, at Rheims, and in Sicily: "God who restorest man, made after thine own image, to that which Thou hast created, look down in mercy upon this Thy servant, and whatever ignorance and heretical perverseness has crept into him, do Thou in Thy pity and goodness pardon, so that any wickedness which he has committed through the fraud of the devil or the iniquity of the Arian falsehood, may not be laid to his charge, but that having been transformed by Thy mercy, and having received the communion of Thy truth at the sacred altars, he may be restored a member of the catholic church."

Heresy as a canonical offence is dealt with by Van Espen (Jus Eccl. Pars iii. tit. iv. c. 2). The admission of heretics to the church is a very complicated subject, owing to the endless varieties of heretical sects. See Martene (de Rit. iii. 6), Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 7-11), Suicer (s. v. αἰρετικός), and Bingham (Antiq. X.C. ii.). A list of the early and mediaeval writers on heresy is given in the preface to Burton's Bampton lectures on Heresies of the Apostolic Age. [G. M.]

HERMITS. Some mediaeval writers on monasticism define hermits (eremitæ) as solitaries in cells, and anchorites (anachoretæ) as solitaries without any fixed dwelling place; more correctly anchorites are solitaries who have passed a time of probation as coenobites, and hermits those who enter on the solitary life without this preparation (Martene, Reg. Comm. Bened. c. 1; Isid. De Div. Off. ii. 15). Generally the word "eremite" includes all solitary ascetics of one sort or another; other designations of them in early ecclesiastical writers are ἀθληταί, ἀσκηταί, μονάζοντες, φιλόθεοι, φιλοσοφούντες, κατειργμένοι, viri Dei, renunciants, continentes, cellulani, inclusi, reclusi, monachi, &c.; and, later, religiosi. The words μοναχὸς and μοναστηρίον were soon transferred from the hermit in his solitary cell to the coenobite in his community.

The asceticism of the desert was among Christians the first step towards the asceticism of the cloister. It was prompted by a passionate longing to fly from the world to escape not merely the fury of the Decian or Diocletian persecutions, but the contaminations of surrounding heathenism. It commended itself to devout Christians by reasons, which, however specious, really contradict and cancel each other, for it seemed at once a refuge from spiritual dangers, and a bolder challenge to the powers of darkness to do their worst; at once a safer, quieter life than the perilous conflict day by day with an evil world, and, in another aspect, a life of sterner self-denial. In the pages of its panegyrist the solitary life presents itself now in one and now in the other of these irreconcilable phases, according to the mood or temperament of the writer. It may be replied, that, far from being either more heroic or more free from danger, it is neither.

Until about the middle of the 3rd century the more austere Christians were only distinguished by such epithets as οἱ σπουδαῖοι or οἱ ἐκλεκτότεροι, without withdrawing from the society of their fellows (e.g. Euseb. H. E. vi. 11; Clem. Alex. Homil. "Quis Dives?" n. 36). About that time, Antony and Ammon in Egypt, and Paul in the Thebaid led the way to the desert; and their example soon found a crowd of imitators (Socr. H. E. iv. 23; Soz. H. E. i. 13, 14; Hier. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.). In Syria Hilarion, in Armenia Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, in Cappadocia Basil urged on the movement. It spread quickly through Pontus, Illyricum, and Thrace westwards; and the personal prestige of Athanasius, an exile from his see, helped to make it popular in Italy at Rome (Niceph. H. E. ix. 16; Aug. de Op. Mon. c. 23; Hier. Ep. 16; Epitaph. Marcell.). But the solitary life never found so many votaries in Europe, as in Egypt and in the East; partly because of the comparative inclemency of the climate, and the proportionate need of more appliances to support life, partly of the more practical character of the West.

The institution of Lauras was the connecting link between the hermitage and the monastery, in the later and more ordinary use of that word.

Pachomius at Tabenna in Upper Egypt had already begun to organise a community of hermits, by arranging that three should occupy one cell, and that all who were near enough should meet together for the daily meal (Soz. H. E. iii. 14; Pallad. Hist. Laus.). The monks of Mons Nitrius, too, near the Lake Mareotis, though many of them in separate cells (οἰκήματα μοναχικά σποραδῆν, τὰ Κελλά, Soz. H. E. vi. 31) had refectories for common use, chapels in their midst for common worship on Saturdays, Sundays and holy days, certain presbyters appointed to officiate in these, and certain lay officers, (oeconomi) elected^a by the older hermits to provide for their temporal wants, such as they were, and to transmit their scanty alms (diaconia) derived chiefly from the sale of the rush mats which they wove (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. iii. 1; x. 2; xviii. 5; xxi. 9). In the Thebaid a hermit named Joannes presided over a large number of hermits (Soz. H. E. vi. 28, 29). One of the first "Lauras," or irregular clusters of hermits dwelling close together, was at Pharan near the Dead Sea in the 4th century; another was founded near Jerusalem in the next century by Sabas a hermit from Cappadocia, under the patronage of Euthymius.

The early ecclesiastical histories teem with the almost suicidal austerities of the more celebrated hermits. Not content with imposing on themselves the burden hard to be borne of a lifelong loneliness—for even without any vow of continuance it was very rarely that a hermit returned to the companionship of his fellows—and of a silence not to be broken even by prayer, they vied with one another in devising self-tortures; wandering about, almost naked, like wild beasts; barely supporting life by a little bread and water, or a few herbs; only allowing their macerated frames three or four hours sleep in the twenty-four, and those on the bare rock or in some narrow cell where it was impossible to straighten the limbs; counting cleanliness a luxury and a sin; maiming themselves, sometimes with their own hands, to escape being made bishops by force; and shunning a moment's intercourse even with those naturally dearest (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. ii. 6, 17; Socr. H. E. iv. 23; Soz. H. E. vi. 29, 34; cf. Rosweyde Vitæ Patr. pass.). It was only in the decline of this enthusiasm that hermits began to take up their abode near cities. The "father of hermits" used to compare a hermit near a town to a fish out of water (Soz. H. E. i. 13).

Usually the hermit's abode was in a cave, or in a small hut which his own hands had rudely put together (Evagr. H. E. i. 21); but some, like the "possessed with evil spirits" in Gadara mentioned in the New Testament, had their dwellings in tombs (Theodoret. Philoth. c. 12); hence they were called μεμωρῖται, and the keeper or superintendent of these tombs the μεμορφύλαξ (Altes. Ascetic. i. 7). Others roved about incessantly, to avoid the visits of the curious, like the "gyrovagi" in having no fixed abode, but unlike them in keeping always alone (Sulp. Sev. Dial. de Mon. i. 9), and in feeding only on the wild herbs which they gathered [see ΒΟΣΧΙ]. Others, the "Stylitæ," aspiring to yet more utter isolation, planted themselves on the summit of solitary columns. Of these the most famous were the Simeon, who in Syria during the 5th century is said to have lived forty-one years on a tall pillar the top of which was barely three feet in diameter (Evagr. H. E. i. 13; ii. 9; Theodoret, Philoth. c. 26); his namesake who followed his example in the 6th century (Evagr. H. E. vi. 22); and a Daniel, who chose for the scene of his austerities a less dreary neighbourhood, a suburb of Constantinople (Theodor. Lect. H. E. i. 32). Other "stylitæ" are mentioned by Joannes Moschus (Prat. cc. 27, 28, 57, 129). This peculiar form of eremitism was very unusual in Europe. A monk near Treves in the 6th century tried the experiment on the top of a column rising from the summit of a cliff; but by order of the bishop soon relinquished the attempt on account of the rigour of the climate (Greg. Turon. Hist. viii. 16).

The reverence with which hermits were popularly regarded led to their aid being frequently invoked when controversies were raging. Thus in the close of the 4th century Antony, who is also said to have more than once broken the spell of his seclusion in order to go and plead the cause of some poor client at Alexandria (Soz. H. E. i. 13), being appealed to in the Arian conflict not only addressed a letter to the emperor, but made a visit in person to Alexandria on behalf of Athanasius (Soz. H. E. ii. 31; Hieron. Ep. 33, ad Castruc.). The hermit Aphraates boldly confronted the emperor Valens, as did Daniel, the later of the two pillar-hermits of that name, the emperor Basiliscus (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 23; Theod. Lect. Collectan. i. 32, 33). The great Theodosius consulted the hermit Joannes (Soz. H. E. vii. 22). The hermits near Antioch interceded with good effect when the magistrates of that city were about to execute the cruel orders of the exasperated emperor (Chrys. Homil. ad Ant. xvii.). But not rarely the unreasoning zeal of the hermits provoked great tumults; and sometimes in a misguided impulse of indiscriminating pity they endeavoured by force to liberate criminals condemned by the law. Nor were their sympathies always on the side of the orthodox. When Theophilus of Alexandria denounced the error of the Anthropomorphitæ, almost all the Saitic monks were fiercely incensed against him as an atheist "in their simplicity" as Cassian adds, (Cass. Coll. x. 2).

On the comparative excellency of the eremitic or of the coenobitic life there has been much difference of opinion among writers who extol asceticism; the same writer inclining now to the solitary life, and now to the life in a community, as he views the question from one side or another. Sozomen calls the eremitic life the "peak of philosophy" (H. E. vi. 31). Chrysostom and Basil speak to the same effect (Chrys. Ep. 1; Bas. Ep. ad Chilon.). But Basil in the rule for monks ascribed to him commends the coenobitic life, as more truly unselfish, more rich in opportunities both for helping and for being helped (Reg. c. 7); and so speaks his friend, Gregory of Nazianza (Orat. 21). Jerome, with all his love of austerity, cautions his friend and pupil against the dangers of solitude (Ep. 4, ad Rustic.). Augustine praises hermits; and yet allows that coenobites have a more unquestionable title to reverence (De Mor. Eccl. c. 31). Cassian often speaks of hermits as having climbed to the summit of excellence (e.g. Inst. v. 36; Coll. xviii. 4); at other times he deprecates the solitary life as not good for all, and as beyond the reach of many; and he relates how a devout monk gave up the attempt in despair, and returned to his brother monks (Coll. xix. 2, 3; xxiv. 8).

It was from the first very earnestly enjoined by the leaders of asceticism, that none should venture on so great an enterprise as the solitary life, without undergoing probation as a coenobite (Hieron. Ep. 4 ad Rust.; Cass. Inst. v. 4. 36; Coll. xviii. 4; Joan. Clim. Scala, iv. 27). Benedict compares the hermit to a champion advancing in front of the army for single combat with the foe, and therefore insists on his proving himself and his armour beforehand (Reg. c. 1). Councils repeatedly enforce this probationary discipline (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 7; Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, c. 63; vii. A.D. 646, c. 5; Conc. Trull. A.D. 692, cc. 41, 42). The permission of the abbat was required (Sulp. Sev. Dial. i. 5), sometimes, also, the consent of the brethren (Martene, Comm. in Reg. Ben. c. 1) and, sometimes of the bishop (Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 12). The length of this period of probation varied (Mart. es. cf. Isid. De Div. Off. ii. 15). Even those who most admired the hermit-life fenced it round with prohibitions as a risk not lightly to be encountered.

The civil authorities were naturally jealous of this subtraction of so many citizens from the duties of public life. Theodosius ordered all those who evaded their public responsibilities on pretence of asceticism to be deprived of their civil rights unless they returned to claim them (Cod. Theodos. xii.; Tit. 1; Lex 63); and it was forbidden for slaves to be admitted into a monastery without their masters' leave (Conc. Chalc. A.D. 451, Act xv. c. 4). In Western Europe Charles the Great decreed that all hermits infesting towns and cities for alms should either return to their hermitages or be shut up in monasteries. By the law of the Eastern church a bishop who became a hermit was ipso facto deprived of his office.

It was not unusual, particularly in the monasteries of Provence and Languedoc, for one of the brethren most advanced in asceticism to be immured in a separate cell, sometimes underground, always within the precincts, as an intercessor for the monastery (Menard, Observ. Crit. in Bened. Anian. Cod. Regul. ii.). After a solemn religious ceremony the devotee, thus buried alive by his own consent, was left, with no other apparel than what he was wearing, to end his days alone. The doorway was walled up, or the door nailed to and sealed with the bishop's ring, whose consent, as well as that of the abbat and chapter, was requisite. Only a little aperture was left, not such as to allow the inmate to see or be seen, for letting down provisions to him (Menard, u. s.). These "includi" are not to be confounded with the aged or sickly monks, allowed separate cells because of their infirmities (Cass. Inst. ii. 12; Conc. Agath. c. 38). [See HESYCHASTAE.] The rule "for solitaires" of Grimlaicus, probably a monk in or near Metz about the end of the 9th century, seems intended not for a separate order, but for these "includi" generally (Bened. Anian. u. s.). It is a characteristic difference between Asiatic and European asceticism, that the eremites, or desert monks of the east find their western counterpart in solitaries within the precincts of the community.

As might be expected for obvious reasons there have been few female hermits. Gregory of Tours mentions a nun of the convent of Ste. Croix, Poitiers, who retired to a hermitage by permission of the abbess Radegunda (Hist. vi. 29). Usually these female solitaries had their cells in close contiguity to the wall of a church or of a monastery (Martene, v. s.).

HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF (Herutfordiæ concilium). Held at Hertford A.D. 673, Sept. 24; all the bishops of the Anglo-Saxon church then living, except Wini, the simoniacal bishop of London, being present in person or by deputy (Haddan and Stubbs' Councils and Documents, iii. 121, note). Archbishop Theodore, who had summoned them, recited ten canons from a book, in all probability the collection of Dionysius Exiguus from their being all found there, to which all subscribed (Ib.; comp. Mansi xi. 127). [E. S. Ff.]

HERUDFORDENSE CONCILIUM. [HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF.]

HESYCHASTAE (Ἠσυχασταί). Etymologically a term equivalent to "quietists." It was applied to those members of a monastery who were allowed to have separate cells within the precincts that their meditations might be uninterrupted. (Bing. Orig. Eccles. VII. ii. 14; Menard on Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. c. 29; cf. Justinian Novell. 5, 33.) Riddle, however, (Chr. Antiq. VII. vii.), takes it as a designation of monks bound to silence; and Suicer (Theol. Eccles.) as meaning anchorites, although the passage which he quotes from Balsamon (ad Conc. Nic. II. A.D. 787) distinguishes Hesy-chasteria from "monasteria" and the cells of "anachoretæ." In the 14th century it was applied to the mystics of Mount Athos (Herzog Real-Encyclop. s. v.). [I. HESYCHIUS, ESICHIUS or ESICIUS.

(1) Bishop and confessor at Circesium (saec. i.); commemorated with Euphrasius, Indalecius, Secundus, Tesiphon, and Torquatus, May 15 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Mesia; commemorated June 15 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HETAEIRIAE (ἑταιρίαι) were originally political clubs; but the word came to signify any association of men for objects not recognized by the law. Thus Trajan (Plinii Epist. x. 34 [al. 43]) was unwilling to sanction a company (collegium) of firemen at Nicomedia, because he had found that in that district such companies were liable to degenerate into hetaeriae; and it was as hetaeriae that the assemblies of the Christians became objects of suspicion to the state (Ib. x. 96 [al. 97], § 7), and so persecuted (Augusti, Handbuch, i. 40) [C.]

HETERODOXY. [HERESY.]

HEXAPSALMUS (ἑξάψαλμος). By this name are denoted six unvarying Psalms, which are said daily in the Greek office of lauds (τὸ ὄρθρον). They are Pss. iii., xxxvii. (xxxviii.), lxii. (lxiii.), lxxxvii. (lxxxviii.), cii. (cii.), cxlii. (cxliii.) They occur near the beginning of the office; and are introduced by the clause "Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good will among men," and by the verse "Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord, and my mouth shall show thy praise." After the first three Psalms are said the priest comes out from the bema, and while the last three are being said, recites the twelve morning prayers (τὰς ἑσθινὰς εὐχὰς) secretly before the icon of our Lord. They are concluded with three Alleluias; and three Reverences. [H. J. H.]

HEZEKIAH, the king of Judah; commemorated Nahasse 4=July 28 (Cal. Ethiop.). [W. F. G.]

HIBERNICA CONCILIA. [IRELAND, COUNCILS OF.]

HIEMANTES. The word χειμάζεσθαι means primarily "to be storm-tossed" (Acts xxvii. 18). Thence, by a natural metaphor, it passed on to the tempest of the soul. Thus Chrysostom (Hom. liii. in Matt.) says that the mind of a man who has many artificial wants is storm-tossed (χειμάζεσθαι). Compare James i. 6.

The seventeenth canon of the council of An-cyra (A.D. 314) orders those who have committed unnatural crimes, or who are or have been lepers, to be placed at public prayer among the storm-tossed or storm-beaten (εἰς τοὺς χειμαζόμενους εὐχεσθαι). This is rendered in the "Versio Prisca," "cum eis qui tempestatem patiuntur orare;" by Dionysius Exiguus, "inter eos orare qui spiritu periclitantur immando;"

by Isidorus Mercator, "qui tempestate jactantur, qui a nobis energumeni appellantur [ul. furiosi sive energumeni intelliguntur]." To the same effect Martin of Braga (Collect. Can., c. 81), "inter daemones orare." The use of the word in the Clementine liturgy (Constt. Apost. viii. 12, § 20)—παρακαλοῦμέν σε ὑπὲρ τῶν χειμαζομένων ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀλλοτρίου—makes it almost certain that the χειμαζόμενοι or Hiemantes are identical with the Energumeni or DEMONIACS, who had a special place assigned them outside the church proper, whether in the porch or in the open air. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Χειμάζομαι; Van Espen, Jus Eccl. iii. 132; ed. Colon. 1777). [C.]

HIERAPOLIS, COUNCILS OF. (1) A.D. 173, of twenty-six bishops, under its bishop, Apollinarius, against the errors of Montanus, which gave rise to a sect called from the province in which it originated, and in which Hierapolis was situated, "Cataphryges" (Mansi, i. 691-4). Eusebius has preserved extracts from a work written by Apollinarius himself against them (v. 16).

(2) A.D. 445, under Stephen, its metropolitan, when Sabinianus was ordained Bishop of Perthe instead of Athanasius, deposed at Antioch under Domnus the year before. Later, Athanasius was restored by Dioscorus of Alexandria. But the Council of Chalcedon, Oct. 31, A.D. 451, deciding for the moment in favour of Sabinianus, referred the final adjudication of the question to Maximus, bishop of Antioch, and a synod to be held by him within eight months to enquire into the charges brought against Athanasius. Should they not have been made good by then, he was to regain his see, and Sabinianus to be allowed a pension. (Mansi, vi. 465-6; and then vii. 313-58.) [E. S. F.]

HIERARCHY. 1. The word ἱεράρχης denotes properly a steward or president of sacred rites (Böckh, Inscrip. i. 749). By Christian writers it is occasionally used to designate a BISHOP (p. 210). Thus Maximus, commenting on the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of the Pseudo-Dionysius, says, "καλεῖν εἰώθεν ἱεράρχας τοὺς ἐπισκόπους," he commonly calls the bishops hierarchs (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.). Hence the word ἱεραρχία came to designate the order of bishops. Bingham, however (Ant. III. i. 6), considers the hierarchy of Pseudo-Dionysius to include bishops, priests, and deacons, quoting Hallier's Defensio Hierarch. Eccl. (lib. i. c. 3; lib. iii. sec. ii. cc. 1 and 2).

2. In a wider sense, the word Hierarchy is taken to include the whole series of the orders of ministry in the Christian church. See BISHOP, ORDERS. [C.]

HIRMOLOGION. An office book in the Greek church consisting mainly of a collection of the Hirmoi; but containing also a few other forms. [H. J. H.]

HIRMOS (εἰμῶς). The Canons, which form so important a part of the Greek offices, are divided into nine odes, or practically into eight, as the second is always omitted. Each ode consists of a varying number (three, four or five are the numbers most frequently found) of troparia, or short rhythmical strophes, each formed on the model of one which precedes the ode; and which is called the Hirmos. The Hirmos is usually independent of the ode, though containing a refer ence to the subject matter of it; sometimes however the first troparion of an Ode is called the Hirmos. It is distinguished by inverted commas (" ") in the office books. Sometimes the first words alone of a Hirmos are given, and it is not unfrequently placed at the end of the ode to which it belongs. The name is considered to be derived from the Hirmos drawing the Troparia after its model; i.e. into the same rhythmical arrangement. [H. J. H.]

HISPALENSIA CONCILIA. [SEVILLE, COUNCILS OF.]

HISPANUM CONCILIUM. Held, A.D. 793, at some place in Spain, under Elipand, archbishop of Toledo; from whom the document criticised in the letters despatched to Spain from Frankfort emanated (Mansi, xiii. 857; comp. 865 and sqq.). [E. S. Ff.]

HOLIDAYS. [FESTIVALS.]

HOLY! HOLY! HOLY! [SANCTUS.]

HOLY OF HOLIES. In instituting a parallel between the arrangements of the Jewish Temple and that of a Christian church, the BEMA or sanctuary of the church, containing the altar, was naturally held to correspond with the Holy of Holies of the Temple (τὸ ἅγιον τῶν ἁγίων), and was frequently called by that name. But with the Nestorians the "Holy of Holies" is not the sanctuary, but a small recess at the east end, into which not even the priest enters, containing nothing but a cross (Neale, Eastern Church, pp. 177, 189, quoting Etherege, Syrian Churches, p. 109). [C.]

HOLY BREAD. [EULOGIAE.]

HOLY OIL. [OIL, HOLY.]

HOLY PLACES. I. By this phrase were understood, in the first three or four centuries after Christ, chiefly, if not exclusively, the scenes of our Lord's nativity, death, resurrection, and ascension. Of these, therefore, we will speak first. In 212, Alexander, the friend of Origen, "made a journey to Jerusalem, for the sake of prayer and investigation of the places" (τῶν τόπων ἱστορίας, Euseb. Hist. Eccles. i. vi. c. 11). St. Jerome (De Vir. Illustr. cap. lxii.) says that he was drawn thither "desiderio sanctorum locorum." If this was the motive, and there is no good reason to doubt it, Alexander is the first on record whom religious feeling drew to those hallowed spots. Origen himself seems to have carried with him to the Holy Land more of the spirit of a learned and devout traveller of our own day. He was in Palestine in 216 on a rather short visit. In 231, he began a residence of some duration at Caesarea, in that country, and, after an absence of uncertain length, in 238 he opened a catechetical school there. He must, therefore, have known the Holy Land well, and his writings show it; but it is instructive to observe how he uses his knowledge. In one passage, as a critic, he expresses his conviction that "Bethabara," not "Bethany," ought to be the reading in St. John i. 28, "as he had been in the places, on a search after the footsteps of Jesus and his disciples, and the prophets" (Comment. in Ev. Joann. tom. vi. § 24). In another work, writing against an unbeliever, about 247, he alleges the cave of Bethlehem as a piece of evidence. If any one desire further proof than Scripture affords of our Lord's birth in that place, "the cave is shown where He was born, and the manger in which He was swaddled, and that which is shown is widely spoken of in those places, even among aliens from the faith, viz., that Jesus, who is worshipped and revered by the Christians, was born in that cave" (Contra Celsum, l. i. § 51). From the writings of Origen, we should not infer that either he himself had visited, or that it was the custom of his day to visit, the holy places for the express purpose of stimulating devotion, or under the notion that prayer in them was more acceptable to God than when made elsewhere. The spirit which animated the pilgrims of a later age, had not yet been awakened. Its awakening was probably much delayed by the attempts of the heathen to obscure the locality of events sacred to the Christian. Thus, in the time of Hadrian, a vast mound of earth was raised over the spot where our Lord was buried and rose again, and a temple dedicated to Venus was built on it (Euseb. Vita Constantini, l. iii. c. 26; Hieron. Ep. xlix. ad Paulin.).

The first great impulse given to the veneration of the holy places, came from Helena, the mother of Constantine, who, in the year 326, when nearly 80 years of age, travelled to Jerusalem, that she might so "pay the debt of pious feeling to God the king of all," for the elevation of her son, and the general prosperity of her family. After due reverence done to the footsteps of the Saviour, she "left a fruit of her piety to posterity" in two churches which she built, "one at the cave of the nativity, the other on the mount of the ascension" (Euseb. u. s. c. 42, 43). On the site of the burial, Constantine, after his mother's visit, first caused an oratory to be built, and later sent directions to Macarius, the bishop, for the erection of a magnificent church (Ibid. cc. 25-40). To this period, and perhaps to Constantine and Helena, we may probably refer two "very small oratories," one built on Mount Calvary, the site of the passion, the other on the spot where our Lord's body was said to have been embalmed and the cross found, which the Latins, when they took Jerusalem, inclosed within the same wall with the Holy Sepulchre (Gulielmi Tyrii, Hist. Rerum Transmar. lib. viii. c. 3). They were only a stone's throw from each other (Tillemont, note iv. sur Ste. Hélène); and hence the church of the Resurrection, or Holy Sepulchre, was often spoken of as on Golgotha (Cyrill. Hieros. Cat. i. § 1; xiii. § 12; xvi. § 2). Very soon after the recovery of these important sites we find them noticed in the Itinerarium of a Christian traveller from Bordeaux, who visited Jerusalem in 333. He saw the "crypt where His body was placed and rose again on the third day" (Vit. Rom. Itineraria, p. 594, Amstel. 1735), and "the little hill Golgotha where the Lord was crucified" (p. 593). He also went to "Bethlehem, where the Lord Jesus Christ was born. There," he adds, "a basilica was built by the command of Constantine" (p. 598).

II. From this time, the holy places were visited by believers of every rank and almost every age. Some of the more wealthy settled at Jerusalem, and by their alms assisted, and perhaps attracted, many of the poorer. The city grew rapidly in population and prosperity; and soon, as an almost necessary consequence, became as notorious for crime and profligacy, as it was famous for its religious monuments. About the year 380, Gregory of Nyssa was called thither by the affairs of the church, and received impressions which it will be well to put before the reader in his own words. In an epistle, written not long after, he tells his friend that he learned there what it was to keep holy day to God, "both in beholding the saving symbols of God the giver of our life, and in meeting with souls in which like signs of the grace of God are spiritually contemplated; so that he believes Bethlehem, Golgotha, the Mount of Olives, and the Resurrection to be verily in the heart of him who has God" (Ep. ad Eustathium, &c., p. 16, ed. Casaub.). The latter thought in this sentence then carries him away, and he seems, probably out of tenderness to the devout women to whom he wrote, to avoid further reference to the holy places. Some years afterwards, however, he wrote a tract, in the form of a letter to some unknown friend, in which he earnestly dissuaded from visiting Jerusalem on religious grounds. He begins by denying that it is any part of a Christian's duty "to visit the places in Jerusalem in which the symbols of our Lord's sojourn in the flesh are to be seen," and then proceeds as follows: "Why, then, is there such zeal about that which neither makes a man blessed, nor fit for the kingdom? Let the man of sense consider. If it were a profitable thing to be done, not even so would it be a thing good to be zealously affected by the perfect. But since, when the thing is thoroughly looked into, it is found even to inflict injury on the souls of those who have entered on a strict course of life, it is not worthy of that great zeal, but rather to be greatly shunned." He next enlarges on the danger to the morals and reputation of all, but especially women, in their travels through the luxurious and profligate cities of the East; and then proceeds to ask, "What will one gain by being in those places?—As if the Lord were still in bodily presence in them, but departed from us, or as if the Holy Ghost were overflowing abundantly at Jerusalem, but were unable to come over to us." So far from this being the case, he declares that city to be in the lowest stage of moral degradation. "There is no species of impurity that is not dared therein. Flagitious actions and adulteries and thefts, idolatries and witchcrafts, and envyings and murders; and this last evil, above others, is common in that place, so that nowhere else is there such a readiness to commit murder as in those places" (De Euntibus Hierosolymam, pp. 6–13, ed. Petr. Molinaei). Speaking for himself, he adds, "We confessed that Christ who appeared (there) is true God, before we were at the place; nor afterwards was our faith either lessened or increased. And we knew the incarnation through the Virgin before we went to Bethlehem, and believed the resurrection from the dead before we saw the monument of it, and acknowledged the ascension into heaven to be true, apart from our seeing the mount of Olives. This is the only benefit from our journey, that we know, by comparison, our own parts to be much more holy than foreign. Wherefore, ye that fear the Lord, praise Him in those places in which ye are" (Ibid. p. 14). St. Jerome, who lived at Bethlehem, sometimes speaks very much in the same strain. At other times he encourages and praises those who visited the holy places, especially if their intention was to dwell in retirement near them. This is easily understood. The multitude would be injured by familiarity with the memorials of Christ's life on earth; while the few might through them be brought into closer spiritual communion with Him. It may well be doubted, too, whether he would have encouraged any one to stay at Jerusalem, except under the protection of the monastic life; and even that he was far from thinking altogether safe in such a city. Writing, in 393 or thereabouts, to Paulinus, afterwards bishop of Nola, St. Jerome says, "Not the having been at Jerusalem, but having lived well there is to be praised. . . . The court of heaven is equally open from Jerusalem and Britain. The kingdom of God is within you. Anthony, and all the swarms of monks of Egypt and Mesopotamia, of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia, saw not Jerusalem; and the gate of Paradise is open to them without (a knowledge of) this city. The blessed Hilarion, though he was a native of Palestine, and lived in Palestine, only saw Jerusalem on a single day; that he might not appear to despise the holy places on account of their nearness, nor, on the other hand, to confine God to place." He warns Paulinus not to "think anything wanting to his faith, because he had not seen Jerusalem. . . . "If the places of the cross and of the resurrection were not in a city of very great resort, in which there is a court, a military station, in which there are harlots, players, buffoons, and all things that are usual in other cities; or if it were frequented by crowds of monks alone, an abode of this kind would in truth be one that should be sought for by all monks; but as things are, it is the height of folly to renounce the world, to give up one's country, to forsake cities, to profess oneself a monk, and then to live among greater crowds, with greater danger than you would in your own country" (Epist. xlix.). Nevertheless, when Desiderius and his sister had resolved to visit Jerusalem, he wrote (about 396) to encourage them, begging them to visit him and Paula "on occasion of the holy places." "At least," he adds, "if our society shall be unpleasant, it is an act of faith (or perhaps, "a part of your vow," pars fidei est) to have worshipped where the feet of the Lord have stood, and to have seen, as it were, the recent traces of His nativity, and cross and passion" (Epist. xlviii.). In the same spirit he invites Marcella (about 389) to Bethlehem (Epist. xlv.); and bids Rusticus (A.D. 408) seek peace of mind at Jerusalem. "Thou art a wanderer in thy own country;—or rather not in thy country, for thou hast lost thy country. That is before thee in the venerable places of the resurrection, the cross, and the cradle of the Lord the Saviour" (Epist. xc.). In the famous epistle of Paula and Eustochium (about 389) to Marcella, every inducement is held out to her to join them at Bethlehem; the number, eminence, and holiness of those who visited the holy places from every part of the world, the psalms of praise in every tongue continually ascending from them, the high religious interest of the places themselves, and, in particular, the great piety of the inhabitants of Bethlehem and its neighbourhood; but the truth is not lost sight of, that men might be as holy and devout elsewhere: "We do not say this to deny that the kingdom of God is within us, and that there are holy men in other countries, too," &c. (Inter Epp. Hieron. ep. xlv.).

III. Before the middle of this century (about 347), it was reported throughout the Christian world (see Cyrill. Hier. Catech. iv. § 7; x. § 9; xiii. § 2) that the very cross on which our Saviour died had been discovered, and was exhibited at Jerusalem. According to Cyril, who was bishop of Jerusalem from 350 to 386, the discovery took place in the time of Constantine (Epist. ad Constantium, § 2). As he died in 337, and not a word is said of the cross or its discovery by the traveller from Gaul, already cited, who was at Jerusalem in 333, the story must have arisen and the exhibition of the supposed relic must have begun some time between those years. Later writers (as Ambrose, de Obitu Theodosii, §§ 43-47; Paulinus, Ep. xxxi. § 5; Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. l. i. c. 7; Sulpicius, and later on Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, &c.) assert that it was found by Helena, the mother of Constantine; but that princess died five years before the anonymous Gaul visited Jerusalem; and even if we had not his negative testimony, the silence of Cyril with regard to Helena, and the silence on the whole subject of Eusebius, who, in his panegyric on Constantine, written in 337, has zealously heaped together whatever could tend to his honour, or his mother's, throw just doubt on her connection with the discovery, even if that be true [CROSS, FINDING OF, p. 593]. It is painful to suspect that the cross exhibited was not authentic, but when we find that by the middle of the 6th century (See Greg. Turon. Mirac. l. i. c. 7), if not long before, the lance, reed, sponge, crown of thorns, &c., used at the Passion were all exhibited, and revered with equal confidence, we surely have (not to mention certain difficulties in the story itself) some excuse for hesitating to affirm that the cross shown at Jerusalem in the 4th century and downward, was that upon which our Saviour died. It was believed, however, and our business is chiefly with the consequence of that belief. "Prostrate before the cross," says Jerome, speaking of Paula's first visit to Jerusalem, "she worshipped, as if she saw the Lord hanging thereon" (Ep. lxxxvi. ad Eustoch.). Paula herself refers to it, when urging Marcella to join her in Palestine: "When will that day be on which it will be permitted us to enter the cave of the Saviour; to weep with sister, to weep with mother, in the sepulchre of the Lord; then to kiss (lambere) the wood of the cross; and on the Mount of Olives to be lifted up in desire and mind with the ascending Lord?" This will, perhaps, sufficiently illustrate the importance of the alleged discovery, as a means of attracting pilgrims to Jerusalem. From Paulinus we learn that the cross was only exhibited "to be adored by the people" on Good Friday; but that sometimes it was shown to "very religious" persons, who had travelled thither on purpose to see it (Ep. xxxii. § 6).

IV. From one cause or another, then, the resort to the holy places in Palestine continued and increased. E.g. Cassian, A.D. 424, speaks incidentally of some monks who, while he was at Bethlehem, had "come together at the holy places from parts of Egypt orationis causâ" (De Coenob. Instit. l. iv. c. 31). Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius, bound herself by a vow to visit Jerusalem, if she should live to see her daughter married, which, with the consent of her husband, she fulfilled in the year 438 (Socr. Hist. Eccl. l. vii. c. 47). Palladius, a Galatian by birth, who had spent many years in Palestine, writing in 421, tells us that Melania the elder showed hospitality to pious persons going to visit the holy places from Persia, Britain, and almost every part of the world (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 118). Gregory of Tours mentions a Briton who, in his time, came to Tours on his way to Jerusalem (Hist. Franc. l. v. c. 22). Towards the end of the 7th century, Arculfus, a bishop of Gaul, "went to Jerusalem for the sake of the holy places," and being afterwards a guest of Adamnan, abbot of Iona, gave him an account of them. The latter put it in writing, and his work is still extant (Acta Bened. saec. iii. p. ii). See Bede, Hist. Eccl. Angl. l. v. cc. 15-17).

V. From the middle of the 4th century, or thereabouts, some other places had been acquiring such a character for holiness, as the scene of a martyr's triumph or the shrine of his relics, that they were visited by pilgrims from a distance, and even received the conventional title of Loca Sancta. Thus Rome was famous for the martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Chrysostom, alluding to the chain with which St. Paul was bound, says, "I would be in those places, for the bonds are said to be there still. . . . I would see those bonds, at which devils are afraid and tremble, but which angels reverence" (Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. iv. 1). But with him such a pilgrimage would have been only γυμνασία πρὸς θεοσέβειαν; for he more than once tells his hearers that they need not cross the sea, for God will hear them equally where they are. "Let us each, man and woman [remaining here at Antioch], both when gathering in church and staying in our houses, call very earnestly on God, and He will certainly answer our prayers" (Hom. de Statuis, iii. § 5; cf. Hom. i. in Ep. ad Philem. c. i. 1-3). And he claims a similar sanctity for Antioch, in which city he then lived, A.D. 388, as having been the "tabernacle of the apostles, the dwelling-place of the righteous" (Ibid. § 3). St. Augustine, A.D. 404, sent two persons, who accused each other of crime to a "holy place," viz. the shrine of St. Felix, at Nola, in the hope that "the more terrible workings of God" there "might drive the guilty one to confession, by punishment (divinely inflicted) or by fear" (Ep. lxxviii. § 3). He asks, "Is not Africa full of the bodies of holy martyrs? And yet," he adds, "we do not know that such things are done anywhere here" (Ibid.). Nevertheless, in the last book of the City of God, which was written about the beginning of the year 427, he records many wonders as wrought in Africa, within the few years previous, at the Memoriam of St. Stephen and other martyrs (De Civ. Dei, l. xxii. c. 8). Prudentius, himself a native of Spain, A.D. 405, celebrating the praise of two martyrs, who suffered at Calahorra in that country, says that the dwellers in that city "frequented the sands stained with their sacred blood, beseeching with voice, vows, gift; that foreigners, too, and the inhabitants of the whole earth came thither," and that "no one there, in his supplication, multiplied pure prayers in vain." The poet affirms that many miracles were wrought there by the power of the martyrs, and that Christ conferred that blessing on the town, when He gave their bodies to its keeping (De Coronis, Hymn I.). We must remember that the writer is a poet, but hardly more could have been said of a popular shrine in the 9th century.

VI. Probably not very long after the time of these writers, a custom began of sending penitents to various shrines (ad limina sanctorum), partly as a penance, and partly that they might more effectually obtain the intercession of the martyr of the place. Most writers, following Morinus (De Sacram. Poenit. l. vii. c. 15), have supposed that this form of penance was not in use till the 7th century; but a passage in one of the Homilies of Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502), first printed by Baluzius in 1669, implies that it was known in France, at least, before the close of the 5th:—"Frequenting the thresholds of the saints, they (penitents) would ask for aid against their own sins, and, persevering in fastings and prayers, or in almsgiving, would strive rather to punish than to nourish, or add to, those sins" (Hom. iii. p. 23). The great evils to which this practice would soon lead are obvious, and we need only, in conclusion, cite a canon of the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, A.D. 813, by which Charlemagne and his advisers sought to restrain them:—"A great mistake is made by some, who unadvisedly travel to Rome or Tours (to the shrine of St. Martin), and some other places, under pretext of prayer. There are presbyters, and deacons, and others of the clergy, who, living carelessly, think that they are purged from their sins and entitled to discharge their ministry, if they reach the aforesaid places. There are also laymen who think that they sin, or have sinned, with impunity, because they frequent these places for prayer." Some of the powerful, it adds, under pretext of a journey to Rome or Tours "for the sake of prayer or visiting the holy places," oppressed the poor by their exactions, while many of the poor made such pilgrimages an occasion of begging with more success: some falsely pretending to be on their way to the holy places, others going there in the belief that they would be "cleansed from sins by the mere sight" of them (can. xlv. Conc. Cabil. II.). [W. E. S.]

HOLY SPIRIT. The dove is the invariable and exclusive symbol which expresses special manifestation of the presence of the Third Person of the Trinity, and the article under that word will be found to contain some information as to the use of the symbol in this its highest sense. Luke iii. 22, Matt. iii. 16, Mark i. 10. The baptistery of St. Pontianus, in the catacomb of that name (Airinghi ii. 275), contains one of the earliest of these paintings of the Holy Dove, referable to the early 7th century; but the Lateran cross is reputed to be of the period immediately succeeding Constantine, and is a yet more striking example. HOLY WATER. I. The use of lustral water in the Christian church appears to have had a manifold origin.

(1) At an early period we find FOUNTAINS, or basins, supplied with fresh water, near the principal doors of churches, especially in the East, that they who entered might wash their hands at least [see HANDS, WASHING OF], before they worshipped. There can be no doubt that the ritual use of water under the name of holy water (aqua benedicta, ἁγιασμὸς, ὕδατι εὐλογίας, &c.) arose in a great measure from the undue importance which naturally attached itself to this custom, as ignorance and superstition began to prevail amid the troubles of the Western empire.

(2) Again, under the Mosaic law a person legally unclean was not restored to social intercourse, and to communion in prayer and sacrifice, until he had been sprinkled with the water of separation, and had "washed his clothes and bathed himself in water" (Numb. xix.; compare Ezekiel xxxvi. 25).

(3) The courts of heathen temples were commonly provided with water for purification; but it is probable that as a belief in the gods declined through the influence of Christianity, many would neglect to use it as they entered. Hence, we may suppose, the custom for a priest to sprinkle them at the door, lest any should present themselves unpurified. An instance is mentioned by Sozomen. When Julian was about to enter a temple in Gaul, a "priest holding green boughs wet with water sprinkled those who went in after the Grecian manner" (Hist. Eccl. l. vi. c. 6). This bore such a resemblance to the later rite of Christians as to mislead one transcriber of the work of Sozomen, and induce him to substitute Ἐκκλησιαστικῶν, Ecclesiastical, for Ἑλληνικῶν, Grecian (Annot. Vales. in loco. p. 109).

(4) We may add that the notion of a lustration by water prevailed also among the earliest heretics. Some of the Gnostics threw oil and water on the head of the dying to make them invisible to the powers of darkness (Iren. Haeres. l. i. c. 2, § 5). The Ebionites immersed themselves in water daily (Epiph. Haer. xxx. § 16). The founder of the sect is said by Epiphanius to have been wont to plunge into the nearest water, salt or fresh, if by chance he met one of the other sex (ibid. § 2).

II. Many miracles are said to have been wrought by means of water, and to this also we attribute a certain influence in giving both authority and shape to the superstitions which arose with regard to holy water. Count Joseph in the time of Constantine the Great, sprinkled an insane person with water over which he had made the sign of the cross, and his reason was restored (Epiph. u. s. § 10). We are told that by the same means he dispersed the enchantments by which the Jews sought to hinder the erection of a church at Tiberias (ibid. § 12). An evil spirit who hindered the destruction of the temple of Jupiter at Apamea, A.D. 385, was, according to Theodoret, driven away by the use of water which the bishop had blessed with the sign of the cross (Hist. Eccl. l. v. c. 21; Cassiod Hist. Tripart. l. ix. c. 34). Gregory of Tours describes a certain recluse named Eusitius (A.D. 532), in the diocese of Limoges, as so gifted with power to cure those afflicted with quartan fever, that by "giving them water to drink merely blessed (by him), he restored them forthwith to health" (De Glor. Confess. c. 82). Water from a well dug by St. Martin "gave health to many sick," and in particular cured a brother of St. Yriez, who was dying of fever (De Mir. S. Martini, l. ii. c. 39); and many were in like manner said to have been healed by the waters of a spring at Brioude, in Auvergne, in which the head of the martyr Julian (A.D. 304) had been washed (Mirac. l. ii. c. 3; see also c. 25, 26, and the Liber de Passione S. Juliani). The same author relates how a certain bishop "sent water that had been blessed to a house" in which many had died of fever, and how, "when it was sprinkled on the walls, all sickness was forthwith driven away" (Vitae Patrum, c. iv. § 3).

III. The tendency to ascribe virtue to water blessed by the priest, was without doubt greatly promoted by a superstition with regard to baptism, and by the use sometimes made of the water employed at it. St. Augustine, writing in 408, says that some persons in his day brought their children to be baptized not for the sake of any spiritual benefit, but "because they thought that they would by this remedy retain or recover their bodily health" (Ep. xviii. § 5, ad Bonif. Com.). In the last book of the City of God, written about the year 427, the same father tells us of two persons who were at their baptism suddenly and entirely cured of very serious maladies of long continuance (lib. xxii. c. 8, §§ 4, 5). It was but a short step from belief in such miracles to suppose that the water used at a baptism might have virtue available for the benefit of others than those who were baptized in it. It would be often tested, and several alleged results of the trial are on record. At Osset, near Seville, was a font in the form of a cross, which, according to Gregory of Tours, was every year miraculously filled with water for the Easter baptisms. From this font, after it had been duly exorcised and sprinkled with chrism, every one "carried away a vessel full for the safety of his house, and with a view to protect his fields and vineyards by that most wholesome asperion" (Mirac. l. i. c. 24; see also Hist. Franc. l. vi. c. 43). A mother put on the mouth of her daughter, who was dumb from birth, "water which she had sometime taken from the founts blessed" (by St. Martin), and she became capable of speech (De Mirac. S. Mart. l. ii. c. 38).

In the East, even in the time of St. Chrysostom, the water from the baptisms at the Epiphany was carefully kept throughout the year, and believed to remain without putrefaction. "This is the day on which Christ was baptized, and hallowed the element of water. Wherefore at midnight on this feast, all draw of the waters and store them up at home, because on this day the waters were consecrated. And a manifest miracle takes place, in that the nature of those waters is not corrupted by length of time" (De Bapt. Christi, § 2). In the West two centuries or so later we find a similar reservation, practised at Rome at least, but, as might be expected, with a more definite purpose. There, after the consecration of the water on Easter eve, "The whole people, whoever wished, took a blessing (benedictionem; compare the use of ἁγιασμός) in their vessels of the water itself, before the children were baptized in it, to sprinkle about their houses, and vineyards, and fields, and fruits" (Ordo Rom. i. § 42; Musac. Ital. tom. ii. p. 26). It will be observed that the water was now considered holy for this purpose after being blessed, and before any one had been baptized in that font. It was an easy transition from this stage of practice and belief to the benediction of water without any reference to baptism, which should nevertheless have the same power of protecting and benefitting house, field, and person, that was ascribed to water taken from the baptismal font.

IV. The earliest example of an independent benediction of water for the above-mentioned uses occurs in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions, but there can be no doubt of its being one of the corrupt additions made to the original recension probably in the 5th century. "Let the bishop bless water and oil. If he is not present let the presbyter bless it, in the presence of the deacon. But if the bishop be there, let the presbyter and deacon assist. And let him say thus: 'Lord of Sabaoth, God of hosts, creator of the waters and giver of the oil . . . who hast given water for drink and cleansing, and oil to cheer the face . . . Thyself now by Christ sanctify this water and the oil . . . and give it virtue imparting health, expelling diseases, putting to flight devils, scattering every evil design, through Christ,' &c. (lib. viii. c. 29). From Balsamon we learn that holy water was "made" in the Greek church at the beginning of every lunar month. The observance of any festival at the new moon was forbidden by the council of Constantinople, A.D. 691; and he regarded this rite as in some manner a substitute for that relic of heathenism. "Owing to this decree of the canon, the feast of the new moon has ceased from time beyond memory, and instead of it, by the grace of God, propitiatory prayers to God and benedictions (ἁγιασμοί) by the faithful people have place at the beginning of every month, and we are anointed with the waters of blessing, not of strife" (Comm. in Can. lxx.).

In the West the earliest mention of holy water not blessed for baptism, occurs in one of the Forged Decretals, ascribed to Alexander I., A.D. 109, but composed probably about 830. It is certain, however, that these fictitious orders, put forth in the names of early bishops of Rome, did not, except possibly in a very few cases, create the practices which they pretended to regulate. The rite existed before, at least in some locality familiar to the author of the fraud. The following decree, therefore, is witness, we may assume, to a custom already of some standing. "We bless water sprinkled with salt, that all being therewith besprinkled may be sanctified and purified. Which also we command to be done by all priests" (Gratian, p. iii. De Cons. d. iii. c. 20). In the same century Leo IV., A.D. 847, in a charge to his clergy, says, "Every Lord's day before mass bless water wherewith the people may be sprinkled, and for this have a proper vessel" (Conc. Labb. tom. viii. col. 37). The same order occurs in three similar "synodal charges" of about the same period, which have been printed by Baluze (App. ad lib. Reginonu de Eccl. Discipl. pp. 503, 6, 9). In a "visitation article" of the 9th century, it is asked whether the presbyter blesses water, as directed, every Sunday (Ibid. p. 10). Hincmar of Rheims, the contemporary of Leo, after directions similar to his, adds a permission that all who wish may carry some of the water home "in their own clean vessels, and sprinkle it over their dwellings, and fields, and vineyards, over their cattle also, and their provender, and likewise over their own meat and drink" (cap. v. Conc. Labb. tom. viii. col. 570).

We have argued in effect that the prevalence of a custom in the 9th century implies that it was, to say the least, not unknown in the 8th. In the present case we have a direct proof beside. In the Pontifical of Egbert (p. 34; Surtees Society, 1853), who was archbishop of York from 732 to 766, are forms of prayer for exorcising and blessing the water to be used in the consecration of a church. Referring to the Gelasian Sacramentary (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. i. col. 738), we find the same forms to be used over water for the purification of any house, the exorcism only being adapted by Egbert to the occasion. The same benediction occurs in the Gregorian Sacramentary, and an abbreviated form of the same previous exorcism (Ibid. tom. ii. col. 225). As it is almost certain that Egbert borrowed his formulae from a Roman source, we infer that the office for making holy water was in the Roman Sacramentaries a century before the practice was enjoined, as we have seen, by Leo IV. It should be mentioned that the headings of these prayers speak only of water "to be sprinkled in a house," and they were obviously drawn up with reference to that only (Murat. tom. i. col. 738); but as they are followed closely (as in the modern Rituale) by benedictions of new fruits, &c. (Ibid. col. 742; tom. ii. col. 231), and no other express benediction of water is prescribed (except in the Gelasian, for the dispersion of thunder), we may perhaps infer that water once blessed for one purpose was considered available for general use. In all the offices to which reference has been made, the salt which is to be mixed with the water is itself previously exorcised and blessed. [W. E. S.]

HOLY WEEK [EASTER EVE, MAUNDY THURSDAY, GOOD FRIDAY]. The week immediately preceding the great festival of Easter, commencing with Palm Sunday, and including the anniversaries of the institution of the Lord's Supper, the Passion, and Resurrection of Christ was observed with peculiar solemnity from the early ages of the church (Chrysost. Hom. xxx. in Genes.; Hom. in Ps. clxv.). It was designated by various names—ἑβδομάς μεγάλη, ἁγία, or τῶν ἁγίων; Hebdomas major, sancta, the former being the earlier title in the Western church (Missal. Ambros. apud Pamel. p. 339) authentica (ibid.) ultima (i. e. of Lent) (Ambros. Epist. 33). From the restriction as to food then enjoined it was called ἑβδ. ξηροφάγιας (Epiph. Haer. lxx. 12) Hebdomas Xerophagiae: as commemorating our Lord's sufferings, ἑβδ. τῶν ἁγίων πάθων; ἡμέραι παθημάτων, σταυρώσιμαι; Hebd. poenosa, luctuosa, nigra, lamentationum: from the cessation of business, ἑβδ. ἀπρακτος, Hebd. muta: and as ushering in the Paschal absolution. Hebdomas Indulgentiae.

The observance of Holy Week belongs to very early, if not to primitive, antiquity. As the historian Socrates has justly remarked (H. E. v. 22), no commemorative seasons were appointed by the apostles, or found any place in the ritual of the apostolic church. But as Easter naturally succeeded to the commemoration of the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt, so the anniversary of the passion took the place of that of the slaying of the paschal lamb, while the sanctity of these holy days was gradually extended to the whole week preceding Easter, which therefore assumed a special character in the Christian year. The observance of Holy Week is accordingly closely connected with that of Easter, and is probably but little later in its origin. The earliest notice of Holy Week, which speaks of it as universally accepted, is in the Apostolical Constitutions, which represent the Eastern custom towards the end of the 3rd century. About the same time, c. 260, Dionysius of Alexandria also mentions it as of universal observance. If we may accept as genuine the ordinance of Constantine the Great given by Scaliger (de Emendat. Temp. p. 776) and Beveridge (Pandect. ii. 163) the sanctity of this week as well as of the succeeding one was consulted by enforced abstinence from public business at the beginning of the fourth century. The whole week was, as far as possible, kept as a strict fast, from midnight on Palm Sunday till cockcrow on Easter Day.

By the Apostolical Constitutions (v. 18, 19), abstinence from wine and flesh was commanded, and the diet restricted to bread, and salt, and vegetables, with water as a beverage. Total abstinence was enjoined on Friday and Saturday, or at least on Saturday "when the bridegroom shall have been taken from them," while on the other days of the week no food was to be eaten till 3 p.m. or the evening, according to ability. The fast was observed in this manner in the time of Dionysius of Alexandria (c. A.D. 260), who in his canonical epistle speaks of some who fasted through the whole six days (ἡμέρας πάσας ὑπερτιθέασιν ἄσιτοι διατελοῦντες), others, two, three, or four days, according to power of physical endurance; while some kept no fast at all, and others faring delicately during the first four days sought to make up for their self-indulgence by excessive strictness on Friday and Saturday (Dionys. Alex. Ep. Canon., Routh. Reliq. Sacr. iii. 229). Epiphanius describes the practice in his days almost in the same words (ὑπερτιθέμενοι διατέλουν); some, he adds, ate every two days, others every evening (Epiph. Haeres. xxix. 5; Expos. Fid. 22). Tertullian speaks of the continuous fasts of this week in the phrases jejunia conjungere, Sabbatum continuare jejuniis Parasceves. (Tertull. de Patient. 13; de Jejun. 14.) Epiphanius in another place describes the bodily mortifications practised this week, such as sleeping on the ground, strict continence, watchings, xerophagy, &c., and charges the Arians with passing the time in jollity and merriment (Epiph. Haeres. lxxv. 3). Sozomen (H. E. i. 11) relates an anecdote of Spyridon, bishop of Trimythus in Cyprus, illustrating the habit of continuous fasting, ἐπισυνάπτειν τὴν νηστείαν, at this season. All work was as far as possible laid aside, and business, private and public, suspended during the week. From the time of Theodosius (A.D. 389) actions at law ceased, and the doors of the courts were closed for seven days before and after Easter (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. viii.; De Fer. leg. ii. [see Gothofred's Commentary, vol. i. p. 124]; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. xii.; de Fer. legg. vii. viii.; August. Serm. xix.; Ed. Bened. vol. i. p. 741). Those in prison for debt and other offences, with the exception of those guilty of more heinous crimes, were ordered to be released by a law of Valentinian's, A.D. 367, the earliest of the kind, according to Gothofred Comment. vol. ii. p. 273 (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. xxxviii.; de Indulg. Crim. legg. iii. iv.; Ambros. Epist. 33; Chrysost. u. s.). Slaves were manumitted, and there was a general cessation from labour during this and the following week, not only to afford the servants rest but also opportunity of instruction in the elements of the faith (Apost. Constit. viii. 33; Greg. Nyssen. Hom. III. de Resurr. tom. iii. p. 420; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. xii.; de Fer. leg. viii.). The week was also distinguished by liberal almsgiving (Chrysost. u. s.).

The observance of the week may be said to have commenced with the preceding Saturday, when, with reference to John xii. 1-9, the church commemorated the raising of Lazarus—an event assigned erroneously by Epiphanius to that day (Epiphanius. Honil. eis ta Baia tom. ii. pp. 152, 153; Neale Eastern Ch. ii. 747). The Gallican liturgies commemorated this miracle the next day (Palm Sunday), known therefore as Dominica Lazari, as appears from the collects of the Missale Gallicum Vetus, and the Sacram. Gallicanum (Muratori ii. 718, 834). On the Saturday the pope was accustomed to give special alms at St. Peter's, in allusion to Christ's words spoken that day (Mar. xiv. 7). (Comes Hieronymi apud Pamel. ii. 21; Sacram. Gregor. ib. 244.)

The Sunday next before Easter, the first day of Holy Week, was distinguished by many different names. The earliest and most constant, indicating the great event of the day, being Palm Sunday; κυριακή, ἑορτή τῶν Βαλῶν; ἡ βασιφόρος ἑορτή; Dominica Palmarum, or in Palmis, Florum, or Ramorum, or Osanna. A later appellation derived from the same event was Pascha florum, or floridum. From the Easter absolution which followed it was known as Dominica indulgentiæ; and with reference to the great Paschal baptism, Pascha pettum, or competentium (Ordo Romanus), while the mass was styled Missa in Symboli traditione, because on this day, or according to the Ambrosian rite the day before (Miss. Ambros. apud Pamel. i. 336) the creed was recited to the competentes, or candidates for baptism, to be learnt by Easter eve, as was ordained by the 13th canon of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1385; cf. Isid. de Eccl. Off. i. 27. ii. 21). The works of Augustine and other fathers contain sermons delivered on this and the following days to the competentes in exposition of the creed (Aug. Serm. de Temp. 113-135). Palm Sunday was also called capitulavium because on that day the heads of the catechumens were washed in preparation for baptism and confirmation (Raban. De Inst. Cler. c. 35).

The ceremony of the benediction of the palm branches, or other branches that were substituted for them, especially olive boughs, appears in the Sacramentary of Gregory, where it has a special collect (Pamel. ii. 245). The jubilant processions which have long formed so characteristic a part of the ritual of Palm Sunday in the East as in the West, are mentioned by Gregory Nyssen (l. c.) and were introduced almost universally by the end of the 7th century (Augusti Habch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 338).

Each day in this Holy Week was of special sanctity, designated μεγάλη δευτέρα, μεγάλη τριτη, &c. (Bevereg. Pandect. ii. 163), the observances gradually rising in solemnity to the Thursday in Coena Domini [MAUNDY THURSDAY], and the Friday, Passio Domini [GOOD FRIDAY]. The history of our Lord's Passion was recited on successive days, beginning with that by St. Matthew on Palm Sunday, and closing with that by St. John on Good Friday. [E. V.]

HOMICIDE (Homicidium, φόνος). Murder was regarded by the church as one of the gravest crimes. It is joined by Cyprian (de Pat. c. 9) with adultery and fraud, by Pacian (Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 9) with fornication and idolatry, by Augustine (de Fid. et Op. c. 19) also with fornication and idolatry, as one of the three mortal sins which were always to be visited with excommunication. By the laws of the Christian emperors murderers were expressly excepted from the general pardons granted to criminals on occasions of great festivals (Cod. Theod. IX. xxxviii. 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8), and were refused the right of appeal (ibid. XI. xxxvi. 1). In some dioceses the peace of the church was denied for ever to wilful murderers (Tert. de Pudicit. c. 12, Gregor. Thaumat. Can. Ep. c. 7, Comp. Cyprian Ep. 55 ad Anton. on the practice of some of his predecessors with reference to the other great crime of adultery). But in general a murderer was re-admitted to the church after a long term of exclusion. By a decree of the council of Ancyra A.D. 314, c. 22, this term was lifelong; by Gregory of Nyssa (Ep. ad Letoi.) it was fixed at twenty-seven years; by Basil (ad Amphil. c. 56) at twenty. In the Penitential of Theodore (l. iv. 1), a murder committed to revenge a relation, was punished by seven or ten years' penance; but if restitution was made to the next of kin, half the term was remitted. If one layman slew another (ibid. c. 4), he must either relinquish arms or do penance seven years, three of them without wine and flesh; but (ibid. c. 5) if a monk or one of the inferior clergy was slain, the slayer must either relinquish arms and serve God the remainder of his life, or do penance seven years, as the bishop should direct; if a presbyter or bishop was the victim, the matter was to be brought before the king (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 1-8, Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10, 11). In the Dialogue of Egbert (Haddan and Stubbs Councils and Eccl. Doc. iii. 403), there is some variety in the penalty; a layman who slew a bishop was to pay the fine and submit to the term of penance a council should appoint, if he slew a priest the fine was to be eighty shekels; if a deacon, sixty; if a monk, forty. The ecclesiastical law in these instances being in accordance with the well-known system of early English jurisprudence, which allowed homicide and every variety of personal injury to be expiated by money payments. See the laws of Ethelbert, between A.D. 597, and 604, on the payments to be made for murders (cc. 5-7, 13), and for injuries to the person (cc. 33-72). The laws of Ine of Wessex A.D. 690 (c. 76), contain the provision that if a man slew another's godson or godfather, he must pay "bot" (fine to justice), as well as "wer" (recompence to kindred); and that if the slain was a bishop's son (i.e. confirmation son), only half the payment was to be exacted. For a full account of the laws on injuries to the person, see Turner Anglo-Saxons, vol. ii. pp. 436-447, ed. 1852.

Murder joined with other great crimes was more severely punished. One who used magical arts to slay another, thereby adding idolatry to murder, was denied communion even at the last (Conc. Eliber. c. 6). The same sentence was decreed against a woman who added murder to adultery by slaying the offspring which she had conceived in the absence of her husband (ibid. c. 63), and the council of Lerida A.D. 523, more than two centuries after that of Eliberis, when the terms of penance had become much easier, assigned (c. 2) a lifelong exclusion to any who used sorcery to get rid of the offspring of adultery. In an English Penitential code (Theodor. Poenitent. I. vii. 1) the punishment of homicide combined with adultery, was seclusion in a monastery for life. The parricide or the slayer of any near blood relation was, by the civil law (Cod. Theod. IX. xv. 1), in imitation of the old Roman custom, to be sewn in a sack with serpents and thrown into the water; and if this were generally executed there would be no opportunity for the early church to attach any special stigma to the crime. In England a woman who slew her son, was to do penance fifteen years, with no relaxation except on the Lord's day (Theodor. Poenitent. I. xiv. 25). The parricide or fratricide was assigned by some seven years, by others fourteen, of which half were to be passed in exile (Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10).

The modern distinction between murder and manslaughter was not invariably observed. In the council of Ancyra A.D. 314 (cc. 22-23) a shorter term is imposed upon involuntary than upon wilful homicide. But in the canonical epistle of Gregory of Nyssa involuntary homicide is explained to mean that which occurs through simple accident; but homicide which is the result of passion, is treated as if it were wilful murder, even if deliberation and intention, which constitute the legal crime of murder, are absent. The distinction however appears in the Penitential of Theodore, where it is decreed (I. iv. 7) that if a man kills another by accident, he shall do penance one year; if in a passion, three years; if over the wine cup, four years; if in strife, ten. Homicide committed at the command of a master or in war was to be subject (ibid. I. iv. 6) to forty days' penance. The chastisement of a slave with such severity that he died, which was a crime on the borderland of manslaughter and murder, was not dealt with so severely as wilful homicide (Conc. Eliber. c. 5, Conc. Epaoon. c. 34).

Causing abortion in any stage of conception, or taking or even administering drugs for that purpose, was treated as a form of murder, and a long period of penance was allotted to it (Tert. Apolog. c. 9; Basil ad Amphiloc. cc. 2, 8; Conc. Ancyra. c. 21; Conc. Ilerd. c. 2; Conc. in Trull. c. 91). But that there was some laxity of opinion on the crime, appears from one of the English Penitentials (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 12), which excludes from communion for a longer term a woman who procured abortion in order to conceal her shame, than one who did so because she was too poor to maintain her child. Closely allied to this crime was the EXPOSING OF INFANTS. [See that head.]

Anger and strife as tending to murder (Matt. v. 22) were brought under discipline. In the African church (Stat. Eccl. Anty. c. 93, ed. Bruns) the oblations of those who were at enmity with their brethren were received neither at the altar nor in the common treasury, and they were consequently excluded from communion. A similar decree prevailed in the Gallic church (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 50), those who broke out into open strife were to be removed from all church assemblies till they were reconciled. The discipline of the English church was more in accordance with the practice of the Anglo-Saxon law. He who wounded another in strife was to pay him a recompence, and help to support him till he had recovered, and do half a year's penance; if he was unable to support him, the penance was to extend to a whole year (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 9). [G. M.]

HOMILY AND HOMILIARIUM.

The word ὁμιλία designates generally "intercourse," implying the interchange of thought and feeling by words. In a special sense, it is used for the instruction which a philosopher gave his pupils in familiar conversation (Xenophon, Mem. I. ii. 6 and 15). In this sense of "familiar instruction" it passed into Christian usage. Thus St. Luke uses the word ὁμιλίας of the same address which he had previously described by the word διαλεγόμενος (Acts xx. 9, 11). Compare Euseb. H.E. vi. 19, § 17. Photius (Biblioth. no. 174, 4, in Suicer's Thes. s. v.) notices that the discourses of Chrysostom were properly called ὁμιλίας, rather than λόγοι, as being simple, inartificial, popular addresses, in a style rather conversational than formal, while a λόγος was constructed according to the rules of art, and with a certain dignity and elevation or style. Similarly the French Conférence. The council of Ancyra (c. 1) A.D. 314, forbidding presbyters who have sacrificed to idols προσφέρειν ἢ ὁμιλεῖν ἢ ὅλως λειτουργεῖν seems to use the word ὁμιλεῖν as the common technical expression for the address of the presbyter in the liturgy.

Probably the earliest extant addresses commonly called Homilies are those of Origen, who (if he himself applied the term to his discourses) no doubt took it from the schools of philosophy.

The word seemingly did not pass into common use in Latin before the fifth century; for Victor Vitensis (Persec. Vandal. i. 3, p. 10, Ruinart), writing towards the end of that century, speaks of Augustine's popular addresses, "quos Graeci homilias vocant," as if "homilia" were still to some extent strange to his Latin readers.

Augustine had himself made a similar explanation of the word (On Ps. 118 [119], Pref.; Epist. 2, ad Quodvultdeum). And he also supplies abundant evidence that these homilies were intentionally careless and colloquial in style. So long as all are instructed (he says), let us not fear the critics (Serm. 37, c. 10, p. 187); let not word-catchers ask whether it is Latin, but Christians whether it is true (Serm. 299, p. 1213); it is better that the preacher should be barbarous, and his hearers understand, than the preacher scholarly and the people lacking (On Ps. 36, Serm. 3, p. 285); it is better that critics should blame, than that the people should miss the meaning (On Ps. 138, p. 1545).

See further on preaching, and its place in the liturgy, under SERMON.

At a comparatively early period we find that the custom arose of delivering the sermons of others in churches where the priest was, for some reason, unable to preach. Mr. Scudamore (p. 290) gives the following instances:—

Augustine (De Doct. Chr. iv. 62) thinks it well that those who have a good delivery, but no power of composition, should adopt the sermons of others. Isidore of Pelusium (A.D. 412) wrote a homily to be delivered by his friend Dorotheus, which was declaimed with much applause (Epist. iii. 382). Cyril of Alexandria is said by Gennadius (De Vir. Illust. c. 57 in Fabricii Biblioth. Eccl. p. 27) to have composed many homilies, which (he adds) are committed to memory by the Greek bishops for delivery. The same author relates (u. s. c. 67, p. 31) that Salvian of Marseilles made many homilies for bishops. Some of the Dictiones Suaræ of Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (A.D. 511) are manifestly written to be preached by some other than the writer, and two of them bear the titles: "Sent to Honoratus, bishop of Novara, at the dedication of the basilica of the Apostles," and "Given to Stephanus . . . to be pronounced by Maximus the bishop." The second council of Vaison, A.D. 529, licenses all presbyters to preach in their districts, and provides (c. 2) that, in case the presbyter, from sickness, is unable to preach, homilies of the Holy Fathers should be recited by the deacons [DEACON, p. 529]. Caesarius of Arles († 542) is said (Life by Cyprian, c. 31; in Acta SS. Ben. i. 645) to have composed homilies, which the bishops in the Frank territory, the Gauls, Italy, or Spain, to whom he sent them, might cause to be preached in their churches. To read the sermons of others seems indeed to have been a recognised practice in the Gallican church. Thus Germanus of Paris (Expositio Brevis, in Migne's Patrol. lxxii. 91) says, that the homilies of the saints which are read after the Gospel, are to be taken merely as preaching, that the pastor or doctor of the church may explain in popular language to the people what has been delivered in the Prophecy, Epistle, or Gospel.

This constant habit of using the sermons of others led in process of time to the formation of collections of homilies, of which those who were unable or unwilling to compose sermons might avail themselves. Bede's Homiliae de Tempore are said to have been much used in this way. This collection contains 33 homilies for the summer half of the year, 15 for the winter; 22 for Lent; 32 for the Saints' Days of the summer half, 16 for those of the winter half; and various Sermones ad Populum. Probably several other collections were in circulation before the end of the eighth century. See Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. iii. pt. 1, p. 556 ff. But in the time of Charles the Great all the homiliaries in common use in the Frankish kingdom were found to labour under great defects; the homilies which they contained were in many cases written by men of no authority, and they were full of errors both of style and matter. The king, therefore, commissioned Paul Warnefrid, the well-known historian of the Lombards, to draw up a collection of homilies from the Fathers which should be free from these faults. This task he accomplished before the end of the eighth century, probably not later than A.D. 780; for Charles, in the recommendation prefixed to the book, does not style himself Imperator. In this preface (Mabillon's Analect. Vet. p. 75, ed. 1723) the king states that in gratitude to God for the protection which He had given him in war and peace, he had set himself to promote the welfare of the church and the advancement of knowledge; he refers to the efforts which he had made to secure a correct text of the Scriptures [CANONICAL BOOKS], and then proceeds to recommend the homiliary for adoption in the Gallican churches, which his father Pepin had already furnished with chants after the Roman model (Romanae traditionis cantibus). In this collection* the discourses are arranged according to the series of Sundays and Festivals; that form of the Vulgate text is adopted in quotations from Scripture which had been in common use since the days of Gregory the Great.

In the year 813 the council of Rheims (c. 15) enjoined the bishops to preach sermons of the Holy Fathers in the dialect of their several dioceses, so that all might understand, and in the same year the third council of Tours (c. 17) ordered that every bishop should have homilies prepared containing needful admonitions for the use of those under them, and that each should endeavour to translate the said homilies clearly into the rustic-Roman or the Teutonic tongue, so that all might more easily understand the things spoken. To the same effect the council of Mayence (c. 2), in the year 847.

The collection of Aelfric (generally supposed to be the archbishop of York, 1023-1051) does not fall within our period; but it was probably the successor of various other collections of English homilies, some of which may have existed before the time of Charles.

John Belet (A.D. 1162) calls the Book of Homilies (Div. Off. Expl. c. 60) the Homeliarius, and mentions a Sermologus separately among the books which a church ought to have.

* It was commonly attributed in the Middle Ages to Alcuin, and bears in the Cologne edition of 1530 the following title: "Homiliae seu mavis sermones sive conciones ad populum praeantissimorum ecclesiae doctorum Hieronymi Augustini Ambrosii Gregorii Origenis Chrysostomi Bedae etc. in hunc ordinem digestae per Alcuinum levitam idque Injuncte ei Carolo Mag. Rom. Imp. cui a secretis fuit." Possibly the mistake arose from the fact that Alcuin revised the so-called Comes Hieronymi [LECTIONARY]; or he may have revised the work of Warnefrid. See on this point Mabillon (Ann. O. S. Ben. ii. 328) and Rivet (Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 337). The Editio Princeps is that of Speyer, 1482. The author of the ancient Life of Alcuin (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. Saec. iv. pt. 1, p. 158) says that Alcuin collected two volumes of Homilies from the works of the Fathers. If he did—which is scarcely probable when Warnefrid's collection had just been authorised—the work is lost.

Durandus uses (Rationale, vi. i. §§ 28, 32) the form Homiliarius [i.e. Liber] as well as Homeliarius.

(Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. 3.340 ff.; Wetzer and Welte's Kirchenlexicon, v. 307; Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, 290 ff.; Ranke in Studien und Kritiken, 1855, ii. p. 387 ff.) [C.]

HONEY AND MILK. 1. The giving of honey and milk to a person newly baptised, as a symbol of the nourishment of the renewed soul, has already been mentioned [BAPTISM, § 66, p. 164].

2. Among the things enumerated by the Apostolical Canons (c. 3), which the bishop is forbidden to bring to the altar [or sanctuary], are honey and milk. The 24th canon of the third council of Carthage also excludes honey and milk from the offerings on the altar, in that it forbids anything to be placed upon it but bread and wine mixed with water. But the 27th of the African canons, repeating this, adds: "Primitiæ vero, seu mel et lac quod uno die solemnissimo in infantum mysterio solet offerri, quamvis in altari offerantur, suam tamen habeant propriam benedictionem, ut a sacramento Domini Corporis et sanguinis distinguantur; nec amplius in primitiis offeratur quam de uvis et frumentis." It is evident from this, that at the time when these canons were drawn up, the custom had arisen of placing on the altar the honey and milk for the neophytes at Easter, and (apparently) of consecrating them with the bread and wine. It is this latter practice which is here forbidden; the honey and milk are to have a benediction of their own, but not that given to the eucharistic elements. At the end of the seventh century the placing of honey and milk on the altar was wholly forbidden (Conc. in Trullo, c. 57; cf. c. 28).

(Bingham, Ant. XV. ii. 3; Van Espen, Jus Eccl. iii. 329, 414; ed. Colon. 1777.) [C.]

HONOR. 1. The word is used specially of ecclesiastical dignities or orders. Thus Optatus of Milevis (c. Donat. ii. 24) says, speaking of the attempts of the Donatists to annul the orders of Catholic priests, "quid prodest quod vivi sunt homines et occisi sunt honores a vobis?" So Augustine, Adv. Epist. Parmen. ii. 11; and Conc. Arelat. IV. cc. 1 and 2. In Charles the Great's Capitularies (v. 8), "honorabilis persona" is used apparently to distinguish one in major orders from "ecclesiastici viri" who were only in minor orders (Ducange, s. v.).

2. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572, lays down (c. 2) that no bishop making a visitation of his diocese should take anything from the churches besides the customary honorarium to the see (praeter honorem cathedrae suae) of two solidi. We may perhaps discern here the germ of the later use, according to which "honor" means a benefice. [C.]

HONORATUS. (1) Bishop of Arles (†429 A.D.); commemorated Jan. 16 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

HOOD (κουκούλλον, κουκούλιον, κούκουλλα, καπούτζιον, ἄνω καμαλαύχη; capitulum, caputium, cucullus, cuculla, cucullio, capa, cappa). Garments intended for outdoor wear were very frequently provided with a hood as a protection for the head against rain or cold, which might be drawn forward when need required, or might be allowed to fall back upon the shoulders. This would of course be ordinarily, but not necessarily, attached to the dress. The lacerna, for example, was generally furnished with a hood or cowl (see e.g. Martial xiv. 132, 139; and cf. Juvenal vi. 117, 330; viii. 145); so also was the caracalla, which was introduced into Rome from Gaul, and from which the emperor Aurelius Antoninus derives the name by which he is ordinarily known. Jerome refers to it by way of illustration in his description of the ephod of the Jewish high-priest, "in modum caracallarum, sed absque cucullis" (Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, § 15; vol. i. 364, ed. Vallarsi), where the last words imply what was the ordinary fashion of it. A hood was also the appendage of the casula, which Isidore (de Origin. xix. 24) describes as vestis cucullata; of the colobion (see e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis, Gemma Animæ, i. 211; Patrol. clxxii. 607), and of the cope (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iii. 1. 13, who speaking of the symbolism associated with the pluviale, or cappa, adds "habet etiam caputium, quod est supernum gaudium"). As regards the last of these, we may take this opportunity of remarking that Isidore (de Origin. xix. 31) uses the word cappa distinctly in the sense of hood, "cappa . . . quia capitis ornamentum est." As an example of this more restricted meaning of the word, we may cite a remark in a letter of Paulus Diaconus, in the name of abbot Theodemar, to Charlemagne as to the dress of the monks of Monte Cassino, "illud autem vestimentum, quod a Gallicanis monachis cuculla dicitur, et nos capam vocamus . . ." (Pauli Diac. Epist. i.; Patrol. lxxv. 1587). He had just before remarked that the word cuculla with them meant the same dress "quam alio nomine casulam vocamus." A later instance is found in the records of a council of Metz (A.D. 888), which enjoins the use of the capa (in the sense of hood) to monks and forbids it to laymen (can. 6, Labb. ix. 414). An earlier council, that of Aix-la-Chapelle (A.D. 816), had restricted the use of the cuculla to monks, excluding other ecclesiastics (can. 125, Labb. viii. 1395). It may be added here that the congress of Gallican abbots and monks, held at the same place in the following year, carefully fixed the size of the cowl, "mensura cucullae duobus consistat cubitis" (cap. 21; op. cit. 1508). With reference to the foregoing prohibitions, it may be mentioned that the Theodosian code had expressly permitted to slaves, with certain exceptions, the use of the byrrrus and cucullus (Cod. Theodos. lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 1).

The most prominent instance of the use of the hood is to be found in that of the monastic cowl, which is frequently referred to in various Rules, and which formed a special part of the monkish dress at least as early as the time of Jerome. The hermit Hilarion was, according to this father, buried "in tunica cilicina et cucullâ" (Vita S. Hilar. c. 44, 46; vol. ii. 39, 40, ed. Vallarsi). We meet with several allusions to the cuculla in Jerome's translation of the Rule of the Egyptian Pachomius (see e.g. cc. 81, 91, 99, op. cit. 67, sqq.). Thus the monks in this system were to have two cowls, which were to bear tokens indicative of the particular monastery, and without his cowl and "pellicula" no monk was to appear at divine service or at meals. The Rule of St. Benedict allowed to each monk, in the case of dwellers in temperate climates, a frock and hood (cuculla), the latter to be "in hyeme villosa, in aestate pura aut vetusta" (Reg. S. Bened. c. 55; in Holstenius, Codex Regulorum, pt. ii. p. 32; ed. Paris, 1663). The same distinction between hoods for summer and winter wear is also found in the Rule of St. Fructuosus (c. 4; op. cit. p. 139), which allows a couple to each monk, "villata et simplex." The Regula Magistri lays down a wholesome provision as to the hoods and frocks of the monks who discharged the weekly office of cook (c. 81; op. cit. p. 257). The word cuculla passed from Latin into Greek, where it appears as κουκούλλιον, etc. Thus, for example, it is mentioned in connection with the monastic dress by Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. iii. 14, where he remarks on the Egyptian monks), Pseudo-Athanasius (de Virginitate, c. 11; vol. ii. 116, ed. Montfaucon), and by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (ob. 740, A.D.), who also appears to allude to the cross on the cowl, still worn by bishops and σταυρόφοροι in the Greek church (Historia Ecclesiastica et Mystica Con templatio; Patrol. Gr. xviii. 396). The name ἑνω καμηλαύχιον (variously spelled) is given to the hood which covers the under headdress (κάτω καμηλαύχιον) worn by a Greek patriarch who has been a member of a monastic order (see Ducange's Glossarium Graec. s.v. καμελαύκιον). An illustration of this may be seen in Goar's Euchologion (p. 156; cf. also p. 518), where the patriarch Bekkos is thus figured. This name, however, belongs to a date subsequent to our period.

We may briefly refer in passing to the hood worn after baptism, which is spoken of in connection with the white baptismal robe, but as distinct from it (see e.g. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans [ob. 821 A.D.], de Ordine Baptismi, c. 16; Patrol. cv. 234; Jesse Ambianensis [ob. 836 A.D.], Epist. de Baptismo, ib. 790; Rabanus Maurus, de Inst. Cler. i. 29; Patrol. cvii. 313). We may perhaps further refer to an epistle of Gregory the Great, who blames one Peter, a Jew, for having on the day after his baptism entered a synagogue and placed there, among other things, "birrum album, quo de fonte resurgens indutus fuerat" (Epist. lib. ix. ep. 6; vol. iii. 930, ed. Bened.). For further remarks on this species of hood, reference may be made to Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, i. 54, ed. Venice, 1783; Ducange's Glossarium Graec. s.v. κουκούλλα; Goar's Euchologion, p. 366. [R. S.]

HOPE. [SOPHIA.]

HOROLOGIIUM (ὡρολόγιον). An office book of the Greek church, containing the daily hours of prayer, and certain other forms, and which therefore corresponds in a general manner, though with important differences, to the Latin breviary.

The contents of the Great Horologium (ὡρολόγιον τὸ μέγα) which is the fullest form, as described in the edition published at Venice 1856, and approved by the oecumenical patriarch, are arranged in three generic parts (τρία γενικά μέρη) as follows:

1. The office for the day and night hours of the church from matins to compline (ἀπὸ τοῦ μεσονυκτικοῦ ἕως τοῦ ἀποδείπνου).

This part therefore corresponds in the main to the "Psalterium cum Ordinario Officii de Tempore" of the Latin breviary.

2. The variable antiphons and hymns, by whatever name they are distinguished, taken from the Menology (which answers to the Roman Martyrology) and from the other office books which contain the variable portions of the office; and whatever is sung in it on Sundays, festivals, and ordinary days.

This part therefore corresponds in some measure to the "Proprium de Tempore" of the Latin breviary.

3. Various short offices (ἀκολουθίαι), prayers, and canons; independent of the hours; and for occasional use. Into the details of these it is unnecessary to enter; and would be impossible without considerable explanation.

This part therefore may be compared to the collection of short offices and forms of prayer which are found at the end of the Latin breviary; though the offices contained in it are for the most part different from and more numerous than those in the breviary.

The Horologion is often prefaced by the calendar of the Menology, which begins with September; sometimes (as in a copy I possess, printed at Venice 1523) by "the gospel" according to St. John: i.e. the introduction, and four last chapters; and sometimes (as in another copy in my possession, printed at Venice 1775 "con Licenza de' Superiori"), by the Athanasian creed in Greek, of course without the words which imply the double procession. HORRES, martyr at Nicaea with Arabia, Marcus, Nimpodora, Theodora, Theusetas; commemorated March 13 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HORSE. The horse is represented attending on the Orpheus shepherd [Fresco, p. 696]. As a servant or companion of mankind, he occurs frequently in representations of the Magi (Bottari, tav. cxxiii. &c.). Two horses act as cross-bearers (tav. iii.); and horses of course occur in the numerous representations of the translation of Elijah which are found on sarcophagi and elsewhere. The horses of Egypt are commemorated in representations of Pharaoh and the Red Sea (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 331), where a mounted horseman accompanies the chariots. In Bottari (tav. clx.) there are two quadrigae, with horses decorated with palm-branches or plumes. Martigny states in this connexion that the horse symbol has been very frequently found in the graves of martyrs, quoting the titulus of the youth Florens (Lupi, Dissert. elett. i. p. 258), and the horses loose and grazing in the tribune of the cemetery of Basilla (Bianchini Not. ad Anast. Prolegomena, t. iii.). [R. St. J. T.]

HORSE-RACING. [CHARIOTEERS.]

HORTULANUS, the gardener of the monastery. The rule of Benedict provided certain deputies (solatia) to assist the cellarer (cellerarius) in the larger monasteries. These were, usually, a farm bailiff (granatarius), a butler

(custos panis et vini), an^a gardener (hortulanus) (Reg. Bened. c. 31; cf. Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxxi. 17). [I. G. S.]

HOSANNA (or Osanna). This word, adopted from the salutation of the populace at Christ's entry into Jerusalem, occurs in the Mass at the end of the Sanctus, which ends thus: "Hosanna in excelsis. Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini. Hosanna in excelsis." The same words are found in the Greek form of the Sanctus, called ἐνίκλιος ὕμνος; as given in the liturgies of SS. Basil, Chrysostom, &c.

The word also frequently occurs in the antiphons and other parts of the service for Palm Sunday as given in the Latin Processionals, as for instance in the hymn at the Procession:

"Israel es tu Rex, Davidis et inclyta proles, Nominis qui in Domini, Rex benedictie, venis:
Gloria laus et honor tibi sit, Rex Christe Redemptor, Cui puerile decus prompsit Osanna pium."

HOSEA, the prophet; commemorated Jakabit 27 = Feb. 21 (Cal. Ethiop.). [W. F. G.]

HOSPITALARIUS. [HOSPITIUM.]

HOSPITALITY. Hospitality, or a friendly reception and entertainment of strangers, was a Christian virtue strongly inculcated in the New Testament, and practised most liberally by the early Christians, until long after the apostolic times.

The feeling of Christian union and sympathy was so strong, that every Christian was ready to receive another as a friend and brother, although previously unknown: a circumstance which excited the astonishment, and even the hatred and misrepresentations of pagan opponents (Tertul. Apol. 39; Lucian, de mort. perig. 13). And one of the means by which Julian hoped to restore the old Roman paganism was an imitation of this Christian liberality. In a letter of his, addressed to Arsaces a chief priest of Galatia, the emperor urges him to take great care of strangers, and to establish houses for their reception (ἡμεροδοχεῖα) [HOSPITALS] in every city, after the example of the Christians (Sozomen, v. 16).

All Christian families in the earlier times considered it their duty to exercise this hospitality, and Tertullian mentions it as one great objection to a Christian woman marrying a pagan, that she would not be able to entertain any Christian strangers in her house (Tertul. ad Ux. ii. 4).

But presbyters, and afterwards bishops, were specially expected to excel in this virtue. Thus Jerome extols the liberal hospitality of the young presbyter Nepotian (Epit. Nepotiani c. 10). And Chrysostom mentions it as a high praise of Flavian, bishop of Antioch, that his house was always open to strangers and travellers, where they received so kind and generous an entertainment, that it might be doubted whether it ought not to have been called the travellers' home, instead of his (Chrys. in Genes. i. 4).

Monasteries also were distinguished by their ready hospitality to Christians coming from distant parts [HOSPITIUM]. Palladius (Historia Lausica, c. 6) describes the hospital or guest-house (ἡμεροδοχεῖον) which adjoined the church of the Nitrian monks, in which pilgrims might stay, if they chose, two or three years; the first week a guest was not required to work; if he stayed longer, he must work in the garden, the bake-house, or the kitchen; or if he was a person of too much consideration for menial labour, the monks would give him a book to read. In our monastery, says Jerome, hospitality is our delight. We receive with a joyful welcome all who come to us, with the exception of heretics (Jer. adv. Ruff. iii.). In the Rule of Benedict of Aniane, drawn up at the end of the eighth century, particular directions are given for the reception and entertainment of the poor and of strangers. They were first to join in prayer with the monks; they then received the kiss of peace; water was brought for their hands and feet; and in their subsequent entertainment the strict monastic rules of fasting were to be relaxed in honour of the guests. There was a distinct kitchen for the strangers' use, with officers to superintend it, so that the regular order of the monastery might not be disturbed (Concor. Reg. S. Benedict. § 60, de hospitibus suscipiendis). This relaxation of strict ascetic rules on occasion of hospitality to strangers is also mentioned with approbation by Cassian (Collat. i. 26, and xxi. 14, &c.). The council of Aix in 816 (ii. c. 28), desired a place to be prepared at the gate of a monastery where all comers might be received.

The openhanded hospitality of Christians naturally led sometimes to the practice of deceit and imposture on the part of applicants; and to guard against the admission of pretenders, or otherwise unworthy and dangerous persons, it became customary for letters of recommendation [COMMENDATORY LETTERS] to be required. Christians going into a foreign country, or to any place where they were not known, commonly took with them such letters from their bishop, or some other well-known Christian; which letters were, if necessary, to be examined, on their presentation, by the deacons of the place (Constit. Apostol. ii. 58).

In the earlier times Christians received strangers into their own homes; but at a later period, when such hospitality became inconvenient, and hardly sufficient for what was needed, houses were specially built or prepared for the reception of strangers (ἡμεροδοχεῖα). These were established in places where travellers were most likely to resort, or where Christian strangers were commonly most numerous, such as along the lines of travel taken by pilgrims, when the practice of making pilgrimages to holy places had become usual.

At these houses Christian travellers were entertained according to their need, and were sent forward on their way in peace.

A singular remnant of this ancient hospitality still remains at St. Cross near Winchester, where any one who applies at the porter's lodge receives gratuitously a glass of beer and a slice of bread. [G. A. J.]

HOSPITALS. 1. General account of Hospitals.—The remarkable outflowing of benevolence and sympathy with others, which marked the very commencement of Christianity, led immediately to a care for the poor, especially in times of sickness and distress.

From the earliest times the funds of the church were applied to the maintenance of widows and orphans, sick and poor, prisoners and sojourners (Justin Martyr, Apol. I. c. 67). It was the special duty of the deacons and deaconesses to attend to the sick at their own houses (Constit. Apost. iii. 19, and Epiphanius, Fidei Expos. 21). But all Christians, particularly the women who had the most leisure for this purpose, considered it incumbent on them to visit and relieve the sick poor (Epist. ad Zen. et Seren. c. 17, in Justin Martyr's Works, p. 416; Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii. 4). And this they did without being deterred by any fear of infection in the case of plagues or other contagious diseases; of which a notable example, among many others, was seen in the heroic conduct of the Christians at Alexandria during the great plague there in the time of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 260–268). See the account given in Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. viii. 22).

Public hospitals for the reception of the sick, the needy, and the stranger, began to be erected as soon as Christianity, being freed from persecution, could display its natural tendencies without danger or restriction. Houses were set apart for the reception of travellers or sojourners (ξενοδοχεῖα), for the poor (πτωχοτροφεία), for orphans (ὀρφανοτροφεία), for foundlings (βρεφοτροφεία), and for the aged (γεροντοκομεία), as well as for the sick (νοσοκομεία). [HOSPITALITY, EXPOSING OF CHILDREN, FOUNDLINGS.] Several of these objects were often combined in one establishment, so that it is most convenient to treat of them under one head.

Epiphanius (Haeres. 75, c. 1) mentions that Arius, afterwards known as a heretic, about the middle of the 4th century was made by the bishop Eustathius superintendent of the hospital (ξενοδοχεῖον, says Epiphanius, called in Pontus πτωχοτροφείον) at Sebaste in Pontus. It does not appear that the hospital was then first established, and Epiphanius mentions it as a common custom for bishops of the church to provide for the maimed and infirm by setting up such establishments.

The most complete hospital of which we have any account in antiquity was built by Basil the Great, soon after his accession to the see, near Caesarea in Pontus. St. Basil, defending himself from the charge of seeking to gain undue influence, which had been brought against him before the prefect of the place, says (Epist. 94 [al. 372] ad Heliam), "Whom do we injure, in building lodgings (καταγώγια) for the strangers who stay with us in passing through, and for those who need attendance (θεραπείας) in consequence of infirmity? What, in supplying necessary comfort for these persons, nurses, medical attendants, means of conveying them (τὰ νοστοφόρα),^a and persons to take charge of them in removal (τοὺς παραπέμοντας)? And these things must of necessity carry with them handicrafts, both such as are required for sustenance and such as conduce to decorum, and these again require workshops." He also (Epist. 142 [al. 374]) begs an official of the empire to exempt his poor-house from state taxation, and speaks (Epist. 143 [al. 428]) of its being managed by a chorepiscopus. St. Basil's hospital is thus spoken of by Gregory of Nazianzus (who had himself seen it) in his panegyric on the saint (Orat. 20, p. 359, ed. Colon.

1690). "Go forth a little from the city, and behold the new city, the treasure-house of godliness . . . in which the superfluities of wealth—nay, even things not superfluous—have been laid up in store at his exhortation; . . . in which disease is investigated (φιλοσοφεῖται) and sympathy proved . . . We have no longer to look on the fearful and pitiable sight of men like corpses before death, with the greater part of their limbs dead [from leprosy], driven from cities, from dwellings, from public places, from water-courses . . . Basil it was more than any one who persuaded those who are men not to scorn men, nor to dishonour Christ the head of all by their inhumanity towards human beings." From this it appears that at least a portion of St. Basil's hospital was for lepers. Sozomen, again (H. E. vi. 34) speaks of Prapadius having been principal of this "Basiliad, that most famous lodging for the poor founded by Basil, from whom it received the appellation which it still retains." Of St. Chrysostom, too, Palladius (Vita Chrys. p. 19, ed. Montfaucon) relates that he diverted the superfluous expenses of his see to the maintenance of the hospital (νοσοκομείον), and that as the need increased he founded several, over which he set two presbyters of high character; he engaged further physicians and cooks, and kind unmarried attendants to work under them. St. Chrysostom himself (Hom. 66 [al. 67] in Matt.) pointing triumphantly to the large-handed bounty of the church, says, "consider how many widows, how many virgins, the church sustains day by day; the number on the roll is not less than three thousand [in Constantinople]. And she provides also for those who are in distress in the guest-house; for those who are maimed in body; and yet her substance is not diminished." It is evident that a regular system of providing for the poor in connexion with the church was organised in the middle of the fifth century; for the council of Chalcedon (c. 3) especially recognises the care of widows and orphans, and the needy generally as one of the justifications for a cleric's engaging in secular affairs (κοσμικὰ διοικήσεις), if he does it at the command of his bishop.

The emperor Julian recognised the importance of institutions such as those of St. Basil; "these impious Galilaeans," says he (Fragment. p. 305, quoted by Rheinwald) "give themselves to this kind of humanity; as men allure children with a cake, so they, starting from what they call love and entertaining and serving of tables, bring in converts to their impiety;" and again he bids Arsacius (Epist. 49, u.s.), "establish abundance of hospitals in every city, that our kindness may be enjoyed by strangers, not only of our own people, but of others who are in need."

Placilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great, devoted herself much to the care of the sick. She cared, says Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. v. 19), for those who were maimed and injured, not devolving the charge of them on subordinates, but attending to them personally, "going into the places where they were received (τὰς τούτων καταγωγάς) and supplying their several wants. So also, making the round of the hospitals (ξενώνας) of the churches, she attended on those who were confined to bed, herself handling the pots and tasting the broth, bringing bowls, breaking bread, and offering mouthfuls, washing cups, and performing other services which are generally done by domestics.

Samson of Constantinople received the name of "Xenodochus" from his devotion to the care of hospitals and asylums, and is said to have persuaded the emperor Justinian to give up his own palace for the purposes of a xenodochion (see the Byzantine Meneia, June 27). Procopius however (De Aedif. Just. i. 2) gives a somewhat different account of the matter. There was, he says, a hospital for the sick and infirm, built in former years by the pious care of one Samson, of which there were in Justinian's time some remains in a ruinous condition. This the emperor restored, decorated, and amplified in the most liberal manner. He increased, says Procopius, both the number of wards (οἰκίδιον, domuncularum) and the annual revenue. Whether by the expression οἰκίδιον we are to understand detached buildings, or rooms, is doubtful; if the former, Justinian's hospital, like that of Basil previously described, would resemble a little town, a place of many buildings within a wall. Justinian further built, in concert with Theodora, two other hospitals (ξενώνας). Of the empress Eudocia it is related (Vita Euthymii, c. 16, in Acta SS. January, vol. ii. p. 317) that she built many churches, gerontocomia, ptochotrophia, and monasteries. She is said also to have prepared food for the sick with her own hands.

It is not necessary to go through the long list of pious foundations for the benefit of the sick which we meet with in the history of the church. But it may be mentioned as an instance of the general recognition of the duty of providing for sick and infirm brethren, that by the so-called Arabic canons of Nicaea the bishop was expressly bound, in virtue of his office, to institute hospitals. Canon 70 (Hardouin, Concilia, i. 475) prescribes, that in every city a place should be set apart for strangers, sick, and poor, which should be called a xenodochium; and that the bishop should select one of the monks of the desert, himself a foreigner, far from home and family, and a man of integrity, to take charge of the hospital, to procure for it beds and whatever may be necessary for the sick and poor; and that if the property of the hospital be inadequate, he should make a collection from the Christians, according to their several means, and with this provision sustain the brethren who are strangers, poor, or sick, as each may have need.

Most of these instances belong to the Eastern church; but the Western church was not behind in the good work. Paulinus of Nola has left us (Poem. xx. 114) a brief description of the hospital which he himself built, which appears to have been rather for the reception of the poor and old than of the sick, as such:

"Dispositi trino per longa sedilia coetu
Obstupere senes, inopum miserabilis vulgus,
Et socio canae residentes agmine matres."

This description suggests long wards, provided with "sedilia"—perhaps "berths," or divans running along the wall—in which the inmates were separated into three classes—poor, old men, and old women.

Jerome, in a letter to Pammachius (Epist. 66 [x. 26], c. 11, written, according to Vallarsi, A.D. 587) speaks of a xenodochium which the latter had built in the Portus Romanus, of which he (Jerome) had just heard. This was probably attended to by Pammachius himself and the monks for whom he had provided a convent in the neighbourhood. Jerome himself founded a hospital for the reception of the sick and the stranger in Bethlehem; finding his means insufficient to finish it, he sent his brother Paulinianus (u. s. c. 14) to sell his remaining property in his native country, to provide money for its completion. Fabiola, the friend of Jerome, also founded a hospital at Rome. Having been obliged to obtain a divorce from her first husband on account of his intolerable profligacy, she married another before his death. On becoming a widow she learned that according to church law, of which she had been previously ignorant ("nec evangelii vigorem noverat," says Jerome Ep. 77 [al. 30], c. 3), it was unlawful for her to have married again during her first husband's life, however justly she had separated from him. Upon this she submitted to a humiliating penance; and afterwards devoted all her property to charitable purposes, and among other good works built a hospital, where she ministered to the sick with her own hands (ib. c. 6).

Jerome remarks that Fabiola was the first person who founded a hospital (prima omnium νοσοκομείον instituit). But this perhaps only means the first hospital in Rome or Italy. And the fact that Jerome uses the Greek word νοσοκομείον, and not the Latin valetudinarium, tends to confirm the account which points to the Eastern church as the first to exhibit such acts of benevolence.

Rome itself had an ancient fame for its care of the sick and poor (Prudentius, Peristeph. ii. 140 ff.). Its hospitals were frequently the objects of the munificence of the popes. Anastasius (Vitae Pontif. 134 A, ed. Muratori) tells us of Pelagius II. (578–590), that he caused his own house to be made a refuge for the poor and aged (ptochium pauperum et senum). His successor, Gregory the Great (Dialogus, iii. 35, p. 243) seems to say that he had taken Amantius from his own dwelling to pass some days in the infirmary; and John the Deacon relates of him that he set over the several hospitals careful and conscientious men, who had to submit their accounts to himself, that the beneficence of the people towards those institutions might not be checked by mismanagement of the funds. He also provided Probus with money to build a xenodochium on a large scale at Jerusalem, and supported it by an annual subvention (Vita Greg. ii. 7). Other hospitals in Rome of an early date are known to us at least by name. Pope Symmachus (498–514) is said by Ado (Chronicon, in Migne's Patrol. cxxiii. 106 B) to have founded or restored three hospitals (pauperibus habitacula) known by the names of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Laurence respectively. Stephen III. (752–757) is said by Anastasius (Vitae Pontif. p. 165, c. d.) to have restored four xenodochia and founded two others, which were placed in the charge of the regionary deacons of St. Maria and St. Silvester; and Adrian I. (772–795, ib. p. 190, d) to have founded three DIACONIAE (see the word) "foris portam Beati Apostolorum Principis."

Nor was it only in Rome that such institutions were found. In Gaul they existed at any rate before the death of St. Remi (†532), if we may trust Flooard. The saint is made (Hist. Remens. i. 18) to entreat his successors to preserve inviolate his statutes for the management of his poor-houses (ptochia), coenobia, martyria, diaconiae and xenodochia, as he had done those of his predecessors—an expression which implies that some at least of these foundations existed before St. Remi came to the see of Reims before 496. The fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, places (c. 13) the property of xenodochia on the same footing, with regard to alienation, as that of churches and monasteries; and (c. 15) makes special provision for the magnificent hospital which, under the influence of its bishop Sacerdos, Childebert with his queen Ultragotha had founded in Lyons, forbidding the bishop of that city to merge any of its property in that of his church, or to diminish its privileges in any way, and enjoining him to take care that active and God-fearing superintendents (praepositi) be always appointed, and that the care of the sick and the entertainment of strangers be always maintained according to the statutes.

We do not trace the existence of hospitals in the African fathers or councils. In Victor's account of the Vandal persecution (i. 8), we find that Deogratias bishop of Carthage, A.D. 455, turned two churches into hospitals for the reception of the wretched captives who were poured on the African shores from Italy; but this was a temporary expedient, such as has often been adopted in times of calamity. But we are not to suppose that the sick of the African church were ill-cared for; the houses of the bishops, the clergy and the monks often served for the reception of the sick. Augustine (Possidius, Vita Aug. cc. 22, 23) exercised constant care for the sick and poor, and (Regula ad Servos Dei, c. 5) gives directions to monks as to their reception and treatment of the sick and infirm; directions in which he seems to contemplate the case not only of feeble members of the monastic body, but of sick persons brought in from without.

In the Teutonic countries, we have of course no accounts of hospitals of so early a date as those which have been mentioned in Italy and Gaul. Chrodegang, however (Regula, c. 45, in Migne's Patrol. 89, 1076), recommends that a guest-room (hospitale) should be formed in a suitable place, convenient for the brothers to visit; and desires the brothers of his Rule, even if they cannot maintain a hospital at other times, at least in Lent to wash the feet of the poor in a hospital or guest-room. The famous Alcuin at a somewhat later date also warned the bishops of the great necessity there was for forming hospitals, and probably also directed the attention of his patron Charles the Great to the same subject. To Eanbald, as soon as he entered on his see, Alcuin wrote urging him to establish "xenodochia, id est, hospitalia" (Epist. 56, ad Eanb., Alc. Opp. i. 65) in which the poor and the strangers might be received. In accordance with the Rule of Chrodegang and the wish of Alcuin, the synod of Aix, in the year 816, ordered (c. 28) that every ecclesiastical foundation, whether canonical or monastic, should provide accommodation for the poor, the sick, the widows, and the strangers. The poor-house was to be placed near the church, and a priest was to be its superintendent; the infirmary was to be within the convent, as were also the wards for the widows and poor maidens, though probably in a building separate from that which contained the cells of the canons or monks (Conc. Germ. i. 539). The Frankish Capitularies also take order for the maintenance of the poor and sick. Thus it is ordered (i. c. 70, A.D. 789) that "hospites, peregrini et pauperes" have the due entertainment in various places to which they are entitled by the canons; a passage in which "peregrini" are probably monks from other houses, "hospites" are lay guests. And again (ii. c. 29) they bring xenodochia, ptochotrophia, nosocomia, orphanotrophia, gerontocomia, and brephotrophia under the same law as churches and monasteries with regard to the non-alienation of their property.

The establishment of many of the hospitals which existed in the northern countries in the 8th and 9th centuries is due to the Irish missionaries, who cared for the bodies as well as the souls of the people among whom they preached. Hence they received the name of "Hospitalia Scotorum,"^b an expression found both in the canons of Meaux (C. Meldense, c. 40), and in the petition of the bishops of the provinces of Reims and Rouen to Lewis the Pious (c. 10, Baluze, Capit. Franc. ii. 111). These hospitals were closely connected with the monasteries founded by the same missionaries. Gretser (Ad Vit. S. Willibaldi, lib. i. observ. 19; Grets. Opera, x. 778) enumerates some of the hospitals of their foundation.

2. Administration of Hospitals.—In the first instance, the hospitals, like other institutions of the church, were under the immediate superintendence of the bishops. In many cases, as we have seen, they were founded by the bishops themselves from the funds placed at their disposal by the church, and so the oversight of them naturally fell to the founder and his successors. And even when endowed by private persons, such foundation was regarded as of the nature of alms, and so given into the hands of those who were, directly or indirectly, the universal almoners. The property of hospitals was regarded (as has been shewn above) by kings and rulers as being of the same kind as the property of the church. And the attendants on the sick were, at least in very many cases, drawn from the neighbouring monasteries or houses of canons. When the duty was laid upon bishops of providing, so far as in them lay, food and clothing for those who in consequence of infirmity were unable to earn their own living (Conc. Aurel. I. c. 16), it naturally followed that they superintended and directed the establishments for attaining this end.

It must however have been from the first impossible for a much-occupied bishop to give personal attention to all the details of a large hospital, and therefore other clerics were employed under him on this behalf. We have seen already that Aerius was a hospital-superintendent under his bishop Eustathius; and as early as the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, we find the clerics attached to the poor-houses (τῶν πτωχέων) placed on the same footing as those of the monasteries and martyr-churches, and admonished to obey their bishops according to the tradition of the fathers (c. 8), a passage which probably indicates that they had been disposed to assert too great independence. The legislation of Justinian provided carefully for the due administration of hospitals. Thus (Codex, l. 42, § 9, De Episcopis et Clericis) it is provided that prefects of hospitals (of whatever kind) shall be appointed according to the judgment and with the approval of the bishop of the place; and again (ib. l. 46, § 3) bishops are enjoined not to administer the hospitals within their dioceses personally, but to appoint superintendents, and to act themselves as visitors and auditors, in case of need removing the officials. The same law desires that men be appointed to such offices who have before their eyes the fear of God and of the dreadful day of judgment. The same code (l. 28) makes the bishop of the diocese the executor of a will containing a bequest for pious uses, where no executor has been named in the will itself; and desires him (l. 49) in cases where the testator has not designated special objects of his bounty, to apply the bequest to the benefit of the hospital of the city, or to the poorest hospital, where there were more than one. In deciding the question, which is poorest, he is to take counsel with his clergy. But in case there be no hospital (xenon) in the city, then the oeconomus or the bishop is to take the bequest, and apply it for the benefit of the poor. In case the bishop is negligent in discharging this duty, then the metropolitan of the province or the archbishop of the diocese [see DIOCESE] may enquire into the matter and compel the bishop to act. Or (l. 46, § 6) any inhabitant of the city interested in the matter may compel the carrying out of the will.

That in the time of Gregory the Great the xenodochia were under the jurisdiction of the bishop is clear from several passages in his letters. Thus (Epist. iv. 27) he desires Januarius, bishop of Cagliari, to take care that the xenodochi render their accounts to him; and begs him not to let the hospitals fall to decay by his neglect; and he desires that men of proved integrity may be appointed prefects of xenodochia, and these only ecclesiastics (religiosi), who cannot be harassed by lay tribunals. To those whom he himself had appointed prefects of diaconiae or xenodochia he gave full power over the funds, expressly exempting them from rendering an account to any one (Joan. Diaconus, Vita Greg. ii. c. 51).

The bishops of the provinces of Reims and Rouen, in their petition to Lewis the Pious, son of Charles the Great, beg that the rectors of monasteries and xenodochia be made subject to the authority of their bishops (c. 10, in Baluze Capit. Franc. ii. 111).

3. Dedication.—Martigny (referring to Wernsdorf De Columbae Simulacris) says that hospitals were in ancient times commonly dedicated to the Holy Spirit, which was represented under the form of a dove, either on the façade, or on some other conspicuous part of the building. The principal hospital in Rome bears this designation, and has borne it from a very remote period (Fantucci, Tratt. di tutte le opere pie nell' alma città di Roma, c. 1, quoted by Martigny).

HOSPITIUM (also Hospitale). One of the characteristics, perhaps the most commendable, of monasticism, was its unvarying hospitality to all comers. None were to be refused admission; all were to be made welcome (Bened. Reg. c. 53); especially monks, clergy, poor, and foreigners (Reg. Pachom. c. 51; Isidor. Reg. c. 23; Mart. ad Bened. Reg. c. 53). No questions were to be asked (Reg. Patr. c. 4) unless by the abbat's order (Reg. Tarnat. c. 7.) Even passing wayfarers were to be pressed to eat before going on; if they could not wait for the usual hour, the dinner was to be served three hours sooner than usual; or, if they could not stay even so long, they were to have their meal separately (Reg. Mag. c. 72). Everything was to be done in courtesy, and for the comfort of the guests. The prior (or some others of the brethren), was to meet them, and, after a few words of prayer by way of salutation, as well as by way of precaution against any Satanic illusion, was to give and receive the kiss of peace; on their arriving and departing he was to make obeisance to them, as recognising in them a visit from the Saviour (Bened. Reg. c. 53). He was to lead them straightway on arrival to the oratory or sacristy, (usually in Benedictine monasteries close to the entrance-gate), and after praying together (cf. Reg. Pachom. c. 51) awhile, was to sit with them, reading aloud, first some holy book (lex divina), the Scriptures especially (Mart. loc. cit.), and then, these primary duties attended to, conversing amicably ("Omnis humanitas praebeunda," Bened. Reg. v. s.) The abbat himself was to bring water, this was to be done at bedtime, and the footsores were to be rubbed with oil, according to the rule (c. 10) of Fructuosus, and with certain brethren in rotation (so Martene understands "omnis congregatio") was to wash the feet of all without distinction, repeating a verse of the Psalms (Bened. Reg. v. s.). In compliment to the guests, the prior, though not the other monks, was excused from observing a fast day, unless one of special obligation (ib.). If sick or delicate, some dainties ("pulmentaria") were to be provided for them (Fruct. Reg. c. 10). Nor were the guests to leave the monastery empty-handed; for the journey, the best that the monastery could afford was to be supplied as a parting gift (viaticum).

In the annals of the monastery of Micy (Mici-anum), it is recorded in praise of an abbat in the 6th century, that, though the monastery was then very poor, its guests were always regaled with wine, without being allowed to see that the brethren were drinking only water (Mab. A. A. O. S. B. I. ad fin.). Caesarius of Arles is similarly extolled by his biographer for keeping open house as abbat (Vit. Cues. Arelat. i. 37, ap. Mab. ib.).

Such hospitality was sure to be largely used in days when travelling was so difficult and so dangerous. Benedict wisely provides for a constant influx of strangers ("nunquam desunt monasterio," Reg. c. 53). Nowhere indeed in his rule is its tenderness and forethought more remarkable than about the reception of guests. In some of these arrangements he had been anticipated. Cassian speaks of one of the older monks being stationed by the abbat, with the advice of the seniors, near the entrance of the monastery, to receive strangers as they arrived (Cass. Instit. iv. 7). Benedict placed them under the general supervision of the cellarer, or house-steward (Reg. c. 31), and his deputies. Subsequently, a distinct officer was created, the "hospitalarius," corresponding to the eastern "ἐνοδόχος" (Mart. ad loc. cit. Alteserr. Ascticon, ix. 9; Du Cange, s. v. v.), whose duties, however, did not extend to the refectory. One of the brethren, selected as a specially God-fearing man ("Cujus animam timor dei habeat") was appointed by Benedict to look after the guests' dormitory ("cella hospitum") (Bened. Reg. c. 53) (usually on the east side of the Benedictine quadrangle, over the "hospitium"); and two others were told off annually for the guests' kitchen, which adjoined the abbat's kitchen (usually on the south side of the quadrangle^a with a window between (Mart. ad loc.); these officials were to have extra assistance, as occasion required (ib.). Every precaution was taken, lest the influx of strangers should either disturb the placidity of the "house of God" (ib.), or lead to the propagation of silly rumours about it (ib.). Their sitting-room, dormitory, and kitchen were all to be separate from those of the monks (ib. cf. c. 56). None of the monks, unless expressly ordered, might exchange even in passing a word with a guest, except to ask a blessing (ib. cf. Reg. Mac. c. 8). Nor were the guests to be trusted to themselves without supervision. Care was to be taken that the monks' wallets were not left about in the guests' dormitory; and two of the monks, whose turn it was to help in the kitchen and otherwise for the week ("hebdomadarii"), were to keep close to the guests night and day (Reg. Mag. c. 79). It is not clear whether Benedict intended the guests to be entertained in the refectory at a separate table with the abbat, or with him in a separate table (Bened. Reg. c. 56); Martene thinks in the refectory (Reg. Comment. ad loc. cit.; cf. Conc. Aquisgr. c. 27). The abbat on these occasions might invite a few of the brethren to his table, leaving the charge of the rest to the prior, and might make some addition to the ordinary fare (Bened. Reg. c. 56; Mart. ad loc.; Mab. Ann. O. S. B. v. xiii.). It was strictly forbidden by the council of Saragossa, A.D. 691, for lay persons to be lodged in the quadrangle of the monastery ("intra claustra"), even with the abbat's special permission, lest contact with them should demoralise the brethren or give rise to scandals; they were to be lodged in a separate house within the precincts (intra septa) (Conc. Caesar-august. A.D. 691; cf. Mab. Ann. O. S. B. xviii. xv.).

Benedict orders, that monks coming from another country (peregrini) may, if orderly, prolong their stay in the monastery (Reg. c. 61) for one, two, or even three years (Mart. Reg. Comment. l. c.); and that any suggestions which they make for its better management are to be welcomed as providential (Bened. Reg. ib.). They are then either to be dismissed kindly ("honeste") or formally admitted, not, however, unless they bring commendatory letters from their former abbat, or otherwise give proof of his consent. Once admitted, they may be promoted without delay at the abbat's discretion, to places of authority; as may clergy similarly admitted (ib.). Laymen, willing to stay on, are either to take the vow, or to make themselves useful to the monastery in some sort of work in return for board and lodging (Reg. Mag. c. 79).

It was part of the discipline of candidates for the novitiate to wait on the guests in their sitting-room ("cella hospitum," or "hospitium"), according to the rule of Benedict, for some days (Reg. c. 58), or, according to some later rules, for three months (Isid. Reg. c. 5; Fruct. Reg. c. 21; Menard ad Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxii.) [see NOVICE].

History shows how the simple and frugal hospitality enjoined by Benedict and monastic law-makers degenerated in time into luxury and display, burdensome to the revenues of the monasteries, demoralising to their inmates, and one of the proximate causes of their fall. [I. G. S.]

HOST, from the Latin Hostia, a victim. It was applied to sacrifices, or offerings of various kinds in the ecclesiastical language of the West. E.g. in the Vulgate version of Rom. xii. 1, we have "Ut exhibeatis corpora vestra hostiam" (E. V. sacrifice) "viventem, sanctam, Deo placentem, rationabile obsequium vestrum:" and similarly in the Missale Gothicum, the people are bid to pray that God "may cleanse the hearts of all the offerers unto (i.e. that they may become) a sacrifice (hostiam) of sanctification, reasonable and well-pleasing unto Himself" (Liturg. Gall. ed Mabill. p. 237). In the Vulgate of Phil. iv. 18, it is used of almsgiving, "Hostiam acceptam, placentem Deo." Christ, the one true victim, is called hostia, as in Eph. v. 2, "Tradidit semetipsum pro nobis oblationem et hostiam." Similarly Heb. x. 12: "Unam pro nobis offerens hostiam." Compare Heb. ix. 26. This is frequent in the old Latin liturgies. Thus in the Gothic Missal, "Suppliant to Thee who wast slain a victim (hostia) for the salvation of the world, we pray, &c." (Lit. Gall. p. 235); and "Whom Thou didst will to be delivered up a sacrifice (hostiam) for us" (ibid. p. 257; comp. p. 198). In the following example the church commemorates and pleads that sacrifice:—"We offer unto thee, O God, an immaculate victim (hostiam), whom the maternal womb brought forth without defilement to virginity" (Missale Mozar. Leslie, p. 39). As the thank-offering (Eucharist) of the Mosaic law had been called hostia laudis (Ps. cxvi. 17), or hostia gratiarum (Lev. vi. 13), so was the Christian thank-offering, the sacramental commemoration of the death of Christ. E.g. "Receive we beseech thee, O Lord, the sacrifice (hostiam) of propitiation and praise, and these oblations of Thy servants" (Miss. Goth. u. s. p. 253).

As the word properly expresses a concrete notion, it would readily pass from the last meaning to attach itself to the material symbols offered in the rite. In the Missale Gothicum, in a prayer said after the consecration, we read, "We offer unto thee, O Lord, this immaculate host, reasonable host, unbloody host, this holy bread and salutary cup" (u. s. p. 298). The following example is from the Mozarabic Missal:—"This host of bread and wine, which have been placed on Thy altar by me unworthy" (Leslie, p. 445). It will be observed that in these extracts the bread and wine (after conse-crations) are together called the host. Even in the 11th century Anselm affirmed correctly, "One host in bread and wine. . . . They call both together by one name, oblation or host" (Ad Waleranum, c. 2). Long before this, however, it was sometimes restrained to the bread alone, as in the three earliest Ordines Romani, which range from the 7th to the 9th century:—"The acolytes (carrying the consecrated bread) go down to the presbyters that they may break the hosts" (Musaeum Ital. tom. ii. pp. 13, 49, 59). In these ancient directories the unconsecrated loaves are always, and the consecrated more frequently, called by the older name of "oblates."

When the phrase "immaculate host" was introduced into the Roman Missal towards the 11th century (Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe, P. iii. art. 6) from that of Spain, the mistake was made of applying it to the unconsecrated bread. See Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 370. [W. E. S.]

HOST, THE ADORATION OF. In the modern church of Rome, the worship of latria, i.e. such worship as is due to God, is paid to the consecrated symbol of our Lord's body in the eucharist, under sanction of the dogma, that the bread is, in all but appearance and other "accidents," converted into that body, and that His human soul and His divinity, being united to His body, are therefore in that which has become His body; so that whole Christ, God and man, is in it, and in every particle of it (Catech. Trident. p. ii. de Euch. cc. 33, 35). Of such adoration of the host the church knew nothing, and could know nothing, before the opinions which at last shaped themselves into that dogma had taken possession of the minds of men. But the Latin word adoratio, and the Greek προσκύνησις, like the old English worship, have a great latitude of meaning, and are applied to the simplest outward tokens of respect, no less than to that highest homage of the body, soul, and spirit, which is due to God alone. For example, in Gen. xxvii. 7, 9, where the English has "did obeisance," the Septuagint gives προσεκύνῃσαν and προσεκύνουν; the Latin Vulgate, adorare. Exod. xi. 8: Eng. "Thy servants. . . shall bow down to me"; Sept. προσκυήσουσι με; Vulg. adorabunt me. See Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 844. In this lower sense, we find the word "adoration," and its equivalents, employed within the period which it is our part to illustrate, to denote the expression of reverence to the bread and wine, which are the sacramental body and blood of Christ.

With this previous explanation, we give, in chronological order, a catena of passages, which will exhibit sufficiently, as we hope, both the feelings of reverence which the early Christians had for the sacred symbols, and the manner in which they expressed it by words, or gesture, or careful handling, and the like. Among these are several which have often been mistakenly adduced as affording testimony to the antiquity of the Roman worship of the host.

Tertullian, A.D. 192, "We are distressed, if any of our cup, or even bread, be cast on the ground" (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.). The context shows that the allusion is to a religious rite. Origen, A.D. 230: "Ye who are wont to be present at the Divine Mysteries, know how, when ye take the body of the Lord, ye keep it with all care and reverence, lest any particle fall therefrom, lest aught of the consecrated gift be spilled. For ye believe, and rightly believe, yourselves to be guilty, if aught fall therefrom through negligence. But if ye use, and justly use, so great care about the keeping of His body, how do ye think it involves less guilt to have been careless about the word of God, than to have been careless about His body?" (Hom. in Exod. xiii. § 3). St. Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350: "When thou drawest near, do not draw near with hands expanded or fingers wide apart; but making thy left hand a throne for thy right, as about to receive a king, and making the palm hollow, receive the body of Christ, answering Amen. Partake, therefore, having heedfully sanctified thine eyes with the touch of the holy body, taking care that thou drop nought of it. . . . Then, after the communion of the body of Christ, approach thou also to the cup of His blood, not stretching forth thy hands; but with head bowed, and with gesture of adoration (προσκύνησας) and reverence, saying Amen, be thou sanctified, partaking also of the blood of Christ. And while the moisture is still on thy lips, touching them with thy hands, sanctify both eyes and forehead, and the other organs of sense" (Catech. Myst. v. §§ 18, 19). Pseudo-Dionysius, who may have written as early as 362, in a highly rhetorical passage, makes the following apostrophe to the sacrament: "But, O most divine and sacred celebration (τελετή); in the Latin translation, Sacramentum), do thou, unfolding the enigmatic wrappings that with symbols enshroud thee, manifest thyself to us in clear light, and fill our mental vision with the only and unshrouded light" (De Eccl. Hier. cap. iii. n. iii. § 2). Owing to the word τελετή (celebration of mysteries) having been rendered by Sacramentum, this passage has been often brought forward as an address to "the Sacrament;" i.e. to the consecrated host (Bellarm. Disput. tom. iii. l. iv. c. 29 compared with l. ii. c. 3). Had the word been capable of that meaning, it would still have been only an apostrophe, not an example of adoration directed to the sacred element. Gorgonia, the sister of Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 370, is said by him, in a dangerous illness, to have "prostrated herself before the altar, and called with a loud voice upon Him who is honoured thereon" (Orat. viii. § 18). This has been understood (Bellarm. u. s.) to mean that she worshipped the host on the altar; which for several centuries after that time was not reserved there. St. Gregory himself goes on to tell us that "she mingled with her tears whatever her hand had treasured of the antitypes of the precious body and blood." St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, commenting on the words of the 98th Psalm, adornate scabellum pedum Ejus, considers that "by the footstool the earth is meant, and by the earth, the flesh of Christ, which to this day we adore in the mysteries, and which the apostles adored in the Lord Jesus" (De Spir. S. lib. iii. c. 11, n. 79). Here it is implied that a reverence is due to the consecrated earthly elements, not equal to that which is due to Christ Himself, but in such proportion to it, more or less, as our loyal respect for the insignia of royalty has to that which we entertain for the person of the king himself. St.

Augustine, A.D. 396, explains the same passage at greater length, but does not lead us to a different view of the adoration intended: "He took earth of the earth; for flesh is of the earth, and He took flesh of the flesh of Mary. And because He walked here in the flesh itself, and gave His flesh itself to be eaten by us unto salvation, but no one eats that flesh unless he has first adored, we have found out how such a footstool of God may be adored, and how we not only do not sin by adoring, but sin by not adoring" (Enarr. in Ps. cxviii. § 9). Commenting on Ps. xxi. 29 (Lat. 30), the same father says: the rich of the earth "have themselves been brought to the table of Christ, and take of His body and blood; but they only worship,—are not also satisfied, because they do not imitate" (Ep. cxl. ad Honoratum, cxxvii. § 66; Sim. Enarr. i. in Ps. xxi. v. 30). Here, however, it is doubtful whether the writer had at all in view the reverence paid to the sacramental body. He rather, perhaps, is thinking of communion as accompanied by prayer, and as the crowning act of the eucharist, or thanksgiving. The following words of St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, have been supposed (Bellarm. u. s.) to refer to the adoration of the eucharist: "Are thy garments filthy, and it concerns thee not? But are they clean? Then recline (ἀνάσσει, rendered improperly adore) and partake" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. i. vv. 20-23; often quoted from the cento known as Hom. lxi. ad Antioch.). Again, a worship of the elements has been inferred (Bell. u. s.) from this sentence: "This table is in the place of the manger, and here also will the body of the Lord lie; not, indeed, as then, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, but clothed all around with the Holy Ghost. The initiated understand. And the Magi then did nothing but adore; but we will permit thee both to receive, and having received to return home, if thou draw near with a clean conscience" (De Beat. Philogono, § 3). Other passages, to which controversialists refer, in the works of St. Chrysostom (as Hom. lxxiii. in St. Matt. x; xxiv. in Ep. i. ad Cor. &c.), only exalt the sacrament, do not speak of any adoration. Theodoret, A.D. 423: "The mystic symbols do not, after the consecration, pass out of their own nature; for they remain in their former substance, and form, and appearance, and are visible and palpable, as they were before; but they are mentally perceived as what they have become, and are believed to be, and are adored as being what they are believed to be" (Dialog. ii. tom. iv. p. 85). Here the worship of latria cannot possibly be intended, because the author, in the same sentence, teaches that the "creatures of bread and wine" are, after consecration, bread and wine still. It may be remarked also, that although many, or perhaps all, of the foregoing extracts may be seen quoted in favour of the modern cultus of the host, there is not one that is really to the purpose. Nor is it until the 7th century, an age in which the outward observances of religion multiplied rapidly, that we find any definite gesture of respect to the host mentioned. It was the custom at Rome then to reserve a portion of the eucharist [see FERMENTUM], to be put into the chalice at the next celebration. The earliest Ordo Romanus (§ 8, Musae. Ital. tom. ii. p. 8) directs that when this is brought out for use, "the bishop or deacon salute the holy things (sancta) with an inclination of the head." In Ordo II., which is a revision of the first, and perhaps a century later, the bishop, "his head bowed toward the altar, first adores the holy things," &c. (§ 4, p. 43). See also the Ecloga of Amalarius, who comments on this Ordo (§ 6, p. 550). The significance of the action may be estimated by the similar respect paid in some churches to the gospel, e.g. "The priests and bishops standing by uncover their heads, lay down their sticks, and worship the gospel by an inclination of the head" (Rituale Gabriel, Renaud. tom. i. p. 211). The last passage to which we shall call attention, occurs in the Acts of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 754: "As that which He took of us is only the matter of human substance, perfect in all things, without expressing the proper form of a person, that no addition of person may take place in the Godhead, so also did He command the image, chosen matter, to wit the substance of bread, to be offered, not, however, fashioned after the form of man, lest idolatry should be brought in" (in Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii. Labb. tom. vii. col. 448). It is evident that the adoration of the host, in its modern sense, could not have been known when this was written.

As elevation is often supposed to imply adoration, it should be mentioned that there was no elevation of the consecrated elements in the West before the twelfth century; and that the so-called elevation of the East was merely a "showing of the gifts," designed to second the invitation to communicate conveyed by the proclamation, "Holy things for the holy" (see Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 546, 595). [W. E. S.]

HOURS OF PRAYER. I. This phrase was inherited from the elder church. "Peter and John went up together into the temple at the Hour of Prayer, being the ninth hour" (Acts iii. 1). At first the observance of the hours was of devotion only, but it was afterwards made obligatory by canon on the clergy and monks, and they began to be called Canonical Hours. The earliest use of this expression is found, we think, in the rule of St. Benedict (c. 67; in Holstenii Codex Regularum, P. ii.); but it does not appear to have been very common within the period of which we treat. It occurs in the Regula of St. Isidore of Seville who died in 636 (cap. 7; Holst. u. s.). St. Eloy, A.D. 640, employs it: "To whom should it be said that 'men ought always to pray and not to faint' (St. Luke xviii. 1), if not to him who daily at the Canonical Hours, according to the rite of ecclesiastical tradition, praises and beseeches the Lord without ceasing in the accustomed psalmody and prayers" (Hom. xi. in Biblioth. PP. tom. xii.). Bede in our own country (A.D. 701), in his commentary on those words of St. Luke, copies this sentence from St. Eloy. The "Canonical Hours" are mentioned in the excerpts of Ecgbriht, A.D. 740 (can. 28; Johnson's Engl. Canons), and in the canons of Cuthbert, 747 (c. 15; ibid.).

II. What is meant by an Hour.—By an hour was understood a twelfth part of the natural day, reckoned from sunrise to sunset, of whatever length it might be. Upon the use of this natural measure of time by the Jews is founded that saying of our Lord: "Are there not twelve hours in the day? If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not; because he seeth the light of this world" (St. John xi. 9). The Romans are said to have adopted this division of the day about B.C. 291. Martial refers to it as in use among them, when he tells a friend that he might read his book in less than an hour, and that not one of summer's length (Epigr. lib. xii. n. 1, ad Priscum). In the Pseudolus of Plautus an "hour in winter" is said to be "shortest" (Act V. sc. 2, l. 11). The Greeks had learnt this method in the 6th century before Christ, when the sun-dial became known to them probably through Anaximander (see Diogenes Laert. lib. i. c. 7); and they retained it during their subjection to the Roman empire. Thus in the Sentences ascribed to Secundus of Athens in the time of Hadrian, a day is defined to be "the space given to toil, the course of twelve hours" (Sent. 4). As the time of labour varied, so must the hours have been longer or shorter. It is employed beyond our period by Cassianus Bassus, A.D. 940, as when he tells the tiller of the land at what hour the moon sets and rises on each day of the month (Geoponica lib. i. c. 7). St. Augustine speaks as if he knew of no other, "The hour in winter, compared with the hour in summer, is the shorter" (De Verâ Relig. c. xliii. § 80). Hence we infer that the natural day and hour were also employed by the church in his day. Amalarius at the close of our period uses the same division of time with express reference to the Hours of Prayer; prefacing his account of them thus: "The people properly call the presence of the sun above the earth the complete day. From this definition it may be understood that a day of twelve hours ought to begin at the rising and end at the setting of the sun" (De Ordine Antiphonarii, c. 6; see also cc. 16, 70). By the first hour, then, we are to understand that twelfth part of the natural day which began at sunrise; by the sixth that which ended when the sun crossed the meridian; the twelfth that which immediately preceded the sunset.

The day and the night were further divided into four equal parts. Each quarter of the day consisting of three hours was named after the last hour in it. Thus the first quarter, containing the first, second, and third hour, was called the third hour (Tertia, Terce), that is to say, by the "third hour" we often have to understand the whole interval between sunrise and the beginning of the fourth (smaller) hour. Similarly Sext is the space of the three hours that follow, viz. the fourth, the fifth, and the sixth, ending at noon, or twelve o'clock. None embraces the seventh, eighth and ninth hours; and the last, called Duodecima, contains the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth, ending at sunset. This is satisfactorily shown by Francolinus (De Temporibus Horar. Canon. c. xxi.; Rome, 1571). Hence St. Benedict (Regula, c. 48) was free to direct that from Easter to the Kalends of October None should be said "in the middle of the eighth hour," and that from the latter time to Ash-Wednesday "Terce should be performed at the second hour."

III. The Prayers called Hours, &c.—By the Hours of Prayer and the Canonical Hours were also understood the devotions themselves, consisting for the most part of psalms and prayers, which were used at the stated times more properly so called. Equivalents in this secondary sense within the first eight centuries were Officium Divinum, or Officia Divina (see e. g. Bened. Regul., cc. 8, 43; Isidore of Seville, De Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 19), Cursus (sc. Divinus) (Greg. Turon. de Gloria Mart. lib. i. c. 11; Hist. Franc. l. viii. c. 15; ix. c. 6, &c.); Cursus ecclesiastici (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. l. x. c. 31; n. 19); Missa (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, cap. 30; Cassian. De Coenob. Institut. L. ii. c. 7); and so Missa nocturna (Cass. u. s. l. ii. c. 13), Vigilium Missa (ibid. l. iii. c. 8), &c.; Missa Canonica (ibid. c. 5) (though it may be doubted whether in Cassian's time the thought of dismissal was entirely absent when that word was used); Orationes Canonicae (ibid. l. ii. c. 12). We find used also the more general terms Diurna Celebritas, Solemunitas, Agenda, or, from the staple of the devotions used, Psalmodia. The word synaxis (assembling) employed by the Egyptian, Syrian, and Grecian monks, conveyed to the mind alike the notion of the times at which and of the purpose for which they assembled (ibid. lib. ii. c. 10; Collat. viii. c. 16, &c.). It was often thus used in the West, but at first needed explanation. Hence in the rule of St. Columban, abbot of Luxeuil in Burgundy, and afterwards of Bobio in Italy from 589 to 615, we read, "concerning the synaxis, that is, the course of psalms and the canonical method of prayers" (cap. 7, Holst. u. s. sim. Regula Donati, c. 75, Holst. P. iii.). In England the following example occurs in 740, "These seven synaxes we ought daily to offer to God with great concern for ourselves and for all Christian people" (Excerptions of Eggbriht, c. 28). It was Latinised by Collecta, as in the version of the rule of Pachomius (ad calc. Opp. Cassiani), and by St. Jerome, who says "Alleluia was sung, by which sign they were called to collect" (Epitaph. Paulæ, Ep. lxxxvi.). By the Greeks the daily course was also called the canon, because it was the prescribed rule or norm of prayer. Thus Antiochus, A.D. 614, "Our canon is called Psalmody" (Hom. CV. Auct. Gr. Lat. Biblioth. PP. tom. i.). Compare John Moschus, A.D. 630, Limnionion, c. 40. There is perhaps a much earlier instance in St. Basil, A.D. 370, "Every one keeps his proper canon" i.e. observes the prayers assigned to him (Regulae Breviores, Resp. ad Qu. 147). St. Benedict gave to the daily offices of his monks the expressive name of Opus Dei, God's Work (Regula, cc. 43, 44, &c.), a title soon adopted by others (Caesarii Regula ad Mon. c. 19, Holst. P. ii.; Aureliani Regula, c. 29, ibid. &c.). It was used conventionally as a complete equivalent to Officium Divinum; e.g. Opus Dei, celebratur, expletur (Reg. Bened. cc. 44, 52); dicitur, canitur (Regula, SS. Pauli et Stephani, cc. 8, 11, Holst. P. ii.). Opus Divinum is also found as in Benedict (Regula, c. 19), Cassiodorus, A.D. 562 (De Institut. Div. Litt. c. 30), &c. Obsequium Divinum also occurs at the beginning of the 9th century (Conc. Aquisgr., A.D. 816, cap. 131). This use of obsequium, service, may be traced to the Vulgate. See St. John xvi. 2; Rom. ix. 4; xii. 1; xv. 31; Phil. ii. 17, 30.

IV. The seven Hours of Prayer and their various Names.—Three hours of prayer, the third, the sixth, and the ninth were observed by the Jews. "Evening and morning and at noon will I pray," was the resolve of David (Ps. lv. 17). Daniel "kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed and gave thanks before his God" (Dan. vi. 10). Two of these hours were determined by the times of the daily sacrifices (Joshua ben Levi in Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Act. Apost. iii. 1), which were offered "in the morning and about the ninth hour" (Josephus, Antiq. L. xiv. c. 4. § 3). The force of St. Peter's argument in Acts ii. 15, "These are not drunken as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day," depends on the fact familiar to his hearers that the Jews generally did not break their fast (See Grotius and others in loc.) before the morning sacrifice and prayer. This therefore was about the third hour. We are expressly told that "the hour of prayer" at which Peter and John went up to the temple was the "ninth hour" (Acts iii. 1). At the ninth hour Cornelius, a proselyte of the gate, "prayed in his house" (Acts x. 30). St. Peter "went up upon the house-top to pray about the sixth hour" (ibid. v. 9). "We read," says Ardo Smaragdus, and he may speak for many, "that the third, sixth, and ninth hours were observed by the apostles" (Comm. in S. Bened. Regulam, c. 16).

The three hours of the apostolic church were transmitted to the succeeding ages. Tertullian, A.D. 192, speaks of "those common hours which mark the divisions of the day, the third, sixth, and ninth, which we may observe in Scripture to be more solemn than the rest" (De Orat. c. 25. See De Jejun. adv. Psychicos, c. 10). Clemens Alex., A.D. 192, "If some assign stated hours to prayer, as the third, sixth, and ninth, the man of knowledge prays to God throughout his whole life" (Strom. l. vii. c. 7, § 40). "There are three times," observes St. Jerome, "in which the knees are to be bent to God. Ecclesiastical tradition understands the third, the sixth, and the ninth hour" (Comm. in Dan. c. vi. v. 10).

In the 3rd century, however, we begin to hear of five stated times of prayer. St. Cyprian, A.D. 252, after citing the Scriptural examples given above, goes on to say, "But beside the hours observed of old, both the durations and sacraments of prayer have increased for us now. For we ought to pray in the morning Also when the sun withdraws and the day fails, we must by a necessary obligation pray again" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). St. Basil in Cappadocia speaks of these hours of prayer as necessary and suitable for monks; the morning, the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, and the evening (Regulae fusius Tract. Resp. ad Qu. 37, §§ 3-5).

The morning office now introduced is called by Cyprian (u. s.) matutina oratio; matutinae orationes by Aurelian (Regula c. 28); by Cassian matutina solemnitas (De Coenob. Inst. lib. iii. c. 3). By others it was called laudes matutinae, from the use in it of the three last psalms, which were called emphatically by the Latins "laudes," and by the Greeks αἶνοι. Hence the later common appellation of lauds. From this the office also took the name of matutinae (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. L. ii. c. 23; Vit. Patr. c. 4, &c.; Ferreoli Regula, c. 13 in Holsten. P. ii.; Guidonis Reg. c. 39 in Hergot, Vet. Discipl. Mon. Par. 1726). It was also called matutinum sacrificium, as by Fructuosus (Reg. c. 3; Holsten.

u. s. and matutinum officium; Isidor. Reg. c. 7 Conc. Bracar. A.D. 560, can. i.); whence also simply matutinum (Isid. ibid.). Matutinale officium is also found (Vita S. Joann. Gorz. in Acta SS. Ben., saec. v. p. 392) and matutinus (sc. cursus) (Regula Magistri, c. 34, Holsten.); also matutinarius (Caesarii leg. c. 21), and matutinarum canonicorum (Aurel. ord. post Reg.). But the most common name was matutini, from the psalmi, which formed the chief part of the office. This was employed by Benedict (Regula, cc. 12, 13, &c.) and was naturally adopted by many in the same age (Pseud.-Aug. Reg. § 1; Caes. Reg. c. 21; Aurel. Ord. u. s. &c.).

Among the Greeks this office is called by St. Basil (Regulae fus. Tr. u. s.) τὸ ὕψρον, the office of dawn, a name which it retains to this day; by St. Epiphanius, A.D. 368, "morning (ἐσθινὸν) hymns and morning prayers" (De Fide, c. 23); in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions the "prayers of dawn" (lib. viii. c. 34), and the "thanksgiving at dawn" (c. 38).

The evening office was generally called vespera in the West (Bened. Reg. c. 41; Isidor. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 20), and vespertinum officium (Isid. Reg. c. 7). St. Ambrose (De Virginibus, lib. iii. c. 4, § 18) calls it the "hour of incense" in allusion to the Jewish rite (Exod. xxx. 8; Ps. cxli. 2; St. Luke i. 10). It was sometimes called lucernarium, as in a comment on the 119th Psalm ascribed (incorrectly, we think) to St. Jerome. "We (monks) pray at the third hour. We pray at the sixth hour; at the ninth. We make the Lucernarium. We rise in the middle of the night. Finally we pray at cock-crow" (ad fin. Breviar. in Psalm. See also Regul. Tarnat. c. 9, in Holst. P. ii.). Another form was Lucernarii, as in Regula Magistri, (c. 36, Holst. u. s.). In Spain, as we shall see, the Lucernarium was only considered the first part of vespers. Vespers were also called the twelfth (hour), as in the Regula Magistri (c. 34) "Prime ought to be said in the same manner as Twelfth, which is called vespers." The 2nd council of Tours, A.D. 567, says, "The statutes of the fathers have prescribed that . . . twelve psalms be said at the Twelfth with Alleluia, which moreover they learnt from the showing of an angel" (can. 18). A reference to Cassian (De Coenob. Inst. L. ii. c. 5), who tells the story, proves that the Twelfth is here an equivalent to solemnitas vespertina. Compare the Ordines at the end of the Regulae of St. Aurelian in Holsten. P. ii. pp. 110, 112; P. iii. pp. 69, 72. St. Columban does not use the words vespers and completorium in his rule, but (c. 7) orders a certain service to be said "ad initium noctis." It appears more probable that this refers to vespers, the older office which must certainly have been said in his monastery, though Menard and others think that compline is meant. In the Greek church, as partially in the Latin, the lighting of the lamps gave the office its common name τὸ λυχνικόν, though it is also called more properly τὸ ἐσπερινόν (Goar in Euchologio, p. 30). In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii.) the whole office is called τὸ ἐσπερινόν (c. 35). It begins with a Psalm (the 140th) called ἐπὶ λυχνίαις, prayers are then said for the catechumens, energumens, &c. These are then dismissed, and the faithful say a prayer and thanksgiving by themselves, both of which are qualified by the title ἐπιλόχριος (cc. 36, 37). At the council of Constantinople A.D. 536, on one occasion the patriarch announced τὸ λυχνικὸν on Saturday evening in the oratory of St. Mary (Act V. Labb. Conc. tom. v. col. 212). The council held there in 691 (in Trullo) ordered that there should be no kneeling from Saturday evening until Sunday evening, "on which they again knelt" ἐν τῷ λυχνικῷ (can. 90).

St. Jerome at Bethlehem mentions at least six hours as kept by the religious women whom he advised: "There is no one who knows not the third, the sixth, the ninth hour, the dawn also and the evening . . . In the night we should rise twice or thrice" (Ad Eustoch. Ep. xviii.). To Demetrius he says, "Beside the order of the Psalms and prayer, which thing is to be always practised by thee at the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, at even, midnight, and morning, settle at how many hours thou shouldst learn the Holy Scripture," &c. (Epist. xcvi.). Of Paula and her community he says, "They sang the psalter in due course at the morning hour, at the third, the sixth, the ninth, at even, at midnight" (Ad Eustoch. Epitaph. Paulae, Ep. lxxxvi.), and he advised that one preparing for that mode of life be trained "to rise in the night for prayers and psalms, to sing hymns in the morning, to stand in the field like a good soldier of Jesus Christ at the third, sixth, and ninth hour . . . and to render the evening sacrifice when the lamp is lighted" (Ad Laetam, Ep. lvii.). The author of the Apostolical Constitutions says, "Make prayers at sunrise, at the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, at evening, and at the cock-crow" (i.e. evidently at midnight) (lib. viii. c. 34).

The ordinary night office of the monasteries is called by Cassian solemnitas nocturna (Instit. lib. ii. c. 4), and nocturni psalmi et orationes (ibid. c. 13); by Pseudo-Augustine (Regula, App. i. ad Opp.) and others nocturnae orationes; whence simply nocturnae, as in the rule of S. Ferreol, c. 13. Nocturni (sc. psalmi as in Bened. Regula, c. 15; Aurelian Ordo Regulae affix. ; Regula Magistri, c. 33; &c.) was common. It was also called Nocturnum Officium (Reg. Mag. u. s.); Officium Vigiliae (Isidori Regula, c. 7); and apparently the word vigiliae itself conveyed the notion of the service used in the nightly vigil (Benedicti Regula, c. 9; Isid. Reg. c. 7; &c.). The Greek name for the nocturnal office is μεσονυκτικόν (Ordo Philothei in Euchol. Goar, p. 7; Typicon Sabae, c. 5; see Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccl. Graec. Diss. i. p. 65).

In the 4th century there appears a desire to conform the rule of prayer to the standard which was supposed to be set up in the 119th Psalm, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (v. 164). St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, asks, "If the prophet says, Seven times, &c., who was taken up with the affairs of a kingdom, what ought we to do, who read, Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation? Certainly solemn prayers are to be offered with giving of thanks when we rise from sleep, when we go forth, when we prepare to take food, when we have taken it, and at the hour of incense (St. Luke, ii. 10), lastly when we go to bed" (De Virginitibus, lib. iii. c. 4, n. 18; Comm. in Luc. Ev. lib. vii. § 88). If such were to be the practice in private life, it would be felt, how much more signally should monks observe the Psalmist's rule? The argument had weight even with those who understood, as St. Augustine (Serm. xxxi. in Ps. cxviii. § 4) and St. Hilary (Tract. in Ps. eund. lib. xxi. § 4) did, the Scriptural use of that number. Because it is "universitatis indicium," therefore (argues the former) "the church with reason has praised God for His righteous judgments seven times a day." Cassian, A.D. 424, claims for his monastery, the foundation of Paula at Bethlehem, the honour of having settled the rule. This was by the addition of a matin office, afterwards called prime, between the matin lauds and terce. The lauds were "said in the monasteries after a short interval of time when the nocturn psalms and prayers were over," i.e. shortly before sunrise, while the new matin office, or prime, was said after it. We are not told when it was introduced, but in Cassian's time, though of Eastern origin, it was observed "chiefly in the regions of the West" (De Coenob. Instit. l. iii. c. iv.). Nevertheless there is no mention of prime in the rules of St. Caesarius (bishop of Arles, A.D. 506) for monks and nuns on week days, and only in one MS. of the latter is it prescribed for Sundays (Martene, De Ant. Monach. Rit. l. i. c. iv. n. 2); nor does he mention it in his homilies, though he entreates the devout to rise early in Lent for vigils, and before all things to assemble for "terce, sext, none" (Hom. cxi. § 2, in App. Opp. Aug.). He assumes of course that they would be present at matins and evensong; and in the duties proper to litany days we find him including attendance at church at "the six hours" (Hom. clxxv. § 3). Some sixty years later Cassiodorus omits prime in his enumeration of the seven hours observed by the monks (Expos. in Ps. cxviii. v. 164). Nor is it recognised by St. Isidore of Seville a century later either in his rule (Holstenii Codex Regul. Monast. p. ii.), or in his work De Officiis. In the latter (lib. i. c. 23) he even quotes what Cassian says of prime as if it referred to the older matin lauds, thus showing ignorance of the institution of another matin office. It was however already known in France, being ordered (and that as if already known) in the rule of Aurelian, a successor of Caesarius at Arles, A.D. 555 (Ordo Regulae affix. Holst. P. ii. p. 111; P. iii. p. 71). Before the middle of the 7th century it had found its way into Spain; for it is mentioned in the rule of Fructuosus (Holsten. P. ii.; Regula, c. 2) the founder of the Complutensian monastery and many others, who died in 675. It had been introduced in Italy, and an office for it prescribed by St. Benedict, A.D. 530 (Holst. u. s. Regula, c. 17). It appears also in two other Western rules of unknown authorship and country; one (Pseudo-Aug. u. s.) of the 6th century, and the other (Regula Magistri, c. 35, Holsten. P. ii.) belonging to the 7th. It was without doubt largely owing to Benedict and his followers that it now became universal in the Latin church.

The use of seven offices for the day and night, and where prime was adopted, of seven for the day alone, was attained in the 6th century by erecting the last brief prayers said before going to bed into a formal and common service under the name of Compline. St. Ambrose, as already quoted, probably referred to private prayer only; but St. Chrysostom, though the Greek monks did not adopt any set service answering to the Western Compline, appears to speak of hymns sung together when he describes the life of monks in his day. He says that they rise at cockcrow for psalmody and prayer, going to rest again a little before light, that after completing the morning prayers and hymns they turn to the reading of the Scriptures, . . . then observe the third, sixth, and ninth hours, and the evening prayers, and, dividing the day into four parts, honour God in each part by psalmody and prayer; . . . and after sitting (at table) a short time, closing all with hymns, take their rest (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Basil again, referring to the custom of monks:—"When the day is ended, thanksgiving for the things that have been supplied to us and been prosperously ordered, and confession of omissions voluntary or otherwise, &c., are made (i.e. in the evening office) . . . and again, at the beginning of the night, prayer (αἴτησις), that our rest may be undisturbed and free from illusions" (Reg. Fus. Tract. Resp. ad Q. 37, § 5). John Climacus, A.D. 564, in his Liber ad Pastorem, says that a certain abbot when vespers were over would order one monk to say ten psalms (psalmodium odaria), another thirty, a third a hundred, before they went to sleep. The present writer has observed no trace in the East within our period to secure any such last act of devotion by appointing a form of prayer for constant use; but in the Latin church the rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530 (cc. 16, 17), speaks of Compline as if it were already as well known as Terce or Sext. He does not claim to introduce it; nor does he offer any explanation. At the same time, his adoption of the new hour would cause it to be widely received. Cassiodorus, who probably borrowed from St. Benedict (see Garet's Dissert. appended to the Life in Cassiod. Opp.), in his commentary on the 119th Psalm, written about 560, remarks on the words, "Seven times a day," &c. (v. 164), "If we desire to understand this number literally, it signifies the seven times at which the pious devotion of the monks solaces itself; i.e. at matins, terce, sext, none, lucernaria (vespers), completoria, nocturns."

The word completorium has been said to refer rather in its origin to the completion of the ordinary acts of daily life (Amalarium De Eccl. Off. lib. iv. c. 8; De Ordine Antiph. c. 7) than to the completion of the daily round of devotion. This is the name of most frequent occurrence, owing evidently to its adoption by St. Benedict (cc. 16, 17); but completa is also found as in the Ordines of Aurelian (Holst. P. ii. p. 112: P. iii. p. 72), and in the work of Isidore De Eccl. Off. (lib. i. c. 21); though in his rule (c. 7) completorium is used. A corrupt reading in the 2nd canon of Merida, A.D. 666, which orders that vespers be said on feasts prius quam sonum has led to the conjecture that in Spain compline was sometimes called somnum. No name is given to the office by Fructuosus of Braga, 656, who appears however to refer to compline when in his rule (c. 2) he says, "In the night season therefore the first hour of the night is to be celebrated with six prayers, &c." After describing the office, he speaks of the manner in which the monks shall retire to rest. When the Greeks at length prescribed a constant form answering to the Latin completorium, they called it ἀπιδειπνον because it followed the last meal of the day.

Perhaps the earliest authority is the Typton ascribed to St. Sabas, who died in the 6th century, but which cannot in its present form be earlier than the 11th.

In some monasteries a ninth office was said, called Lucernarium. There was from an early period a pious custom of praying when lamps were lighted in the evening, an action so marked among the old Romans as to give name to that part of the day (prima fax, or prima lumina). "It seemed good to our fathers," says St. Basil, "not to receive in silence the gift of the evening light, but to give thanks as soon as it appeared. But who was the author of those words of thanksgiving at the lighting of lamps we are unable to tell. The people, however, utter the ancient saying, and by no one have they ever been thought guilty of impiety, who say, 'We praise the Father and the Son and Holy Spirit of God'" (De Spir. Sanct. c. lxxiii.). In the Mozarabic Breviary are the following directions for the performance of this rite:—"A commencement is made by the invocation of JESUS CHRIST (the Lord's Prayer preceding it, 'Lord, have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy; Our Father' being said in a low voice) in a loud voice, 'In the name of Jesus Christ, light with peace;' that is, the light offered. Those who stand round respond 'Thanks be to God.' And the presbyter says, 'The Lord be with you always.' Resp. 'And with thy spirit.' And the order of vespers whether it be a festival or not, follows in this manner. This may be illustrated from other Spanish sources. E.g. the rule of St. Isidore says, "In the evening offices, first the lucernarium, then two psalms, one responsory and lauds, a hymn and prayer are to be said" (cap. 7). The lucernarium is here considered the first part of vespers. The second canon of the council of Merida, 666, mentions that vespers were said "after the offering of the light." In the East the 140th Psalm, called the psalm at the lighting (ἐπιδείπνιον) was said before vespers (Compare Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 35, with lib. ii. c. 59). St. Jerome at Bethlehem:—"Let her be trained to offer the evening sacrifice when the lamp is lighted" (Ad Lactan. Epist. lvii.). Socrates says that "in Greece and at Jerusalem, and in Thessaly they say the prayers at the lighting of lamps very much in the same manner as the Novatians at Constantinople" (Eccl. Hist. lib. v. c. 22). Naturally, vespers which followed these prayers came to be called in some churches by the name of lucernarium, which appeared to be the first part of it; but sometimes the lucernarium was enlarged into a distinct office, said some little time before vespers. Thus the rule falsely ascribed to St. Augustine (Opp. App. i.), after prescribing the psalm for matins, prime, &c., says, "Let the same thing be observed at vespers and compline; but at lucernarium let there be the (proper) psalm, one responsory, three antiphons, three lessons." So in the rules of Aurelian:—"At lucernarium let there be said in the first place at all seasons, both on festivals and ordinary days, a psalm in monotone (directaneus), then two antiphons. In the third place let there be said with Alleluia, one day the hymn Deus, qui certis legibus; another Deus creator omnium, and a little chapter. At Twelfth (vespers) eighteen psalms, an antiphon and hymn, a lesson and little chapter. When ye are about to take your rest, let compline be said in the school in which ye remain" (Regula ad Mon. Holst. P. ii.; Sim. ad Virg. ibid. P. iii.). Here a distinction is clearly made between the lucernarium and vespers. They are distinct offices. It is probable, however, from the paucity of such notices, that the former was treated as a separate service on the same footing with the ancient hours only in a very few communities.

V. Grounds of Observance.—For Matins, reasons of natural piety were often urged, as by St. Basil, "That the first motions of the soul and mind may be dedicated to God, and we admit nothing else into our mind before we have rejoiced in the thought of God" (Reg. Fus. Tr. Resp. ad Q. 37, § 3); and in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 34), "To give thanks because the Lord, causing the night to pass away and the day to come on, hath given us light."

There was the Scriptural reason too, "That the resurrection of the Lord, which took place in the morning, may be celebrated by prayer" (Cyprian, De Or. Dom. u. s.). Similarly, Isid. Hispal. De Eccl. Off. l. i. c. 22; Conc. Aquisgr. cap. 130.

There was a practical reason for the institution of Prime, as well as the ground of religious sentiment, to which we have already had occasion to refer. It was found that the long interval between the matin lauds and terce was often spent in comparative idleness and sloth. The new office was therefore introduced to prevent this (Cassian, Coenob. Inst. l. iii. c. 4). With this statement compare the provision of a Western rule: "After morning prayers let it not be lawful to return to sleep; but when matins are finished let prime be said forthwith. Then let all employ themselves in reading to the third hour" (Aurel. Reg. ad Monach. c. 28).

The third, sixth, and ninth hours, which were observed earlier than any other, were thought to have been selected in honour of the Holy Trinity. Thus St. Cyprian—"We find that the three children with Daniel, strong in faith and conquerors in captivity, observed the third, sixth, and ninth hours for a sacrament of the Trinity, which was to be manifested in the last time; for the first hour coming to the third exhibits the full number of a Trinity, and again the fourth proceeding to the sixth declares another Trinity, and when the ninth is completed by three hours from the seventh a perfect Trinity (i. e. a Trinity of Trinities) is numbered" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). Similarly Isid. Hispal. De Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 19; Concil. Aquisgr. A.D. 816, c. 126. The significance of these hours taken separately will be shown below.

Terce, as we have seen, was the continuation of a Jewish custom, as were Sext and None. But there were Christian reasons of great weight for retaining it. "The Holy Ghost," says Cyprian, "descended on the disciples at the third hour" (De Or. Dom. u. s.; Sim. Basil. u. s.; Resp. ad Q. 37; Hieron. Comm. in Dan. vi. 10; Isid. Hisp. u. s. &c.).

Another ground alleged was that "at that hour the Lord received sentence from Pilate" (Cons. Apost. l. viii. c. 34). St. Mark x. 25 refers the crucifixion to the third hour, i. e. to the third of the twelve hours between sunrise and sunset; but if the condemnation took place between that and sunrise, it was also correctly said in ecclesiastical language to have been at the third hour. So John xix. 14, reckoning apparently from midnight, places the condemnation at "about the sixth hour," which brings it down to the third hour understood of the larger space of time, and reckoned from sunrise.

With reference to Sext, it was observed that St. Peter "at the sixth hour went up to the house-top, and was both by sign and by the voice of God warning him, instructed to admit all to the grace of salvation" (Cypr. u. s. comp. Hieron. u. s.). Another and more important reason was that "The Lord was crucified at the sixth hour" (Cypr. u. s. Sim. Constit. Apost. u. s. Isid. Hispal. u. s. Conc. Aquisgr. u. s.), a statement, which if taken to the letter, can only be reconciled with that of St. Mark, by supposing the "sixth hour" to cover the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the smaller hours. If however it means no more than that our Lord hung on the cross at that hour, it needs no explanation.

None was said to be observed because "Peter and John went up to the temple at the ninth hour of prayer" (St. Basil. u. s.; St. Jerome, u. s.); but more than all because "at the ninth hour Christ washed away our sins with His blood" (Cypr. Constit. Apost. &c. as before).

The pious sentiment which dictated the prayers developed in some religious houses into a distinct office, called lucernarium, came before us while we traced the origin of that rite.

Evensong was especially an office of thanksgiving. St. Basil—"Is the day ended? Thank Him who hath given us the sun to minister to the works of the day" (Hom. in Mart. Julittam, § 2). "In the evening giving thanks that God has given us the night for a season of rest from the labours of the day" (Const. Apost. u. s.).

Another thought is connected with it by St. Cyprian:—"Because Christ is the true sun and the true day, when, at the departure of the sun and day of the world, we pray and beseech that the light may come on us again, we are praying for the coming of Christ, who will give the grace of everlasting light" (De Orat. Dom. u. s.). A third ground of this observance is suggested by Cassian, viz., that the eucharist was "delivered to the apostles by the Lord the Saviour in the evening" (Instit. l. iii. c. 3; so Isidore, De Eccl. Off. l. i. c. 20; Conc. Aquisgr. c. 127); and with this was associated the completion of the passion on the following day towards the evening, and about the time of the evening sacrifice (Isid. &c. u. s.).

For Compline there was the strong natural reason, often alleged for private prayer before going to sleep at night, as e. g. in a tract doubtfully ascribed to St. Chrysostom:—"With what hope wilt thou come to the season of night; with what dreams dost thou expect to converse, if thou hast not walled thyself round with prayers, but goest to sleep unprotected?" (De Precat. Or. I. sub fin.). The zeal of David (Ps. cxxxii. 3-5) was held up as a model:—"This thing ought powerfully to admonish us that, if we wish to be 'a place for the Lord' and desire to be accounted His tabernacle and temple, we should follow the examples of the saints, lest that which is read should be said of us, 'They have slept their sleep, and none of the men of might have found their hands'" (Isid. u. s. l. i. c. 21; so Conc. Aquisgr. c. 128; Raban. u. s. l. ii. c. 7). "Every one," says Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. l. iv. c. 8), "who has even a little sense, knows how many dangers may assail a man from without when sleeping more than when waking. This office is in some sort analogous to that commendation, by which a man commends himself to God, when he is passing away from this world. Sleep is the image of death," &c.

Nocturns originated in the pious custom of prayer when one woke in the night. Tertullian says of the meals of Christians, "They are so filled as they who remember that even in the night God is to be worshipped by them" (Apol. c. 39). St. Cyprian:—"There can be no loss from the darkness of night to those who pray; for there is day even in the night to the sons of light" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). Clemens of Alexandria (Paedag. l. ii. c. 9, § 79):—"Often in the night should we rise from bed and bless God; for happy are they who watch unto Him, thus making themselves like the angels whom we call watchers" (Dan. iv. 13, &c.). "Without this prayer" (i.e. prayer expressed in words), says Origen, "we shall not pass the season of the night in a fit manner" (De Orat. c. 12). He refers to David (Ps. cxix. 62), and St. Paul and Silas (Acts xvi. 25). St. Cyril of Jerusalem asks, "When is our mind more intent on psalmody and prayer? Is it not in the night? When do we most frequently come to the remembrance of our sins? Is it not in the night?" (Catech. ix. § 4). St. Ambrose cites the example of Christ:—"The Lord Himself passed the night in prayer, that by His own example He might invite thee to pray" (Expos. in Ps. cxviii. v. 62; Serm. viii. § 45). Elsewhere he says:—"In thy chamber itself I would have psalms by frequent alternation interwoven with the Lord's Prayer, either when thou hast waked up or before sleep bedews the body, that sleep may find thee at the very entrance on rest free from care of worldly things and meditating on divine" (De Virginibus, lib. iii. c. iv. § 19). "David every night watered his couch with tears; he rose also in the middle of the night that he might confess to God, and dost thou think that the whole night is to be assigned to sleep? Then is the Lord to be the more entreated by thee; then is protection to be (more) sought, fault to be (more) guarded against when there appears to be secrecy, and then above all, when darkness is round about me and walls cover me, must I reflect that God beholds all hidden things" (in Ps. cxviii. Expos. Serm. vii. § 31). The example of our Lord was urged:—"The day is not enough for prayer. We must rise in the night and at midnight. The Lord Himself passed the night in prayer; that He might invite thee to pray by His own example" (ibid. Serm. viii. § 45). St. Hilary, after dwelling on the words of David, adds, "The mind is not to be released by the dangerous idleness of wakefulness in the night, but to be employed in prayers, in pleadings, in confessions of sins; that when occasion is most given to the vices of the body, then above all those vices may be subdued by the remembrance of the divine law" (Tract in Ps. cxviii. lit. vii. § 6). To these motives St. Basil adds, "Let the night supply other grounds of prayer. When thou lookest into the sky and gazest on the beauty of the stars," &c. (Hom. in Mart. Julitt. § 3).

VI. The Times of the Offices.—For Nocturns some rose at cockcrow, as prescribed in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. 34). So St. Chrysostom:—"As soon as the cock crows the prelate is standing by (the sleeping monk), and strikes him as he lies lightly with his foot, and so wakes all straightway" (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Columban's rule says the "middle" of the night (c. 7); and in Gregory of Tours one speaks of himself as rising "about midnight ad reddendum cursum" (Hist. Franc. lib. viii. c. 15). St. Benedict orders his monks to rise for vigils "at the eighth hour of the night in winter; i.e. from the Kalends of November to Easter," but during the rest of the year the time of vigils was to be regulated by that of matins, which it was to precede by a "very short interval" (Reg. cap. 8). Another rule, of the 7th century, orders nocturns to be said before cockcrow in winter, and after it in summer, when it was to be "soon" followed by matins (Regula Magistri, c. 33). In Spain the severe rule of St. Fructuosus prescribed two or three offices for the night according to the season, one "before midnight," and a second "at midnight," throughout the year, and in winter a third "after midnight" (Reg. cap. 3); thus carrying out to the letter the exhortation of St. Jerome to Eustochium, "You should rise twice or thrice in the night" (Epist. xviii.).

From the union of nocturns with matins, of which we have seen the beginning, the double office was at a later period called indifferently, nocturns or matins, or lauds.

Matins, properly so-called, were said in the morning watch, or fourth watch of the night, that is to say, at any part of that space of three natural hours which preceded sunrise. They were to be over by dawn: Post matutinum tempus sequitur diluculum (Amal. de Ord. Antiph. c. 5). St. Benedict ordered matins to be said "when the light began" (Reg. c. 8). If it surprised them at nocturns, the latter were to be shortened (c. 11). So early as the beginning of the 5th century, matins (solemnitas matutina) were "wont to be celebrated in the monasteries of Gaul a short interval of time after the night psalms and prayers were finished" (Cassian, Instit. lib. iii. c. 4).

Prime was said in the first natural hour after sunrise. This appears from Cassian's account of its origin. The monks were to be allowed to rest after matins, "usque ad solis ortum," and were then to rise for the new office (Instit. u. s.). And so, four centuries later, Amalarius:—"We begin the first of the day from the rising of the sun" (De Ord. Ant. c. 6); and Rabanus fixes it "at the beginning of the day when the sun first appears from the east" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii. c. 3).

Terce might originally be said at any part of the three hours which began at sunrise (see before § ii.); but after the institution of prime it could only be said during the two last. It was not in practice always confined to the last; for in the rule of an unknown author, formerly ascribed to St. Jerome, it is expressly provided that on fast-days, terce, sext, and none, be each said an hour earlier than usual (cap. 34; inter Opp. S. Hieron. tom. v. ed. Ben.). See also the rule of St. Benedict, as cited in § ii.

As the lamps were lighted in preparation for evening prayer, the Lucernarium, as a merely preliminary act of devotion would be said immediately before that; and it was in fact as we have seen, often considered an actual part of the office. Where it became a distinct service, there would, we presume, be an interval of some length before vespers began; but we have no information on the subject.

"It becomes evening when the sun sets" (St. Aug. in Ps. xxix. v. 6, Enarr. ii.). Nevertheless vespers were more generally said in the hour before sunset. This is why the office was called Duodecima (see before § iv.). "We celebrate the evening synaxis," observes Amalarius, "about the 12th hour, which hour is about the end of the day" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 6); "most frequently before sunset" (ibid. c. 70; comp. c. 16; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 20; Raban. Maur. De Instit. Cleri, lib. ii. c. 7). Benedict, in fact, made a rule, which must have influenced the custom greatly, that vespers should be said at all seasons while it was yet daylight; and that in Lent, when refection followed vespers, they should be said at such an early hour that the meal might be over before the light failed (Reg. cap. 41). Another authority says, "Vespers ought to be said while the rays of the sun are still declining." "In summer, on account of the short nights, let lucernaria (here vespers) be begun while the sun is still high" (Regula Magistri, c. 34).

The history of compline has shown the proper time of saying, viz. before retiring to rest; and this was the time observed by the monks within our period. Thus a MS. of the Regula of pseudo-Augustine, now 1200 years old:—"After this (i.e. after certain lessons read at night) let the usual psalms be said before sleep" (Note of Bened. editors, App. i. Opp. Aug.). St. Isidore:—"Compline being ended, the brethren, as the custom is, having wished each other good night before sleeping, must keep still with all heed and silence until they rise for vigils" (Reg. c. 7). St. Fructuosus, after prescribing the office of "the first hour of the night," orders his monks to bid each other good-night and retire to their dormitories (Reg. i. c. 2). Another rule forbids the monks to speak, eat, drink, or do any work after compline (Regula Magistri, c. 30). Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. lib. iv. c. 8) tells us that compline was said in the conticinium; i.e. in the third part of the night, reckoning from sunset, when it was divided, as by the Romans, into seven.

When vespers were said earlier compline was put earlier too, and one writer at the close of our period gives it the name of Duodecima (Smaragdus, Comment. in S. Ben. Reg. c. 16). It had already taken possession of the hour so long occupied by vespers. At length it became the common opinion that it ought to be said at the twelfth hour (Francolinus, u. s. cap. 18).

HOUSE. In Aringhi, i. p. 522, ii. 658, are woodcuts of houses from ancient tombs [TOMB]. This, perhaps, refers to the grave as the house of the dead, an idea or expression inherited from heathenism (Horace Carm. i. iv. 19, and Boldetti, p. 463; even Domus Aeterna, Perret v. pl. 36, x. 110), or to the deserted house of the soul, the buried body (2 Cor. v. i.), "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God," &c. In one of the plates from Aringhi above referred to (ii. 658) there is a house of the grave, with a small mummy of Lazarus; laid up alone (depositus or repositus) to abide the resurrection. The houses of Jerusalem and Bethlehem, representing the Jewish and Gentile churches, occur frequently in ancient paintings and mosaics. [BETHLEHEM.] How far the word Beth, as part of Bethlehem ("house of bread"), may be connected with the Christian import of this symbol, is hard to say. [R. St. J. T.]

HUCKSTERS. The mind of the church has of course always been against all unprincipled gain in traffic, even when permitted by law and custom. Adulterators or fraudulent dealers (κάπηλοι) are enumerated (Apost. Constt. iv. 6, § 2) among those whose oblations are not to be received.^a And again (Ib. viii. 32, § 5) the κάπηλος is classed with the stage-players and dancers, among those who must abandon their profession before they can be admitted to the church. Lactantius (Div. Inst. V. c. 16) emphatically rejects the doctrine of Carneades, that the seller is not bound to declare the faults of the article which he has for sale, and insists that the Christian conscience requires perfect frankness and openness in such a matter. In the same spirit St. Augustine (Tract. 41 in Joan.) puts fraud on the same level as fornication and theft, and gives high praise (De Trin. xiii. 3) to one who, in buying a book, declined to overreach the seller, who was ignorant of its value. So, too, Hilary (on Ps. cxix. [cxviii. Vulg.] 139) enumerates cheating (falsitates) among the things which make our bodies a den of thieves. In short, all kinds of unprincipled dealers (ραδιουργοί) and sorcerers, all who give short weight or measure (υποκορεύσται καὶ δολομέτραι) are condemned (Apost. Constt. iv. 6, § 1).

Tertullian (De Idolol. c. 11; cf. Epiphanius, Expos. Fid. c. 24) and some others regard with disfavour all gain derived from mere buying and selling of goods, considering the labour of the hands the proper means of earning a living. But Leo the Great (Epist. 92, ad Rustic. c. 9) reasonably distinguishes between honest and unprincipled gain (quaestus honestus aut turpis); the culpability or innocence of gain (he holds) depends upon its character; there is no harm in profit not derived from fraudulent practice. HUMERALE. [AMICE.]

HUNTING. Field-sports have been under the censure of the church from an early period, and in the many canons relating to them there is very little trace of any disposition to relax the severity of absolute prohibition, or to allow exceptional cases in which they might be necessary or desirable.

By the 55th canon of the council of Agde (C. Agathense), A.D. 544, bishops and presbyters are forbidden to keep hawks and hounds for the chase under penalty of three months' excommunication in the case of bishops, and of two months' in the case of priests, and of one in the case of deacons. The same abstinence is enjoined on bishops, presbyters and deacons, under the same penalty by the 4th canon of the council of Epaon. By the 3rd canon of the council of Soissons, not only bishops, presbyters and deacons, but all ecclesiastical persons (clerici) are forbidden to hunt with hounds or to take out hawks. In the 8th canon of the third council of Tours, priests are cautioned against the hunting of birds and wild animals, and the second council of Châlons (c. 9) addresses a similar warning against devoting their time to "hounds, hawks, and falcons," to laity as well as to clergy. It seems that certain bishops kept dogs under the pretence that they were necessary for the defence of their houses; but they are reminded by the 13th canon of the second council of Maçon, A.D. 585, that not "barks but hymns, not bites but good works" are the proper protection of a bishop's house, which ought to welcome and not repel men, and certainly not subject any who came for the relief of their sorrows to the risk of being torn by dogs.

Among prohibitions against the same pursuits, issued by individuals, is to be found a letter of Boniface, bishop of Mayence (Epist. 105), probably written on the authority of pope Zachary, forbidding "huntings and excursions with dogs through the woods, and the keeping of hawks and falcons;" and the same prohibition is repeated, totidem verbis, in the 2nd canon of the council of Liptine, A.D. 743, over which Boniface presided. In the Liber Poenitentialis of pope Gregory III. one year's penance is decreed against one in minor orders (clericus), two years' against a deacon, and three years' against a priest, for hunting.

Ferreolus, bishop of Uzès, in his Rule (about A.D. 558), forbids his monks to hunt and hawk on the ground that such pursuits dissipate the mind; he allows them however to set dogs at the wild animals which waste their crops, but only that they may "drive them away, not that they may catch them." Jonas, bishop of Orleans, A.D. 821-844, (de Institut. laic. ii. 23, quoted by Thomassin), vents his indignation against the nobles for spending so much money on hawks and hounds instead of on the poor; and is even more fierce against them for the hardships and cruelties which for the sake of their sport they inflicted on the poor. The frequent recurrence of these prohibitions and the number of years over which they extend, show how rooted was the taste for field-sports among the Teutonic clergy; and the language of some of the canons indicates that these sports sometimes became as oppressive as the Forest Laws of the Middle Ages.

Looking on, or being present at the hunting, or baiting, or fighting of wild animals in the amphitheatre is just as strictly forbidden. The council in Trullo (Quinisextum), can. 51, orders both laity and clergy to avoid "the spectacles of huntings," on pain of excommunication, and hunting is so frequently mentioned in connection with games, dances, and dramatic performances, that it must be concluded that the sports of the amphitheatre are intended. The Codex Eccl. Africanæ (c. 61) entreats the emperors to put an end to spectacles on great festivals, such as the octave of Easter, and begs that no Christian may be compelled to attend them. By the council of Mayence (addit. 3, c. 27) it is ordered that, if any ecclesiastical person attend any spectacle he is liable to three years' suspension. By the 3rd council of Tours and the second council of Châlons, quoted above, the condemnation of hunting is coupled with that of theatrical spectacles, so that to look at a spectacle of hunting in the amphitheatre would be by the same act to commit two offences against the canon. The 8th canon of the council of Friuli (Forojuliense) issued a canon against the worldly pomps and vanities in vogue, in which "huntings" are mentioned with other amusements manifestly scenic.

Theodosius the younger abolished contests between men and brutes in the circus on the ground that "cruel sights made him shudder" (Socrates, H.E. vii. 22).

HYDROMANTIA. The Decretum Gratiani (cau. 26, qu. 5, c. 14, § 3) has the following in the enumeration of magic arts which are condemned:—"Hydromantici ab aquâ dicti; est enim Hydromantia in aquæ inspectione umbras daemonum evocare, et imagineas ludificationes eorum videre, ibique ab eis aliqua audire, ubi adhibito sanguine etiam inferos perhibentur suscitare." The chapter from which this is extracted is taken wholly from Rabanus De Magorum Praestigis, which is again a compilation from Augustine and Isidore of Seville. The passage of Augustine on which the account of Hydromantia is mainly founded is De Civ. Dei, vii. 35, and is to this effect; that Numa, having no real divine inspiration, was compelled to practise hydromancy, so as to see in water images, or rather false semblances (ludificationes), of the gods, and learn from them what he was to ordain with regard to the sacra of his people; and from this use of water for divining purposes (says Varro) Numa gained the reputation of having consulted the nymph Egeria.

It is evident (as indeed Augustine says) that this hydromancy was a form of necromancy. What was its exact nature is not apparent, but it was probably similar to the divining by means of a mirror, or of a dark fluid poured into the palm of the hand, which is frequently mentioned in accounts of magic. [C.]

HYDROMYSTA (ὕδρομύστης), the person who had the care of the holy water in a church, and sprinkled with it those who entered (Synesius, Epist. 121, quoted in Macri Hierolox. s. v.). [C.]

HYMN (the Cherubic). A hymn so called from the reference to the cherubim which it contains, which occurs in the chief eastern liturgies shortly after the dismissal of the catechumens, and immediately preceding the "great entrance" (i.e. that of the elements). It is found in the same position in the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark; and also in the Armenian, in which however it is only sung on special occasions, other hymns being appointed in its place on other days. It is not found in the "heretical liturgies;" which, inasmuch as these underwent less alteration than the orthodox, is an argument against the antiquity of the hymn. Cedrenus (Dupin Bibl. des Aut. Eccles. 11me Siècle) a Greek monk who flourished towards the middle of the 11th century, and who wrote "annals" from the creation of the world down to the reign of Isaac Comnenus, says that Justinian first ordered it to be sung in the churches; and it appears to have been composed about that time. Its object is described as being to excite the minds of the faithful to a devout attention to the mysteries about to be celebrated. While it is being sung, the priest says secretly a prayer called "the prayer of the cherubic hymn." The words of the hymn are: οἱ τὰ χερουβιμ μυστικῶς εἰκονίζοντες, καὶ τῷ ζωοποιῷ Τριᾷδι τὸν τρισάγιον ὕμνον ᾄδοντες, πᾶσαν τὴν βιωτικὴν ἀποθάρσυναν μέρωσαν, ὡς τὸν βασιλεῖα τῶν ὅλων ὑποδεξάμενοι ταῖς ἀγγελικαῖς ὁράταις δορυφορομενὸν τᾶξεσιν. [H. J. H.]

HYMNARIUM. The book containing the hymns sung in the services of the church. Genadius (De Script. Eccl. c. 49) says that Paulinus of Nola composed "Sacramentarium et Hymnarium;" see Gavanti, Thes. Sacr. Rituum, ii. 115. Pelliccia (Politia, i. 159) gives Cantionalii, Libri Chorales, as common designations of such books, but supplies no instances of their use. [C.]

HYMNISTA, a singer of hymns in the church. Thus Prudentius (i. 118):

"Stat nunc hymnistae pro receptis parvulis," where the irregularity of the metre is not

CHRIST. ANT.

perhaps a sufficient reason for arbitrary correction (Macri Hierolox. s. v.). Obbar, however, reads,

"State nunc, hymnite matres pro receptis parvulis."

[C.]

HYMNOLOGIA (ὕμνολογία) seems to be equivalent to the service chanted at the Hours. Thus Gregory of Tours (Hist. Rem. c. 25) says that St. Remi with the brothers, "horarum laudes persolvebat hymnologiarum," meaning (seemingly) that he observed the course set down in the Hymnologies, the term being used so as to include psalms, canticles, antiphons, etc. Macro (Hierolox. s. v.) supposes that Dionysius, the Pseudo-Areopagite (Hierarch. Eccl. iii. 2), when he speaks of ἡ καθολικὴ ὕμνολογία having been uttered as a confession (προσμολογηθείσης) before the elements were placed on the altar, meant the Creed. This is of course possible, and Pachymeres (Paraphr. in loco) seems to have taken it so; for they had, he says, even then, μάθημά τι καὶ συμμᾶθημα πιστεύας [CREED]. [C.]

HYMNS. In the following article no attempt will be made to deal with the literary or theological history of Christian hymnody. All that can be here undertaken is to give a sketch of what is known respecting the liturgical use of hymns within the limits to which this work is restricted. Much of the difficulty connected with the subject arises from our uncertainty as to how much was covered by the word ὕμνος in early Christian writers. Almost everything sung, or rhythmically recited, which was not one of the Davidic Psalms, was called a hymn, or said to be "hymned." Even as late as the middle of the ninth century, Walafrid Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 25) warns us that by "hymns" he does not mean merely such metrical hymns as those of Hilary, Ambrose, Prudentius, or Bede, but such other acts of praise as are offered in fitting words and with musical sounds. He adds that still in some churches there were no metrical hymns, but that in all "generales hymni, id est laudes," were in use. The well-known passage of St. Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. lxxii.), which was for centuries the formal definition of a hymn in every ritual writer, gives us the same rule. A hymn might or might not be in verse; but it was always something meant to be sung, and sung as an act of divine worship. So Gregory Nazianzen defines a hymn as αλως ἑμμελής. Further, Christian writers gradually learned to use the term in contradistinction to the Psalm of the Old Dispensation; though both words were for a time interchangeable.

It is obvious that from the very first, Gentile disciples must have sought and found some further expression for the praise of God than the translation of Hebrew Psalms, or of the canticles from the Hebrew prophets, could afford. But at what period Christian songs of praise first found their place in common worship, it is impossible to say. None can tell in what words Paul and Silas "ᾄδοντες τὸν Θεόν" in prison (Acts xvi. 25); nor can we say with certainty that the rhythmic passages in the Epistles (e. g. Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 15, 16; 2 Tim. ii. 11-13) are quotations from hymns, though this has been frequently maintained. The parallel passages, again, Eph. v. 19, 20, and Col. iii. 16, 17, though evidently pointing to some form of Christian song, yet appear to connect these with social and festive gatherings rather than with worship. Probably they bore the same relation to the forms used in public worship which the Spiritual Songs of Luther, the "Ghostly Psalms" of Coverdale, or the early Wesleyan hymns, did to the existing forms of service in their day; and it may be that, like some of the first and last of these, they were subsequently adopted into divine service. This we know to have been the case at a later period with the ὁὐς ἱερῶν referred to by St. Basil (De Sp. Sancto, c. 29) as being (in his time) of ancient use; it is still, as is well known, a part of the daily office of the Greek church. If this hymn were really the work of Athenagenes († 169), it would doubtless be the earliest hymn now in use; but a reference to the passage in St. Basil will show that he did not believe Athenagenes to be the author. This hymn, with the early form of the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS, the latter being given as the morning hymn of the church in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 48 Coteler.), probably represent in their rhythmic but unmetrical structure many early Christian hymns now lost. Of the existence of such hymns, from the time of Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (Epist. 97), we have abundant evidence. The "hymning to God the giver of all good things," by the Roman Christians after the martyrdom of Ignatius (Mart. S. Ign. vii.), may have been a burst of extemporaneous thanksgiving; but early in the following century a Roman writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 28) tells us how ψαλμοὶ δὲ ὅσοι καὶ ῥῥαὶ ἀδελφῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὑπὸ πιστῶν γραφεῖσθαι, τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν Χριστὸν ὑμνοῦσι θεολογοῦντες; and again the Clementine Epitome De gestis Petri, § 152, refers to ἱερῶν ὕμνων εὐχὴν as a part of worship. Of Alexandria, again, Origen testifies (c. Celsum, viii. c. 67) ὕμνους γὰρ εἰς μόνον τὸν ἐπὶ πᾶσι λεγόμενον Θεὸν καὶ τὸν μονογενῆ αὐτοῦ Θεὸν λόγον [al. τ. κ. α. λόγον καὶ Θεόν]. (Cf. also Fragm. in Ps. 148.)

Again, an early tradition reported by Socrates (H. E. vi. 8) attributes to Ignatius the introduction of antiphonal singing at Antioch, as the result of a vision of the angelic worship which was revealed to him [ANTIPHON]. The monks of the Syrian deserts, in the time of Sozomen (H. E. vi. 33, 2) continued in prayers and hymns according to the rule of the church (θέσμον τῆς ἐκκλησίας). The point to which all these allusions tend is the very early use of hymns both in the East and West. Of the East, indeed, we can speak more positively. The Epistle of the second council of Antioch (A.D. 269) to the bishops of Rome and Alexandria, against Paul of Samosata, makes it one of the charges against him, that he had "put a stop to the psalms that were sung to our Lord Jesus Christ, as being innovations, the work of men of later times;" while, to the horror of every one, he had appointed women to say psalms on Easter Day in his own honour (εἰς ἑαυτὸν) [Euseb. H. E. vii. 30]. This last expression may simply refer to his position on a throne of unusual height and dignity in the church; and it is not unlikely that Paul sought to confine the singing strictly to Jewish psalmody. Another inference deducible from this passage is that metrical hymns were as yet unknown in Antioch. It is a disputed point whether metre was used in divine service before the fourth century; but probabilities are against its use. If used at all, it must have been in Greek hymns, for reasons which will presently appear. No metrical hymns are now used in the Orthodox Eastern church, but all its ecclesiastical verse since the eighth century has been simply rhythmic and accentual, like the earliest Latin sequences; but it is impossible to say whether for a time metrical hymns found their way into Greek offices. The so-called "earliest Christian hymn," the epilogue of Clement of Alexandria to his Παιδαγωγός, is not, except in a loose modern sense, a hymn at all. The same may be said of the sacred verses of Gregory Nazianzen; those of Sophronius approach nearer to the hymnic form, but it is unlikely that his Anacreontic verse could have found its way into divine service.

The fourth century, however, saw a great impulse given to the liturgical use of hymns successively in Syria, Constantinople, and the West, under the influence of three eminent men, and with the same object, the enlisting popular feeling on the side of orthodoxy in times of fierce controversy. The earliest of these movements was that of Ephraim at Edessa. Greek metres and music were introduced into Syriac either by Bardaisan [see BARDESANES in DICTIONARY OF CHR. BIOGR.], or (more probably) by his son Harmonius, whose hymns Ephraim found to be so popular, that he felt anxious to counteract their influence by the substitution of orthodox hymns which might be sung to the same tunes. According to the Syriac life of St. Ephraim (quoted by Augusti), he trained choirs of virgins to sing to these tunes hymns which he proceeded to write on the Nativity, Baptism, Fasting, Passion and Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord, and on other divine mysteries; to which he added others on the martyrs, on penitence, and on the departed. The young women of this association attended divine service on the festivals of our Lord, and of martyrs, and on Sundays; Ephraim himself standing in the midst, and leading them (cf. Sozomen, H. E. iv. 16; Theodoret, iv. 29). From that time forward metrical hymnody became a fixed element in the worship of the Syriac-speaking churches, and has filled a very large place not only in their daily offices, but in the Eucharistic, and indeed in all others. It is not so easy to understand precisely what was effected in Constantinople under Chrysostom; because we do not know what singing was already in use in the churches there. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 24) attributes the introduction of antiphonal singing into Constantinople to two priests under Constantine, named Flavian and Diodorus. In most ritual matters Constantinople followed the lead of Antioch; and this custom may have been an imitation of what was already in use there. We cannot doubt, however, that the device of Chrysostom for silencing or outbidding the Arians, as related by Sozomen (H. E. viii. 8, 1-5), led to a much freer and more abundant use of hymns in divine service. The Arians had been expelled by Theodosius from the churches of the city; but their numbers were still very great, and they had places of assembly outside the walls. On Saturdays and Sundays they assembled in crowds in the open spaces of the city, singing Arian hymns and antiphons, and went in procession, with these hymns, to their churches. Chrysostom determined to organize rival processions of the orthodox. The empress Eudocia entered into the scheme, and a eunuch of the imperial household was instructed to furnish the necessary materials for the ceremonial, at her expense. It is curious to find that these included not merely crosses and torches, but also hymns; so unimportant did the words sung appear to Chrysostom in reference to the end in view. But whether the hymns were good or bad, the midnight processions popularised their use; and from the night offices of the church they seem to have passed into other hours. The midnight singing of the "Golden Canon" of St. John Damascene, so graphically described by Neale (Hymns of Eastern Ch. p. 35), which forms so marked and picturesque a feature of the Greek Easter, is doubtless the true historical representation of Chrysostom's nocturnal processions (cf. Socrates, vi. 8; Cassiodorus, Hist. Trip. x. 8; Nicephorus, viii. 8, 9). It was not, however, according to Neale (u. s. p. 13), till the period of the Iconoclastic controversy (A.D. 726-820) that Greek hymnology reached its full development. Its great names are Andrew of Crete (660-732), John Damascene († 780), Cosmas the melodist († 760), Theophanes (759-818), Theodore of the Studium († 826), and Methodius († 836). How marvellous its development was may be gathered from the fact alleged by Neale that out of the five thousand quarto pages, which he computes to be the contents of the whole body of Greek office-books, at least four thousand are poetry. For a full and elaborate account of the structure and contents of a Greek canon, or group of odes, which forms the staple of the morning office, the reader is referred to the articles CANON (p. 277) and ODE. The other subsidiary forms of hymn are explained in the same volume.

By a singular coincidence the establishment of hymnody as a constant element of divine service in the West, had been brought about, a few years before, by similar disputes between Arians and Catholics. The facts are related by Augustine, who, with his mother Monica, was at Milan at the time (Conf. IX. vii.), as well as more briefly by Paulinus, St. Ambrose's deacon (Vita S. Amb. p. 80; ed. Bened. Paris, 1632). St. Ambrose, in consequence of his refusal to give up to the empress Justina one of the basilicas of Milan for Arian worship at Easter, A.D. 385, had incurred her resentment. In the following year sentence of exile was passed upon him. He refused to obey; and the population, who were devoted to him, guarded the gates of his house, and kept watch night and day in his church, to defend him from capture by the imperial troops. This company of perpetual watchers Ambrose organized into a band of perpetual worshippers. A course of offices, psalmody, prayer, and hymns, was established, and once established, became a permanent institution [HOURS OF PRAYER]. Augustine expressly says that this was an imitation of the Eastern custom; by which he probably means the course of daily and nightly psalmody and prayer—the practice of Oriental ascetics, both Jewish (cf. Philo de Viâ contemplatâ, c. x. [ii. 484, Mangey] quoted by Euseb. H. E. ii. 17) and Christian.

But it is especially to these services organized by St. Ambrose, as all subsequent writers agree, that we of the Western churches owe the incorporation into our offices of metrical hymnody (cf. Isidore of Seville, de Eccl. Off. i. 6; Walafrid Strabo, de Rebus Eccl. xxv. &c. and Paulinus, l. c.). Unlike Chrysostom, Ambrose was able to supply his congregations with words, and himself to set them to music (see AMBROSIAN MUSIC, and Koch, Kirchenlied, vol. i. pp. 61, sqq.). Of the metrical hymns which are undoubtedly his, Biraghi (Inni Sinceri di Sant' Ambrogio) enumerates eighteen, Koch twenty-one. But Milan became a school of Ambrosian hymnody, which has left its mark upon the whole of the West. Ninety-two hymns of this school are given by Daniel (Thes. Hymn. vol. i.). Yet, though Ambrose is the true founder of metrical hymnody in the West, it is possible that hymns were already in use elsewhere. Hilary of Poitiers is sometimes spoken of as the first to introduce them; he certainly was a hymn writer, and his hymn "Lucis largitor optime (al. splendide)," sent from his exile in Phrygia, as early as A.D. 358, to his daughter Abra, found its way into church use. Pseudo-Alcuin (de Div. Off. § 10) attributes to him the completion, in its present Western form, of the "Gloria in Excelsis," and it is at least possible that he may have introduced other innovations, especially as some of his hymns (notably a well-known Lenten one, "Jesu quadragenariæ," though common in Germany and England, were not in use in Italy. The work of St. Gregory the Great is not, as a hymnographer, distinct from that of St. Ambrose; he introduced no new species of hymn, nor, it would appear, any new use for hymns; his ritual and liturgical work lay in other directions, though he made many important contributions to the now rapidly increasing stock of metrical hymns. But the progress of hymnody for the next four centuries will be best illustrated by a table of the sources from which the leading Breviary hymns have been derived. In the subjoined list, the numbers in the first column are from Daniel, who, without attempting perfect accuracy, arranges under the name of each author the hymns traditionally assigned to him; those in the second column from Koch, who has endeavoured to assign to each author the hymns known to be his, but has not consulted so wide a range of breviaries as Daniel:—

The use of Ambrosian and other hymns of Italian origin was much extended by the establishment of the monastic orders, each with its own set of offices for the hours. Benedict especially is expressly mentioned by Walafrid Strabo as having inserted in his offices many Ambrosian hymns. Other countries began, as the above lists will show, to produce hymnographers of their own, especially Spain, of whose rich store of hymns the Mozarabic Breviary is an evidence. There are signs, however, that this influx of hymns did not everywhere meet with favour. The complaint made by the orthodox against heretics that they had innovated, could now be turned against themselves (Ambrose, Ep. 873, 72); and among Catholics there were some who doubted, like the Genevan reformers later, whether it were right to use in worship any but the words of Scripture. Others, as time went on, became accustomed to the Ambrosian hymns, but hesitated to receive fresh ones. At the second council of Tours (567-8), by canon 23, the admission of other hymns of merit, in addition to the Ambrosian, was formally sanctioned. At Toledo, again, complaints were made that some still rejected the hymns of Hilary and Ambrose, as not scriptural (Walafrid Strabo, l. c.). At length, on Dec. 5, 633, at the fourth council of Toledo, under the presidency of Isidore, a canon (c. 13) was passed threatening with excommunication all in France or Spain who opposed the use of hymns in divine service. Yet, as we have seen, there were still some churches, even in the ninth century, which did not admit metrical hymns into their offices.

Two points remain to be noticed—the metre of Latin hymns, and the offices to which they were restricted.

Ambrose found in the Iambic Dimeter (our present L. M.) a metre admirably adapted to the concise and solemn language of his hymns, and equally well fitted for singing. This accordingly has been the normal metre of Latin hymnology, down to the invention of sequences. But it was by no means used in strict conformity to classical models; accent and quantity, it must be confessed, were both at times disregarded. Some attempts were made, however, at other metres. Among the so-called Ambrosian hymns appears one on St. John Baptist, in four-line stanzas of Alcaic Hendecasyllables—and four others, one for fair weather, one for rain, and two in time of war, in a peculiar form of the lesser Asclepiad, with spondee instead of dactyl in the last place.

— — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — —
"Almi prophetae | progeni | es pia,"

— — — — — | — — — — — || — — — — — | — — — — —
"Obdurexere polum nubila coeli."

The poems of Prudentius, not being originally intended for church song, supply other irregularities, as Iambic Trimeter—

"O Nazarene, lux Bethlem, verbum Patris," and the Anacreontic (Iamb. Dim. Catal.)—

"Cultor Dei memento."

The fine cento from his "Da puer plectrum," beginning—

"Corde natus ex Parentis ante mundi exordium," first introduced into church song the Trochaic Tetrameter Catalectic of Greek tragedy, which has been so great and permanent a gain. He has also a hymn in stanzas of four Sapphic lines (without the final Adonius)—

"Inventor rutili dux bone luminis."

Two centos from Fortunatus—

"Crux benedicta nitet, dominus qua carne pendit," and the well-known "Salve festa dies," are the earliest instances of elegiac verse in church song. It is to be noted that both were processional. St. Gregory the Great wrote Sapphic hymns for the hours—

"Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes," and

"Ecce jam noctis tenuatur umbra," and thenceforth their use was not infrequent.

A few other irregularities may be mentioned, but they are unimportant.

The use of hymns till now was threefold: (1) as processional; (2) in the canonical hours; (3) at certain special offices, such as the Benediction of Paschal tapers, &c. As yet no metrical hymns were used in any part of the Eucharistic office. Walafrid Strabo mentions, however, that Paulinus "Patriarcha Forojuliensis" (Paulinus of Aquileia) had frequently, especially in private masses, introduced hymns either of his own or of others, "circa immolationem sacramentorum" (i.e. at the Illation or Preface following the Sursum corda). He adds that so great a man would not have done this without authority or reason. It is possible, therefore, that there were other instances of the interpolation of hymns into the Mass. One such is known to us, the verses attributed by Daniel to Eugenius of Toledo—sung as a Communio, or Antiphona ad accedentes, before the reception of the elements; Neale (Chr. Remembrancer, Oct. 1853) assigns this to the seventh or eighth century. These exceptional uses were foreshadowings of the great outburst of sequences in the beginning of the tenth century, which was destined to add so much to the splendour and variety of Latin hymnody.

"Sancti venite, corpus Christi sumite,"

HYPACOE (ὑπακοή). Certain rhythmic compositions, or hymns, which follow upon and echo (as it were) the sense of that which preceded, are called ὑπακοαί, because they depend upon (ὑπακούουσιν) that which has gone before, as a servant on a master. This is the explanation of Coresi. Goar, however (quoted in Daniel's Codex, iv. 723), prefers the explanation, that such hymns relate some wonderful work of God, by listening to which the church may be edified. Neither explanation is perhaps quite satisfactory, but the latter can scarcely be considered to give any reason at all why these hymns should be called Hypacoe more than many other parts of the office. [C.]

HYPAPANTE (often written HYPANTE), a name given to the festival of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, from her meeting (ὑπαπαντή) with Simeon and Anna in the Temple. [MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.] [C.]

HYPATIUS, bishop of Gangra in Paphlagonia, θαυματουργός; commemorated March 31 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

HYPOCAUSTORIUM, a room warmed by a hypocaust, or furnace under the floor. Thus Thiadildis, abbess of Freckenhorst, in Westphalia, is said to have built in her monastery "refectorium hiemale et aestivale, hypocaustorium, dormitorium, cellarium, domum arearum, etc." (Vita S. Thiad. c. 7, in Acta Sanctorum, 30 January, App. vol. ii.). [C.]

HYPOPSALMA (ὑπόψαλμα), a particular manner of chanting the Psalms. The Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57, § 5) give the direction, "after every two lections let some other chant (ψαλλέτω) the hymns of David, and let the people chant responsive (ὑποψαλλέτω) the ends of the verses." Such a replication of the body of the congregation to the voice of the single chanter was called ὑπόψαλμα. Compare ANTI-PHON (Bingham's Ant. XIV. i. 12). [C.]

ΙΧΘΥΣ. (Compare FISH, p. 673.) The fish is found in an allegoric or symbolic sense in the ancient remains of almost every nation. Among the Assyrian fragments discovered by Mr. Layard, for instance, are frequent instances of monsters partly formed of fish. See, as examples, Monuments of Nineveh, pl. 39, 67 B, 68, 71, 72, &c. The gem figured on p. 674 of this work, in which a man appears covered with the skin of a fish, is probably a representation of this kind of monster, rather than of the Apostolic fisherman. The coins of Tyre and Phœnicia, maritime nations, show on their coins fish, or monsters ending in fish. The same object is found on Egyptian monuments, though much more sparingly, for the fish was an abomination to the Egyptians (Clemens Alex. Strom. vii. 6; p. 850, Potter; compare v. 7, p. 670). Nor is the symbolic fish wanting in the remains of the Indo-Germanic races (Sir W. Jones in Asiatic Researches, i. p. 230; Ann. de Philosophie Chrét. v. p. 430). The dolphin in particular is continually represented in art and lauded by the poets; and we not unfrequently meet with allusions to a mysterious fish, the κάλλιχθυσ, from the presence of which all noxious things fled away: Ἐν τοῖς καὶ κάλλιχθυσ ἐπάννυμος, ἱερὸς ἰχθύς (Oppian. Halieut. i. 185).

When we find it in Christian symbolism, the question arises, whether the fish, like so many other symbols and formulae, was adopted by the early Christians from the already existing art? Looking at the general character of early Christian art, considering its constant adoption even of symbols and representations obviously pagan, it would seem probable that special sense was given to an already existing mode of representation. And this particular symbolism seems to have been determined by the discovery of the acrostic ἰχθύς, from which the fish, many times mentioned in the gospels, received a mystic significance.

It is quite uncertain when it was first observed that the word ἰχθύς is formed of the initials of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Τύς Σωτήρ. We may perhaps assume, that whenever the fish was recognised as the symbol of the Lord, it was in consequence of the acrostic meaning having been discovered, and, if this was the case, it must have been recognised from the very earliest days of Christianity. The Clavis attributed to Melito of Sardis, which, if genuine, belongs to the middle of the second century, lays it down that Piscis=Christus (c. iv. § xl.; Spicil. Solesm. ii. 173); but the date and character of that work, although Dom P'tra seems to entertain no doubts, cannot be considered as beyond question. The Sibylline verses give (lib. viii. 217-250) the famous acrostic on the letters of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χρεῖστος Θεοῦ Τύς Σωτήρ, σταυρός. At the time when this was written, the mystic meaning of ἰχθύς was clearly recognised, but the date of the verses is by no means certain. Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. iii. 11, § 59; see GEMS, p. 712) numbers the fish among Christian symbols, but does not state its special significance; elsewhere (Strom. vi. 11, § 94) he regards the "five barley loaves and two small fishes" as typical of the preparatory discipline of Jews and Gentiles. In Clement's contemporary Tertullian we arrive at firmer ground; he writes (De Baptismo, c. i.) "Nos pisciculi, secundum ΙΧΘΥΝ aëstrum, in aqua nascimur." Here we have both the primary and the secondary application of the fish-symbol. First, the Fish is Christ, and that clearly as ΙΧΘΥΣ, showing that Tertullian had the acrostic in his mind; secondly, they who are born of Christ are in their turn "smaller fishes," a symbolism which also took a firm hold on the mind of the early Church, and is often alluded to [FISHERMAN, p. 674]; thirdly, a fresh significance is added to the conception of the believer as the fish, inasmuch as it is through the water of baptism that they are born from above. It is to be observed that Tertullian gives no explanation of the ΙΧΘΥΣ which would be intelligible to the uninitiated; the symbol, whether written or pictured, was part of the secret language of the early Church. This reticence was probably maintained during the centuries of persecution; but when the need of concealment ceased, we find the true significance of the symbol proclaimed. Thus, the writer of the work De promission. et benedict. Dei, attributed to Prosper of Aquitaine (ii. 39), seems to give positive testimony on this point. "ΙΧΘΥΝ, latine piscem, sacris litteris majores nostri interpretati sunt, hoc ex sibyllinis versibus colligentes." Augustine, too, speaking of the Sibyl, says (De civit.

Dei, xviii. 23), "If you join the first letters of the five Greek words Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός, Θεοῦ, Υἱός, Σωτήρ, you will have ΙΧΘΥΣ, fish, in which word Christ is mysteriously designated. Compare Optatus c. Donatist. iii. 2. And when the Empire became Christian, and it was no longer necessary for Christians to conceal the great object of their faith under a symbol, its use began to decline. De Rossi, the highest authority on such a matter, assures us that at Rome, at least, it is scarcely ever found in cemeteries formed after the age of Constantine, but is almost confined to the catacombs, and to the most ancient portions of these. It was, he believes, growing obsolete in the 4th century, and was scarcely ever used merely as a symbol, whether at Rome or in the provinces, in the 5th. The symbolic fish, indeed, is found on an ambo in the church of St. John and St. Paul at Ravenna, which is shown by an inscription to be of the year 597; and the ΙΧΘΥΣ is found on the large cross in the apse of St. Apollinaris in Classe, near the same city, which Ciampini* (Vet. Mon. ii. 79, ed. 2) maintains to be a work of the year 567. These, however, are rather instances of the use of ancient symbols by an artist for decorative purposes, than of the continued use of the symbol, as such. When the symbols occur in inscriptions, where mere ornament is evidently not intended, we may be sure that they are still used as a sign for believers. In representations of scenes from the gospels, or from hagiology, fish are of course found in all ages of Christian art.

Although the ΙΧΘΥΣ was originally an acrostic, there is only one ancient inscription known in which it actually appears as such. In all other cases it stands separate, at the beginning or end of an inscription, or both; generally it is written horizontally in the ordinary manner, but sometimes vertically (Fabretti, Inscript. Expl. p. 329; compare GEMS, p. 714). It would indeed be impossible to arrange ΙΧΘΥΣ as an acrostic in a Latin inscription, and all the ΙΧΘΥΣ monuments which have come down to us are Latin, with the one exception just referred to. This famous slab was found in the year 1839, beneath the surface, in an ancient cemetery^b near Autun, and was first published by Dom (now Cardinal) Pitra (Annales de Phil. Chrét. 2^e sér. t. xix. p. 195). Since that time a considerable literature has gathered round it. It is a sepulchral inscription over one Pectorius, son of Aschandius. It is imperfect, but as to the restoration of the first six lines there is no very great difference of opinion among palaeographers and scholars. Mr. W. B. Marriott (Testimony, p. 118) gives the inscription thus:

Ἰχθύος οὐρανόθεν ἄγων γένος ἡγορι σεμνῷ
Χρῆσε λαβὼν [ζωὴν] ἀμβροτον ἐν βροτέοις Θεοσεπίων ὑδάτων τὴν σὴν, φίλε, θάλλεο ψυχὴν

* Ciampini misreads the ΙΧΘΥΣ; but Gori (Diptych. iii. 251) gives the correct reading.

^b It is noteworthy that this cemetery is locally called, not cimetière, but polyandrie, i.e. πολυάνδριον—a curious relic of the time when Greek was spoken at Autun. Probably this was the very name used in the time of Gregory of Tours, who, in his ignorance of Greek, took it for a Gallic word (De Gloria Confess. c. 73, quoted by Marriott, Testimony, p. 127).

Ἰχθῶσιν ἀνάνοις πλουτοδότου σοφίης,

For ζῶν he should perhaps read πηγὴν. The word χρῆσε may be taken either for ἐχρησε, or for χρῆσαι, as λιτάζομε for λιτάζομαι in the latter part of the inscription. Πινάων is for πινάων. The hiatus in the last line but one may perhaps be filled by the words σὺν μητρὶ γλυκερῇ καὶ ἀδελφείοις ἐμοῖσιν (Franz), or something equivalent; and the last may perhaps run Ἰχθυν ἰδὼν νιοῦ μνήσεο Πεκτορίου. Mr. Marriott translates the whole as follows:—"Offspring of the heavenly Ichthus, see that a heart of holy reverence be thine, now that from

The first portion seems to be an admiration to the Christian passer-by who read it, the second a prayer of the deceased himself; the third an address to his parents and friends.

This inscription has been referred to very various dates, from the end of the 2nd century (Pitra) to the end of the 6th (Rossignol). Probably the judgment of Messrs. Franks and C. T. Newton, of the British Museum (in Marriott's

^c For the tracing from which this engraving was made the writer is indebted to Prof. Churchill Babington

Testimony, etc. p. 133), who assign it to the 4th or 5th century, is not far from the truth. With this agrees the decision of Kirchoff, the editor of the fourth volume of the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, which contains this inscription (No. 9890).

Mr. Marriott (u. s. p. 141) conjectures that the space at the lower corner of the marble, to the spectator's right, was occupied by a sculptured fish, whether alone or in combination with some other symbol.

Costadoni (ix. 35) gives a gem (no. xi. in his plate) engraved with two fishes, with this inscription in three lines: IX || CωTHP || ΘV: evidently the IXΘΥC, differing from the form common elsewhere in having CωTHP written at full length, instead of being separated by its initial letter like the other words of the acrostic. The CωTHP is probably placed between the IX and the ΘV because that shape of the inscription best suits the space.

Of seventy-five sculptured slabs containing the symbol which De Rossi has examined, not more than eight contain the ιχθὺς alone, and only twenty—of which four are fragments of slabs which may have contained other symbols—the sculptured fish alone; the rest give also other symbols. Seventeen join with the fish the dove and olive-branch; a conjunction which seems clearly equivalent to Spiritus in pace in Christo; or—if the olive-branch be omitted—Spiritus in Christo. Spiritus tuus in pace is a common form of acclamation in Christian epitaphs. Twenty-three add the anchor to the fish, whether separate or intertwined; a conjunction also extremely common on GEMS [p. 714]. As the ANCHOR [p. 81] unquestionably symbolizes Hope, we may read these symbols Spes in Christo, one of the most common of Christian sepulchral formulae. A sepulchral slab from the catacombs, now in the Kircher Museum, exhibits an anchor between two fishes, with the inscription IXΘΥC ZωNTωN. (See further under GEMS, p. 713). Of the fish swimming in the water and supporting a ship on its back, clearly signifying that Christ bears up the church, De Rossi has seen three instances.

There remains the conjunction of loaves and fishes. That these in some instances simply form part of a representation of the Lord's miracle of the loaves is clear from the fact that in at least one of De Rossi's Monumenta (No. 71, from the cemetery of St. Hermes, now in the Kircher Museum) there are five loaves and two fishes; but there can be no doubt that the fishes and loaves conjoined were intended to convey the further meaning that Christ is the Bread of Life, and that with special reference to the Eucharist [CANISTER, p. 264; EUCHARIST IN ART, p. 625]. This is well illustrated by the Autun inscription, given above, where, according to the most probable restoration, the fish is spoken of as in the hands. We can scarcely doubt that these words refer to the receiving of Christ in the Eucharist. So when Augustine (Confess. xiii. 23, § 34), after mentioning the sacrament of baptism, goes on to speak of that other "solemnitas . . . in qua ille piscis exhibetur quem levatum de profundo terra pia comedit," he undoubtedly refers to the sacrament of the Eucharist. It ought however to be noticed, that some at least of the paintings commonly supposed to be Eucharistic are intended rather to represent the heavenly marriage-supper which Christ makes for his faithful ones (Polidori, Dei convivii effigiati a simbolo monumenti Christiani. Milano, 1844).

Ample information on this curious subject may be found in Costadoni, Sopra il Pesce come simbolo di Gesù Christo presso gli antichi Cristiani, in Calogiera's collection, vol. xli. p. 247 ff.; in J. B. De Rossi's treatise, De Christianis Monumentis IXΘYN exhibentibus, and in Pitra's De Pisce Allegorico et Symbolico, both in Pitra's Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. iii.; and in the late Mr. Wharton Marriott's Essay on the Autun Inscription, in his Testimony of the Catacombs, p. 115 ff. (London, 1870). [C.]

ICONIUM, COUNCIL OF. The date generally assigned to it is A.D. 378 (Mansi, iii. 505-10), this being the year in which St. Basil died; and Amphilocheius, bishop of Iconium, who presided, speaking of him as having been expected there, but kept away by severe illness. St. Basil himself (Ep. ccii. al. cxcvi.) had asked to have it put off in the hope that his health might improve. But it may be doubted whether this is not the meeting of which he speaks in a subsequent letter (cxcvi. al. cclxxii.), when illness equally compelled him to return home. Mansi thinks his words here prove that he actually was at this meeting: they may mean no more than that he had commenced his journey with that intention, but after he had got as far as Neo-Caesarea, which he may have gone to first, he was taken ill and had to return. This, according to Mansi, took place A.D. 375; and the question is, whether Amphilocheius must necessarily be supposed to have been speaking of a later illness. To make up for his absence, his treatise on the Holy Spirit was read there, to attest his sentiments on the subject of which it treats, says Amphilocheius: in all probability, therefore, this council had to do with the followers of Macedonius. ICONOSTASIS. In the ecclesiology of the Eastern church this designation is given to the screen or partition wall, tabulatum, which cuts off the bema or svcrarium from the Soleas and the choir. From its general similarity in form to the chancel screens of Western churches, the iconostasis is often identified with them. This, however, is based on an erroneous idea. The screen of western ecclesiology separates the nave, the place of the laity, from the choir, the place of the clergy. The iconostasis, on the other hand, invested with far greater dignity and importance, has its position further eastward, and corresponds in locality to the altar rails. Thus it divides the choir, or place of the clergy, into two parts, separating "the holiest of all," containing the holy table and the place for the celebrant and his assistants, from the "holy place," on either side of which are arranged the stalls for the clergy. The iconostasis in its original construction was a comparatively light and open screen, the κιγκλίδες, δρύφακτα, or cancelli of primitive times, very much resembling the ordinary type of western chancel screens. The present arrangement, by which it has been converted into a close partition with curtained doors, entirely concealing the holy mysteries from those who stand outside it, cannot be carried higher than the 8th century, and in its existing development is probably later still. The name εικονόστασις is derived from the icons (εἰκόνας) or sacred pictures painted on it.

These screens in the larger and more dignified churches were of the richest materials attainable, and were adorned with all the resources of art. The elaborate description given by Paul the Silentary, enables us to realize the form and character of that in St. Sophia, as rebuilt by Justinian, in the middle of the 6th century. The material was silver. It consisted of a ἐπεκός, or partition, described as being of ivory, tortoise-shell, and silver.

According to Goar, the iconostasis owes its present close form to a reaction against the iconoclastic fury of the 8th century, as affording a more ample space for the exhibition of sacred pictures. His words are, "Reticula illa lignea" (the wooden trellis work, such as that in Paulinus' church at Tyre) "mutavit Ecclesia Orientalis in tabulata solida a tempore quo iconoclastarum furore turbata plures et frequen- formed by a stylobate, ornamented with arabesque flower work. On this stood pairs of twisted columns, twelve in number, surmounted by an architrave of chased metal. The spaces between the columns were filled in with panels, bearing in oval medallions the icons of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, the apostles and prophets. In the centre, above the "holy doors," the intertwined monogram of Justinian and Theodora was to be seen, surmounted by the crucifix in an oval panel (Paul Silentiar. part ii. v. 265, sq.)

The Church of the Apostles, erected by Constantine at Constantinople, had its screen of gilt

tiore sanctorum imagines ibi depictas esse voluit" (Eucholog. p. 18). Early examples of the solid iconostasis are hard to find. The partition has been invariably removed by the Turks in the churches converted by them into mosques, so that not a single instance appears in the churches of the Holy Land, and of Central Syria, drawn by De Vogue, nor in those given in Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, or in Hübsch's Altchristliche Kirche. The earliest example known to Dr. Neale is that in the Arian crypt church, at Tepekermann, in the Crimea, which he thinks "may be referred to about A.D.

copper (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 59). They were often of brass, or bronze. In that rebuilt by Paulinus, at Tyre, the screen was a trellis work of wood of the most slender and graceful workmanship (Euseb. H. E. x. 4, § 14). That of St. Peter in the Palace, built by Basil the Macedonian (A.D. 867-886), was of marble (Theophan. Ceram. Homil. lv.). The screen in the convent church of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, is ancient examples of a closed screen known is also in a cave church, the Grotto of the Apocalypse, at Patmos. From the woodcut given, taken from Calmet (Dict. de la Bible), it will be seen to be a plain boarded partition, reaching, in two divisions, from the floor to the spring of the vault, and very much resembling a Jacobean chancel screen in England. It has a central arched door, and two arched windows on either side, surrounded with arabesque work, and closed with curtains. The upper division exhibits an icon of Our Lord to the right, and of the Blessed Virgin to the left, with the crucifix above.

350," of which a woodcut is annexed. This is not a close screen, but consists of four pillars standing on a solid stylobate, the panels of which are ornamented with boldly incised crosses. The columns reach to the roof of the cave. The openings between them may have been probably closed with curtains (Neale, Hist. of East. Church, vol. i. p. 193). According to Guénebauld (Dict. des Monumens, Art. Iconostase), one of the mos

According to the normal arrangement, an iconostasis had three doorways, that to the right hand leading to the diaconicon; that to the left to the

the present day. The iconostasis, according to Dr. Neale, is "now generally made of wood; what would be the pierced part in a western rood screen being panelled and painted. In Attica they are found of plain deal." (Neale, u. s.; Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, p. 62.) The iconostasis in the churches of Russia is always a feature of considerable magnificence, which, from its size and elaborate decoration, is the object that first attracts attention on entering, being rather an architectural feature of the edifice than a mere piece of church furniture. It is very possible that more complete acquaintance with the ecclesiology of Russia will bring to light earlier examples of the iconostasis than those hitherto known. The annexed example from a church near Kostroma, in Eastern Russia, prothesis, through which the "Great Entrance" was made. The central doorway, ἁγία θύρα, always the largest, and most highly decorated with carvings, opened on to the bema. It was protected in the lower part by two gates, about the height of a man, meeting in the middle, the upper portion, as well as the two side doorways, being closed with curtains [CURTAINS, HANGINGS]. On the right of the holy doors was invariably the icon of Our Blessed Lord; on the left that of His Virgin mother. On the panels on either side, and on those above, other icons were depicted, according to the taste or devotion of the founders of the church, and to the saints under whose invocation it was placed. This arrangement remains on the whole unchanged to given by Mr. Fergusson in his History of Architecture, is not of very early date, but is pronounced by him to be "a favourable specimen of its class." [E. V.]

ICONOSTASIUM, εἰκονοστάσιον, in the Greek church, a moveable stand for the suspension of icones or sacred pictures. Such a piece of church furniture is mentioned by Codinus (de Off. Aul. Constantinop. c. vi. § 2), when describing the imperial ceremonial of Christmas Day. After mattins the canonarchs brought out the iconostasion, and set it in its place, with an analogium, or reading desk, bearing a copy of the gospels in front of it. On it they suspended an icon of the nativity, and three or four others.

The emperor on entering the church kissed the icons, and again on leaving. Ducange, s. v. identifies the iconostasion generally with a small domestic chapel, or oratory, and considers that that described by Codinus was a portable shrine. Gretser is more correct in defining it as "omne illud in quo stant, vel ex quo pendent sacrae imagines." Goar strangely interprets it of a carved picture frame. [E. V.]

IDIOMELA (i. e. στιχηρὰ ἰδιόμελα). These are Stichera or Strophes, which have no hirmos (εἴρμος), the rhythm of which they follow, but which are independent as to rhythm. They are usually said at lauds and at vespers on days of special observance. At lauds one only is said as a rule, though not invariably, as in the Holy week when there are several, after the στίχοι following the αἶνοι (i. e. Pss. 148, 149, 150). At vespers we find sometimes one only, as on certain week-days in Lent. Sometimes several, four or five being the usual number; and occasionally more, e. g. nine on St. John-Baptist's day, and of these one or more is often repeated. The tone to which they are said is specified, and the name of the author is often given. Their character is that of other troparia used in the Greek offices; but they are often, though not invariably, longer than others. Idiomela are also used in other offices, e. g. in the office for the burial of a priest.

[H. J. H.]

IDIOTA (ἰδιώτης). 1. An illiterate person, as contrasted with a "clerk." Thus, Gregory the Great (Epist. ix. 9) speaking of the use of pictures from sacred history, says that pictures are the bible of the uneducated—"quod legentibus scriptura, hoc idiotis praestat pictura cernentibus." Bede (Epist. ad Egbert.; Migne's Patrol. xciv. 659 c) wishes the idiotae—that is, he explains, those who have no knowledge of any tongue but their own—to learn by heart the Apostle's Creed and the Lord's Prayer in their own tongue. In the Middle Ages, when an educated man was almost of course in holy orders, the word "idiot" came to mean simply a layman.

2. The word Idiotae was also used to designate those who attached themselves to some convent as helpers, without being regular members of the brotherhood, i. e. lay-brothers [CONVERSI] (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.) [C.]

IDLENESS. [MENDICANCY.]

IDOLATRY (Idolatria, εἰδωλολατρεία). The object of this article is to describe the laws of the ancient church relating to idolatry, or any rites or customs connected with it. The treatment of Christians who went back altogether to heathenism, belongs to APOSTASY; of those who succumbed for a time under pressure of persecution, to LAPSED.

Few canons directed against idolatry appear in the councils, until Christianity had become the dominant religion in the different countries of Europe. The first law which interfered with the free exercise of Paganism, was an edict of Constantine, A. D. 319, against private sacrifices (Cod. Theod. IX. xvi. 1, 2), but it is questionable whether this was issued solely in the interest of Christianity. Later laws were undoubtedly levelled against idolatry. In A. D. 324, Constantine forbade (Euseb. Vit.

Const. ii. 45) the erection of images of the gods, or (ibid. iv. 16) of his own statue in the temples; he (ibid. ii. 44-5) prohibited all state sacrifices, and (ibid. iii. 54-8) shut up many of the temples, converted others into churches, and destroyed some which had been the scene of immoral rites. Laws of Constantius forbade (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 4, 6) all sacrifices whatever on pain of death; but it does not appear that the penalty was ever exacted. But that which is considered to have given the death-blow to Paganism, is a comprehensive law of Theodosius, A. D. 392 (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 12); sacrifice and divination were declared treasonable and punishable with death; the use of lights, incense, garlands, and libations, was to involve the forfeiture of house or land where they were used; and all who entered heathen temples were to be fined. But that Pagan rites lingered after this appears, among other proofs, from a petition addressed to the emperor by a Carthaginian council (A. D. 399), requesting him to destroy some rural temples, and forbid certain idolatrous banquets, which were held on Saints-Days, and which the Christians were compelled to attend (Cod. Eccl. Afric. cc. 58-60). And two centuries later Gregory has occasion (Epp. iv. 23-6) to rebuke some landowners in the remote parts of Italy, who suffered their peasants to continue in heathenism; and in a letter (Epist. ix. 65) to the bishop of Cagliari, he recommends that if the rustics will not listen to preaching, they shall be fined, imprisoned, or chastised. On the disappearance of Paganism, see Robertson, Church Hist. iii. 5.

2. Local Edicts.—In the Gallic church, a fragmentary letter of Childebert, A. D. 554 (Hardouin, Conc. iii. 334), commands all landlords who have images or idols on their estates, to remove them, and assist the priests in destroying them. The worship of sacred trees or groves^a or stones or fountains, is frequently forbidden, and the bishops are admonished to be more zealous in checking it (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 23; 2 Conc. Turon. c. 22; Conc. Francoford. c. 43). A Frankish council presided over by Boniface, A. D. 742 (Conc. German. c. 5, in Hartzheim's Conc. i. 49) prohibits incantations and auguries, and sacrifices which were offered to martyrs in place of the old Pagan deities; other councils forbid the "sacrilegious fire-burnings which are called Nedfrates"^b (Conc. Liptin. c. 4; Conc. Suess. c. 6). Appended to the council of Liptina (probably Lestines, Hartzheim, i. 51), A. D. 743, is a curious list of forbidden Pagan superstitions. It contains mention of the widespread worship of sacred trees and stones; of sacrificing to saints; of various omens and charms, such as observing tempests, horns, and snails, and the brain and dung of animals, and fire on the hearth; or superstitions connected with the state of the moon, particularly women hoping to attract men

^a On the Teutonic religion of worshipping in groves, see Milman, Lat. Christ. iii. 2. The most recent and satisfactory investigation into the history and meaning of sacred stones will be found in Fergusson's Rude Stone Monuments.

^b On the derivation and meaning of need-fire, see Ducange, s. v. Neufri. It appears to have been a superstitious practice in certain parts of Germany of striking fire from dry wood on the eve of St. John [JOHN, ST., FIRE OF].

by lunar influences. Compare a similar superstition in England, where people are warned against trusting to cries and sorceries during an eclipse of the moon (Egbert. Penit. viii. 3). An edict of Charlemagne issued after the conquest of the Saxons, A.D. 785, contains some severe enactments against the heathen practices of the vanquished (de Partibus Saxon. in Baluze's Capitularia, i. 250). Death is to be the penalty of (c. 4) ostentatiously and defiantly eating meat in Lent; of (c. 6) burning a witch because of supposed cannibalism, and then superstitiously eating her flesh; of (c. 7) burning a dead body and collecting the ashes; the bodies of the dead (c. 22) are to be buried in cemeteries and not in the Saxon tumuli. A more merciful clause (c. 14) contains a singular provision that if any one who has exposed himself to death by such crimes, shall confess his offence to the priest, and be willing to do penance, the extreme penalty may be remitted on the testimony of the priest. This capitulary was to some extent repealed by a more lenient one, A.D. 797, which, according to the general practice of the Teutonic races, allowed a money payment to compound for the capital offence.

The Spanish councils contain evidence of the lingering of the old heathenism at the end of the 7th century, and that even the clergy were not free from complicity with it. The 3rd council of Toledo, A.D. 589 (c. 16), complains that the "sacrilege of idolatry" was prevalent through both Spain and Gaul, and declares that the bishops and priests neglecting to assist in its extirpation shall be excommunicated. The 12th council, A.D. 681 (c. 11), threatens death to slaves worshipping idols or stones or fountains or trees, or lighting torches; but if their masters will be answerable for their abstaining from such rites for the future, the extreme sentence may be commuted to a flogging or to being shackled with iron: if the masters decline such responsibility, they lose all rights over the slaves, and are themselves subject to excommunication. The same practices are enumerated by the 16th council, A.D. 693, and the bishop or priest who is negligent in searching them out, is sentenced (c. 2) to a year's penance; and further, anyone who puts obstacles in the way of priest or officer is to be put under anathema, and if a noble, pay 3 pounds of gold to the treasury, if low born, receive 100 stripes, have his head shorn, and forfeit half his property.

In England, Gregory had given directions to Augustine (Epist. xi. 76) that heathen idols were to be destroyed, but the temples preserved, that the fabric should be sprinkled with holy water, that altars should be constructed in them and relics deposited, and so the building be converted to the worship of God on spots already consecrated in the popular imagination; even the sacrifices of oxen were to continue, but transferred to Saints Days. Gregory defends this policy on the ground that he who aspires to the highest place, must be content to ascend step by step, and not at one bound. The English Penitentials disclose the idolatrous customs which seem to have had the most tenacious hold on the people. Those who sacrifice to devils on slight occasions are to do penance for a year, on great occasions for ten (Theod. Penitent. I. xv. 1; Egbert. Penitent. iv. 12). Any woman who places her daughter on the roof of a house, or in an oven, to cure her of a fever, is sentenced to seven years (Theod. Pen. I. xv. 2; Egbert. Pen. viii. 2). Burning grain in any house where a dead body has been deposited, as a charm to protect the survivors, is punished by five years (Theod. Pen. I. xv. 3). The witches who invoke storms are to be penitents seven years (Egbert. Pen. iv. 14). In the laws of Wiltred of Kent, A.D. 696 (c. 12), it is decreed that if a husband without his wife's knowledge makes an offering to a devil, he shall be liable in all his substance; and if they both agree, they shall both be liable; but that if a "theow" makes the offering, he (c. 13) shall make a "bot" of six shillings or his hide. There are intimations that ecclesiastical law extended to other practices which, though not connected with religion, were regarded as badges of idolatry. The Legatine Synod held in A.D. 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, iii. 458), in its report to Adrian I., complains (c. 19) that the people dress after the manner of the heathen; that they follow the heathen custom of mutilating their horses by clipping their tails and splitting their nostrils and joining their ears; and also that they eat horse-flesh, which no Christian does in the East (Orientalibus, Italy and Germany). In the previous century the eating of horse-flesh, though not prohibited was regarded with disfavour (Theod. Penitent. II. xi. 4). A prohibition against heathen dress is also found in the ancient Welsh code of the 7th century (Canones Walliæ, c. 61). "If any Catholic let his hair grow long after the manner of the heathen, he shall be expelled Christian Society."

3. Idolatrous offices or customs.—The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 4), orders Flamens who wish to become Christians to undergo two years' additional probation as catechumens; if after baptism they wear the sacrificial garland (c. 55), to do penance two years; if they provide a public spectacle (munus) (c. 3), to be denied communion till death; and if they sacrifice (c. 2), to be excommunicated for ever. The same council requires a Duumvir to separate himself from the church during his year of office. See also ACTORS, GLADIATORS. The grounds of such prohibitions are stated by Tertullian (de Spectac. c. 12). The same father condemns (de Spectac. cc. 20-22) the actors in each of the four sorts of shows.

The social festivities of the heathen were not regarded with the same suspicion. Tertullian (de Idolol. c. 16) sees no harm in a Christian being present at the solemnity of assuming the toga virilis, or of espousals or nuptials, or of giving a name to a child. But this toleration was not extended to festivities of a less innocent character. [HEATHEN, § 5, p. 763.] The superstitious lighting of torches and burning of lamps is forbidden both in the 4th and 7th centuries (Conc. Eliber. c. 37; Conc. in Trull. c. 65). Another canon of Elvira (c. 34) prohibits the burning of wax candles in the cemeteries lest the spirits of the saints should be disturbed; a reference probably to the idolatrous practices associated with lighting lamps on heathen festivals (Tert. Apoloq. c. 35; de Idolol. c. 15). The irregularities attending the observance of the feast of the Kalends of January (the new year) form the subject of one of Chrysostom's Homilies (in Kalend. t. i. p. 697, ed.

Bened.), from which it appears that Christians set up lamps in the market place, and adorned their doors with garlands, and gave themselves up to excess and made divinations of their future. "You will prosper," says Chrysostom, "in the coming year, not if you make yourself drunk on the new moon, but if you do what God approves" (Tert. de Idolol. c. 14; Ambrose, Serm. 17; Conc. Autiss. c. 1; Conc. in Trull. c. 62). The 2nd council of Tours, A.D. 567, states (c. 17) that it was a custom in the church to have special Litanies on the three days of the Kalends of January, as a protest against the heathen licentiousness [CIRCUMCISION]. The observance of the heathen festivals lingered long after heathenism itself was extinct; at the end of the 7th century the Trullan council (c. 62) after denouncing the Kalends, declares that the church will excommunicate any who keep the solemnities of the Bota (Vota), or the Brumalia (the winter feast), or the 1st of March; and forbids the heathenish customs of those festivals, the public dancing of women, the interchange of dress between men and women, wearing comic or satyric or tragic masks, calling on the name of Bacchus and simulating a Bacchic frenzy while treading the grapes.

Making gain from idolatry was considered idolatrous. No artisan might assist in making an idol. "Canst thou," says Tertullian (de Idolol. c. 6), "preach the true God, who maketh false ones? 'I make them,' says one, 'but I worship them not.' Verily thou dost worship them, and that not with the spirit of any worthless savour of sacrifice, but with thine own; not at the cost of the life of a beast, but of thine own." Similarly he exposes (ibid. c. 8) the sophistries of those who made their livelihood by building or adorning heathen shrines; and (ibid. cc. 5, 6, 8, 11, 17) the dealers in victims and incense, and the guardians of the temples and the collectors of their revenues. A landlord who reckoned in his accounts any property of an idol, was subject to five years' separation (Conc. Eliber. c. 40); a man or woman lending vestments to decorate idolatrous pomp, to three (ibid. c. 57).

The rule which was to govern Christians in eating food, which might have been previously offered to an idol, is laid down by St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 25, 30). A great part of the animals used in the sacrifices was frequently sold by the priests, and afterwards retailed in the public shambles. This the Christians were at liberty to eat. But any attendance at a temple for the sake of the sacrifice was strictly prohibited (Conc. Eliber. c. 59). The council of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (c. 7), forbids any one to eat in a place consecrated to idolatry, even if he took his own food. But by the direction of Leo (Ep. ad Nicet.), a captive among the barbarians who from hunger or terror eat idol food, was to be leniently dealt with. Directions with regard to eating food offered to idols appear frequently in subsequent councils; it is the same as eating carrion, and exposes the offender to excommunication (4 Conc. Aurel. c. 20); offering food to the dead on the festival of St. Peter, and after receiving the body of Christ going home and eating meat consecrated to devils, incurs a like penalty (2 Conc. Turon. c. 22); other superstitions with food are to be reprimanded (Conc. Remen.

c. 14); not even the sign of the cross will purify an idol offering (Gregory II. Cm. Epist. c. 6). [G. M.]

ILERDENSE CONCILIIUM. [LERIDA, COUNCIL OF.]

ILLATION. This in the Mozarabic liturgy is the equivalent to the Preface (Praefatio) of the Roman and Ambrosian liturgies. In the Gallican liturgy the corresponding prayer is called Immolutio or Contestatio. The Mozarabic Illation is usually much longer than the Roman Preface, and varies with each mass. It begins with the words "Dignum et justum est," and leads up to the Sanctus. [v. PREFACE.]

ILLIBERITANUM CONCILIIUM. [ELVIRA, COUNCIL OF.]

ILLITERATE CLERGY. Pope Hilary (A.D. 461-468) decreed that an illiterate person (litterarum ignarus) incurred irregularity, i. e., disqualification for holy orders. And this rule was repeated, under varying phrases, by a council at Rome during his pontificate and by Pope Gelasius afterwards. But the standard of knowledge required does not appear to have been exactly defined. We learn from St. Augustine (Epist. 76), that the same rule applied to monks who were candidates for orders. In the time of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-604) it was sufficient to be able to read. But the offices were repeated, it seems, to a considerable extent memoriter, especially by the clergy of the lower grades. He ordered the deacons from country cures to be examined as to how many psalms they could say by heart. Thus, too, the Second Council of Orleans (A.D. 545), in its 15th canon, forbids the ordination as priest or deacon of any man who could neither read nor repeat the Baptismal office. And the First of Mâcon (A.D. 581) ordered the clergy to fast every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday from Martinmas to Christmas, and to employ these days in learning the canons. The Council of Narbonne (A.D. 589) even tried to enforce learning by suggesting that a cleric, obstinately illiterate, had no right to his share of the ecclesiastical revenues, and should be sent to a monastery, since he could not edify the people (Cm. 10).

We find much the same state of things in Spain. The Fourth Council of Toledo (circa A.D. 630) describes ignorance as the "mother of all other errors," and orders that a bishop when he ordained a parish priest, should give him an office book to use (Canons 25, 26). It is implied that he would be able to read this.

Respecting the Eastern Church our information is much less precise. Justinian (Novell.

vi. c. 5) forbade the advancing to any grade of the ministry those who were unable to read. During great part of the 8th century the Iconoclastic controversy was raging, and destroyed almost entirely, says Balsamon, the habit of study among the Catholics. Therefore the Seventh General Council at Nicaea, in A.D. 787 ordered in its 2d canon that no bishop should be consecrated who could not repeat the psalter; and who was not well acquainted with the gospels, the epistles of St. Paul, the whole scriptures, and the canons: a very considerable requirement for the time.

With the accession of Charlemagne a movement upwards began. In many capitularies of that sovereign, stringent regulations against ignorance in the clergy were laid down (for details see Thomassin, p. ii. lib. i. cc. 90, 96 passim). These details, by the moderation of the standard set up, serve to show the existing lack of knowledge. Even these it was impossible to enforce with any strictness. Lupus, Abbot of Ferrara, writing during this reign to Hincmar, apologises for a bishop, who was unable to teach his flock otherwise than by his good example, because of his ignorance. And Agobard, in a letter to Bernard of Vienne, concludes that ignorance in parish priests would do even more harm than an evil life. Charlemagne himself, lamenting this prevailing ignorance, writes to Alcuin: "Oh, that I had twelve clerks as learned and as perfectly taught in all wisdom, as Jerome and Augustine were!" Alcuin's reply is worth recording: "The Creator of heaven and earth had only two such, and you wish to have twelve!" The complaint of the English Alfred, reported by Asser, is well known, that "from the Humber to the Thames there were very few priests who understood the liturgy in their mother tongue, or who could translate the easiest piece of Latin; and that from the Thames to the sea, the ecclesiastics were still more ignorant" (De Reb. Gest. Alfred. apud Camden, Anglica, p. 25). We must not suppose, however, that there were no exceptions. Bede, Alcuin, John Scotus Erigena, and Hincmar, are proofs to the contrary. But this sudden blaze of learning was a good deal adventitious, rested on the personal influence of Charlemagne, and died out again after his decease (Muratori, Antiquitates; Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccl. Disciplina, Pars II. lib. i.; Maitland, Dark Ages). [S. J. E.]

ILLUMINATION. [MINIATURE.]

ILLYRIAN COUNCIL (Illyricum or Illyricum Concilium according to Cave). Held in Illyria, but it is not agreed in what year: Pagi contending for A.D. 373, others for 375, Cave for 367, and older authorities for 365. Pagi says it had been preceded by the second (he should have said rather the third) of the Roman councils under pope Damasus, in conformity with whose letter to the bishops of Illyria, a letter, asserting the substantiality of the three Persons in the Trinity, was now addressed by them to the bishops of Asia Minor. This view is at least countenanced by the letters themselves; and it must be allowed that the letter of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian to the bishops of Asia Minor expresses the declaration of the Illyrian bishops on this occasion (Mansi, iii. 386-94; and 455-68. Comp. Roman Councils, 19).

Three more councils are given under this heading. 1. A.D. 415, according to Sir H. Nicolas (Chron. of Hist. 217), at which Peregrine was appointed bishop of Patras.

2. A.D. 515, according to Mansi (Sir H. Nicolas A.D. 516, as Illyriense) when the bishop of Thessalonica having joined Timothy of Constantinople, forty bishops, whose metropolitan he was, renounced his communion, and declared for communicating with pope Hormisdas (Mansi, viii. 538).

3. A.D. 550, according to Mansi, in defence of the three chapters (ix. 147). [E. S. Ff.]

IMAGES. I. From the time of the Macca-bees the second commandment was generally understood by the Jews to forbid not only the worship of the likeness of any living thing, but even the making of it. It is probable that they were led to this view by their abhorrence of the acts of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his agents. Among other outrages these had set up "chaplains of idols" in the cities of Judah (1 Macc. i. 47), and even "sought to paint the likeness of their images" in the book of the law (Ibid. iii. 48). Hence Josephus (Antiq. viii. c. 7, § 5) condemns Solomon for making the twelve oxen on which the molten sea was set in the temple (1 Kings vii. 25; comp. 29), and the lions that were about his throne (Ibid. c. x. 19, 20), though no degree of reverence was paid to either of them. In the days of Herod the Great a sedition was nearly caused in Jerusalem by his exhibition of trophies, such as the Romans display after their victories, the Jews supposing that the armour was put on the effigy of a man. They declared that they would never "endure images of men in the city, for it was not their country's custom" (Jos. Antiq. xv. c. 8, §§ 1, 2). In the same spirit a band of zealots destroyed a golden eagle which Herod had put over the great gate of the temple (De Bello Jud. i. c. 33, § 2, 3). When Vitellius was marching through Judaea to meet Aretas, the inhabitants entreated him to take another route on account of the figures which they observed on his standards (Antiq. xviii. c. 6, § 3). Origen, A.D. 230, even asserts of the Jews in general that "there was no maker of images among their citizens; neither painter nor sculptor was in their state" (C. Cels. iv. § 31).

It appears, then, that most of the Jewish converts would enter the church thoroughly imbued with a dislike to all images; and it is probable that many of the heathen would be similarly affected towards them out of mere horror at the idolatry which they had forsaken. There were some also of the latter who, even before their conversion, were prepared by the higher traditions of philosophy to renounce the use of images in connection with religion. Pythagoras, we are told, forbade his disciples to "wear rings or to engrave images of gods on them" (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. c. 5, § 28). Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school, maintained that men "ought not to make temples or images" (Ibid. c. 11, § 77). It was a tradition among the Romans that Numa had "forbidden them the use of any image of God in the likeness of man or in the form of any animal, and that there was among them previously no image of God either painted or fictile; but that for the first 170 years when they built temples and set up chapels they made no images in any shape, on the ground that it was an unholy thing to liken the better to the worse, and impossible to reach God otherwise than with the mind" (Plutarch in Numa, c. viii.). Varro, in a passage preserved by St. Augustine (Civ. Dei, iv. c. 31), also affirms that for the period specified, the Romans "worshipped the gods without an image (simulachro)." He thought that if the law had continued, "the gods would have been more purely worshipped;" and after referring to the example of the Jews, he adds that "they who first set up images of the gods for the people relieved their states (civitatibus, but probably civibus, their fellow-citizens), from a fear, and involved them in an error" (Opp. Varr. Fragmenta, p. 46; Amstel. 1623).

II. That many of the early Christians adopted the Jewish interpretation of the second commandment is evident. Tertullian, A.D. 192, even thought it wrong to make such masks as actors wore; for, if God forbade the likeness of any thing, "how much more of His own image?" (De Spect. c. 23). He thought painting a sin in Hermogenes (Adv. Herm. c. 1); and he teaches that "the law of God, in order to eradicate the material of idolatry, proclaims, Thou shalt not make an idol; adding also, Nor the likeness of any thing . . . Over the whole world hath it forbidden such arts to the servants of God" (De Idololatr. c. iv.). Clemens Alex., A.D. 192, appears to hold the same rigid view: "It has been manifestly forbidden us to practise deceptive art; for, saith the prophet, Thou shalt not make the likeness of any thing that is in heaven or in the earth below." (Protrept. c. iv. § 62.) Origen says that painting and sculpture were disallowed among the Jews, lest the effect on senseless men should be to "draw the eyes of the soul off God on to the earth" (C. Cels. iv. § 31); a reason, which, if valid, ought to debar Christians from the exercise of them also.

III. All held that representations of God, even of the Second Person as man, were unlawful. Thus Clemens Al.: "It were ridiculous, as the philosophers themselves say, for man, who is the toy of God (Plato, de Legibus, vii. § 10) to make God, and for God to be made of sportive art," &c. (Strom. vii. c. 5, § 28). Origen: "The statues and ornaments that become God are not made by handicraft artisans, but are those wrought by the word of God and formed within us, the virtues (to wit) which are imitations of the first-born of every creature" (C. Cels. viii. § 17). Minutius Felix, A.D. 220: "What image should I make of God, when, if you think aright, man is himself the image of God" (Octav. c. 9). Lactantius, A.D. 303: "An image of God, whose spirit and power being diffused everywhere, can from nowhere be absent, must be always superfluous" (Instit. ii. c. 2; see also the Epit. c. 25). Arnobius, A.D. 303, after ridiculing the images of the heathen, says, "So far are we from attributing corporeal features to God, that we even fear to ascribe to so great a being the ornaments of minds, and the virtues themselves in which excellence has been hardly ascribed to a few. For who would say that God was brave, constant," &c. (Adv. Gent. iii.). Eusebius, the historian, in a letter to Constantia Augusta (the daughter of Constantine and wife of Cæsar Gallus), who died in 354: "Since thou hast written about some image, it seems of Christ, wishing the said image to be sent to thee by us, what, and of what kind, is this image which thou callest that of Christ? . . . Has this Scripture alone escaped thee, in which God by law forbids to make the likeness of any thing in heaven, or on the earth beneath? Hast thou ever seen such a thing in a church thyself, or heard of it from another? Have not such things been banished throughout the whole world, and driven far off out of the churches; and has it been proclaimed to us alone among all men that it is not lawful to do such a thing?" (Epist. put together from fragments by Boivin, in note to Niceph. Gregoras; Hist. Byzant. tom. ii. p. 130, ed. Bonn). Eusebius proceeds to say he had taken from a woman two pictures of persons dressed like philosophers, which she called portraits of Christ and St. Paul, "lest," he adds, "we should seem to carry our God about in a representation like idolaters." St. Augustine writing in 393: "It is not to be thought that God the Father is circumscribed by human form. . . . It is unlawful to set up such an image to God in a Christian temple. Much more is it wicked to set it up in the heart where the temple of God truly is" (De Fide et Symbolo, c. 7; comp. in Ps. cxiii. Enavr. Serm. ii. § 1, &c.). Asterius of Amasea, A.D. 401: "Do not depict Christ. For the one humiliation of the Incarnation sufficeth Him, which He took on Himself by choice for our sake. But bear and carry about the incorporeal Word mentally, in thy soul" (Hom. in Div. et Lazar. Auctar. Graec. Combef. tom. exeg. col. 5). A writer quoted as Epiphanius Cyprius (the famous bishop of Constantia) by the council of Constantinople in 754: "Remember, dear children, not to bring images into churches, nor into the cemeteries of the saints; but have God ever in your hearts through remembrance of Him; nor indeed into a common house" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii.). Even in the 8th century there were no representations of God the Father, but unhappily not always from principle. "Why," says Gregory II. in 726, "do we not represent and paint the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ? Because we do not know what He is, and it is impossible to represent and paint the nature of God. But if we had seen and known Him, as we have His Son, then should we have been able to represent and paint Him also, that you might call His image too an idol" (Ep. I. ad Leon. Labb. Conc. tom. vii. col. 13). John Damascene in the East at the same period, A.D. 728, who is equally vehement on the general question, says to the same effect: "We should indeed be in error if we made an image of the invisible God" (Orat. de Sacris Imag. ii. § 5).

After the period in which all painting was condemned, it is not so common to find passages, which forbid pictures of saints, or deny that the church used them. There are such, however; although, as we shall see, such pictures were then looked on only as lessons in history. For example, St. John Chrysostom, A.D. 398: "We enjoy the presence of the saints through their writings, having images not of their bodies but of their souls. For the things said by them are images of their souls" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii.; sim. Amphilochius of Iconium, ibid.). An author whom the council of Constantinople already mentioned, cites under the name of Theodotus of Ancyra: "Concerning them he teaches thus, that we have not been taught by tradition to form the likenesses of the saints in images out of material colours; but we have learnt, through those things which are written of them, to copy their virtues, which are, as it were, living images of them" (Labb. Conc. tom. vii. col. 492).

IV. There was a consensus against the worship of images, in every sense of the words προσκύνησις and adoratio. At first this extended to material representations of the cross. "We neither worship crosses," says Minutius, "nor wish to do so" (Octav. c. 9). With regard to images of our Lord and the saints, the evidence is ample. Thus Irenaeus, A.D. 167, condemns the error of some Gnostics, who crowned images painted in colours, and of other materials, which they asserted to be likenesses of our Lord (Adv. Haer. i. c. 25, § 6). Epiphanius who repeats this (Haer. xxvii. § 6) says that some of the images were of gold and silver, and that they "set them up and worshipped them." (See also Aug. De Haer. n. 7.) Origen: "We do not honour statues, that as far as in us lies we may avoid falling into the notion that the statues are other gods" (C. Cels. vii. § 66). The council of Eliberis, about the year 305, decreed "that pictures ought not to be in a church, lest that which is worshipped and adored be painted on walls" (Can. xxxvi.). St. Augustine: "Who worships an image (simulacrum) or prays looking on it, that is not so affected as to fancy that he is heard by it, as to hope that what he desires is granted him by it? . . . Against this affection, by which human and carnal weakness can be easily ensnared, the Scripture of God sings [as a nurse waking infants] things very familiar, by which to stir memory, and to rouse, as it were, the minds of men asleep in custom of their bodies. The images of the heathen, it says, are silver and gold" (Enarr. in Ps. cxiii. Serm. ii. § 5). Elsewhere, when he dwells on the feeling excited by images, he speaks also of its contagious nature: "Who doubts the idols being destitute of all sense? Yet when they are set in their places, exalted for honour, so that they may be attentively regarded by those who, pray and sacrifice, then through the very resemblance of living limbs and senses, though senseless and lifeless themselves, they affect weak minds, so that they seem to live and breathe; especially when there is besides the veneration of a multitude, by whom a worship so great is paid to them" (Ad Deogr. Ep. cii. quaest. 3, § 18). It is undeniable that the objection here urged is as applicable to the image of a Christian saint as to that of a heathen god. Other testimonies will occur in the following sections.

V. The figures first used among Christians in any reference to their faith were merely symbolical. The earliest was the momentary sign of the cross made by the hand. "At every journey and movement," says Tertullian, "at every coming in and going out, at the putting on of our clothes and shoes, at baths, at meals, at lighting of candles, at going to bed, at sitting down, whatever occupation employs us, we wear our forehead with the sign" (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.; compare Ad Uxor. ii. 5; S. Cyrill. Hier. Cat. iv. c. 10: xiii. cc. 11, 18, and others). The first permanent representation of the cross is probably that set up at Rome beside the statue of Constantine after the defeat of Maxentius in 312 (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ix. 9); but Eusebius tells us also that "the symbol of the salutary passion composed of various and precious stones was set up" by Constantine in a room in his palace (Vit. Const. iii. 49). The same prince had the arms of his soldiers marked with a cross (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i. 8). Julian the emperor, A.D. 361, says to Christians in reproach: "Ye worship the wood of the cross, making shadowy figures of it on the forehead, and painting it at the entrance of your houses." St. Cyril of Alexandria in his reply justifies the practice of painting "the sign of the precious cross" (Lib. VI. ad calc. Opp. Jul. 194). From St. Jerome we learn that the sign of the cross was made in the 4th century, as it is now, in witness to written documents (Comm. in Ezek. ix. 4). St. Chrysostom: "This shines at the sacred table, at the ordination of priests, and again with the body of Christ at the mystic supper. It may be seen everywhere displayed, in houses, in market-places, in deserts, on roads, on mountains, in groves, on hills, on ships and islands in the sea, on beds, on dresses, on arms, on couches," &c. (Contra Judae. et Gentil. § 9). Severian, A.D. 401, calls the cross "the image of the immortal king" (Hom. de Cruce, inter Opp. St. Chrys. ed. Saville, v. 899). Paulinus of Nola, writing in 403, speaks of "the ensign of the cross," surmounted with the crown of thorns, painted on the walls of his churches at Nola and Fundi (Ep. xxxii. ad Sever. §§ 12-17). Nilus, A.D. 440, recommends Olympiodorus, who was about to erect a martyrion, to "set the figure of a single cross in the sacrarium on the east of the most sacred precincts; for by one saving cross is mankind completely saved" (Ep. iv. 61).

Tertullian is the first witness to the use of other symbolical figures: "We may begin from the parables in which is the lost sheep sought by its owner, and brought home on his shoulders. Let the very pictures of your chalice stand forth" (as witnesses). "The Good Shepherd whom thou paintest on the chalice" (De Pudic. 7, 10). Clemens Alex. (Paedag. iii. 11, § 59) mentions several devices which he considered permissible on seals. [GEMS, p. 712.] "Symbols of the Good Shepherd" were placed by Constantine in the fora of Constantinople (Euseb. Vita Const. iii. 49). A mosaic in the church built by Paulinus at Nola represented Christ by a lamb, the Spirit by a dove, while "the voice of the Father thunders from the sky" ("This is My beloved Son" [Matt. iii. 17], being probably in letters). The APOSTLES [p. 107] were figured by twelve doves round a cross, and the church was seen set on a rock from which issued four streams, the doctrines of the four Evangelists (Ep. Paulini xxxii. § 10). At Fundi the picture of a shepherd separating the goats from the sheep suggested the Day of Judgment (Ibid. § 17).

VI. (1) When religious art advanced from symbolism to portraiture, its works of the new type were at first, perhaps in every instance, partly historical and partly ideal. There was, for example, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla at Rome, a picture of the Virgin and Child, accompanied by the figure of a man, whose dress and action (he is pointing to a star) are so clearly suggestive of a symbolical meaning that he is supposed by De Rossi to represent the prophets who foretold the coming of Christ (Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, p. 234, and pl. x.). Other pictures belonging to this period of transition, being apparently of the 5th century, show our Lord blessing a child, or raising Lazarus, but with "the rod of His power" (Ps. cx. 2) in His hand (Aringhi, Roma Subterr. ii. 33, 37, &c.; De Rossi, Roma Subterr. ii. tav. 14, 24). In one of the same class and probably of the same age, our Lord appears with an open book in His hand, and an Apostle and rolls of writing on either side (Aringhi, ii. 91; Marriott, pl. xii.). The rolls evidently represent the Old and New Testaments; and the Apostles are probably St. Peter, the great converter of the Jews, and St. Paul, whose chief mission was to the Gentiles. The thought conveyed is that Christ is the great teacher. He "opened the Scriptures" to the Apostles, that they might instruct the world. Works of this twofold character are frequent after the strictly historical treatment of religious subjects had quite established itself. See examples in Aringhi, ii. 83, 88, 129, &c.

(2) We come now to pictorial images, which were, so far as appears, of a purely historical character. St. Augustine writing about the year 400, says of some misbelievers who had forged epistles as from our Lord to SS. Peter and Paul, that he supposed those Apostles "occurred to them because they saw them painted together with Him in many places" (De Consensu Evang. i. x. n. 16). He speaks also of the offering of Isaac as a "noble deed sung by so many tongues, painted in so many places" (C. Faust. xxii. 73). A painting on this subject is described by St. Gregory of Nyssa: "I have often seen the image of his suffering in a picture, and passed the sight not without tears, so vividly did the art of the painter bring the story before the eyes" (De Deit. Fil. et Sp. Orat.; compare Greg. II., Ep. I. ad Leon. Labb. Conc. vii. 16). It was a favourite subject, because it symbolised the death of Christ, which as yet men did not venture to represent directly. St. Gregory tells us also that the martyrdom of Theodore in all its circumstances was depicted on the walls of a church built to his memory (Encom. Theodori). The people of Antioch in the time of St. Chrysostom had the figure of St. Meletius "in the besils of rings, on stamps, on bowls, on the walls of chambers, and everywhere" (Chrysost. in St. Melet. § 1). Paulinus, in a poem written about the year 402, describes several scenes from the Old Testament, which he had caused to be painted in his church at Nola. He owns that it was an unusual thing (raro more, line 544), and explains his reason for it at length. It was an experiment by which he hoped to interest and instruct the rude converts of that neighbourhood, and especially to keep them from the excesses which prevailed among them, when they assembled in great numbers on the festivals (Poema xxvii. De S. Fel. Nat. carm. 9). Pictures of Paulinus himself and St. Martin had been placed by Sulpicius Severus in the baptistry of his church at Primuliac, near Beziers. Paulinus, hearing of this, sent him some verses to be set over them, in which he describes St. Martin as an example of holiness to the newly baptized, and himself of penitence (Ep. xxxii. §§ 2, 3). From Asterius we learn that at the beginning of the 5th century some persons had subjects from the New Testament, as Christ and the Apostles and miracles wrought by them, embroidered on their dress, a practice which he strongly condemns (De Div. et Laz. u. s.). The same writer describes at length the martyrdom of St. Euphemia as painted in a church (u. s. col. 207). Prudentius, A.D. 405, saw in the Forum Cornelianum at Rome a picture of the martyrdom of St. Casianus, a schoolmaster, whom his pupils at the command of the heathen magistrate had stabbed to death with their styli (De Coronis, Hymn. ix. 9). He also describes a picture on the tomb of Hippolytus, in which that martyr was represented being torn asunder by horses (Ibid. x. 126). Heraclides of Nyssa, A.D. 440, wrote two epistles against the Messalianites, in the latter of which was a "testimony to the antiquity of the venerable images" (εἰκόνας, the Greek paintings) (Photius, Biblioth. cod. i.). We have reason to think that the custom of placing in churches the portraits, either painted, or in mosaic, of the patriarchs or other eminent men, was becoming common about this time. St. Nilus advised Olympiodorus "to fill the holy temple on all sides with stories from the Old and New Testament by the hand of the finest painter, that those who did not know letters and were not able to read the Holy Scriptures might by contemplating the picture be reminded of the virtue of those who served God truly," &c. (Epist. iv. 61). An author in Suidas, supposed to be Malchus, A.D. 496, says that in a church at Constantinople there was a mosaic, put up in the lifetime of Gennadius (A.D. 458 to 471), in which that patriarch and Acacius, who became his successor, were represented with our Lord between them, and that the clergy set up pictures of Acacius in the oratories (Suidas in Acacius, i. 76). We find incidentally that the partisans of Macedonius had portraits of him in their churches (Theodorus Lector, Excerpt. ii.). Evagrius, A.D. 594, mentions a picture on the ceiling of a church at Apamia, representing a miracle of which he had himself been witness when at school there (Hist. Eccl. iv. 26). Gregory of Tours, his contemporary, mentions pictures (iconicæ) of the apostles and other saints, which were in an oratory at Arverna (Vitæ PP. xii. § 2). When Augustine and his companions had their first interview with Ethelbert in 597, they came "bearing a silver cross for banner, and an image of the Lord the Saviour painted on a board" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. 25). But the earliest authentic account of pictures in an English church occurs in Bede's life of Benedict Biscop, his first abbot, who, in 648, "brought from Rome paintings of sacred images, to wit, of the blessed Mary and of the twelve Apostles, besides representations of the Gospel history, and of the visions of St. John the Evangelist, and placed them in his church; so that all who entered the church, even those ignorant of letters, whithersoever they turned their eyes, might contemplate the ever-lovely countenance of Christ, and of his saints, though in an image; or might more heedfully call to mind the grace of the Lord's Incarnation" (Hagiogr. sect. i.). In 685 (Ibid. 720) he brought other pictures from Rome, many of saints and Gospel subjects, as before; but some also illustrating the relation of the New Testament to the Old, as Isaac bearing the wood beside Christ bearing His cross, the brazen serpent on the pole by Christ on the cross. Pictures of this character probably abounded in Rome at this time; for a great number are mentioned as to be seen there by Gregory II. in his first reply to Leo the emperor, A.D. 726 (Lab. Conc. vii. 16).

VII. Scarcely had portraits of holy persons become common, before pictures of fabulous origin were brought forward, and superstitious notions and practices began to abound. For example, Theodoret had heard that the Romans held Symeon the Stylite in such esteem, as to "set up small portraits of him in all the entrances of their workshops, deriving thence protection and safety for themselves" (Hist. Religiosa, c. xxvi.). Theodorus Lector reports that Eudocia, the Augusta, sent to Pulcheria (about A.D. 456) a "likeness of the mother of God which the Apostle Luke painted" (Excerpta, i. prope init.). The same writer relates that a painter of Constantinople in the time of Genadius, had "dared to paint the Saviour as Zeus." For this his arm withered, but was restored at the prayer of the patriarch. The historian adds that "the other representation of the Saviour, with curling short hair, is the more correct" (Ibid. i. 554). When Edessa was besieged by Chosroes, king of Persia, about 544, the mound erected by him against the walls was, according to Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 27), destroyed by fire, the heat and power of which had been miraculously intensified by water that had been sprinkled over a picture of Christ ("the God-made image which the hand of man wrought not"), sent by himself to Abgarus a former king of that city. Evagrius finished his history in 594. It is worthy of note that Procopius (De Bello Persico, ii. 27), who wrote soon after the Persian war, and from whom Evagrius took the rest of his account, does not mention the miraculous picture. In a later war with Persia, A.D. 590, another portrait of Christ, said also to be of divine origin, accompanied the Roman army, and gave courage to the soldiers (Theophyl. Simoc. Historiarum ii. 3, 70, ed. Bekker). At this time imagination readily connected miracles with the icons of the saints. Thus both Evagrius and Gregory of Tours tell the story of a Jewish boy at Constantinople, who, having with others of his age partaken of the remains of the Eucharist according to the custom there, was cast by his enraged father into a burning furnace. The next day he was found in it uninjured. Evagrius (u. s. c. 36) merely says that he declared that "a woman clothed in purple" had appeared to him and saved him; but in the version of Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 10), "the woman seated in a chair and carrying an infant in her bosom, who was in the basilic, where he received the bread from the table, had covered him with her mantle that the fire might not devour him." Another improvement of the same kind in a miraculous story should be mentioned here. Paulus Warnefridi, in his History of the Lombards (ii. 13), relates how the bad eyes of two persons were healed by oil from "a lamp set to give light" near the altar of St. Martin, in a church at Ravenna. When this story is told in France, as it is in some of the manuscript copies of Gregory (De Mirac. S. Martini, i. 15), the lamp stands

CHRIST. ANT.

"under an image of the picture of the blessed Martin." Such variations appear to indicate the growth of a feeling which ascribed to the image a part of the supposed powers of the saint himself. Other stories told by Gregory of Tours are of a picture of Christ, which was said to have shed blood, when maliciously injured by a Jew (Mirac. i. 22); and of another at Narbonne, respecting which our Lord in a vision expressed His displeasure, because it represented Him on the cross, not fully clothed, but "girt with a linen" only (Ibid. c. 23). Such stories were quite as common in the East, e.g. Leontius, bishop of Neapolis in Cyprus, A.D. 590, speaks of the flow of blood from images as of frequent occurrence (Apol. in Act. iv. Conc. Nic. ii. Lab. vii. 240). At Constantinople there was a picture of our Lord "at which many miracles took place." This image Gregory II., writing in 726, calls without any qualification "the Saviour." When the emperor Leo ordered it to be destroyed, the officer sent to execute the decree was murdered by women, whom the pope describes as full of zeal, and honours with a title (μυροφόροι) which antiquity gave to those holy women who "prepared spices and ointments" wherewith to embalm the body of Christ (Epist. ad Leon. I., Lab. Conc. vii. 19). The murder is equally approved by the Greek author of the 'Life of Stephen the Younger' (Analecta Graeca Bened. t. i. p. 415).

It is evident that men who had arrived at this stage of superstition were ripe for the practice of direct idolatry. Serenus, a bishop of Marseilles, contemporary with Gregory of Tours, found this so rife among his people that he had the images in his church destroyed. We learn this from an epistle of Gregory I., who concurred with him in principle, while he condemned the deed: "It hath reached our ears some time ago that your fraternity, seeing certain worshippers of images, has broken and cast forth the said images out of the church. And indeed we praise you for being zealous lest aught made by the hand should be worshipped; but we think that you ought not to have broken the said images. For painting is used in churches, that they who are ignorant of letters may at least read on the walls by seeing them what they cannot read in books" (Epist. vii. 111). "It is one thing to adore a picture, another to learn by the story of the picture what ought to be adored. . . . If any one wishes to make images by no means forbid him; but by all means stop the worship of images" (Epist. ad eund. ix. 9). In both these epistles now quoted Gregory teaches, and in the second at great length, that pictures were placed in churches "only to instruct the minds of the ignorant" (non ad adorandum, sed ad instruendum solummodo mentes nescientium); but elsewhere he indicates another use which experience has shown to lead rapidly to direct worship: "We do not prostrate ourselves before it ('the image of our Saviour') as before the Godhead; but we worship Him whom by help of the image we call to mind as born, as suffering, or even sitting on His throne. And while the picture itself, like a writing, brings the Son of God to our memory, it either rejoices our mind by the suggestion of His resurrection, or consoles it by His passion" (Ep. ad Secund. vii. 54). In the Greek church, however, we find the worship of pictures already avowed and defended; as by Leontius, above mentioned: "I, worshipping the image of God, do not worship the material wood and colours; God forbid; but laying hold of the lifeless representation of Christ, I seem to myself to lay hold of and to worship Christ through it" (Apol. in Act. iv. Conc. Nic. ii. Labb. vii. 237). He compares this worship to that which a Jew pays to the book of the law; but as he dwells much on miracles wrought by images, and, like Gregory, on the emotions which the sight of a cross or picture ought to raise in the beholder, it is clear that in practice the worship of them was very different from the reverence shewn to the law. Indeed it is very probable that the simple plea of instruction for the ignorant, however just when properly applied, was soon so extended as to cover practices which could not be distinguished from idolatry. For as Gieseler notices (Ecol. Hist. per. i. div. i. p. i. § 1) the only reply to the complaint, "This generation has made gods of the images," which a fanatical image-worshipper of the 8th century could offer, was that by which Gregory I. had defended the merely didactic use of them; viz., "You must teach the unlearned people" (Orat. de Imag. Adv. Constantinum Cabal. c. 13; inter. Opp. S. Joann. Damasc.).

VIII. By the beginning of the 8th century the worship of images had become such a scandal in the East that a Mahometan prince, Izid, or Jesid, the son of Omar, thought himself justified in interfering. In 715 he accordingly commanded all pictures to be removed from the churches of his dominion (Theophanes, Chronographia ad a. m. 6215). A little later, Leo the Isaurian, who became emperor in 716, made his hostility to the practice known. He claimed to be influenced by a horror of idolatry, and there is no evidence of any other motive. His sentiments were probably well-known from the first (Theophan. ad ann. 6217); but we gather from the testimony of two adversaries (Greg. II. Epist. ad Leon. Iabb. vii. 9; Vita Steph. Jun. u. s. p. 412) that he had reigned ten years before he ventured on any overt act. In the year 726 he issued a declaration against the worship of images, but did not command them to be "destroyed, only placed higher, so that no one might kiss them, and thus bring discredit on that which was otherwise worthy of respect" (Vita Steph. u. s.). However, about the same time he seems to have ordered the image already mentioned, to which miracles were ascribed, to be removed from a public place in Constantinople. He also wrote to the bishop of Rome, who quotes his letter thus: "Thou sayest that the images occupy the place of idols, and that they who worship them are idolaters." "Thou hast written, that we ought not to worship things made by the hand, nor the likeness of any thing . . . and, inform me who hath taught by tradition the reverence and worship of things made by the hand, and I will confess that it is the law of God" (Epist. Greg. II. u. s.). In a most insolent and unchristian reply, the pope dwells much on his own feelings before a sacred picture (coll. 14, 16); but does not meet the complaint that such objects were abused to idolatry. About the same time John of Damascus wrote his three "Orations against those who reject the holy images." In his demand for adoration he does not go further than "worshipping and kissing and embracing the image both with lips and heart; as the likeness of the Incarnate God, or of His mother, or of the Saints." He says that pictures are the "books of the unlearned" (Orat. ii. § 10). Leo, however, persevered. A second letter to the pope (Labb. u. s. col. 23) being met in the same spirit as the former, and Germanus of Constantinople proving equally impracticable, in 730 he ordered all images to be removed out of churches (Theophan. ad an. 6221). Constantine V., his son and successor, published another edict against images in the first year of his reign, 741; and is even said to have exacted an oath from his subjects that they would not worship them (Theophan. ad an. 6233; Vita Steph. p. 444). Such images as had been left were now effaced by scraping or whitewashing the walls (Vita Steph. p. 445); but merely decorative paintings of trees, flowers, birds, &c., were allowed. That the party of the image-worshippers was at this time strong and numerous, is clear from the fact that the rebel Artavasdes won many adherents by declaring himself in their favour, and setting up icons in the cities. Anastasius the patriarch went over to him (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 4; ed. Bonn), and he was recognized by Zacharias of Rome, who dated letters from his assumption of the purple (Ep. iv. v. Labb. vi. 1503-5). From this time image-worshippers would naturally be suspected of disloyalty, and would suffer much in that age of cruelty on the suppression of the revolt in 743. In 754 Constantine convened a general council at Constantinople, at which 338 bishops (Labb. tom. vii. col. 417) were present, but none of the great patriarchs. At this synod it was maintained that the worship of images was in a great measure due to, and that in return it fostered, a tendency to those heresies respecting the nature of Christ which had been condemned by earlier councils (ib. coll. 429-453), their characteristics being either to lower the Divine nature, or to dwell on the human as apart from it, or to confound the two. After a careful review of the scriptural and patristic evidence (ib. coll. 473-504) the following decree was made:—"Whosoever shall from this time present dare to make or worship or set up in a church or private house or conceal an image (εἰκόνη), if he be a bishop, presbyter, or deacon, let him be degraded; if a monk or layman, let him be anathematized and punished by the imperial laws, as contrary to the commandments of God and an enemy to the doctrine of the Fathers" (ib. col. 508; see also 506). At the same time it was forbidden, under pretence of compliance with this decree, to lay hands on sacred vessels, vestments, &c., that had any figure wrought on them, but they might be recast or made up afresh with licence from the patriarch or emperor (ib. coll. 510, 511). This caution was necessary, and only partially effectual. E.g., a fanatical bishop was accused to the council of having "trampled on the holy paten of the undefiled mysteries of God, because it was engraved with the venerable image of Christ, and of His mother, and of the Precursor" (Vita Stephani, u. s. p. 480). We read too that many books containing pictures were burnt or defaced by the "iconoclasts" (Labb. u. s. coll. 372-377); and a general complaint is made by Germanus of Constantinople that they were not content with obeying the order for the removal of images, but must needs destroy "any symbolical ornament on the 'venerable vessels,' and 'defacing altar cloths' embroidered in gold and purple, would put them up in their own houses," &c. (De Synod. et Haeres. § 42, in Maii Spicil. Roman. tom. viii. p. 1; comp. Vita Steph. p. 445). The decree is said to have been carried out with great cruelty, but we cannot believe all the charges brought by his enemies against Constantine; as, for example, that the governor of Nalolia, with his approbation, having assembled at Ephesus in 770 all the monks and nuns of Thrace, gave them the choice of marriage or the loss of their eyes (Theophanes, ad an. Const. 30). However this may be, it appears certain that from the date of the council no images that could be made the object of worship were permitted in the churches of the East until after the death of Leo IV. (Chazarus), the son of Constantine, in 780.

In 786 the widow of Leo, Irene, who had been brought up an image-worshipper, being regent of the empire in the minority of her son Constantine VI., resolved, in conjunction with her creature Tarasius the patriarch (785-806), to make every effort for the restoration of the icons. A council assembled at Constantinople was dispersed by a tumult among the soldiers who were faithful to the convictions of their former master; but it met again the next year (787) at Nicaea. There were present 375 bishops. Two legates from Rome attended, and two represented jointly the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In the second session a letter was read, addressed by Hadrian of Rome to Irene and her son, in which the pope maintained that a relative worship was due to images (Labb. tom. vii. col. 113). This had been the teaching of his predecessor Gregory II. in his letter to Leo (ὁ ὑ λατρευτικῶς, ἀλλὰ σχετικῶς, ib. col. 13), and it appears in several of the authorities read before the council (coll. 304, 353, 356, &c.). The principle was fully accepted by the synod, and stated in the conclusion at which it arrived, viz., that "the venerable and holy images should be set up in the same manner as the figure of the precious and life-giving cross; both those which are in colours or tessellated work, and those of other suitable material, in the holy churches of God, on sacred vessels and vestments, on walls and boards, on houses, and by the wayside; the images, to wit, of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the one undefiled Lady, the holy mother of God, and of the honourable angels, and all saints and holy men. For the more frequently they are seen in their pictured resemblance, the more are those who behold them stirred up to the recollection and love of their prototypes, and to render to them (the images) salutation and honorific worship; not indeed true supreme worship (λατρείαν), according to our faith, which is due to the Divine nature alone, but that, as the pious custom of the ancients held, an offering of incense and lights should be made in their honour in the same manner as to the figure of the precious and life-giving cross, and to the holy gospels, and to other sacred ornaments. For the honour of the image passes on to the original, and he who worships the image worships in it the person of him who is therein depicted" (Labb. u. s.

col. 556). If lights and incense had not been mentioned, we should hardly have suspected these words to demand a greater reverence for images than a devout mind naturally feels for a copy of the Bible, or indeed for anything that brings God immediately before it; but to arrive at their full significance, we must also take into consideration the habits of the age, and especially the arguments and testimonies on which the decree professed to be founded. Many pictures were deemed miraculous, and any one, in the belief of the people, might become so, while prayers were already addressed directly to the icons, and many superstitious practices existed in connection with them without rebuke from those who framed this decree. In a passage read with applause at the council from the Limonarium of Sophronius or John Moschus (A.D. 630), worshipping the image of Christ is spoken of as worshipping Christ, and not to do so as a deadly sin (Labb. col. 381). Such indeed was the constant language of the iconolaters. He, says Photius, "who does not worship the image of Christ, does not worship Christ, though he may think he worships him" (Epist. lib. ii. n. 102). In another passage from the Limonarium, also approved by the council, we are told that a certain anchorite, when about to visit any holy place, used to light a candle before a picture of the Virgin with Christ in her arms, and "regarding her picture to say to the Lady, 'Holy Lady, mother of God, seeing I have a long way to go, a journey of many days, take care of thy candle and keep it unquenched according to my intent; for I depart having thy aid on the way.' And having said this to the image he departed." The light burned on till his return (ib. col. 384). (For the direct address compare Greg. II. ad Leon. Ep. i. col. 13, and Germanus of Constantinople, ad Thom. col. 312.) Other important facts are recorded in a letter of Michael Balbus to Ludovicus Pius. "They not only sang psalms and worshipped them, and asked for help from the said images," but many, hanging linen cloths on them, placed their children in them as they came out of the font, thus making them sponsors; and monks receiving the tonsure had the hair held over them so as to fall into their lap. "Some of the priests and clerks, scraping the colours of the images, mixed them with the oblation and wine, and after the celebration of masses gave of this oblation to those who wished to communicate. Others put the Lord's Body into the hands of images, from which they caused those who desired to communicate to receive it. Some despising the church used the flat surface of pictures for altars in common houses and celebrated the sacred liturgy on them; and many other like things, unlawful and contrary to our religion, were done in churches" (Imper. Decr. de Cultu Imag. p. 618, ed. Goldast. Francof. 1608).

In 797 Constantine VI. was deprived of his kingdom and sight by the contrivance and command of his unnatural mother (Cedrenus, tom. ii. p. 27), who after five years of undivided power was supplanted by Nicephorus. He is said to have favoured the iconoclasts (Cedr. u. s. p. 49), but there is no evidence of any action in support of their cause. His death in battle, July 811, was in two months followed by that of his son and successor Stauratius, who had been wounded at the same time. Michael Rhangabe, who deposed the dying Stauratius, seems to have punished with impartial hand both those who worshipped images and those who broke them. Leo the Armenian, who deprived him of his throne in 813, was a decided enemy to image-worship. He thought that the heathen were permitted on that account to obtain victories over the Christians. "I desire," he declared, "to overthrow them (the images). For observe, all the emperors who have received and worshipped them have died, some pursued to death, some falling in battle: and only those who did not worship them have ended their reigns each by a natural death, and been buried with honour," &c. (Narratio de Leone Arm. Imp. auctoris incerti, in Opp. Theophanis, p. 435, ed. Paris). The people generally seem to have been with him; for he is also reported to have remonstrated in this manner with the patriarch Nicephorus:—"The people are scandalized by the images, and say that we do ill to worship them, and that for this reason the heathen lord it over us. Condescend a little, and use management with the people, and let us pare away trifles. But if you are not willing to do this, give us the grounds on which you worship them, for the Scripture is by no means clear on the point" (ib. p. 437). In reply Nicephorus merely asserted the antiquity of the practice. In 815 Leo procured the condemnation of the second council of Nicaea by another, which he convened at Constantinople (Labb. tom. vii. col. 1299). The acts of this council are not extant; but an edict of Leo, issued at the time, is probably in complete accord with its decrees. In that the emperor alleges the unlawfulness and absurdity of image-worship, and the duty of removing the cause of offence (Michael Monach. in Vita Theodori Stud. c. 63; opp. Sirmondi, tom. v.) It is related of Michael II. (Balbus), A.D. 820, that "though he was of the heterodox party (an image-worshipper is speaking) he had nevertheless no wish to trouble those who did not defer to him, but allowed every one to do as he chose" (Vita Theod. Stud. c. 102). He also recalled those who had been banished by Leo. He at first contented himself with forbidding the word "saint" to be inscribed on images, wherever they might be (Cedren. tom. ii. p. 110); but it is probable that he afterwards became more severe (ib. p. 74). A letter is extant addressed by this emperor and his son Theophilus to Louis the Godly, in which he describes the course of action adopted by his predecessors of like mind:—"By common counsel they caused images to be removed from too low situations (in churches), and allowed those set in higher to remain where they were, that the painting might serve for Scripture, lest they should be worshipped by the more ignorant and weak; but they forbade the lighting of lamps or burning of incense to them" (Epist. ad Ludov. apud Goldast. u. s. p. 619). Theophilus, on his accession, required strict obedience to the law, and even forbade the painting of icons (Theophan. Continuât. lib. iii. c. 10; Cedr. tom. ii. p. 110).

On the death of Theophilus in 842, his widow, Theodora, who governed for her infant son Michael III., restored the icons and their worship, notwithstanding an oath that she would not do so, exacted by her dying husband (Cedr.

tom. ii. p. 142). The sanction of the church was obtained through a council held at Constantinople (Labb. tom. vii. col. 1782); and the triumph of images celebrated by the institution of an annual feast on the first Sunday in Lent, thence called by the Greeks ἡ κυριακὴ τῆς ὀρθοδοξίας (Philothei Serræ in Dom. I. Quadr. in Gretser's note to Cod. nus De Offic. c. xv., and Narrat. de Imagibus Restit. in Combesis. Auctar. tom. hist. col. 738). From the Typicon of Sabas, c. 42, we learn that the occasion is marked by a procession of crosses and pictures, and the public reading of the decree of Nicaea (Gretser, u. s.). Opposition, however, was not wholly extinguished; for about the year 860 we find Photius, who had usurped the patriarchate of Constantinople, proposing to Nicholas of Rome that another general council should be held to complete the suppression of "the heresy of the iconomachi" (Vita Ignatii a Niceta conscr. in Labb. tom. viii. col. 1204). The council met the next year and pronounced the deposition of Ignatius, whom Photius had supplanted, but its action in regard to images is not recorded. In 869 another council, convened by the emperor Basil especially for the condemnation of Photius, denounced the iconoclasts, upheld pictures as useful in the instruction of the people, and declared that we ought to "worship them with the same honour as the book of the holy gospels" (can. iii. Labb. tom. viii. col. 1360). Here the history of the struggle closes in the East.

IX. The position of the Nestorians and Euty-chians with respect to images is interesting and instructive. The former were cut off from the church in 431, before images of any kind were common. Their antagonism to the church would make them keen-sighted to the evil springing up within her, and naturally lead to their entire rejection. We find accordingly that "the Nestorians have no images or pictures in their churches, and are very much opposed to the use of them, even as ornaments, or as barely representing historical facts illustrative of sacred Scripture" (Badger's Nestorians, vol. ii. p. 132). The Euty-chians, condemned in 451, were a very small body until the time of Jacob Baradaeus, who died in 588. They became very numerous, under the name of Jacobites, in the 7th century, and when they left the church they carried with them the custom of image-worship, as it was then understood and practised. At a later period the Greeks observing a difference and not knowing that they had themselves changed, accused the Jacobites of error: "They think it indifferent whether they worship or do not worship them, but if ever they chance to worship, they do not kiss the image itself, but touching it with a finger only, kiss the finger instead" (Demetr. Cyzicen. de Jacob. Hæres. Max. Biblioth. PP. tom. 814). One division of the Monophysites, whom some identify with the Armenians, were called Chatzitzarii, from the Armenian Chatzeu a cross, because they revered the cross only (ib.). Of the Armenians Nicen says, "They do not adore the venerable images, and what is more, their Catholicism with the rest anathematizes those who adore them" (De Armen. Relig. Max. Biblioth. tom. xxv. p. 328).

X. We turn now to the West. In 767 Pipin held a council at Gentilly, at which legates from Rome and Constantinople were present. One object was to consider the "cultus of images." The decision was that "images of saints made up (fictas, i.e. mosaics) or painted for the ornament and beauty of churches might be endured, so that they were not had for worship, veneration, and adoration, which idolaters practise" (Constit. Imper. Goldast. tom. i. p. 16). The decree of Nicaea was transmitted by the bishop of Rome to Charlemagne and others, but the French church was not even then prepared to accept the worship, though long accustomed to the sight, of images. In 790 a strong protest appeared in the famous Libri Carolini or Capitulare Prolizum, a treatise in four books, expressly directed against those abuses which the council and the pope had sanctioned. It is not probable that Charlemagne composed it himself, but it is written in his name. The author speaks of king Pipin as his father (lib. i. c. 6), and of legates sent into Greece by his father and himself (lib. iii. c. 3); and Hadrian, in his controversial reply, addresses Charles as the writer (Labb. Conc. tom. vii. coll. 915, 916, 960). A brief quotation will show the practice of the church in France at that time:—"We do not banish from the basilics effigies set up for the commemoration of events, or for ornament, but we restrain a most strange, or rather most superstitious adoration of them, which we do not anywhere find to have been instituted by the apostles, or by apostolical men" (lib. ii. c. 10). "In the year 792," says Roger Hoveden, our English annalist, "did Charles the king of the Franks send a synodal book to Britain, which had been forwarded to him from Constantinople, in which book were found, alas! many unmeet things and contrary to the true faith; chiefly that it had been defined by the unanimous assertion of nearly all the eastern doctors, and not less than 300 or more bishops, that we ought to adore images, which the church of God altogether execrates. Against which Albinus (Alcuin) wrote an epistle admirably confirmed by the authority of the Divine Scriptures, and presented it, with the said book, in the name of our bishops and princes, to the king" (Chronica ad ann. 792; Sim., Simeon Dunelm. Hist. Regum, and Matth. Paris, Chron. Maj. ad eund. ann.); in 794 a council was held at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, "which rejected with contempt and unanimously condemned the adoration and service" which the synod of the Greeks had declared under anathema to be due to "the images of the saints as to the Divine Trinity" (can. ii.). Thus the matter rested during the life of Charlemagne. In 824 Louis the Godly received from Michael Balbus the epistle to which we have already referred, and was induced by it to convoke a synod at Paris in the following year. Having read the letter of Hadrian to Irene, the bishops assembled declare, in an address to Louis and Lothair, that as the pope "justly reproves them who in those parts rashly presumed to break the images of the saints, so is he known to have acted indiscreetly in that he commanded to give them superstitious worship" (Constit. Imper. tom. i. p. 154). They support their judgments by an ample catena from the fathers. At this time Eugenius II. was pope, and a letter is ascribed to him (the contents of which make the authorship doubtful) in which, after quoting a letter from Louis and Lothair to himself, he expresses disapprobation of pictures of saints altogether, and even blames the Greek emperors Michael and Theophilus, to whom he writes, for "allowing any one who chose to have images painted or chased" (ib. p. 186). Claudius, who became bishop of Turin in 821, by the choice of the emperor Louis, finding the basilics of his diocese full of images superstitiously worshipped, ordered them to be removed (Decreta de Cultu Imaginum, Goldast. p. 763). He even effaced the painted figure of the cross. His argument was, "If you worship a cross because Christ died on one, why not a manger, because he lay in one, and a ship because he taught from one; . . . a lamb, because he is the lamb of God; but those perverse dogmatics will devour lambs that have life, and adore them painted on walls" (ib. p. 767). The Apology of Claudius was published after the council of Paris was held. As he went beyond that, he was opposed by many who approved of the acts of the council. Among these was Jonas the bishop of Orleans, whose work in three books (Adversus Claudii Taurinensis Apologeticum) is extant, and has preserved to us whatever remains of that of Claudius. In it he distinctly disallows the worship of images, while protesting vehemently against the extreme opinions and high-handed measures of his opponent:—"Permit the images of saints and pictures of holy works to be painted in churches, not that they may be adored, but rather that they may lend to them a certain beauty, and impart to the senses of the unlearned the history of past events" (lib. i. sig. c. Colon. 1554). A few years later, 823, Dungalus, a monk of St. Denys at Paris, published a violent attack on Claudius. His work (Liber Responsionum adv. Claud., &c.) is printed in the Maxima Biblioth. PP. tom. xiv. A more able production than either of the above is the Liber de Picturis et Imaginibus, written by Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, probably about 840. This author maintains that "the images of the apostles and of the Lord Himself were painted and kept by the ancients rather for love and remembrance than religious honour or any veneration after the custom of the Gentiles" (c. 20); and that "none of the ancient catholics ever thought that they are to be worshipped and adored" (c. 32). He laments the later practice as "near to or like the heresy of idolatry or of the anthropomorphites," and thinks that it was "rightly decreed by the orthodox fathers (in the council of Elvira), in order to put down this kind of superstition, that pictures ought not to be in churches" (c. 33). This was probably the last clear note of warning. Walafrid Strabo, abbot of Reichenau, A.D. 842, gives an uncertain sound. "We know," he says, "that icons are not to be adored or worshipped" (colendas), but he demands for them "seemly and moderate honours" (De R. b. Eccl. c. 8). Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, A.D. 845, at the request of his compatriots wrote a treatise, now lost, to explain "in what manner the images of our Lord and His saints are to be revered" (venerandae; Flodoard. Hist. Eccl. Remens. lib. iii. c. 29). His teaching is not further indicated by our authority; but it may be safely inferred from his contemptuous language with respect to the Greek and Roman practice, which he stigmatizes as "doll-worship" (puparum cultus), and from his open rejection of the second council of Nicaea (Opusc. lv. adv. Hincmar. Laud. c. xx.).

XI. The "images" of which we have spoken were all either pictures, like the modern Greek icons, or mosaics. Some writers, however, to prove that statuary was not unemployed by the early church, allege the image of our Lord which was said to have been set up at Paneas (Cesarea Philippi or Dan) by the woman whom He healed of an issue of blood. (See the Hist. Eccl. of Eusebius, lib. vii. c. 18; Philostorgius, ex lib. vii. § 3; Sozomen, lib. v. c. 21; Asterius Amas. in Photii Biblioth. cod. 271.) If this were indeed a statue of our Lord, the solitary act of a semi-heathen would be no indication of the mind of the apostolic church. But opposite the principal figure was the brazen statue of a woman in a beseeching attitude, kneeling, and with hands raised, not behind and furtively touching the hem of his garment, as in the gospel story. This suggests that the erection of the group was an expression of gratitude to some earthly ruler who had granted a petition. The costliness of the work creates another difficulty (see St. Luke viii. 43). Nor can we build anything on the fact related by Lampridius that Alexander Severus had the images of Christ, Abraham, Orpheus, &c., in his lurarium (Vita Al. Sev. c. 29). It is possible that in the 9th century there was some use of statues among Christians; but we cannot with Mabillon (Præf. I. in Sæc. IV. S. O. B. c. 29) think it a certain inference from these words of Agobard (De Imag. c. 31):—"Whoever adores any picture, or molten or moulded statue, is not giving worship to God, is not honouring the angels or holy men, but showing reverence to (their) images" (simulachra).

IMAGINES CLIPEATAE. The Romans gave this name to the heads painted on the shields usually hung up in their temples (Buonarroti, Osservaz. sopra alc. medaglioni, p. 9-11). We find in ancient Christian art a similar mode of treatment applied to portraits of our Lord. In some instances the bust of the Saviour is painted on a circular space in the form of a shield. This is notably the case in the vaulting of the chapel in the cemetery of Callixtus [JESUS CHRIST], probably the most ancient example of a type that became traditional. Clipeatae of the Good Shepherd as a standing figure are frequently met with in the vaultings of crypts in the catacombs. In the mosaic of the great arch of St. Paul without the walls we find the bust of our Lord in clipeo (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. lxxviii.). Also in ancient ivory diptychs, such as that of Rambona (Buonarroti, Vet. p. 262), in which the clipeus is supported by two winged angels. Another diptych exhibits the shield or crown carried in a similar manner by two angels, and bearing in the midst a Greek cross instead of the figure of the Saviour (Calogera's Raccolta, vol. xi. p. 295). That this mode of treatment lasted till the 7th century is proved by a painting in the roof of the oratory of St. Felicitas; there the bust of our Lord appears in clipeo (Raoul-Rochette, Disc. sur les types init., p. 25). Examples may also be quoted in later times (Du Cange, Gloss. s. vv. Scutum, Thoracilla).

Many of the sarcophagi found in Roman cemeteries exhibit the effigies of a husband and wife carved within a shield or shell, as in the instance figured below (Bottari's pl. xx.). Some times a single figure is thus represented (Id. xxxvi. xl. lxxxix.).

IMIZILUM (also IMIZINUM, MIZILUM, MICILUM, MYZINUM). This word, variously spelt, occurs several times in the Vitæ Pontificum of Anastasius Bibliothecarius. It appears to denote some material of a silky nature, used for articles of dress of a costly description. The etymology of the word is doubtful; according to one view it is akin to the Italian ermesino, but Ducange (s. v.) rather connects it with camisile (Vitæ Pontificum, Leo III. p. 418; Paschalis I. p. 449; Sergius II. p. 490; Nicolaus I. p. 584). IMMERSION. [BAPTISM, § 49, p. 161.]

IMMUNITIES OF CHURCHES. [CHURCH (1), p. 365.]

IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY. Before the time of Constantine the clergy of the Christian church enjoyed no immunities or privileges. With the conversion of the emperor to the Christian faith, the ministers of what became the state religion began to be exempted from burdens borne by other members of the community, and to have special honours conceded to them. This policy reached its height in the Middle Ages, when its results caused a reaction to ensue which is operating at the present day.

By immunities we understand in the present article exemptions from ordinary burdens, by privileges, extraordinary honours, or prerogatives, whether sanctioned by custom only or by law. Both immunities and privileges may be best reviewed under three heads, as I. JUDICIAL, II. PECUNIARY, III. OFFICIAL AND SOCIAL.

I. JUDICIAL. Under this head we have to distinguish, 1. Rights maintained and confirmed, 2. Immunities allowed, 3. Privileges granted.

1. Rights maintained and confirmed. (1) Decisions in matters of faith and in ecclesiastical causes.—Christianity had grown up in antagonism to the imperial power of Rome, and managing its own affairs under its own officers, unaffected by any internal interference on the part of the civil authority. It jealously guarded its independence when the worldly power exchanged its attitude of hostility for one of friendship and alliance. In matters ecclesiastical ecclesiastical authority continued supreme. This was no immunity or privilege granted now for the first time as a favour bestowed by a friendly chief magistrate, but a prescriptive right maintained. The right was afterwards impaired by servility on one side, and by the exertion of might on the other; for the co-operation of the emperor was found so useful for enforcing the acceptance of conciliatory decrees that it was appealed to by contending factions, and, when appealed to, the civil power naturally enough took upon itself to decide which faction it should support and why it should support it. This led imperceptibly to the civil power being regarded as having a right to judge in things spiritual as well as in things civil. But it was rather in its political than in its judicial character that such claim was made or admitted. Ecclesiastical causes, strictly so called, such as trials for heresy, were never brought before courts taking their authority from the state. This is evidenced by laws of successive emperors, of Constantius, A.D. 355 (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 12, tom. vi. p. 37, ed. Gothofred. Lugd. 1665), of Valentinian and Gratian, A.D. 376 (Ibid. leg. 23, p. 52), of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 399 (Ibid. tit. 11, leg. i. p. 298). These laws are of the same tenor, giving the sanction of law to the already existing custom that in ecclesiastical causes judgment was given by church officers and not by the state courts. "On questions of religion," says the law of Arcadius and Honorius, "bishops are to be judges; other cases must be carried before the law courts" (l. c.).

(2) Trials of ecclesiastical persons for moral offences.—In addition to offences against the faith, those offences against morality on the part of the clergy which were not civil crimes were by prescription under the cognisance of ecclesiastical authority alone. This could not be otherwise, as acts that were not offences against the law could not be carried into the law courts. The bishop was judged by his peers, members of the other clerical orders by their bishop; judgment being in accordance with the canons of discipline promulgated by the recognized authority of church synods. In the continuance of this jurisdiction the state simply permitted the exercise of a right which it found the church already possessed of.

2. Immunities allowed. (1) Exemption of the clergy from the jurisdiction of the secular courts in respect to minor offences.—Hitherto we have not arrived at any novel immunity or privilege granted by the state as a matter of grace. But soon episcopal jurisdiction over the clergy was extended from cases of morality to petty crimes, and at the same time the clergy were withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the state courts in respect to those crimes. There was a recognized distinction, according to the laws of the Roman empire, between great and petty crimes; the first were called atrocia delicta, the last levia delicta. By the imperial favour the clergy became exempted from the jurisdiction of the secular courts in respect to the levia delicta, while subject to them, as much as any other citizens, in cases of grave crime, such as murder, rebellion, and the like. In the reign of Justinian, A.D. 539, this exemption was allowed to apply to monks and nuns as well as to the clergy (Justin. Novell. 79, 83; Corpus Juris Civilis, tom. ii. pp. 166, 174, ed. Beck, Lipsiae, 1829); and in the reign of Heraclius, A.D. 610, it appears to have been extended from petty offences to all criminal cases (Constitutiones Imperatoriae, ad calc. Cod. Justin.; Const. 3, p. 808, Paris, 1628). When one of the parties was a clergyman and the other a layman, the clergyman's immunity from the jurisdiction of the secular court did not hold good, except by the consent of the layman (Valentin. Novell. 12).

(2) Exemption of bishops from being summoned into court as witnesses.—By Justinian, possibly by Theodosius, it was enacted that no bishop should be required to appear at the tribunal of a secular judge for the purpose of giving his testimony in any case before the court. The judge was required to send his officer to take the bishop's testimony at his own house. The words of Justinian's law are "No judge is to compel bishops to come to a trial to exhibit their testimony, but he is to send to them some of his subordinate officers" (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 7; Corpus Juris Civilis, tom. ii. p. 250).

(3) Exemption of bishops from having to take an oath in giving their testimony.—By the law of Justinian above quoted it was enacted that the word of bishops, given on the holy gospels, should be accepted in place of an oath, an oath being regarded as derogatory to their holy character. "That the bishops having the holy gospels before them may say what they know, as becomes priests" (Ibid.).

(4) Exemption of bishops and presbyters from being examined by torture while bearing testimony.—According to the laws of the Roman empire, witnesses might be scourged and otherwise tortured in order to extract from them the truth (Cod. Justin. lib. ix. tit. 41; Corpus Jur. Civ. p. 323; Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 9, leg. 2, tom. v. p. 105; St. Aug. Serm. cccv. tom. v. p. 1572, ed. Migne, al. De Diversis, 49; Synesius, Ep. 58, Op. p. 201; Paris, 1631). Theodosius, with some hesitation and ambiguity, exempted bishops and presbyters from this liability. His words are: "Presbyters are to give testimony without being liable to torture, provided, however, that they do not pretend what is false. But the rest of the clergy below them in order or rank, if they have to give their testimony, are to be treated as the laws direct" (Cod. Theod. lib. xi. tit. 39, leg. 10, tom. iv. p. 331).

3. Judicial privileges. (1) Episcopal coercive jurisdiction in civil causes.—It had been the custom of Christians, in accordance with the injunctions of St. Paul (1 Cor. vi. 4), to settle their differences before one of themselves, instead of going to the heathen law courts. Very soon, and very naturally, the office of arbitrator became attached to that of bishop, the bishop being the best qualified person to exercise the judicial function. We find instances of the exercise of judicial power in Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. iii. Ep. 12; lib. vi. Ep. 4, Op. p. 160), Synesius (Ep. 105, Op. p. 247), St. Ambrose (Ep. lxxii. Ad Marcellum, Op. tom. ii. p. 1100; Paris, 1690), St. Augustine (Confess. vi. 3, tom. i. p. 720, ed. Migne). Down to the time of Constantine episcopal decisions thus given had not any force in law. Litigants were bound only by their free choice or by contract to abide by the verdicts given. But now coercive jurisdiction was given to the bishop's court. It was still necessary for both parties to the suit to consent to carry it before the bishop, but when it was once carried to him his sentence was final, and was executed by the secular authorities. From Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History (i. 9, p. 21, Cantab. 1720) it would appear that this privilege was granted by Constantine. It is clearly recognized by a law of Arcadius and Honorius (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, leg. 8, tom. ii. p. 33). Valentinian III. carefully distinguishes between religious causes, in which bishops and presbyters had a prescriptive right to judge, and civil causes, in which they had no inherent right to act judicially; but he recognizes their jurisdiction in the civil causes when the free choice of the litigants has selected them in preference to the state judges (Valentin. Novell. 12, ad calc. Cod. Theod.). Thus bishops were made, by virtue of their office, not only arbitrators between members of their flocks, but also magistrates before whom any that pleased might carry their suits to be by them finally and legally settled. The burden of judicial business became so heavy (see St. Augustine, Epistola xxxiii. Migne, al. 147), that it was devolved upon presbyters (St. Aug. Epist. cxxiii. Migne, al. 110), deacons (Concil. Turracon. can. iv.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1042, Paris, 1714), and laymen (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 37, p. 321; Oron. 1844); whence probably there arose the existing custom of the bishops appointing lay chancellors to preside in their courts. Episcopal jurisdiction did not, however, extend to criminal causes, but was confined to civil questions and pecuniary suits. Bishops were forbidden by canon law to interfere with criminal cases (see Concil. Turracon. can. iv.).

(2) Episcopal intercession.—In pecuniary cases bishops were magistrates, in criminal cases they were intercessors. Wherever the arbitrary will of a despotic sovereign has power over life and liberty, a right of intercession is sure to become vested in the ministers of religion, the reason being that the religious character alone invests its possessor with so much awe as to enable him to dare to resist the passionate and capricious fury of otherwise uncontrolled power. Such a right begins in the courageous act of some brave ecclesiastic, and first being recognized by custom, is afterwards confirmed by law. When, at a more advanced stage of civilisation, punishments are calmly meted out by the scales of justice, the right of intercession necessarily ceases. The propriety of the privilege is argued in two letters that passed between Macedonius and St. Augustine (Ep. clii. cliii. Migne, al. 53, 54); the latter, in interceding with the tribune Marcellinus for the fanatics called Circumcelliones, advances very strong claims: "If you do not listen to a friend who asks, listen to a bishop who advises; though, as I am speaking to a Christian, I shall not be too bold if I say that in such a case as this you ought to listen to your bishop that lays his injunction on you, my noble lord and dear son" (Ep. cxxxiii. Migne, al. 159). He addresses the proconsul Apringius on the same occasion in the same strain (Ep. cxxv. Migne, al. 160). Flavian, when the people of Antioch had raised a futile rebellion against Theodosius, proceeded to Constantinople. "I am come," he said to the emperor, "as the deputy of our common Master, to address this word to your heart, 'If ye forgive men their trespasses, then will your heavenly Father also forgive you your trespasses.'" He returned with a message of pardon. Eparchius, a monk who lived in Angoulême in the 6th century, exercised so great an influence over the neighbouring magistrates that the populace rose and compelled a judge, who was about to yield to his intercession, to execute a robber that had been guilty of murder (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vi. 8, p. 379; ed. Migne, 1849). In the 7th century (A.D. 633) a canon of the fourth council of Toledo, repeated in the sixth council of Arles (A.D. 813), enjoins on bishops the duty of protecting the poor, repressing over-severe judges, and, if necessary, reporting to the king (Conc. Tolet. iv. can. xxxii.; Conc. Arelat. vi. can. xvii.; Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 587; tom. iv. p. 1005).

Closely connected with the privilege of intercession, were the further privileges of protection of the weak, of asylum, of censorship of the public morals; all of which, like the right of intercession, are based upon the character belonging to the minister of religion, not upon the decision of an arbitrary statute.

(3) Interference in behalf of the weak.—This practice, begun at the risk of the bishop, became sanctioned by the laws of the empire. Widows and orphans were counted the especial charge of the bishop, and their property was placed under his guardianship. St. Ambrose tells his clergy that they will do well if through their means the attacks of the powerful, which the widows and orphans cannot resist, are beaten back by the protection of the church. He warns them not to let the favour of the rich have weight with them, and reminds them how often he had himself resisted assault in behalf of the widow, and indeed of any one who required his help (De Officiis Minist. ii. 29. Op. tom. ii. p. 105). Justinian legalized the bishop's right of protection in the case of prisoners, of children stolen from their parents, of lunatics, of foundlings, of minors, of oppressed women (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, legg. 22, 24, 27, 28, 30, 33; tom. ii. pp. 35–39). The fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549), decreed that the archdeacon or other church officer should visit the prisons, and see that the prisoners were cared for, and further, that the bishop should provide them with food (Conc. Aurel. v. can. xx.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1447). Gregory of Tours describes a good bishop as getting justice for the people, helping the poor, consoling the widow, and protecting the minor, as parts of his official duties (Greg. Turon. iv. 35).

(4) Sanctuary.—Out of the rights of intercession and protection there necessarily grew on the one side the right of sanctuary, on the other the right of censure. If the weak and the accused could look to the bishop for help, they naturally fled to him when help was needed; and if the bishop might advocate the cause of the accused and of the suffering, he had to make but one step to censuring the judge and the oppressor. That churches or temples should be places of asylum is founded on natural piety, not on positive law: and until law is all powerful, it is necessary that there should be such refuges from sudden fury. They existed under the Jewish and the various pagan religions, as well as under the Christian religion; and not only Christian churches, but statues of the emperor and the imperial standard originally enjoyed the privilege. We find the custom of sanctuary acknowledged and acted on in the time of St. Basil (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xx. De Laud. Basil. Op. com. ii. p. 353; Paris, 1630), St. Chrysostom (Op. tom. viii. p. 67, ed. Savil), Synesius (Ep. lviii. Op. p. 201; Paris, 1630). Arcadius abrogated it at Eutropius' instance, A.D. 398 (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 3, tom. iii. p. 361); but when Eutropius had himself to claim sanctuary this abrogation was itself abolished (Socrates Hist. Eccl. vi. 5). Shortly afterwards Theodosius II. enacted a law extending the privilege of sanctuary from the interior of the church to its environs (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45). The persons who were allowed to take sanctuary were by no means all classes of criminals, as afterwards was the case through abuse of the original right. It was intended for the defeated party in any civil affray, for slaves that were in danger of cruel treatment, for debtors, unless they were debtors to the state; in general, for the innocent, the injured, the oppressed, and any whose criminality was doubtful, and for whom intercession might seem likely to be of avail. Such persons, provided they came unarmed, had protection for thirty days. Slaves were protected, at first for one day (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 5), afterwards till their masters gave a promise to spare them corporal punishment (Concil. Epauense, A.D. 517, can. xxxix.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1051); for breaking which promise the masters were liable to suspension from communion (Concil. Aurelianense v. A.D. 549, can. xxii.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1447). Ordinary criminals, as robbers and murderers, were not admitted till later times, when the privilege of asylum became incompatible with the due execution of the laws, and was abrogated with the applause of all lovers of justice and morality. Charles the Great, A.D. 779, forbid any subsistence being supplied to murderers, though by that time they had made good their right not to be directly delivered up to justice.

(5) Censorship.—The censorship vested in the clergy was partly a right founded on the fact that the church, as a religious body, took cognisance of immorality within its own body, and exacted of its members the discipline of penance; partly it was a privilege recognized by law, arising out of the privilege of intercession, and indeed forming a branch of it. The council of Arles, A.D. 314, instructed bishops to have a special oversight of such civil magistrates as were Christians, and to cut them off from the church if they acted contrary to her laws (can. vii. Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 264). St. Basil very boldly censured so purely a political act as that of separating Cappadocia into two provinces, A.D. 371, because it threw an increased burden of taxes on the poor (Ep. cccxxxix. ad Martinianum, Op. tom. iii. p. 369; Paris, 1638). St. Gregory Nazianzen declared to rulers and governors (δυνάται καὶ ἀρχόντες) that the law of Christ subjected them to his tribunal (Orat. xvii. Op. tom. i. p. 271; Colon. 1690); Synesius excommunicated Andronicus, president of Lybia (Ep. lviii. Op. p. 201); Orestes' hatred of Cyril of Alexandria was not only personal, but also "because the authority of the bishop took away so much from the power of the king's officers" (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 13, p. 293).

The penance performed by Theodosius I. at the command of St. Ambrose was a conspicuous exhibition of a censorship exerted by a bishop and submitted to by an emperor (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 25, Op. p. 315; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 17, Op. p. 215; Cantab. 1720). These episcopal acts were performed on the principle that every body spiritual or political has an inherent right of exercising discipline on its own members, even to the point of excluding the refractory from its bosom. But the imperial laws were not slow in giving further rights of censorship to the clergy. We have already seen that it was the duty of the bishop to visit prisoners. The same law (A.D. 409) that imposed upon him this duty gave him also the right of admonishing the judges. Justinian required him, further, to report what he found amiss in the prison, that it might be corrected (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, legg. 22, 23; Corp. Jur. Civ. tom. ii. p. 35). The same emperor likewise empowered bishops to uphold good morals by putting down gaming (Ibid. leg. 25); to see that justice was impartially administered (Ibid. legg. 21, 31); to resist tyranny on the part of the chief lay authorities, and to look after the administration of public property (Ibid. leg. 26).

These rights passed over from the Byzantine empire to the Western nations, and no questions were asked as to whether they were founded in positive law or in prescription. The third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, declared bishops to have, by royal command, the charge of seeing how the judges treated the people (Conc. Tolet. iii. can. xviii.; Hard. Conc. tom. iii. 482). The fourth council we have already seen requires bishops to admonish judges, and to report to the king such judges as disregarded their admonition (can. xxxii.). The same charge was repeated by the sixth council of Arles, A.D. 813 (can. xvii.). It was in France that the mystical signification of the "two swords" was discovered (by Geoffrey, abbot of Vendôme, A.D. 1095), and in accordance with the principle involved in that interpretation, ecclesiastical authority was freely exerted over sovereigns. Louis le Debonnaire, Lothaire, and Charles the Bald, three Carolingian princes, were deposed by councils of the Gallican church, while king Robert, Philip I., and Philip Augustus, like Henry IV., Henry V., and Frederick II. of Germany, suffered Papal excommunication. But it was in France too that the secular authority once more revindicated its right in the memorable struggle between Philippe le Bel and Boniface VIII. at the end of the 13th century. A quarter of a century later we find a conference held before Philippe de Valois (A.D. 1329), in which the whole question of lay and spiritual jurisdiction was argued by Pierre de Cugnieres on behalf of the crown, and by the archbishop of Sens and the bishop of Autun in behalf of the church, in which the king's advocate alleged sixty-six excesses of jurisdiction on the part of the ecclesiastical courts. Soon after, the Appel comme d'abus or Appellatio tanquam abusu was instituted, which admitted appeal from an ecclesiastical court to the nearest civil authority whenever it could be pleaded that the ecclesiastical judge had exceeded his powers or encroached upon temporal jurisdiction. At the council of Trent this right was assailed, but through the influence of the ambassadors of Charles IX. it was maintained, and it continues still in vigour.

II. PECUNIARY. 1. Immunities allowed. (1) Census Caputum or Poll Tax.—The clergy, their wives, children, and servants were exempted by Constantius from paying the poll-tax, which was levied on all citizens between the ages of 14 and 65, except such as were granted immunity (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 10, 14). This was a favour shared by the clergy with the members of other liberal professions. Valentinian exempts the higher class of painters (Picturae professores, si modo ingenui sunt) from the incidence of the tax (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 4, leg. 4). This immunity is alluded to and pleaded by Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. clix. ad Amphilochem, Op. tom. i. p. 873) and by St. Basil (Ep. cclxxix. ad Modestum, Op. tom. iii. p. 272).

(2) Epiorum canonicorum aduercator or Soldiers' horses tax; Aurum tircenicum or Recruit tax.—The clergy had to pay their property tax (census agrorum) and all burdens on land like other owners and occupiers, but they appear to have been exempted from any local taxation that might be imposed for the supply of horses for the army, or as a substitute for recruits. High-priests of the old pagan religions seem to have shared this immunity (Cod. Theod. lib. vii. tit. 13, leg. 22; cum Gothofredi comment.).

(3) Trading-tax called Chrysargyrum from being paid in gold and silver, and Lustralis collatio because collected at the end of each lustrum. The inferior clergy were permitted to trade without paying this tax, provided their operations were confined within moderate bounds (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 1, legg. 1, 11; lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 8, 10, 16, 36). This immunity was abused, and clerics were forbidden to trade by Valentinian (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 1, leg. 16; Valentin. Novell. 12 ad calc. Cod. Theod.). The tax was abolished by Anastasius (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 39; Op. p. 371; Cantab. 1720).

(4) Metatum or Entertainment-money.—The clergy were not compelled to receive the emperor, the judges, or soldiers on their circuits or travels. This immunity their houses shared with those of senators, Jewish synagogues, and places of worship (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8).

(5) Superindicta or Extraordinary taxes.—The clergy were exempted from these by Constantius (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8), by Honorius and Theodosius Junior (ibid. leg. 40), and by Justinian (Justin. Novell. cxxxi. c. 5).

(6) Ad instructiones reparacionesque itinerum et pontium or Highway rate.—By a law of Honorius and Theodosius Junior, A.D. 412, church lands were exempted from paying the road-tax; but this exemption was withdrawn A.D. 423 by Theodosius Junior and by Valentinian III., and it was not regranted.

(7) Cursus publicus, angariae, parangariae, translatio, evectio, or Conveyance-burden.—Constantian exempted the clergy from the burden of having to convey corn and other things for the soldiers and imperial officers (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 10), but in the last year of his reign, A.D. 360, he revoked the concession. The immunity was restored A.D. 382, and confirmed by Honorius A.D. 412 (Cod. Theod. lib. ii. tit. 16, leg. 15; lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 40), but again revoked by Theodosius Junior and Valentinian, A.D. 440.

(8) Descriptio lucrativorum, denarismus, unciæ, or Municipal tax.—If the property of a member of a town-council (curia) passed by will to any one that was not a member of the curia, the new owner had to pay a tax to the curia amounting to the sum previously paid by the curialis. But if the property passed to the church, it was enacted by Justinian that the tax could not be demanded (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 22; Novell. cxxxi. c. 5).

2. Pecuniary Privileges. (1) Legacies.—By a law of Constantine (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 4) it was enacted that goods might be bequeathed to the church, no distinction being made between real and personal property. This law was confirmed by Justinian (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 13). Moneys or estates left to the church were administered by the bishop for the general welfare.

(2) Inheritance.—Constantine settled the property of confessors and martyrs dying intestate and without near relatives, on the church (Euseb. Vit. Constant. ii. 36; Op. p. 461; Paris, 1659). Theodosius Junior and Valentinian extended the provision, so as to embrace the case not only of martyrs and confessors, but of all clergymen, monks, and nuns (Cod. Theod. lib. v. tit. 3, leg. 1; Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 20).

(3) Forfeiture.—Justinian enacted that the property of clergymen or monks leaving the clerical or monastic life should be forfeited to the church or monastery with which they had been connected (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 55).

(4) Confiscation.—By laws of Honorius and Gratian some of the property which had belonged to the heathen temples (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 10, leg. 20) and that which was owned by heretics (ibid. tit. 5, leg. 52) was confiscated to the use of the church.

(5) Imperial largess.—Occasionally large sums were bestowed by the emperors for the support of the clergy. Thus Constantine desired his African Receiver, Ursus, to pay over a vast sum (τριαχίλιους·φóλλεις) to Caecilian, bishop of Carthage, for him to divide among the clergy of Africa Mauritania and Numidia, and enabled him to draw for more (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. x. 6, p. 722, ed. Burton). On the occasion of an oecumenical council being summoned, the emperor bore the travelling expenses of the bishops.

(6) State allowance.—Constantine passed a law requiring the prefects of each province to make an annual grant of corn to the clergy out of the revenues of the province (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. i. 11; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 5). This allowance was discontinued when Julian occupied the throne, but it was restored on a limited scale after Julian's death. It is recognized by a law of Justinian (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 12).

Titles are not to be added to this list, as they did not originate in a state grant, but in the voluntary liberality of individuals, grounded partly on a belief that tithes were due by divine right (see St. Hieron. Com. in Mat. iii. Op. tom. iii. p. 1829, ed. Ben. Paris, 1704; St. Aug. Enarr. in Psal. cxlvi. 8; Op. tom. iv. p. 1911, ed. Migne), partly on the evident need of some such provision for the maintenance of the ministers of religion in modest independence. They became general in the 4th century, not as a legal impost but as a voluntary gift (see St. Chrysos. Hom. iv. in Ephes. s. f.; Op. tom. iii. p. 784). They were made compulsory by Charles the Great, A.D. 778 (see Selden, History of Tithes. Works, vol. iii. pt. 2, p. 1146).

III. OFFICIAL AND SOCIAL. 1. Immunities.—Public offices not bringing with them their own salary and emoluments were looked upon, though honourable in themselves, as burdens, like the office of high-sheriff of a county among ourselves. Constantine, on embracing Christianity, exempted the clergy from the burden of bearing any offices whatsoever (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. x. 7, vol. ii. p. 724; Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 1, 2, 7). This concession applied to all offices, whether personal (personalia munera) or praedial, i.e. attached to property, whether honourable (honores or curialia munera) or mean (sordida munera). No change was made by subsequent laws in respect to personal burdens or mean offices, but the experience of Constantine taught him to restrain his first liberality as to the burdens belonging to property. For it was found that immunity from bearing office was counted so great a boon that men of wealth, who had no purpose of undertaking the ministry of the Church, solicited and obtained minor ecclesiastical posts solely with the fraudulent purpose of exempting their estates from the services to which they were liable. Constantine therefore enacted that no one qualified by his estate to bear public offices should be allowed "to fly to the clerical name and ministry, and that any who had done so with a view to declining the public burdens should nevertheless be compelled to bear them" (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 3). Succeeding emperors modified these laws of Constantine in a manner sometimes more sometimes less favourable to the clergy, the general tendency of the legislation being to exempt the estates of the church from civil burdens, but to preserve the liability of the private property of the clergy—a liability which they had to fulfil either by finding substitutes to perform the necessary duties, or by parting with a portion at least of their lands (Cod. Theod. lib. xii. tit. 1, legg. 49, 59, 99, 121, 123, 163; lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 19, 21).

Official and Social Privileges. (1) Free election.—In the midst of the despotism of the empire the clergy and laity maintained their old right of electing, and the clergy their right of being elected, to the office and dignity of bishop. "Those absolute monarchs respected the freedom of ecclesiastical elections; and while they distributed and resumed the honours of the state and army they allowed eighteen hundred perpetual magistrates to receive their important offices from the free suffrages of the people" (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xx.). By degrees this right has been taken away in almost all parts of the church, partly on the plea that the civil magistrate represents the laity, partly on the allegation that endowments and civil privileges had been granted by the state, sometimes because it was considered that the security of the state required such a precaution, sometimes from apprehension of the evil consequences expected to arise out of the excitement of free elections, sometimes owing to corrupt agreements, termed concordats, made between the bishop of Rome assuming to represent ecclesiastical interests and the king or emperor of a particular country, representing the civil power.

(2) Authority of the higher over the lower clergy.—The position of the bishops of the larger sees was made one of great dignity and importance by the subjection of the clergy and ecclesiastics of all classes to their uncontrolled authority; and this was not restrained by any interference on the part of the state. The bishop of Constantinople presided as lord over 60 presbyters, 100 deacons, 40 deaconesses, 90 sub-deacons, 110 readers, 25 chanters, 100 doorkeepers (Justin. Novell. ciii.), and a guild of 1100 copistae or gravediggers. The clergy, under the immediate control of the bishop of Carthage, were upwards of 500. The parabolani alone, at Alexandria, amounted to 600. All these were allowed by the law as well as by custom to form in each central city a society which recognized the bishop as its head with a devotion which was not equalled by the retainers of any civil officer. Beyond this immediate circle of adherents a less defined authority was vested in the metropolitan, extending over all his suffragan bishops.

(3) Rights of meeting and speech.—Twice every year each metropolitan was commanded by the canons, and permitted by the laws, to call together the synod of his province: occasionally the emperor assembled the synod of the empire. At these meetings, as well as in the pulpit, free speech was allowed by the laws, the doctrine and discipline of the church were regulated, ecclesiastical sympathies were strengthened, and the power of the clergy, by being concentrated, was increased.

(4) Tokens of respect.—It was the custom for the laity, not excluding the emperor, to bow the head to the bishop and to kiss his hand (see instances given in Valesius' note on Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. iv. 6, p. 153, Cantab. 1720; and Savaro's note on Sidonius Apollinaris, viii. 11, p. 532, Paris, 1609). It was usual to address the bishop by the title of God-beloved or Most-holy (θεοφιλέστατος, ἁγιώτατος), and by still stronger terms of honour, as "Holy Lord and Most Blessed Pope"—words commonly used by St. Jerome in writing to St. Augustine. "Per coronam" was a common form of beseeching a bishop (see St. Aug. Ep. xxxiii. al. 157, tom. ii. p. 131, ed. Migne; Sidon. Apollinaris. cum comment. Savan. vii. 8, p. 440). Its meaning is doubtful, but it is probably equivalent to the phrase "your honour" (see Bingham, Antiquities, ii. 9, 4). Occasionally Hosannahs were sung before bishops and others eminent for sanctity, but this practice is condemned by St. Jerome as savouring of profanity and presumption (St. Hieron. in Matt. xxi. 15; Op. tom. iv. p. 98). The bishop's seat in his cathedral was called his throne.

There is no doubt that the position of the chief bishops was one of great dignity, authority, wealth, and power. Gibbon calculates that the average income of a bishop amounted to 600*l.* a-year (chap. xx.). This does not give an accurate idea of the status held by them, as the value of money is constantly changing, and averages are always deceptive. We may regard the bishops of the chief cities of the empire as maintaining a state superior to that of the imperial officers and lay nobles, while the bishops of lesser sees were comparatively poor and obscure men, though enjoying a spiritual equality with their more prominent brethren. The simple presbyter's position was a humble one, at a time when bishops were comparatively more numerous than now and parochial endowments did not exist: the deacon was regarded as little else than one of the bishop's attendants.

We may note in conclusion how little remains of all the privileges and the immunities granted to the clergy by the fervour of the first faith of a converted world. Their judicial privileges and immunities exist no longer, except so far as the coercive power of the bishop's court be regarded as a shadow of them, though once they were considered important enough to lead an archbishop Becket to enter upon a life-and-death struggle with a Henry II. for their maintenance. Their pecuniary privileges and immunities exist no longer, for the grant made in some countries to the clergy from the national exchequer is rather a substitute for estates confiscated than a free gift of love. Their official privileges and immunities exist no longer, unless the permission conceded to bishops to take part in national legislation, and the exemption of the clergy from having to serve in the army or on juries, be regarded as the equivalents of the honours and immunities bestowed by the Caesars with so ungrudging a hand. The apparent tendency of modern legislation, still affected by a reaction from mediæval assumptions, is to approve not only of the civil power resuming the privileges that it had bestowed, but of its transferring to itself those powers of self-government in respect to doctrine and discipline, which were not granted to the church as a favour, but were conferred to her by Constantine and his successors as hers by prescription and inherent right.

IMPLUVIUM seems to be sometimes used to designate the ATRIUM, or court outside the door of a church, in which there was generally a basin or some vessel for performing ablutions [FOUNTAIN; HOLY WATER] (Bingham's Antiq. VIII. iii. 5). [C.]

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (Manus impositio, χειρὼν ἐπίθεσις, χειροθεσία, χειροτομία). [Χειροτομία originally signified election, per suffragii manuum extensione data. An election by the people always in the early church preceded consecration, so that it is not surprising that χειροτομία soon came to signify the whole process of making a bishop, of which it properly denoted only the first stage (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.).]

The origin of this rite is to be looked for in patriarchal times, when it seems to have been a form simply of solemn benediction. Thus Jacob, when blessing Ephraim and Manasse on his death-bed, laid his hands upon them (Gen. xlviii. 14). The high priest employed practically the same gesture as a part of the public ritual (Lev. ix. 22, 23). So the Lord Himself blessed children (Mark x. 16).

It became also a form of setting apart or designation to important offices, as well secular as religious, e. g., in the case of Joshua (Num. xxvii. 18-23; Deut. xxxiv. 9). And in connection with the consecration of priests (Lev. viii. 22). Jewish Rabbins were set apart by imposition of hands until comparatively modern times. We pass over the use of this ceremony in the Levitical sacrifices, and also in oaths, as having no Christian equivalent. Though this latter somewhat resembles the custom of swearing with the hand laid upon relics, and upon the volume of the gospels even to modern times.

In the New Testament, we find the laying on of hands used by our Lord both in blessing and in healing; and again He promises to His disciples that they too should lay hands on the sick and they should recover. The apostles laid their hands as the outward sign of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, both on ordinary Christians after baptism (Acts viii. 17; xix. 6), and on those set apart for a special office (Acts xiii. 3; and probably 1 Tim. iv. 14; and 2 Tim. i. 6); at the time when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written, the doctrine of the "laying on of hands" was one of the elements of Christian teaching (Heb. vi. 1). [DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, vol. iii. p. xc.]

The imposition of hands is used in the following ceremonies:—

1. In Ordinations to the higher Orders. The 4th council of Carthage had canons directing imposition of hands in the ordination of a bishop, priest, or deacon (cann. 2, 3, 4). But another form was provided for the subdeacon, "quia manūs impositionem non accipit." Similarly for the other minor orders (cc. 5-10). See also Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 16. These were ἀχειροτόντος ὑπερείς, an inferior ministry, and the holders insacramental ministri. They were not allowed to enter the diaconicon, nor handle the vasa Domini or sacred vessels (Conc. Agyathen. c. 66; Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 51; Bingham, iii. 1). "Manus impositio docet, eos qui sacris ordinibus mancipantur, sacras omnes actiones, quasi sub Deo efficere, utpote quem habeant operationum suarum in omnibus ducem ac rectorem" (Pseudo-Dionysius, De Eccles. Hierarch. c. 5, par. 3). "Hæc manuum impositio significatur illapsus Spiritus Sancti, quem ordinans precatur dari ordinando: ejusque regimen, directio et protectio, ut scilicet Spiritus Sanctus ordinandum quasi manu suâ regat et dirigat" (Amalarius de Eccles. Offic. lib. i. c. 12).

Deaconesses also received the impositio manuum; and their ordination is expressly called both χειροτομία and χειροθεσία in the 15th canon of Chalcedon. [ORDINATION.] [S. J. E.]

2. In the restitution of holy orders, as in the original conferring, the imposition of the hands of the archbishop formed an essential portion of the rite (Martene, Rit. Ant. III. ii.).

3. In baptism the laying-on of hands, with unction, followed in the most ancient times immediately upon the washing of water [BAPTISM, § 13, p. 157]; nor was the custom obsolete in the West in the 13th century (Martene, R. A. I. ii. 1 § 3), while in the East it is practised still. This is however to be understood, in the West at least, to refer to baptisms at which the bishop himself was present, as was generally the case when baptism took place—except in cases of extremity—only at certain solemn seasons. When baptism was frequently celebrated in the absence of a bishop, while the laying-on of hands and chrismation on the forehead was a privilege of the episcopal order (R. A. I. ii. 3, § 2), the custom arose of the baptized being presented to the bishop at some convenient season separate from that of baptism. [CONFIRMATION.] The Arabic canons, called Nicene (c. 55), desire the chorepiscopus in his circuits to cause the boys and girls to be brought to him, that he may sign them with the cross, pray over them, lay his hands upon them, and bless them. Bede tells us that Cuthbert used to journey through his diocese, laying his hands upon those who had been baptized, that they might receive the Holy Ghost (Vita Cuthberti, c. 29, in Migne's Patrol. xciv. 769 D). Ancient authorities, however, give at least as great prominence to the chrismation on the forehead which was reserved for the bishop, as to the laying-on of hands. See on the whole subject Martene, De Rit. Ant. lib. i. c. ii.; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 206 ff.

4. In the reception of a heretic into the church, whose baptism was recognised as valid, imposition of hands was the form of conferring those gifts of the Holy Spirit which he could not have received in a heretical community [CONFIRMATION, p. 425; HERESY, p. 768].

5. In benedictions the laying-on of hands is constantly used; as, in the benediction of an abbat (R. A. II. i. 3); of a virgin dedicated to a religious life (ib. II. iv. 16); of a king (ib. II. x.), as when St. Columba, who was an abbat and not a bishop, laid his hands on the head of Aidan and consecrated him as king (Cumineus Albus, Vita S. Columbae c. 5, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. 1).

6. In the visitation of the sick the priest and the faithful who are with him are directed to lay hands on the sick (Martene, R. A. I. vii. 4, Ordd. 4, 5, 14, etc.), with the prayer that the Lord would vouchsafe to visit and relieve His servant.

7. In absolution the laying-on of hands accompanied the prayer for the remission of the sins of the penitent (Martene, R. A. I. vi. 3, Ordd. 3, 9, etc.). [C.]

IMPOTENT MAN, CURE OF. Guénébault mentions (s.v. "Boiteux," p. 164) a fine bas-relief of the cure of the lame man at the gate of the Temple, with apparent reference to Acts iii. 2, as published in Monumenta crypturum Vaticanæ, Angelus de Gabrielis, fol. pl. lxxix. no. 3. Notice of the universally-treated subject of the healing of the paralytic man will be found under the heading PARALYTIC. [R. St. J. T.]

IMPRISONMENT OF THE CLERGY. Seclusion of criminous clerks, generally in a monastery, appears to have been resorted to as a disciplinary measure as early as the 6th century. Justinian (Novellæ, cxiii. c. 20) orders "that if any presbyter or deacon were convicted of giving false evidence in a civil cause, he should be suspended from his function and confined to a monastery for three years." Laymen were scourged for this crime. So the 2nd council at Seville (can. 3), in the case of vagrant clergy: "Desertorem tamen clericum, cingulo honoris atque ordinationis suae exutum, aliquo tempore monasterio relegari convenit:

sicque postea in ministerio ecclesiastici ordinis revocari." A similar canon directing deposition and relegation to a monastery to be inflicted upon clerks guilty of certain crimes, passed at the council of Agde (c. 1). A distinction was drawn by the first council of Mâcon between the inferior clergy (junior) and the higher orders (honorator). The former were to receive forty stripes, save one, whilst the latter were imprisoned thirty days for the same offence (Conc. Matiscon. I. can. 8). Pope Gregory the Great seems to have laid down (Epp. vii. 50) an intelligible principle: that such crimes as were by the Mosaic law punished with death, when committed by clerics, incurred the penalty of deposition without hope of restoration (desperationem sacramentum dignitatum). To these he added some others, fornication, adultery, perjury, and such like: all these incurred irregularity. Other offences were expiated by penitential in a monastery for a longer or shorter time (Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Eccl. Disc. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 59). Individuals would sometimes segregate themselves of their own accord to expiate some fault. The same Gregory praises (Epp. vii. 12) Saturninus, bishop of Jadera (= Zara), in Dalmatia, for so doing in order to atone for communicating with the excommunicated archbishop of Salona (ib. c. 59). Joannes Defensor, whom Gregory had sent into Spain to execute a sentence of six months' relegation to a monastery upon a certain bishop who had driven an unoffending neighbour from his see, pronounced the sentence far too lenient. The same punishment was inflicted upon certain bishops who had condemned an innocent person. When Gregory imprisoned clerics he was in the habit of making an annual payment for their maintenance to the monastery that received them (Thomassin, u. s. III. lib. ii. c. 29), but whether derived from the offender's benefice, or the property of the pope himself, does not appear. The tendency was perhaps to bear more lightly on crimes of the kind mentioned above; but incontinence was always heavily punished. Hincmar, and after him Flodoard, tell the story of Genebald, bishop of Laudunum (Laon), who for a crime of this kind was condemned to seven years' penitence, and even put into fetters by his metropolitan, Remigius, bishop of Rheims (Hincmar, Vita S. Remig.). And for capital crimes the incarceration was for life, and included a sentence of perpetual lay-communion (Conc. Epaon. can. 22).

But during the reign of Charlemagne a somewhat milder rule prevailed. Hincmar, and also Rabanus, archbishop of Mentz, were inclined to distinguish between secret crimes, and those which caused open scandal, and to treat the former more leniently upon confession and repentance. Probably the general declension of morals at that period forced them to make some abatement from the rigid rules of a purer age. Accordingly, canonical punishments were generally lightened from this time (Thomassin, u. s. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 60; Bingham, bk. xvii. c. 4).

The larger churches had sometimes prisons in their precincts as well as monasteries [DECANIA]. [S. J. E.]

IMPROPRIATION is the assignment of ecclesiastical tithes to a layman, and is to be distinguished from appropriation, which is the assignment of them to a college or other corporation, some of whose members are in orders. The practice seems to have sprung up only about the beginning of the 9th century.

Very soon after the payment of TITHES (see the article) became general, the alienation of them by the laity began. Thus a council at Ingelheim (A.D. 948) in its 8th canon protests against this new form of robbery: "Ut oblationes fidelium, quatenus altari deferantur, nihil omnino ad laicalem potestatem, dicente Scripturâ. 'Qui altari serviunt, de altario participantur.'" (So Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Eccl. Discip. III. lib. i. c. 7, n. 8), who interprets this canon as referring to tithes. Louis IV. of France, and the emperor Otho, were present at this council. To the same effect a council of Metz in its 2nd canon, quoting Mal. iii. 8-10. It was not uncommon for the lay lords to seize the opportunity of the vacancy of a bishopric or a parish, to make these depredations (Vid. Thomassin, tom. iii. lib. ii. c. 53, for instances of this). And we find even that the monks of St. Denis had got possession of some tithes (it does not appear how) and wanted to sell them. This seems to be a distinct case of appropriation, and we learn the facts from a letter to them of Hincmar of Rheims, who protests against their selling what they ought to restore to the parish priest.

But any instances we find in these times are exceptional, and apparently the result of violent and illegal seizure by laymen of ecclesiastical dues. As Thomassin observes: "Necdum tunc in mentem quidquam venisse de decimis infodatis. Involaverant decimas Laici, necdum pacifice possidebant, necdum obducere potuerant huic rapinae vel colorem legitimæ possessionis. Quin identidem commonebantur profini depredatores, ut ecclesiae restituerent, quae jure retinere non possent" (tom. iii. lib. i. c. 7).

It is in the next and succeeding ages that we must look for impropriation as a legally recognized condition of ecclesiastical property.

IN PACE. [INSCRIPTIONS, p. 854 ff.]

INCENSE. There is no trace of the use of incense in Christian worship during the first four centuries. On the contrary, we meet with many statements in the writings of the early fathers which cannot be reconciled with the existence of such a custom. Thus Athenagoras, A.D. 177:—"The Creator and Father of the universe does not require blood nor smoke, nor the sweet smell of flowers and incense" (Legatio, § 13). Tertullian, A.D. 198, comparing certain Christian customs with heathen, says, "It is true, we buy no frankincense; if the Arabians complain of this, the Sabeans will testify that more of their merchandise, and that more costly, is lavished on the burials of Christians, than in burning incense to the gods" (Apol. c. xlii.). "I offer Him a rich sacrifice . . . not one pennyworth of the grains of frankincense," &c. (ib. c. xxx.). Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 192, contrasting the reasonable service of Christians with that of the heathen says, that "the truly holy altar is the just soul, and the perfume from it holy prayer" (Strom. lib. vii. c. vi. § 32). "If then they should say that the great High Priest, the Lord, offers to God the incense (θυμίανα) of sweet smell, let them not suppose that the Lord offers this sacrifice and sweet smell of incense, but let them understand that He offers on the altar the acceptable gift of charity and spiritual perfume" (Pædug. lib. ii. c. 8, § 67). Arnobius, A.D. 298, says of the use of frankincense among the heathen, "It is almost a new thing, nor is the term of years impossible to be traced since the knowledge of it flowed into these parts . . . But if in the olden times neither men nor gods sought after the matter of this frankincense, it is proved that it is vainly and to no purpose offered now" (Adv. Gentes, lib. vii.). Lactantius, A.D. 303:—"It follows that I show what is the true sacrifice of God . . . lest any one should think that either victims, or odours, or precious gifts are desired by God. . . . This is the true sacrifice, not that which is brought out of a chest, but that which is brought out of the heart" (Divin. Instit. Epit. c. 2). He also quotes with approbation a saying of the Neo-Platonists, that "frankincense and other perfumes ought not to be offered at the sacrifice of God" (Divin. Instit. lib. vi. § 25). St. Augustine, 396:—"We go not into Arabia to seek for frankincense, nor do we ransack the packs of the greedy trader. God requires of us the sacrifice of praise" (Enarr. in Ps. xlix. § 21). The above are brief extracts from passages, often of considerable length, all bearing on the subject; and not a single author makes the least allusion to any Christian rite of incense, or any reservation from which we could infer that such a rite existed. Their language precludes the supposition.

It is probable, however, that incense was very early employed in Christian places of worship as a supposed disinfectant, and to counteract unpleasant smells; and that this was the origin of that ritual use of it, which began in the 6th or possibly the 5th century. Tertullian, who, as we have seen, denies by implication the ritual use, yet says, "If the smell of any place offend me, I burn something of Arabia; but not," he adds, "with the same rite, nor the same dress, nor the same appliance, with which it is done before idols" (De Cor. Mil. c. 10). The following is a benediction of incense, used in the days of Charlemagne and later, in which no other object than that which Tertullian had in burning it is recognized:—"May the Lord bless this incense to the extinction of every noxious stench, and kindle it to the odour of its sweetness" (Martene, De Eccl. Ant. Rit. lib. i. c. 4, Art. 12, ord. 5, 6). There is no mention of incense in the so-called liturgy of St. Clement, which is supposed to represent the offices of the 4th century; nor indeed in the Apostolical Constitutions with which it is incorporated. Pseudo-Dionysius (probably about 520, but possibly somewhat earlier) is the first who testifies to its use in religious ceremonial:—"The chief priest (bishop) having made an end of sacred prayer at the divine altar, begins the censuring with it, and goes over the whole circuit of the sacred place" (Hierarch. Eccles. c. iii. sect. 2; comp. sect. 3, § 3). A thrible of gold is said by Evagrius to have been sent by a king of Persia to a church in Antioch about 594 (Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. 21). The most ancient Ordo Romanus, which Cave supposes to have been compiled about 730, and which may belong to the 7th century, orders that in pontifical masses a subdeacon, bearing a golden censer, shall go before the bishop (of Rome) as he leaves the secretarium for the choir, and two with censers before the deacon gospeller as he proceeds with the gospel to the ambo (§§ 7, 11, in Musae. Ital. tom. ii.). These rules are also given in the next revision of the Ordo, which may be a century later (ib. §§ 4, 8). This latter document says also, "After the gospel has been read . . . the thuribles are carried about the altar, and afterwards taken to the nostrils of persons (hominum), and the smoke is drawn up towards the face by the hand" (§ 9). This probably originated in its earlier natural use as a means of sweetening and (as they thought) purifying the air; but we see in it the probable origin of the strictly ritual censuring of persons in the West. In the same Ordo, which was certainly in use before Amalaricus wrote (about 827), is a direction that after the oblates and the chalice have been set on the altar, with a view to their consecration, "the incense be put on the altar" (§ 9). Here we have the probable germ of the later "censing of the gifts." It is probable, however, that such ritual practices were for some time confined to Rome. We do not observe any reference to the use of incense in the Gallican Liturgies which were in use down to the time of Charlemagne, nor is it mentioned by Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, in his explanation of liturgical rites (Martene, u. s. ord. 1), nor by Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, in his book on the offices of the church. We may also infer its rarity within our period, and the little importance attached to it throughout the 9th century, from the fact that it is not mentioned by Florus of Lyons, Rabanus of Mentz, or Walafrid of Reichenau, in works largely devoted to questions of ritual.

The so-called Missa Illyrici (Martene, u. s. ord. 4) preserves the Scriptural symbolism by directing the priest to say, when the incense is burnt, "Let my prayer be set forth in Thy sight as the incense" (Ps. cxli. 2). But in the same and later ordines [ORDO] it represents divine influence on the soul, according to the following explanation of Amalaricus:—"The thurible denotes the body of Christ in which is fire, to wit, the Holy Spirit, from whom proceeds a good odour, which every one of the elect wishes to snatch towards himself. The same odour is a token that virtue (bonam operationem) goes forth out of Christ, which he who wishes to live passes into his own heart" (De Eccles. Offic. lib. iii. c. 18). The reader will observe the allusion to the mode of inhaling the smoke above described.

This notice would be imperfect without a reference to certain passages from early writers, which have led some to suppose that notwithstanding the authorities above cited, the ritual use of incense was known in the Christian church from the beginning. As the earliest testimony we often see alleged the third apostolical canon, which forbids that "beside honey and milk, and new ears of corn and bunches of grapes in their season [see FRUITS, OFFERING OF], anything else shall be offered on the altar, at the time of the holy oblation, than oil for the lamp and incense" (Bever. Pandect. tom. i. p. 2). The Arabic paraphrase has more generally, "in the time of the sacraments and prayers" (ib. tom. ii.; Annot. p. 16). It will be seen that this canon does not mention the ritual use of incense, nor can it be shown that the incense mentioned was designed for such use. It was without doubt often used as a perfume, and in the caves and catacombs in which the first Christians often worshipped, and in which their dead were frequently buried, would sometimes be thought almost as necessary as the lamp-oil, on behalf of which a similar exception was made. We must add too that the whole of the clause above cited looks like a late addition to the very simple code which is assigned, with probability, to the middle of the 3rd century, though the first mention of it occurs in 394 (Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 76). Pseudo-Hippolytus, alleged as the bishop of Portus, 220, but in reality some centuries later:—"The churches lament, with a great lamentation, because neither the oblation nor the (rite of) incense is celebrated" (De Consumm. Mundi, c. 34). Here we have nothing more than imagery borrowed from well known rites of the Mosaic law. The language was probably suggested by that of the following passage in St. Basil, 370, which has been brought forward with the same object:—"The houses of prayer were cast down by unholy hands, the altars were overthrown, and there was no oblation nor incense, no place of sacrifice, but fearful sorrow, as a cloud, was over all" (In Gordium Mort. Hom. xix.). St. Basil here is merely in part citing and partly paraphrasing, with reference to the church under persecution, what Azarias in the Song of the Three Children says of the state of Jerusalem during the captivity (Sept. Vers. v. 14). St. Ambrose says, with reference to the appearance of the angel to Zacharias "on the right side of the altar of incense" (St. Luke i. 11), "Would that an angel might stand by us also as we burn (or rather heap, adolentibus) the altars" (Expos. Evang. S. Luc. lib. i. § 28). Incense is not mentioned here, and "adolere" does not necessarily imply the use of fire, so that no allusion to incense may have been intended. It is probable, however, that the thought of incense was suggested to St. Ambrose by the mention of "the altar of incense." We therefore further point out that if he was thinking of material incense, as used in the Christian church, it must in his time have been burnt on altars, which no one asserts; and, moreover, that St. Ambrose explains himself by a paraphrase of his own words, "as we heap the altars, as we bring the sacrifice." The incense in his mind was "the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving." The testament of St. Ephrem the Syrian, a spurious document of uncertain date, is also quoted with the same object:—"I exhort you not to bury me with sweet spices . . . but to give the fumigation of sweet-smelling smoke in the house of God . . . Burn your incense in the house of the Lord to His praise and honour" (Test. S. Ephr. in Surii Vitæ Sanctorum, Feb. 1). The actual use of incense during the funeral ceremony appears to be intended here; but the evidence of a late forgery is worth nothing. We may add that there was an obvious natural reason, such as the first Christians would have recognized with Tertullian, for burning incense at a funeral; and it is probable that the custom of using it then contributed not a little to the introduction of the practice as a purely religious rite.

[W. E. S.]

INCEST (Incestus) is defined by the Decree of Gratian (causa 36, qu. 1, c. 2, § 4) thus: "Incestus est consanguineorum vel affinium abusus," where we are of course to understand affinity or consanguinity such as would be an impediment to matrimony (Van Espen, Jus Eccles. P. iii. tit. iv. cc. 48, 49).

Christian morality extended the range of "prohibited degrees" within which it was unlawful to contract matrimony, and consequently the conception of incest, much beyond that of the heathen world. The apologists, as Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 31) and Origen (c. Celsum, V. p. 248, Spencer) speak with horror of the licence given to Persians and Egyptians of marrying persons near in blood; and Augustine (De Civitate, xv. 16) insists upon the natural loathing which men feel at connexions of this kind. Gothofred (on the Theodosian Code, lib. iii. tit. 12) gives many instances of marriages among the Romans—as of uncle with niece—which the feeling of Christendom universally condemns. [AFFINITY; PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

Basil the Great (ad Amphiloichum, c. 67) holds incest with a sister to be a crime of the same degree as murder. He who commits incest with a half-sister, whether by the father's or the mother's side, during the time that he continues in his sin, is to be absolutely excluded from the church; after he is brought to a sense of his sin, he is for three years to stand among the "Flentes" at the door of the church, begging those who enter to pray for him; then he is to pass another seven years among the "Audientes," as still unworthy to pray with the rest; then, if he show true contrition, and on his earnest entreaty, he may be admitted for three years among the "Substrati;" then, if he bring forth fruits meet for repentance, in the tenth year he may be admitted to the prayers of the faithful, but not to offer with them; then, after continuing two years in this state, he may at last be admitted to holy communion (c. 75). The same punishment is prescribed for one who commits incest with a daughter-in-law (c. 76). He who marries two sisters, though not at the same time, is subject to the penalties of adultery, i.e. two years among the Flentes, two among the Audientes, two among the Substrati, and one among the Consistentes, before he can be admitted to communion. And generally, he who marries within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity (τῆς ἀπειρημένης συγγενείας) is liable to the penalties of adultery (c. 68). The council of Elvira (Conc. Elib. c. 61), A.D. 305, allotted to a marriage with a deceased wife's sister the penalty of fifteen years' excommunication; that of Neo-Caesarea (c. 2), A.D. 314, decreed the excommunication of a woman who married two brothers for the whole of her life, except that in peril of death she might be admitted to communion, on promising to renounce the connexion if she recovered (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. xi. 3).

The Penitentials, as might be expected, provide penalties for incest; those, for instance, of Theodore, of Bede, and of Egbert assign to different forms of this sin periods of penance varying from five to fifteen years (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 179, 328, 420). [C.]

INCLINATION. [GENUFLEXION, p. 725.]

INCLUSI. Monks living in detached cells within the precincts of the monastery ("intra septa") were termed "inclusi." These were monks either of long experience or of delicate health (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 38). They were subject to the control of the abbot, but not to the ordinary rules of the monastery (Martene, Reg. Cumm. c. 1; Menard, Concord. Regul. c. 3, § 6). See HERMITS and HESYCHASTAE.

INDALECIUS. [HESYCHIUS (1).]

INDICTION. From the middle of the 4th century a new note of time begins to appear in dates; Indiction, followed by an ordinal number, from I. to XV., as a character of the year, is appended to its customary designation; e.g., Coss. M. et N. (or Anno ab Incarnatione—Indictione). In respect of its origin, "Indictio" is a term of the Roman fiscus, meaning "quidquid in praestationem indicitur," notice of a tax (on real property, Cod. Justin. x. 6, 3), "assessment," ἐπινέμσις: thence it came to denote the year on which the tax was assessed, beginning 1st September, the epoch of the imperial fiscal year. It seems that in the provinces, after Constantine, if not earlier, the valuation of property was revised upon a census taken at the end of every fifteen years, or three lustra (Ideler, Hdb. 2. 347 sqq., from Savigny, über die Steuerverfassung unter den Kaisern, in the Transactions of the Berlin Royal Academy, 1822, 23). From the strict observance of this fiscal regulation there resulted a marked term of fifteen years, constantly recurrent, the Circle of Indictions, ἡ ἐκαὶ δεκάετηρς τῶν Ἰνδικτιῶνων (or Ἰνδικτῶν), which became available for chronological purposes as a "period of revolution" of fifteen years, each beginning 1st September: which (except in the Spanish peninsula) continued to be used as a character of the year irrespectively of all reference to taxation. The Indictions (like the "solar cycle" of Sunday letters, twenty-eight years, and the lunar cycle, nineteen years, of "Golden Numbers," beside which this circle has obtained place in chronology) do not form an era: the annexed ordinal number is reckoned from the epoch of the circle then current: it is not expressed how many circles have elapsed since any given point of time. It is certain that September 1st is the original epoch of each indiction (St. Ambros. Epist. ad Episc. per Acmil. 2, 256, Indictio cum Septembri mense incipit; and de Noe et Arcá, c. 17. A Septembri mense annus videtur incipere, sicut Indictionum praesentium usus ostendit). From any given date of a known year to which its indiction is added, as e.g., "3 id. August. Symmacho et Boëtio Coss. [= 11 Aug., A.D. 522] in fine Indictionis XV." (Reines. Inscript. Vet. 978), it results that a circle of indictions began 210 (= 14 × 15) years earlier, i.e., A.D. 312. Now as it is only since Constantine that "Indiction" makes its appearance as a note of time, and as with the defeat and death of Maxentius in the autumn of that year Constantine attained to undisputed empire, the date, A.D. 312, 1 Sept., is accepted as the epoch of the first circle of indictions. Hence the technical rule for finding the indiction of each year. To the ordinal number of the given year A.D. (beginning with 1 January) add 3: divide the amount by 15: the remainder denotes the indiction: if there be no remainder, the year is Indict. 15. Thus, in respect of the above-cited date, A.D. 522 (August 11th), the division of 525 by 15 gives no remainder; therefore Jan. 1st to Aug. 31st of that year lie in Indiction 15, beginning at 1 Sept. of A.D. 521. The author of the Paschal Chronicle (probably a man of Antioch) makes the circle of Indictions begin much earlier, viz. at the epoch of the Antiochene era, 1 Gorpiaeus=1 Sept. U.C. 705=B.C. 49; at which year he notes: "Here begins the first year of the 15-year circle of indictions, with the first year of C. Julius Caesar:" and thenceforward he adds to each year its indiction. Twenty-four complete circles ($24 \times 15 = 360$) and therefore at 1 Sept. A.D. 312: and at Ol. 273, 1, Coss. Constantino III., Licinio III., U.C. 1066, beginning 1 January, A.D. 313, he notes: "Ἰνδικτιώνων Κωνσταντινιανῶν ἐνθάυθα ἀρχή—to be understood as meaning that the first eight months of that consulsip belonged to that first year. (So, throughout, the Indiction in Chron. Pasch. is attached, not to the year in which it began, but to the following year, beginning 1 January, which contains eight months of it. Comp. Clinton, F. R. Append. 1 and 2.) Although there is no trace elsewhere of this earlier system of indictions, it does not follow, in Ideler's judgment (2, 351), that the statement of the Paschal Chronicle is entirely without foundation. A fiscal regulation, proceeding by periods of fifteen years may, he thinks, have obtained in Syria and other Eastern provinces: and the assumption would serve to explain the circumstance, else unaccounted for, that in the reckoning of Antioch, the year (of the era of the Seleucidae) begins 1 September, not at the old 1 October. Some later writers, misled by the merely technical rule above given, have assumed that the Indictions actually had their beginning three years before the Nativity, i.e. before our A.D. 1, with the "decree of Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed" (St. Luke iii. 1). So says Duranti—a writer of the 13th century (Speculum Juris. t. i. pt. 1, p. 281): "Caesar Aug. decretum proposuit, ut describeretur universus orbis; i.e., ut quilibet aestimaret bona sua, describens orbem sub tributo sibi singulis quindecim annis reddend., quod quilem tempus divisit per tria lustra," &c. And the rule concerning three years to be added to the year-date (A.D.) rests, he adds, on the fact, "quia tot praecesserant de indictione quando Christus natus fuit, vel quia praemisum edictum Caesaris tribus annis praecipit Nativitatem Christi."

It is only in the latter half of the 4th century that the indictions first appear in dates. St. Athanasius, in a fragment of his work de Synodis, opp. t. i. pt. 2, p. 737, gives "Indiction XIV." with the date (=A.D. 341) of the council of Antioch; but that work was written towards the close of his life (ob. 371), at which time this method of dating was in common use. The earliest clear instance is the date of a decree of Constantius (Cod. Theod. xii. 12, 2), of the year 356, or rather (for the text needs correction) 357. From the earliest years of that century the yearly appointment of consuls became irregular, and from time to time the designation of the year, instead of Coss. M. et. N., became post consulatum M. et N. There was even an uncertainty in the numbering of a set of post-consulate years: for instance, some would designate the first vacant year anno post consulatum M. N. i.: others, after the old fashion of numbering, anno ii. (Pagi, Dissert. Hypat. p. 319; Ideler, 2, 345 note). A further source of uncertainty was the difference of epochs of the year. But the fifteen-years' circle of indictions once established throughout the empire provided a correction for all such uncertainty, so long as it continued to be understood, that the year of indiction began on the 1st of September (preceding the 1st of January of the year found by the rule above given). And, in fact, this was the established practice during the greater part of the period with which we are concerned in this work. In the Codex Theodosianus, indeed, its learned annotator, Gothofred, finds indications of four distinct reckonings of the indictions, viz. the Italica, A.D. 312; Orientalis, 313; and two of Africa, 314 and 315. As regards the supposed Orientalis, Cardinal Norris (De Anno et Epochis Syro-Maced. Dissertat. IV. c. iv.: Opp. t. ii. col. 422 sqq.) has shown that its epoch is the 1st September, A.D. 312. Concerning the two supposed different African reckonings, see Ideler (Hdb. 2, 354 sqq.; Lehrb. p. 409). Apart from these inferences from the Theodosian Codex, we find no trace, except here and there in corrupt texts and negligent dates, of a different reckoning: Dionysius Exiguus knows no other than that which is expressed by the usual rule (Argumenta paschalia, ii.). To trace the history of the use of the indictions through the different provinces of the Roman empire would, as Ideler remarks, require extensive disquisition. In respect of France, Mabillon has shown (de re diplomat. ii. 24, 26) that this note of time does not appear in public acts before Charlemagne, but in acts of councils, and in writers, it is found earlier. But far down into the middle ages its use became so general that it is rarely absent from dates attached to civil or ecclesiastical documents in Italy, France, Germany (in the Pyrenean peninsula it seems never to have been established). Duranti, writing in the 13th century, testifies (u. s.): "Tantae fuit auctoritatis indictio, ut nullus sine ea fieret contractus, nec privilegium, nec testamentum, nec alia scriptura sollemnis: et etiam hodie eandem obinet auctoritatem."

With the desuetude of the Imperial fiscal regulation, with which the indictions originated, the original epoch, 1st September, ceased to be significant—except in the Eastern empire, where that day was established as the first day of the year: wherever in the Corpus Historiae Byzantinae the indictions occur, they are those of 1st September, 312. Even in the West, beyond the limits of our period, they are still occasionally met with: thus, a writing of Gregory VII., A.D. 1073, bears the subscription, "Datum Capuae, Kalend. Sept., incipiente Indictione XII." But in process of time the indiction, detached from its original epoch, came to be dated from the new-year's day, as received at the time, December 25th, or January 1st, or March 25th. Distinct from these indictions used by various popes in their bulls, and by other writers, is one which has been called "Caesarean," of which the first notice occurs in Bede, de temp. ratione, c. 46: "Incipiunt Indictiones ab viii. Kalend. Octobris, ibidemque terminantur." This, of which there is extant no earlier indication (but which, so great was the authority of the writer, may have influenced the practice of the Imperial chancelleries), is probably due to an assumption of Bede, that the old epoch of the Byzantine year, September 24th, was accepted by Constantine as the epoch of the indictions established by him. [H. B.]

INDULGENCE. (1.) The use of the word Indulgentia by ecclesiastical writers is derived from that of the juriconsults, who employ it to designate a remission of punishment or of taxes, especially such a general amnesty as was sometimes proclaimed by an emperor on an extraordinary occasion of rejoicing. Thus the Theodosian Code has a title De Indulgentiis Criminum (Van Espen, Jus Eccles., P. II. sec. i. tit. 7). Hence the word passed into ecclesiastical usage in a double sense. First, it designates remission of sins, as in what Reticus, bishop of Autun, according to St. Augustine (c. Julian, i. 3), observed of baptism as early as the Roman synod under pope Melchior, A.D. 313: "It can escape nobody that this is the principal indulgence known to the church, where we lay aside the whole weight of our hereditary guilt, and cancel all our former misdeeds committed in ignorance, and put off the old man with all his innate wickednesses." In this passage, indulgence stands immediately for remission of sins, and that alone. But we are more immediately concerned with it in a second sense, that in which it designates such a lightening of ecclesiastical penalties, in consideration of the state of the offender, as St. Paul practised in the case of the incestuous Corinthian (2 Cor. ii. 6-11). This question of the advisability of such a relaxation first comes prominently before us in the case of those who had "lapsed" or denied Christ to avoid persecution, and for whom martyrs had in many cases interceded. St. Cyprian tells us, in his letter to Antoninus, how it had been discussed and decided by his colleagues in Africa. They held that the church should not be closed irrevocably to such of the lapsed as were desirous of returning to it: nor yet opened indiscriminately till they had undergone their full penance, and had their particular case taken into consideration. "Et ideo placuit . . . examinatis causis singulorum: libellaticos interim admitti, sacrificatis in exitu subveniri: quia exomologesis apud inferos non est, nec ad penitentiam quis a nobis compelli potest, si fructus penitentiae subtrahatur" (Ep. lii.). The bishops, he adds, already made distinctions between other crimes, according to their discretion, and therefore might be left to deal with this similarly. No canons for regulating penances of any kind had as yet been passed. It rested accordingly with the bishops to use greater or less indulgence in dispensing them all as they thought fit. It was disputed by Novatian whether they could remit as well as bind: and he maintained that only God could remit. But this was not the doctrine of the church. The fifth of the canons of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (Mansi, ii. 516) gives the bishops power to mitigate (φιλανθρωπεύειν) or to increase the length of an offender's penitence; so the twelfth Nicene canon gives the bishop power to deal more gently with penitents who have shown true repentance (Mansi, ii. 673). The merciless rulings of the Elviran canons 1, 2, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 17, 19, 63-66, 70-73, and 75, which forbid certain offenders to be readmitted to communion even on their death-beds,* were neither imitated elsewhere nor maintained in Spain itself (Mansi, ib. 5-19). St. Ambrose, speaking for the West, says: "Our Lord must have meant the powers of loosing and binding to be coextensive, or He would not have bestowed both on the same terms" (De Poen. i. 2). St. Gregory Nyssen deposes, on behalf of the East, to what had been customary: Τοῖς ἀσθενεστέροις ἐγένετό τις παρὰ τῶν πατέρων συμπεριφορά, which is the Greek equivalent for "indulgentia" (Ep. ad Letoi c. 4).

Usually there were four stages or degrees through which offenders had to pass before regaining communion: (1) weepers, (2) hearers, (3) kneelers, (4) bystanders; and usually several years had to be spent in each. Now the bishop, according to St. Gregory, might, in proportion to their conversion, "rescind the period of their penance; making it eight, seven, or even five years instead of nine, in each stage, should their repentance exceed in depth what it had to fulfil in length, and compensate, by its increased zeal, for the much longer time required in others to effect their cure" (ib. c. 5).

So matters went on till about the end of the 7th century. The office of PENITENTIARY presbyter, abolished by Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, three centuries earlier, is not supposed to have produced any change, so far as they were concerned (Soc. v. 19 and Soz. vii. 16). But they were changed materially when the system of commutations laid down in the Penitential of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, had begun to work: according to which a rigorous fast of days, weeks, or years, might be redeemed by saying a proportionable number of psalms, or by paying a proportionable fine (c. 3-10, in Migne's Patrol. xcix. 937 sqq.). Several of the offences stigmatised in the canons of the synod of Berghamstedt, A.D. 697, are dismissed with a fine (Mansi, xii. 111 sqq.). The synod of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747, protests in its 26th and 27th canons against the neglect of discipline to which this "new device" and "perilous custom" had led (ib. 493-96). But the Penitential of Egbert, archbishop of York, not only re-enacts all the commutations authorised by Theodore (ib. 433), but adds to them in a subsequent chapter (ib. 456), voluntary exile from home and country being one of the new kind allowed. Similar permission is given in the Penitential of Bede, as it is called (ib. 519). After this the extension of indulgences to pilgrimages and holy wars was a pure matter of time; and these, from the ardour inspired by both, threw everything else into the shade. The climax was reached when, to make them more attractive, it was formally declared of the one, "iter illud pro omni penitentia reputetur" (Concil. Clarentum, c. 2, ap. Mansi, xx. 816), and popularly believed of the other, "pro stipendio erat indulgentia peccatorum proposita" (ib. pp. 827 and 890). On this point see Morinus, De Poenit. x. 22, 1-6, and Bingham, Ant. xviii. 4, for earlier times. Goar (Euchol. pp. 680-88)

* It is to be observed that the reading "nec in fine," or "nec in finem," is changed in some later recensions—as in that of Burchard—into "non nisi in fine," so as to bring it into harmony with the Nicene canon (13) which forbids such total excommunication.—[Ed.]

attempts in vain to detect affinity between papal indulgences and the συγχωροχάρτια of the Greek church (comp. Ducange, Gloss. Gr. s. v.).

[E. S. Ff.]

(II.) Indulgences, or relaxations of the strict letter of the law, are however by no means confined to penitential cases; such relaxations are found in relation to almost all points of conduct. The laws of God, whether known by revelation or by natural light (Augustine, Quest. 67 in Exod.), are of course always binding; but under positive human enactments cases may and do occur, in which the rigid enforcement of a law may be a greater evil to the society concerned than the suspension of its operation. Hence, in all states and societies, either the law-giving power or some other has exercised the right of suspending the operation of a law upon occasion. A familiar instance of such a dispensing power is the commutation by the sovereign of this country of sentences passed by the judges in the ordinary course of law. As a law is necessarily rigid, while the real character of human acts cannot be rigidly defined, such a dispensing power seems necessary for the equitable administration of justice.

And this principle is just as true of the church as of other societies; here too we find the strict letter of the law mitigated by authority in special cases from an early period. Such indulgences, or concessions to human weakness, commonly called dispensations, have received various names—remissio, venia, clementia, misericordia, dispensatio; συγγνώμη, συμπάθεια, φιλανθρωπία, οικονομία (Suicer, Thes. s. v.)—all implying something of the nature of occasional indulgence or ἐπιείκεια in the administration of a law, the law itself remaining unchanged. A constant exemption of a person or body corporate from the operation of a particular law is called a privilegium. The canonists generally limit the use of the word dispensatio to the case in which a future transgression of a law is permitted.

Thomassin (Eccl. Discip. II. iii. 24, § 14) holds that in the early ages of the church, when few or no councils were held, such dispensations were granted by the bishops; that afterwards, from the end of the 3rd century, councils decided on the cases in which some relaxation of the law of the church was to be allowed; then, as provincial councils frequently referred such matters to the judgment of the see of Rome, that see gradually claimed and exercised a dispensing power independent of councils. The twenty-seventh canon of the (so-called) fourth council of Carthage supplies a good instance of a dispensing power applied to a canon. The council recognises the general prohibition of the translation of bishops from an inferior to a better see “per ambitionem,” yet goes on to provide that “if the good of the church requires it,” such a translation may be made on the certificate of election being produced in the synod itself. Here a dispensing power seems to be given to the synod; for it must be presumed that it was to decide whether in a particular case “utilitas ecclesiae fendum poposcerit.” Penitents, digamists, and husbands of widows were by the general law of the church incapable of holy orders; yet pope Siricius (Epist. 1 ad Himerium, c. 15) permits such persons, once ordained, to exercise the functions of their order, though without hope of promotion to a higher. Pope Innocent I., A.D. 414, allows (Epist. 22, c. 5) that the bishops of Macedonia might, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, admit to the exercise of their functions those who had been irregularly ordained by Bonosus, a heretic, while he insists strongly on the general maintenance of the rule which for once is violated; it is only “pro necessitate temporis” that such relaxations of canonical strictness can be allowed, and “quod necessitas pro remedio invenit, cessante necessitate debet utique cessare,” such liberties cannot be permitted when the church is restored to its normal state of peace. We have another kind of dispensation in Gregory the Great’s letter to Augustine of Canterbury (Epist. xi. 64; in Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 21), in which he permits persons who had married in ignorance within the prohibited degrees to be admitted to communion, though the general law of the church excommunicated such persons.

Of such a nature were the relaxations of strict law permitted in the early church; the numerous dispensations in matrimonial cases, in plurality of benefices, and in some other matters, which were so great a scandal in the mediæval church, do not fall within our period; nor within the same period had the baneful practice arisen of granting dispensations for wrongs to be committed. It was (as Thomassin observes, u. s. § 20) “in more recent times, when the discipline of the church had grown feeble and languid, that permission was sought for future violation of the canons, that license was asked and granted for sinning against sacred rules; men would fain sin without risk of penalty, and draw even from the laws themselves cover and authority for their contempt of the law.”

INFANT BAPTISM. [BAPTISM, § 95, p. 169.]

INFANT COMMUNION. The practice of communicating infants was universal throughout the period of which we treat. For the east, where it still flourishes, we have the testimony of the so-called liturgy of St. Clement, in which little children (παιδιά) are ordered to receive immediately after all who have any special dedication, “and then all the people in order” (Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 13). Pseudo-Dionysius, possibly of the 5th century, but more probably of the 6th, says that “children who cannot understand divine things are yet made partakers of divine generation, and of the divine communion of the most sacred mysteries” (De Eccl. Hierarch. c. vii. § 11). Evagrius, who completed his Church History in 594, proves the continued observance of the rite, where he mentions “an ancient custom” at Constantinople, “when there remained a good quantity of the holy portions of the undefiled body of Christ our God, for uncorrupted boys from among those who attended the school of the undermaster to be sent for to consume them" (lib. iv. c. 36). There is a story told by John Moschus, A.D. 630, of some children who imitated among themselves the celebration of the Eucharist, as they had witnessed, and taken part in it themselves (Pratum Spirit. c. 196).

The earliest witness in the Latin church is St. Cyprian, who writing in 251, relates how the agitation of an infant to whom the cup was offered, led to the discovery of its having been taken to a heathen sacrifice (De Lapsis). He also represents the children of apostates as able to plead at the day of judgment, "We have done nothing; nor have we hastened of our own accord to those profane defilements, forsaking the meat and cup of the Lord" (ibid.). St. Augustine:—"They are infants; but they are made partakers of His table, that they may have life in themselves" (Serm. 174, § 7). "Why is the blood, which of the likeness of sinful flesh was shed for the remission of sins, ministered that the little one (parvulus) may drink, that he may have life, unless he hath come to death by a beginning of sin on the part of some one" (Contra Iulianum, Op. imperf. l. ii. c. 30)? It is evident from these passages (and see especially to the same effect, De Peccat. Mer. lib. i. c. xx. § 26; c. xxiv. § 34) that St. Augustine considered this sacrament to be generally necessary to the salvation of infants; but it is desirable to mention that some passages often cited from his works, which appear to imply or maintain that view are not really to the purpose. He argued against the Pelagians, that if infants were not born in sin, our Lord's words, "Except ye eat the flesh," &c. (St. John vi. 53), would not be true in reference to them: they would have life without eating of that flesh (see Contra Duas Epp. Pelag. lib. i. c. xxii. § 40); but then he taught also that "every one of the faithful is made a partaker of the body and blood of Christ, when he is made a member of Christ in baptism." This is carefully shown from his writings by Fulgentius, who had been questioned by Ferrandus, on the hope that might be entertained for a young man who had died immediately after baptism (see the note of the Benedictine editors on Aug. De Pecc. Mer. lib. i. c. 20, § 26). The same remark must be made on a saying of Innocent I., A.D. 417 (Ad Potres Syn. Milev. § 5, Ep. 182, inter Epp. Aug.), which Augustine himself interprets of the necessity of Baptism (Ad Paulin. Ep. 185, c. viii. § 28). See also Gelasius of Rome, Epist. 7, ad Episc. per Picenum. Gennadius of Marseilles, A.D. 495, gives the following direction with regard to the reception of some of those who had been baptized by heretics in schism. "But if they are infants (parvuli), or so dull as not to take in teaching, let those who offer them answer for them, after the manner of one about to be baptized; and so, fortified by the laying on of hands and chrism, let them be admitted to the mysteries of the Eucharist" (De Eccl. Dogm. c. 22). We call attention to the word "parvulus" when it is used in this connection, because "infans" was sometimes applied even to the newly-baptized adult, as being newly born to a higher life. In 585 the council of Mâcon, in France, in imitation, as we may suppose, of the Greek custom lately mentioned, ordered that on Wednesdays and Fridays innocent (children) should be brought to the church, and there "being commanded to fast, should receive the remains of the sacrifices" (can. 6). The council of Toledo, 675, found it necessary to reassure anxious minds by a declaration that the sick who found themselves unable to swallow the eucharist, and others who had failed to swallow it "in time of infancy," did not fall under the censure of the first council of Toledo (can. 14), against those who having received did not consume it (can. 11). The Gelasian Sacramentary (lib. i. n. 75) provides for the immediate communion of an infant (infans) baptized in sickness. The earliest extant copy of the Gregorian has the following rubric referring to all baptized at Easter. "If the bishop be present, it is fit that he (infans) be forthwith confirmed with chrism, and after that communicated. And if the bishop be not present, let him be communicated by the presbyter" (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. ii. col. 158). It will be observed that previous confirmation was not an indispensable condition of the first communion. A MS. Sacramentary of the 8th century preserved at Gellone and a Rheims pontifical of the same age expressly contemplate the probability of some of the "infantes" baptized being nurslings, but make the same provision for the communion of all (Ordd. 6, 7, 8, in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 1, art. 18. Comp. ord. 15). The little children were also to communicate daily throughout the octave with the rest of the newly-baptized. See Ordd. 6, 8, 9.

There is an English canon ascribed to Egbert, A.D. 740, but probably somewhat later, which says, "They who can, and know how to baptize, faithful monks especially, ought always to have the eucharist with them, though they travel to places far distant" (Johnson's Engl. Canons, vol. i. p. 235). Jesse, bishop of Amiens, A.D. 799, in an epistle on the order of baptism, says, that "after trine immersion the bishop should confirm the child (puerum) with chrism on the forehead, and that finally he should be confirmed and communicated with the body and blood of Christ, that he may be a member of Christ" (see note to Regino De Eccl. Discipl. lib. i. c. 69; ed. Baluz.). The epistle of Jesse was written in reply to some questions of Charlemagne respecting baptism. In the Capitularies of the latter we find the following law notably framed in express accordance with the answers of Jesse and other bishops:—"That the presbyter have the eucharist ready, that when any one shall be taken sick, or an infant (parvulus) be ailing, he may communicate him at once, lest he die without communion" (Lib. i. c. 155; Sim. lib. v. c. 57). This is in the collection of Walter of Orleans (c. 7); Regino (u. s.); Burchard (lib. v. c. 10); and Ivo (Deor. P. ii. c. 20).

Infants were during a period of uncertain length required to be kept without food between their baptism and communion, when the latter followed as a part of the day's rites. Thus in the earliest Ordo Romanus, supposed by Usher to be written about the year 730, care is enjoined that the little ones (parvuli) baptized on Easter Eve "take no food, nor be suckled, after their baptism before they communicate of the sacrament of the body of Christ" (§ 46; Musae. Ital. tom. i. p. 28). There are rubrics to this effect in several ancient orders of baptism, three of which were compiled or copied in the 8th century (Ordd. 6, 7, 8, in Martene, u. s. For later examples, see Ordd. 9, 15). In one copy of the Gregorian Sacramentary, the rule is thus relaxed. "They are not forbidden to be suckled before the sacred communion, if it be necessary" (Inter Opp. S. Greg. tom. v. col. 111; Antv. 1615). The prohibition seems to have been generally omitted from the rubric after the 8th century; but the pontifical of the Latin church of Apamia in Syria, which was written in the 12th, retains it, though speaking of confirmation and communion immediately after baptism only as "the custom of some churches" (Ord. 15; Martene, u. s.).

There can be no doubt that infants were at first communicated in both kinds; but there is little clear evidence to that effect. Passages which speak of their eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ are not conclusive. The council of Toledo before cited, after mentioning the occasional rejection of one element by the sick, "because except the draught of the Lord's cup, they could not swallow the eucharist delivered to them," proceeds to the case of others "who do such things in the time of infancy." The inference appears good that the eucharist was offered to both in bread as well as wine. We are however in a good measure left to infer the practice of the first ages from that of the later church. Because the cup only is mentioned in St. Cyprian's story of the infant who had partaken of a heathen sacrifice, some have argued that they were communicated in the blood only. Had it been so, they would hardly have been permitted to receive in both kinds at a later period; as they certainly did, when for a time the custom of intinction prevailed in the West. Even in the 12th century, when Paschal II. suppressed that practice at Clugny, he made an exception in favour of "infants and persons very sick who are not able to swallow the bread." All others were to receive the bread by itself (Epist. 32; Labb. Concilia, tom. x. col. 656). In a manuscript Antiphonary that belonged to an Italian monastery, written about the middle of the same century, after directions for a baptism, is the following rubric: "Then follows the communion, which is ministered under these words; 'The body of our Lord Jesus Christ steeped in His blood, preserve thy soul unto everlasting life'" (Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medieev. tom. iv. p. 843). About the same time, however, we find Radulphus Ardens saying, in a sermon on Easter Day, "It has been decreed that it be delivered to children as soon as baptized, at least in the species of wine; that they may not depart without a necessary sacrament" (Zaccaria, Biblioth. Rit. tom. ii. p. ii. p. clx.). How infants were communicated in the one species then, we may learn from the pontifical of Apamia already cited. "But children who as yet know not how to eat or drink are communicated either with a leaf or with the finger dipped in the blood of the Lord and put into their mouth, the priest thus saying, 'The body with the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee unto everlasting life'" (Martene, u. s.). Robertus Panlulus, A.D. 1175, in a work De Sacramentis, long ascribed to Hugo de S. Victore, says, "The said sacrament is to be ministered with the finger of the priest to children newly born in the species of the blood; because such can suck naturally" (Lib. i. c. 20).

As the Greeks and Orientals generally used intinction before the age of Charlemagne, it is to be presumed that they communicated infants in the same manner as adults; i. e., in both kinds with a spoon. Now "in practice, though the rule is otherwise, the eucharist is given to infants under the species of wine alone" (Goar in Annot. Nihusii ad Allatii Dissert. de Missâ Praesanct. ad fin.; Allat. De Occ. et Or. Consent. col. 1659). The Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians and Maronites, are said to have fallen into the same practice (Gabriel Sinaita, ibid. col. 1667). The Greeks use a spoon, but from conflicting statements before us (see Martene, u. s. art. 15, n. 15), we infer that the rest use the finger or a spoon indifferently. [W. E. S.]

INFIRMARY (MONASTIC). In his enumeration of Christian duties Benedict specifies that of visiting the sick (Bened. Reg. c. 4); and elsewhere he speaks of it as a duty of primary and paramount obligation for monks ("ante omnia et super omnia," c. 36), quoting the words of Christ, "I was sick, and ye ministered unto Me." Beyond, however, saying, that the sick are to have a separate part of the monastery assigned to them (cf. Aurel. Reg. cc. 37, 52; Caesar. Reg. c. 30), and a separate officer in charge of them (cf. Reg. Tarnat. c. 21), that they are to be allowed meat and the luxury of baths, if necessary, that they are not to be exacting ("ne superfluitate suâ fratres contristent"), and that the brethren who wait on them are not to be impatient, he gives no precise directions (ib.). Subsequently it was the special duty of the "infirmarius," the "cellarius" (house-steward), and of the abbot himself, to look after the sick (Martene, Reg. Comm. c. 4; Caesarii Reg. ad Virg. c. 20, Reg. Cujusd. ad Virgines, c. 15); no other monk might visit them without leave from the abbot or prior (Mart. l. c.). Everything was to be done for their comfort, both in body and soul, that they should not miss the kindly offices of kinsfolk and friends (cf. Fructuos. Reg. c. 7; Hieronym. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.); and, while the rigour of the monastic discipline was to be relaxed, whenever necessary, in their favour, due supervision was to be exercised, lest there should be any abuse of the privileges of the sick-room (Mart. l. c.; cf. Reg. Pachom. c. 20). The "infirmarius" was to enforce silence at meals, to check conversation in the sick-room ("mansio infirmorum, intra claustra," Conc. Aquisgran. A.D. 816, c. 142) at other times, and to discriminate carefully between real and fictitious ailments (Mart. l. c.). The sick were, if possible, to recite the hours daily and to attend mass at stated times, and if unable to walk to the chapel, they were to be carried thither in the arms of their brethren (ib.). The meal in the sick-room was to be three hours earlier than in the common refectory (Reg. Mag. c. 28). The abbot might allow a separate kitchen and "buttery" for the use of the sick monks (Aurelian. Reg. ad Monach. c. 53, Reg. ad Virg. c. 37). The rule of Caesarius of Arles ordered, that the abbot was to provide good wine for the sick, the ordinary wine of the monastery being often of inferior quality (cf. Mabill. Disquis. de Curs. Gallic. vi. 70, 71; Mabill. Ann. iii. 8, Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). [I. G. S.]

INFORMERS. (Calumniatores, Delatores. Tertullian [adv. Marcion. v. 18] fancifully connects "diabolus" with "delatura.") This class of men originated before the Christian era, and indeed before the establishment of the Roman empire. [DICT. OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s. v. Delator.] When persecution arose against the church, the delatores naturally sought gain, and probably some credit with the civil authorities, by giving information against those who practised Christian rites, since the secret assemblies of Christians for worship came under the prohibition of the Lex Julia de Majestate (Tac. Ann. i. 72, p. 3; Merivale, Hist. Rome, c. xlv.). Tertullian states that Tiberius threatened the accusers of the Christians—"Caesar . . . comminatus periculum accusatoribus Christianorum" (Apol. c. 5), but the story rests only upon his statement. He also (l. c.) claims M. Aurelius as a protector of Christians. Titus issued an edict against delators, forbidding slaves to inform against their masters or freedmen against their patrons. Nerva on his accession republished this edict. "Jewish manners," i. e. probably Christianity, is specially mentioned as one of the subjects on which informations were forbidden (Dion lxxviii. 1, quoted by Merivale). In Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (x. 96 [al. 97]) we find the delatores in full work. The Christians who were brought before him were delated (deferbantur), and an anonymous paper was sent in containing a list of many Christians or supposed Christians. Trajan in his answer (ib. 97 [98]), though he forbade Christians to be sought out (i. e. by government officials), did not attempt to put a stop to the practice of delation; those who were informed against, if they continued in their infatuation, must be punished. See Tertullian's comment on this (Apol. c. 2). And in the subsequent persecutions a large part of the suffering arose from unfaithful brethren who betrayed their friends to the persecutors. It is not wonderful that during and immediately after the days of persecution the delator was regarded with horror. Thus the council of Elvira (Conc. Elib. c. 73), A.D. 305, excommunicated, even on his death-bed,^a any delator who had caused the proscription or death of the person informed against; for informing in less important cases, the delator might be re-admitted to communion after five years; or, if a catechumen, he might be admitted to baptism after five years. The first of Arles, A.D. 314, reckons among "traditores" not only those who gave up to the persecutors the Holy Scriptures and sacred vessels, but also those who handed in lists of the brethren (nomena fratrum); and respecting these the council decrees, that whoever shall be discovered from the public records (acta) to have committed such offences shall be solemnly^b degraded from the clerical order; but such degradation, if the offender was a bishop, was not to vitiate the orders of those who might have been ordained by him. Charges against traditores were not to be admitted unless they could be proved from the "acta publica." This decree is highly interesting, as following immediately upon a period of persecution, and showing that the edict of Milan (A.D. 313) had brought about a great change in Gaul, and that Christians were admitted to consult the public records of the recent proceedings against them. The capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. vi. c. 317, in Baluze, i. 977) cite the 73rd canon of Elvira with the reading "nec in fine." So lib. vii. c. 205, and Additio Quarta, c. 34, in Baluze, i. 1068, 1202. The same capitularies (Add. Quarta, c. 35) enjoin bishops to excommunicate "accusatores fratrum;" and, even after amendment, not to admit them to holy orders, though they may be admitted to communion. Any cleric or layman who brings frivolous charges against his bishop (calumniator extiterit) is to be reputed a homicide.

The canon of Elvira is cited in the decree of Gratian (p. ii. cau. v. quae. 6, c. 6) with the reading "non nisi in fine." The same decree (u. s. c. 5) attributes to pope Hadrian I. a decree, "let the tongue of a delator be cut out (capuletur), or, on conviction, let his head be cut off;" a decree probably taken from the civil legislation, for nearly the same provision is found in the Theodosian code (lib. x. tit. x. l. 2), and precisely the same in the Frank capitularies (lib. vii. c. 360; Bal. i. 1102). INFULA. 1. The infula was in classical times the band or fillet which bound the brow of the sacrificing priest and the victim.

"Nec te tua plurima, Panthu Labentem pietas nec Apollinis infula texit."

Virg. Aen. ii. 430.

Servius (on Aeneid. x. 538) tells us that it was a broad fillet or ribbon, commonly made of red and white strips. Isidore (Etymol. xix. 30) describes the infula of the heathen priest in similar terms. The infula of the victim is mentioned in

"stans hostia ad aram
Lanea dum niveâ circumdatur infula vittâ."

Virg. Georg. iii. 487.

And the term seems to have been early transferred to the head-covering of Christian priests. Hence Prudentius (Peristeph. iv. 79) speaks of the "sacerdotum domus infulata" of the Valerii of Saragossa, when he is evidently speaking of the "clerus." So Pope Gelasius (Hardouin's Concilia, ii. 901), wishing to say that a certain person ought to be rejected from the Christian priesthood, says that he is "clericalibus infulis reprobabilis" (Hefele's Beiträge, ii. 223 ff.). See MITRE.

2. For infula in the sense of a ministerial vestment, see CASULA, PLANETA. [C.]

INITIAL HYMN.—A name for the hymn which in the Eastern liturgies corresponds to the

^a According to the reading "Nec in fine;" some MSS. read "non nisi in fine." It seems probable that "nec in fine" or "finem" was the original reading, and that it was altered to bring it into accordance with the decree of Nicaea (c. 13), which provides that the Holy Communion is in no case to be refused to a dying man.

^b "Non verbis nudis;" another reading is "verberibus multis."

Introit of the Roman mass. In the eastern liturgies the term Introit (εἰσόδος) is applied to the two ENTRANCES of the liturgy, the little entrance (ἡ μικρὰ εἰσόδος) i. e. that of the Book of the Gospels, and the great entrance (ἡ μεγάλη εἰσόδος) i. e. that of the elements.

In the liturgies of St Basil and St. Chrysostom this hymn takes the form of three antiphons, called the first, second, and third antiphons, each of which consists of a few verses called "stichi" (στιχοί) from the Psalms; each verse of the first antiphon being followed by the clause "At the intercession of the Theotocos, save us, O Saviour;" each verse of the second and third by an antiphonal clause of the same nature, varying with and having reference to the festival. That of the third antiphon is sometimes one of the troparia of the day. Each antiphon is followed by an unvarying prayer, called generally the prayer of the first, second, and third antiphon,^a and which are the same in the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom.^b

The first and second antiphons are followed by "Glory &c. (δόξα καὶ νῦν), after which the antiphonal response is repeated.

The third antiphon by short hymns or troparia in rhythmical prose under different names, and which vary with the day. These antiphons are considered to symbolise the predictions of the prophets, foretelling the coming and incarnation of our Lord.^c As a specimen the three antiphons for Easter Day are:—

Antiph. I.

- Stich.* O be joyful in God all ye lands. (Ps. lxxvi. 1.)
At the intercession, &c.
- Stich.* Sing praises unto the honour of His name. (Do.)
At the intercession, &c.
- Stich.* Say unto God, O how wonderful art Thou in Thy works. (verse 2.)
At the intercession, &c.
- Stich.* For all the world shall worship Thee. (verse 3.)
At the intercession, &c.
Glory, &c.
At the intercession, &c.

Antiph. II.

- Stich.* God be merciful unto us. (Ps. lxxvii. 1.)
Save us, O Son of God, Thou that art risen from the dead.
- Stich.* And show us the light of His countenance. (Do.)
Save us, O Son of God, &c.
- Stich.* That Thy way may be known upon earth. (v. 2.)
Save us, O Son of God, &c.
- Stich.* Let the people praise Thee. (v. 3.)
Save us, O Son of God, &c.
Glory, &c.
Save us, O Son of God, &c.

Antiph. III.

- Stich.* Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered let them also that hate Him flee before Him.
(Ps. lxxviii. 1.)
- Christ is risen from the dead, having trodden down death by death, and given life to those that are in the grave.

^a There are variations between the two liturgies, as to whether the prayer of the antiphon should be said before or after its antiphon, which it is unnecessary to particularise.

^b The prayer of the third antiphon is "A Prayer of St. Chrysostom" of the English Prayer-book.

^c Vid. Casali de Vet. Sac. Christ. Rit. cap. xci.

Stich. Like as the smoke vanisheth so shalt thou drive them away: and like as wax melteth at the fire. (v. 2.)

Christ is risen, &c.

Stich. So let the ungodly perish at the presence of God, but let the righteous be glad. (vv. 2, 3.)

Christ is risen, &c.

Stich. This is the day which the Lord hath made: we will rejoice and be glad in it. (Ps. cxviii. 24.)
Christ is risen, &c.

On Sundays as a rule, in the liturgy of St. Basil the Typica^d for the day are said instead of the first two antiphons; and in those of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom instead of the third antiphon, the Beatitudes (οἱ μακαρισμοί).

These are the Beatitudes from the Sermon on the Mount, and are thus said. They are introduced by the clause "Remember us, O Lord, when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom." The first five Beatitudes are then said consecutively; after the fifth and each following one is interposed a short troparion, differing in each case, and all varying with the day. After the sixth of these follows "Glory, &c." and then two more troparia, the latter of which is a Theotocion.^e

In the liturgies of St. James and St. Mark the initial hymn is the same, and unvarying. It is of the ordinary form of Greek hymns, beginning "Only begotten Son and Word of God," &c., and containing prayers for salvation through the mysteries of the incarnation, which it recites. INNOCENTS, FESTIVAL OF THE. (ἡμέρα τῶν ἁγίων ἰδ' χιλιάδων νηπιῶν: festum Innocentium [i. m.], Natales Sanctorum Innocentium, Natale Infantum, Necatio [Allisio] Infantum. The old English Childermas and the German Kindermesse may also be noted.)

1. History of festival.—The Holy Innocents of Bethlehem, the victims of Herod's jealousy of our Lord, are at an early period commemorated as martyrs for Christ, of whom indeed they were in one sense the first (see Irenaeus adv. Haer. iii. 16. 4; Cyprian, Epist. 56, plebi Thibari consistenti, § 6). Subsequent fathers continually speak in the same strain, e.g. Gregory of Nazianzum (Serm. 38 in Nativitate, § 18; vol. i. 674, ed. Bened.); Chrysostom (Hom. 9 in S. Matt. vol. vii. 130, ed. Montfaucon); Augustine (Enarratio in Psal. 47; vol. iv. 593, ed. Gaupne; Serm. 199 in Epiphania, § 2, vol. v. 1319; Serm. 373 in Epiph. § 3, vol. v. 2178; Serm. 375 in Epiph. § 2, vol. v. 2183); Prudentius (Cath. xii. de Epiph. 125). Augustine also distinctly refers (de libero Arbitrio, iii. 68, vol. i. 1035) to a commemoration of their martyrdom by the church. Some writers, as Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, i. 304), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, v. 1. 549) and others, refer to a homily of Origen as affording evidence on this last point. The writing in question, however (Hom. 3 de diversis, vol. ii. p. 282; ed. Paris, 1604), is universally rejected as spurious, and Huet sums up concerning it (Origenis Opp. vol. iv. 325, ed. De la Rue) that it is a work originally written in Latin, and later than the time of Jerome.

^d These terms will be explained in their place.

The commemoration of the Massacre of the Innocents was at first combined with the festival of the Epiphany. Thus the passage of Prudentius above referred to speaks of them in the hymn on the Epiphany; Leo, in not a few of his homilies on the Epiphany, speaks of the Innocents (see e.g. Serm. 31-33, 35, 38; Patrol. liv. 234 sqq.), as also Fulgentius of Ruspe in a homily de Epiphania, deque Innocentium nece et muneribus magorum (Patrol. lxxv. 732). Subsequently a special day was set apart for the festival of the Innocents, a day in close proximity to that on which the Lord's Nativity is celebrated being chosen; not that we have any definite knowledge as to the time when Herod put the children to death, but from the special association between the two events. Hence we find December 28 in the Western and December 29 in the Eastern church set apart for the commemoration of the Innocents. The date of the origin of the separate festival cannot be very closely defined. It is however mentioned in the Calendarium Carthaginense, to whose date we can approximate from the fact that the latest martyrs commemorated are those who perished in the Vandal persecution under Huneric, 484 A.D. Here the notice is, "V. Kal. Jan. Sanctorum Innocentium, quos Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). It may be added that Peter Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna (ob. 450 A.D.), has left among his sermons, two de Infantum nece, quite apart from several others on the Epiphany (Serm. 152, 153; Patrol. lii. 604). It is needless to give here a list of later calendars and martyrologies, in which the festival of the Innocents uniformly occurs, but it may be noted that it subsequently acquired a considerable degree of importance, for in the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz (ob. 766 A.D.), the "festivitas Infantum" is included among the "solemnitates praeceptae" (Reg. Chrodeg. c. 74; Patrol. lxxvii. 1009).

2. Liturgical notices.—The earliest of the Roman Sacramentaries, the Leonine, contains two masses for the festival of the Innocents, which follow immediately after that for St. John the Evangelist, and are headed In Nat'li Innocentium (Leonis Opp. vol. ii. 155, ed. Ballerini). We may call attention to the curious reference in the Preface of the second mass to the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxxi. 15), "Rachel plorans filios suos, noluit consolari, quia non sunt," where the mother's grief is explained as arising not from the death of her children, but because infants held worthy of receiving so great a renown were born not from her line, but from that of Leah. Elements from the Leonine Sacramentary are found embodied in the service for the day in the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv. 1060) and Gregorian Sacramentaries (col. 12, ed. Menard), in the latter case including a slightly modified form of the Preface,* which also appears in the service for the day in the Ambrosian liturgy (Pamelius, Liturg. Latt. i. 308). In the ancient Roman church a special degree of mournfulness was associated with this day, for we find in the Gregorian Liber Antiphonarius (col. 659, ed. Menard) the notice that the Gloria in Excelsis and Alleluia are not sung, "sed quasi prae tristitia dies illa deducitur." Of this we may derive an illustration, though of much later date, from the Ordo Romanus (x. 26), which remarks that on this day, except it fell on a Sunday, the Romans abstain from flesh and fat. See also Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. i. 41; Patrol. cv. 1074), and the Micrologus (de Eccl. obs. c. 36; Patrol. cli. 1005), which mentions the further omission on this day of the Te Deum and Ite, missa est. He subjoins as a reason for the sadness attaching to this day, that the Innocents, though martyrs for Christ, "nondum tamen ad gloriam, sed ad infernalem poenam discesserunt."

In the ancient lectionary of the Gallican church, the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel were respectively Jer. xxxi. 15-20, Rev. vi. 9-11, Matt. ii. 1-23 (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 112; see also the service in the Gotho-gallic missal, lib. iii. p. 198). In the Mozarabic liturgy, however, they are respectively Jer. xxxi. 15-20, 2 Cor. i. 2-7, Matt. xviii. 13-15, 1-6, 10, 11 (Missale Mixtum S. Isidori, p. 48, ed. Leslie).

The Micrologus (supra) refers to the octave of the festival of the Innocents as generally observed ("eodem modo ut aliorum Sanctorum celebratur"). It would seem, however, that this is of comparatively late date as a matter of general observance, for according to Binterim (Denk. v. 1. 552), it is wanting in many calendars of the 9th century. A curious mistake must be mentioned here into which several have fallen in connection with the octave of the festival of the Innocents. In the Indiculus operum S. Augustini by Possidius, is an entry "de die octavarum Infantum; duo" (Patrol. xli. 16). This has been taken by Baronius (Martyrologium Romanum, Dec. 28 and Jan. 4, not.) and others as showing the existence of an octave of the festival of the Innocents in Augustine's time. The two sermons, however, of Augustine refer to the first Sunday after Easter, the octave of the day on which the sacrament of baptism had been received, "hodie octavae dicuntur infantum, revelanda sunt capita eorum" (Serm. 260, 376; Patrol. xxxviii. 1201, 1669).

Attention has already been called to the proximity of the festival of the Innocents to that of the Nativity, in consequence of the association of the two events commemorated. These two indeed, with the commemorations on the two intervening days of Stephen the protomartyr and John the disciple whom Jesus loved, may be supposed to form one combined festival, all centering in the idea of the Incarnation. Thus we have a homily of Bernard of Clairvaux de Quatuor continuis solemnitatibus, scilicet Nativitatis Domini ac Sanctorum Stephani, Johannis et Innocentium (Patrol. clxxxiii. 129).

The day for the commemoration of the Innocents in the Eastern church is December 29, but we find in the Armeno-Gregorian calendar (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 799) June 10 associated with them: this same calendar being one of those which gives from what original cause does not appear, the amazing number of 14,000 for the infants slain. This is also the case with the pictorial Moscow calendar prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. lxxii.).^b Numerous Eastern calendars, however, do not contain this absurd addition (see e.g. Ludolf, Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 16; Selden, de Synedriis veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 214, 231, ed. Amsterdam, 1679).

INSACRATI. [IMPOSITION OF HANDS, § 1.]

INSCRIPTIONS. In strictness of speech every inscribed monument falls under this category, unless the writing be upon skin or upon paper; and accordingly the great collections of Greek and Latin inscriptions recently published at Berlin include every kind of monument which is inscribed, coins only excepted. These are somewhat arbitrarily but at the same time profitably excluded, as belonging to a special department of study. But in common parlance, by Inscriptions, the larger monuments in stone are intended, and in the following article comparatively little notice will be taken of any others.

In treating of this vast subject it is proposed to take into account—(1) The literature of the subject, which is indeed the only division which can be treated at all comprehensively in an article like the present. (2) Technical execution. (3) Symbols. (4) A selection of inscriptions, with notes on some matters arising out of them. (5) Their language and style. (6) The modes of dating them. (7) An enumeration of the abbreviations which occur on them.

(i.) Literature of the Subject.—This matter is ably treated of by M. De Rossi in the first thirty-six pages of his preface to the Inscriptiones Christianae Urbis Romae Septimo Saeculo Antiquiores^a (Rome, 1857–1861 fol.). The principal facts are as follows. The earliest collections of Christian inscriptions of which we have any knowledge belong to the age of Charles the Great, and were made, as De Rossi thinks, by scholars of Alcuin. The most ancient of these is contained in an Einsiedeln MS. written in the age of Alcuin: about a third of the whole collection is Christian, sepulchral examples however being wholly wanting. Various compilations of inscriptions were also now made, in which many of the epitaphs written by pope Damasus, among other Christian authors, were included; and the small remaining stone fragments of some of these can be completed with certainty by their aid. The collectors of these inscriptions cared little for their historical value, and commonly omitted all mention of their age or authors; they rather designed them to be models, after which similar verses might be composed. The others now remaining in whole or in great part are—(1) The Palatine MS. of the 11th century (now in the Vatican), edited by Gruter, Thes. Inscr., pp. MCLXIII.–MCLXXVII., who has omitted a few profane epigrams, which are interspersed. None of the Christian inscriptions seem to be later than the 9th century, and they were probably collected by some one who visited Rome and various other places in Italy about the close of that century. (2) A MS. of Kloster Neuburg, about the 11th century, consisting of Christian inscriptions exclusively, which were copied from Italian originals about the 8th century; they are almost all historical, many being by Damasus. (3) A Verdun MS. of the 10th century, containing thirty-one Roman inscriptions; a collection independent of either of the preceding, made in the 8th or 9th century.

^b A still wilder estimate, however, is found in an Auctarium to the martyrology of Usuardus, which fixes the number at 144,000 (Patrol. cxxiii. 848), probably with reference to Rev. vii. 4.

^a Le Blant's catalogue of books relating to Christian epigraphy, published at the end of his Manuel, is a useful supplement to this, and brings the bibliography down to 1869. De Rossi is less careful to notice printed books than MS. collections, as being better known. After the publication of Marin's papers by Mai in 1831 he ceased altogether

"Hae tres antiquissimae syllogae omnes trans Alpes servatae nobis sunt; neque quidquam his simile in Italiae nostrae bibliothecis uspiam inveni Primi ergo veterum inscriptionum amatores transalpini omnes fuisse Ab Alcuiniana aetate ad saeculum usque decimum quantum antiquis inscriptionibus colligendis nemo videtur operam navasse" (De Rossi, u. s. pp. x.* xi.*).

The 15th century saw the revival of epigraphic studies, but among the inscriptions collected by Poggio, Signorili, Cyriaco, Feliciani, Marcanova, Pehem, Schedel, and others, those which are Christian "apparent rare," and are not separately classed. The earliest collector of purely Christian inscriptions, who lived in the age of the Renaissance, is Pietro Sabini, who in 1495 presented his work, in MS., comprising those which he had copied in Rome and out of it, both from the originals and from MSS., to Charles VIII., king of France. The MS. has been found in the library of St. Mark at Venice by De Rossi, who affirms that some of the inscriptions are very valuable, and have been copied by no other scholar; many however belong to a late period. A volume of inscriptions from the ancient churches of Rome, made by Giovanni Capoti in 1498, seems to have been of much the same character. The other collectors of inscriptions who lived from this time to the middle of the 16th, added scarcely anything (vix mediocre incrementum) to Christian epigraphy. Aldus Manutius the Younger however applied himself diligently to the collection of Christian inscriptions among others, and twenty volumes of these formed by various members of this illustrious family are preserved in the Vatican, from which De Rossi has derived no small profit. The most important of these was compiled in 1566 and 1567, and is entirely filled with inscriptions contained in Christian churches. The whole number of Christian inscriptions hitherto collected from all parts, from the 8th to the middle of the 16th century, excluding those of very recent date, is considerably less than a thousand; a great many of these being contained in MS. only.^b At present more than 11,000 Christian inscriptions earlier than the 7th century are known to have been found in Rome alone. With the exception of a few epitaphs by Damasus copied in tombs of the martyrs by the scholars of Alcuin, no subterranean inscription had hitherto been decyphered. But the discovery of the catacombs of Rome in 1578 marks a new era in the study. Ciaccone, L'Heureux or Macarius, Winghius, Ugone, and somewhat later in time, but first and foremost in diligence and success, Antonio Bosio, were among the earliest explorers, and all were more or less addicted to the study of Christian inscriptions. Soon after this time the Christian inscriptions occupy a distinct place in Gruter's Corpus Inscriptionum, published in 1616; but besides the Palatine Collection mentioned above, all the others together reach only about 150, although many more had been now copied in Rome by several of his friends. There can be no doubt that Gruter cared comparatively little about this class of inscriptions. The extensive and accurate transcripts of Bosio were transferred, after his death in 1629, to Severani, who published the Roma Sotteranea in 1632; which was republished in an enlarged Latin form by Aringhi, in two folio volumes, in 1650.^c During the half century that followed the publication of Gruter's great work, many scholars collected additional Christian inscriptions, some of the most important of which are still in MS. Especially to be named are those of J. B. Doni (died 1647), preserved in the Marucelli Library at Florence, "codex inter primaria operis mei subsidia numerandus" (De Rossi); of Sirmond (died 1651), in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (very valuable, containing many still unpublished), and of Peiresc (died 1637), whose Inscriptiones Christianae et novae were consulted at Paris by De Rossi, who speaks of their value, more especially for the inscriptions of Gaul. To these should be added the collections of F. Ptolomeo (made about 1666), preserved in the public library of Sienna, of which Muratori made much use, and those of Brutio, in seventeen volumes, finished in 1679, preserved in the Vatican, whose value is scarcely proportional to their bulk. Between Aringhi (1650) and Fabretti, whose folio volume on inscriptions appeared in 1702, Montfaucon alone (so thinks De Rossi) can be regarded as having materially added to the knowledge of Christian epigraphy; his MSS. were examined at Paris by De Rossi, who thence derived some valuable additions to his Roman inscriptions. It deserves however to be recorded that William Fleetwood, fellow of King's College, Cambridge, afterwards bishop of Ely, published in 1691 an Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge (Lond. 8vo), in two parts; the second part, "Christiana monumenta antiqua quae hactenus innotuerunt omnia complectitur:" these occupy nearly two hundred pages, and are occasionally accompanied by brief notes.^d Zaccaria several times notices this work controversially or otherwise (Diss. de Vet. Inscr. usu, pp. 326, 327, 370, 382, 384, 388, 399), and it is frequently quoted by other epigraphists as by Marini, Le Blant, and De Rossi himself, though he has not named it in his introduction. Fabretti's labours are both skilful and accurate; but the types which the printer made use of were inadequate to express the true reading of his inscriptions. Boldetti and Marangoni, who laboured in concert in the same field as Bosio had done, "are

^b The Edinburgh Review for 1864, p. 221, goes so far as to say that "the results of the whole epoch (of the revival of letters) may be summed up in the single statement, that more than a century had elapsed after the discovery of printing before a single inscription of the early Christian centuries had been given to the world."

Various MS. volumes are mentioned by De Rossi (u. s. pp. xiv.-xvii.) of which no notice is taken here.

^c Dr. McCaul (Christian Epitaphs, pref. p. iv. note) observes that these volumes "have a reputation far beyond their merits." There is no doubt, he adds, that some forger of inscriptions imposed both on Severani and Aringhi. De Rossi promises a detailed account of this matter. p. xxvi*.

^d We can the less afford to pass it over, though it appears to be little else but a compilation from other authors, as it is almost the only work on Christian epigraphy expressly devoted to the subject, that has appeared in this country till quite lately.

made especially memorable by one of those catastrophes, which occasionally diversify the monotonous history of student life. They had spent more than thirty years in the exploration of the catacombs and other sacred antiquities of Rome. Boldetti's volume, published in 1720 at Rome [entitled Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri de' Santi Martiri], comprised a portion of the results; but by far the greater part still remained in MS., when in 1737 an unlucky fire destroyed in a few hours the fruit of all these years of toilsome research. The loss, it is melancholy to add, was complete and irreparable. Boldetti's great age precluded all hopes of his being able to repair his portion of the work. Marangoni although grievously depressed resumed his labours with great energy; but M. De Rossi has everywhere sought in vain for the results of his attempted restoration" (Edinburgh Rev. u. s. p. 222). The destruction of these papers has left a void which can hardly be supplied; the chambers which they explored are now "demolita et horrendum in modum vastata" (De Rossi). Boldetti indeed and those whom he employed to copy the inscriptions have been proved to be very inaccurate both as regards the sites of their discovery and the reading of the texts; "ei me iratissimum esse profiteor," says De Rossi (p. xxvii.*). Marangoni was much more exact, and his Appendix ad Acta S. Victorini, Rom. 1740, 4^o, is a work of considerable value. P. Lupi, a friend of these scholars, has left, besides various printed works relating to epigraphy, a valuable collection of inscriptions preserved in MS. in the Vatican at Rome; and a similar collection by the celebrated Buonarrotti is preserved at Florence.

It became evident that the time had now arrived when a fresh collection of Christian inscriptions should incorporate the previous discoveries of so many scholars. The industrious Gori projected such a work, in which they should be so arranged as to illustrate the doctrines, the ceremonies, the hierarchy and the discipline of the church. But his other engagements prevented. The MSS. however of his friends Stosch, Ficoroni and others, containing materials for the work, are stored up in the Marucelli Library at Florence, where they were consulted with profit by De Rossi. The task was in some measure executed by the indefatigable Muratori, whose Novus Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum published at Milan in 1739 in four folio volumes, contains, in addition to the profane inscriptions, a larger number of Christian ones than had ever yet appeared, being taken both from printed and from MS. sources; but the work was very uncritically executed, and his conjectural additions are not distinguished from the actual readings of the broken inscriptions. Maffei, who has been called the founder of lapidary criticism, had undertaken in conjunction with Séguier a great body of inscriptions, in which there should be a purely Christian division; but both these and various other scholars, who had cherished like good intentions, bore no fruit to perfection.

It now also again entered into the minds of more than one divine to turn the extant mass of Christian inscriptions to theological account; and with somewhat better success. The learned Jesuit A. F. Zaccaria contemplated a very extensive work, in which the more interesting Christian inscriptions should be arranged under the following heads: (i.) Religio in Deum; (ii.) Religio in Sanctos; (iii.) Templa; (iv.) Templorum ornamenta, vasa sacra, idque genus caetera; (v.) Dies Festi; (vi.) Sacramenta; (vii.) Hierarchia ecclesiastica ac primo Romani Pontificis; (viii.) Episcopi; (ix.) Presbyteri; (x.) Ordines majores; (xi.) Ordines minores; (xii.) Monachi; (xiii.) Laici; (xiv.) Laici dignitate praestantes; (xv.) Artes atque officia minora; (xvi.) Leges ecclesiasticae (De Rossi, u. s. p. xxx.*). This magniloquent announcement however was never carried out; but a kind of first fruits were put forth in 1762 in a treatise entitled De veterum Christianorum in rebus theologicis usu.^f In this work he brings together with a considerable amount of industry and learning such inscriptions as bear or seem to bear upon the doctrines of his church; "quae non ultra septimum nostrae aerae saeculum progrediuntur, ne haereticis cavillandi detur occasio" (Thes. Theol. Diss. p. 325). Martigny however calls it "un livre mediocre;" and speaks of his friend and imitator, Danzetta, as having written "avec moins de succès encore" (Dict. p. 305). The bearing of inscriptions upon doctrinal or disciplinary controversy is "a perfectly legitimate use of the subject," and indeed its true ultimate end, but one for which from the insufficiency of the data the time had not [in the 18th century] fully arrived." (Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 224.) Nor can it be said to have fully arrived now. In a few years' time it will probably be otherwise.

Zaccaria in his later years encouraged a rising young scholar, Gaetano Marini, to undertake the task which he had found to be too much for himself. Marini set about the work with great spirit, and from 1765 to 1801 worked at it, not exclusively indeed, but yet so as never to allow his labours to be wholly intermitted. An ample account of his preparations and of the merits and defects of his performances is given by De Rossi (u. s. pp. xxxi.-xxxii.). By help of his friends in Italy and his own labour he had amassed about 8600 Christian inscriptions in Latin, and about 750 in Greek from all parts of the world, of the first ten centuries. But these were in a confused, imperfect and uncritical state. "Marini's labours were interrupted by the French Revolution; and at his death he bequeathed to the Vatican Library the materials which he had compiled, and which, having ^f Published in the Thesaurus Theolog. Dissertationum vol. i. pp. 325-396, Venet. 1762, 4to; apparently for the first time (see Præfatio generalis). Le Biant (in his Bibliographie) gives 1761 as the date. It has been republished by Migne in his Cursus Theolog. completus.

* It would seem from De Rossi's remarks (p. xxxi.*) that his Theologia Lapidaria exists only in MS. (in the Vatican). He gained from it a few unpublished inscriptions which Danzetta had taken from the papers of Marangoni.

^h For the ecclesiastical historian inscriptions of all periods will of course have their own value; and many of them yield up a great deal of information and furnish "illustrations of almost every branch of Christian literature, history, and antiquities" (Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 231).

* De Rossi (under his Inscr. Urb. Rom. n. 17, p. 24) calls him a man "cujus in id genus apographis excipiendo impertitum et incuriam non centena, sed millena exempla testantur."

recently been put in order by M. De Rossi are found to fill no fewer than 31 volumes. Among these, four volumes had been partially prepared for publication, of which the first was in a comparatively forward state. This is the Inscriptionum Christianarum pars prima, which is printed in the fifth volume of Mai's Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio, in 1831. And perhaps it may be said that it is to the incomplete and unsatisfactory condition of the remaining portion of Marini's papers that we are indebted for much of the far more critical and scholarly work of M. De Rossi, entitled Inscriptiones Urbis Romae Septimo Saeculo antiquiores (Rom. 1857-61, fol. pp. 619+123 prol. +40 praef.). This publication was undertaken at the express solicitation of Cardinal Mai, who finding the task of preparing for the press the rest of Marini's materials entirely incompatible with his other engagements, transferred to his young and learned friend the undertaking for which his tastes, his studies, and his genuine love of the subject pointed him out to Mai as eminently fitted." (Edinburgh Rev. u. s. pp. 224, 225, slightly altered.) The first volume of this great work, the only one known to the writer, and perhaps the only one yet published, contains those Roman inscriptions only whose precise or approximate date is positively known.¹ The number of these is 1126; among which we have one belonging to the first century, two to the beginning of the second (all very brief and unimportant), and twenty-three to the third; the fourth and fifth centuries have between four and five hundred each, and the sixth century a little more than two hundred. Fragments and additional inscriptions contained in the appendices bring the number up to 1374.

The second part of his work is intended to include select inscriptions interesting for their theological and historical worth; and in the last place he will include all the remaining inscriptions arranged according to the localities where they were found; and also the Jewish inscription found in Rome.²

We can afford no more space to notice this masterly performance, which every one who desires to become acquainted with Christian inscriptions must necessarily study; an interesting account of it, and also of the work following will be found in the Edinburgh Review for July, 1864.

The impulse given to Christian epigraphy by De Rossi's great work, and by his other works of smaller dimensions³ has been manifested by the publication of other books relating to the subject, among which those which comprise the Christian inscriptions en masse of particular countries hold the first rank. And among these we must place at the head the Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule antérieures au VIII^{me} Siècle, edited and annotated by M. Edmond Le Blant, in 2 vols. 4to., Paris, 1856, and 1865, comprising 708 inscriptions, nearly all Latin, but a few Greek, and a few also written in Runes.^m The earliest dated inscription belongs to the year 334, and the latest to 695; but only four of these are as early as the 4th century. Of the rest that are dated about 50 belong to the 5th century, nearly 100 to the 6th, and 13 to the 7th century. A few which are undated are certainly before the age of Constantine (Manuel, p. 124).

² Under each inscription mention is made of the place where it was found, where it has been edited, if at all, or from what MSS. it has been copied by the editor, if he have not himself transcribed it. Plates are in most cases added. If the inscriptions were more frequently written out in common minuscules, besides being figured, they would be more easily read by the non-antiquarian scholar or student.

³ His Bullettino di Archeologia Cristiana, of which the first volume (in twelve monthly parts) appeared in 1863 (Roma, tipografia Salviucci, 4to) is a magazine of most

The same learned author has likewise more recently, in 1869, written a Manuel d'Épigraphie Chrétienne d'après les marbres de la Gaule, accompagnée d'une bibliographie spéciale, i.e., a catalogue of books relating to Christian epigraphy generally, Paris, sm. 8vo. pp. 267. Although this valuable work refers more especially to Gaulish inscriptions, there is a great deal about others also; in particular his enumeration of formulae (Greek and Latin) which occur in different parts of the Christian world, in Europe, Asia and Africa, where different provinces have their own styles of epigraphy, is peculiarly instructive (pp. 76-81), and a translation will be found below. The Christian inscriptions of Spain have very recently been edited by one of the most eminent living epigraphists, Prof. E. Hübner, of Berlin. His Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae was published at Berlin in 1871, and includes 209 inscriptions, besides 89 others of the medieval period comprised in the appendix. Of the earlier ones two or three only can be referred to the 4th century; the others are of the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th centuries; about half of them are dated, the earliest being of the year 465, and the latest being 782. Nearly all are in Latin; a very few only in Greek. A splendid publication commenced in 1870, entitled Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language, chiefly collected and drawn by G. Petrie, LL.D., edited by M. Stokes, Dublin, printed at the University, 4to. Four parts have now (1874) been published. Those of Clonmacnois (above 100 in number) range from valuable information for inscriptions among other antiquities. Other works of his (some unknown to the writer) on this subject are enumerated by Le Blant in his Bibliographie at the end of his Manuel d'Épigraphie.

^m Both this and Hübner's work (see below) give details for each inscription in the same exact and comprehensive manner as De Rossi, and are accompanied by numerous plates. M. Le Blant has subsequently obtained additional inscriptions from various parts of France and Switzerland, which will one day, he hopes, form a rich supplement to his former work (Manuel, p. 1).

ⁿ It is notwithstanding to be regretted that so useful a book was not put together with a little more fullness and precision: it is divided into nineteen chapters, but nothing is said either at the beginning of the work or at the head of each respecting the contents of the chapters; the list of books placed at the end of the volume scarcely satisfies the requirements of the bibliographer, as it almost invariably omits the Christian name or initials of the authors mentioned, and the number of volumes in each work. At the same time it will be found very helpful without being by any means complete, particularly as regards English books.

the 7th to the 12th century in a regular series; and by their help it is hoped that a key to the approximate date of such works in other parts of the country as well as in other parts of the British Islands may be obtained. They occupy the first part of the work. All the above works are beautifully illustrated with figures. There are also other recent books which deal with the Christian inscriptions of particular regions. Among them are to be named C. Gazzera, Delle iscrizioni cristiane antiche del Piemonte discorso, Torino, 1850, 4to. (also in Mem. Accad. di Torino, 1851); J. B. De Rossi, De Christianis titulis Carthaginiensibus (in Pitra's Spicil. Solesm. vol. 4); and (along with the Pagan inscriptions) L. Renier, Inscriptions Romaines de l'Algérie, Paris, 1858, fol.

The Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, whose publication is still going forward at Berlin, includes, with specified exceptions, all Latin inscriptions, both Pagan and Christian, which can be placed with certainty or reasonable probability before 600 A.D. (see pref. to vols. ii. and iii.). The Christian inscriptions are distinguished in the indices by a dagger prefixed.^o

A great number of Welsh inscriptions, the earliest being probably about the 7th century, will be found in the numerous volumes of the Archæologia Cambrensis, 1846, sqq. 8vo., mostly described by the well-known palæographer Prof. Westwood. But a conspectus of the whole of the early Christian inscriptions of Great Britain and Ireland^p will, it is to be hoped, in process of time be included in Messrs. A. W. Haddan and W. Stubbs' Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain, of which the first volume appeared at Oxford in 1869, 8vo., part of the second in 1871, and the third in 1873. The very scanty inscribed Christian remains of the Roman period will be found at vol. i. pp. 39, 40;^q vol. ii. p. xxii. (Addenda)

^o It is astonishing how small a number of Latin Christian inscriptions (or, at any rate inscriptions known to be Christian) occur in some countries. In vol. iii. edited by Mommsen, which includes Egypt, Asia, Illyricum, and the provinces of European Greece, there are only about thirty inscriptions which can be counted upon as Christian out of 6574. Of these several were found together at a place in Dalmatia.

^p The books where the inscriptions are described and figured are fully detailed under each inscription in the same complete manner as in De Rossi's, Le Blant's, and Hübner's works already mentioned. It is hardly necessary therefore to say much of any of them here; many of them are periodicals, others are monographs on particular classes of monuments, particularly Stuart's Sculptured Stones of Scotland (printed for the Spalding Club, Edinb. 1856-1867, 2 vols. fol.); G. Stephen's Old Northern Runic Monuments (London and Copenhagen, 2 vols. fol. 1866-1868); Munch's edition of the Chron. Manniæ (Christian. 1860). A great number also of topographical and archaeological works by Lysons, Hodgson, Nichols, C. Roach Smith, Horsley, Borlase, &c. are brought under contribution.

^q The Lincoln inscription is considered by Hübner (Inscr. Brit. Lat. n. 191) to be of the 16th century. If so, perhaps the only Roman Christian inscription which deserves the name must be struck off. The chrisma, however, has been found on six or seven monuments of different kinds (without counting coins), once with the α and ω (Haddan and Stubbs, u. s.). The chrisma occurs also on a lamp in the Newcastle museum, published by Hübner (u. s. p. 240, n. 27), who likewise gives two rings with the Christian acclamation, "VIVAS IN DEO," found and p. 51. To these will perhaps be added a Roman inscription found at Sea-mills, near Bristol, in 1873, seen by the writer, but whether it be Christian or no "adhuc sub judice lis est." The sepulchral Christian inscriptions in Celtic Britain, A.D. 450-700, mostly in Latin, but one or two in Welsh, vol. i. pp. 162-169; some few of the Latin inscriptions being accompanied by Ogham characters. The same class of inscriptions in Wales, A.D. 700-1100, vol. i. pp. 625-633 (Latin); the inscriptions of Scottish and English Cumbria (A.D. 450-900, vol. ii. pp. 51-56), some Latin, some (at Ruthwell near Dumfries, and at Bewcastle in Cumberland) Runic. The inscribed monuments (very few) in the Pictish and Scottish kingdoms (A.D. 400-900), partly Latin, partly in Runes and Oghams, are in vol. ii. pp. 125-132; those of the Isle of Man, nearly all Runes, of Norwegian origin (one may be Gaelic), and inscribed on crosses, whose date is not given, will be found in vol. ii. pp. 185-187. There still remain to follow the Saxon inscriptions of the period of the Heptarchy and the Monarchy.^r

A work has yet to be mentioned, which is perhaps of greater importance to the student of Christian epigraphy than any which has been already named, De Rossi's only excepted; viz., the Christian inscriptions, which are contained in Böckh's Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum (vol. iv. fasc. 2, Berlin, 1859, fol., plates). They are collected and edited by Prof. A. Kirchhoff, the same great epigraphist who has just been occupied upon the Corpus Inscriptionum Atticarum. The Christian inscriptions begin at No. 8606 and terminate at No. 9893, besides a few in the Addenda; thus making a total of nearly 1300 inscriptions of all ages and in almost all parts of the Roman world, down to the fall of the in England (pp. 234, 235), as well as other rings which seem to be Christian. The Romano-Christian remains in Britain are so extremely rare that it seems to be worth while to make these slight additions to what will be found in Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs' work. Mr. Wright's statement (Celt. Roman and Saxon, p. 298) that "not a trace of Christianity is found among the innumerable religious and sepulchral monuments of the Roman period found in Britain," cannot be safely contradicted. The Westminster and Bristol monuments may possibly be exceptions. So much can hardly be said of one or two others which have been suspected to be Christian. See Dr. McCaul's remarks on the Chesterholm stone in the Canadian Journal for 1874.

^s Until these appear, it may be useful to indicate some of the principal sources of information. In addition to the books already referred to, among which Professor G. Stephen's Runic Monuments is the principal, Pegge's Sylloge and Camden's Britannia, with the additions of Gibson and Gough, may be consulted. Among the periodicals, the Yorkshire Archaeological and Topographical Journal and the Proceedings of the West Riding of Yorkshire Geolog. and Polytechnic Society are more especially to be mentioned, where the Runic and other early inscriptions of Yorkshire are described by the Rev. D. Haigh and the Rev. J. Fowler. Professor Hübner informs the writer that he hopes his Inscriptiones Britannicæ Christianæ will appear in the course of 1875, which will be analogous in all respects to the Inscr. Hiép. Christ. It includes all Latin inscriptions down to about 800 p.c. "As there are in Wales some few in Oghams only, while the rest is in part bilingual, I do not," he says, "exclude those few merely Celtic ones."

Byzantine empire. To these are to be added about sixty already included in the earlier parts of the book, which are evidently of Christian times ("quos Christianae esse aetatis apparet"). They are divided into three classes. (1) Tituli operum publicorum et votivi, the first division of which is arranged chronologically, the second comprising those whose age is uncertain. Of the former division there are 175, but none is earlier than the 4th century, a copy of a letter of St. Athanasius, the only authority for the Greek text, being perhaps the earliest of all; there are only six or seven others which can be referred to the 4th century. The fifty-eight which follow these comprise all which are of the fifth and following centuries, several of them being in verse, to the death of Charlemagne, of which number about twelve belong to the age of Justinian (A.D. 527-565). The most important of these perhaps is a copy of the paschal canon of St. Hippolytus, which appears to have been engraved in the reign of Theodosius; most of the others are inscriptions on various kinds of buildings, such as churches, monasteries, hospitals, towers, and there are two or three which are invocations of the Virgin and the saints, or prayers for the welfare of the persons mentioned.

(2) The second class comprises 156 inscriptions on mosaics, fictile and other vessels, glass, lamps, triptychs or other wooden tablets, "et variae supellectilis sacrae et profanae, ponderum, sigillorum, amuletorum, gemmarum" (Nos. 8953-9109). About seventy of these are on seals (nearly all lead); a few are as early as the 7th and 8th centuries. Some of those however on gems and glass are much earlier, and some notice has been taken of these in the articles on those subjects in this Dictionary.

(3) The remaining class contains no less than 783 inscriptions, all sepulchral, and these are arranged by the regions in which they are found. Those which bear dates are comparatively very few. (a) Egypt, Nubia, and the rest of Africa (Nos. 9110-9137); (b) Syria (Nos. 9138-9154); (c) Asia Minor (Nos. 9155-9287); (d) Greece and Illyricum (Nos. 9288-9449, of which 114 are from Athens); (e) Sicily and Malta (Nos. 9450-9540); (f) Italy and Sardinia (Nos. 9541-9885); (g) Gaul and Germany (Nos. 9886-9893).

Various other Greek Christian inscriptions have been since published; in particular, it may be observed that a few have been found in Spain and Algeria, countries from which Kirchoff has not given a single example (Hübner, u. s. p. v. praef.; Rénier, u. s. pp. 255, 349).

From what has now been said, it must be apparent how utterly hopeless and impossible it is to give within the limits of an article in a dictionary a satisfactory account of this immensely numerous class of Christian antiquities. The most important aid which such an article can render must be to indicate the principal sources of information; and these, if De Rossi's labours are carried out, will be very largely increased in the course of a few years.

A little work however has been published at Toronto in 1869 by the Rev. John McCaul, LL.D., in which a judicious selection of a hundred "Christian epitaphs of the first six centuries" (Greek and Latin from various parts of the world, especially from Rome) has been brought together and ably commented upon. They occupy sixty-eight pages, and an introduction relating to the language, names, and dates employed fill up twenty-eight more. Besides these we have a brief preface pointing out the necessity of caution in using uncritical books, like those of Aringhi and Boldetti, and giving amusing examples of forgeries of Christian inscriptions, which have deceived some learned writers even of the present century. To those who cannot give any great amount of attention to the subject, this little work may be heartily recommended, as it bears every mark of conscientious care and of strict honesty.

(ii.) Technical Execution and Materials employed.—The modes of writing employed have much the same variations as in all ages: the letters are most commonly engraved with a chisel below the surface of the stone, and then occasionally coloured (red) or gilded; sometimes the letters are scratched with the point of some instrument, a nail or the like (fig. 1); on some gems the letters are in relief (camei). More rarely the letters are drawn in paint (vermilion) (fig. 2) or in gold upon the flat surface of the marble, or cut in gold leaf (upon glass), or written in ink upon sepulchral tablets or vases, or in white

2. Letters (Latin words in Greek characters) painted in vermilion on the flat (not incised) surface of the marble: they are of mixed forms, uncial and minuscule. Leaves and points introduced capriciously. A.D. 269. (Rome. The famous epitaph of St. Severa.)

colour on frescoes, &c. In the catacombs the inscriptions were occasionally, by reason of the unhappiness of the times, smeared in charcoal, in hope that when persecution had passed away, they might be recorded in a more permanent form. Sometimes also old tombstones of the pagans were used over again, and the Christian inscriptions were written on their backs, or on their obliterated faces (fig. 5). Points are also frequently found, sometimes to distinguish words (fig. 3), sometimes scattered capriciously (figs.

2, 4); likewise a variety of other marks, particularly cordate leaves, common to pagan and graved, sometimes painted on the marble. There are also many Christian inscriptions as well as Christian inscriptions (figs. 2, 5, 6). Some of the above remarks are illustrated by the inscriptions figured above and below, to be more fully described under TOMB. The reader may see more on this subject in Martigny's Dict. s. v. Inscriptions, §§ II., III.; but it can only be studied to advantage by examining the plates in such works as De Rossi's Roma Sotterranea

(coloured plates) and Inscr. Urb. Rom., and the other books named above in which the letters and accessories are figured. The same remark must be made of the palaeography. The letters have the same varieties of form, such as uncial, minuscule, rustic, and ligated, which are common to MSS. and monuments of all kinds, and their execution varies from extreme neatness (figs. 6, 10) and even beauty to extreme ugliness and carelessness (litterae rusticae) (figs. 1, 8). Of the former sort the characters employed by pope Damasus in the 4th century are the most remarkable, their apices being ornamented with little hooks (fig. 7). They are called after him

10. Inscription in minuscule letters of variable form. 7th century. (Clonmacnois, Ireland.)

u. s. p. 116; De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 18.

(iii.) Symbols.—Of the symbols which are found with some Christian inscriptions, the principal are the following: the fish, the anchor, the dove, the Good Shepherd, the chrisma, the α and ω , and the cross in various forms. These will be found described under their respective heads (also noticed under GEMS and MOSAICS), and they may be regarded as either exclusively or principally Christian symbols. The palm which is also found, and that very commonly, is, like the phoenix, Christianised; but it occurs also on pagan and Jewish inscriptions. It must be sufficient to refer to a table indicating the symbols on the early Roman and Gaulish sepulchral inscriptions (by far the most complete series), and the observed dates of their introduction and disappearance, given by M. Le Blant (Manuel, p. 29). For symbols generally see Raoul Rochette, Tableau des Citadomies de Rome, pp. 229 sqq., Paris, 1853, and the authors named at the beginning and end of the book.

(iv.) Select Inscriptions.—These consist of such examples, arranged chronologically, in prose and verse, as are connected with churches or their furniture or adjuncts, and they have mostly some further interest of their own. No uniform system of printing has been followed. Sometimes the mere transcript of the letters seems to be sufficient; sometimes the words have been written out (corrected and at length) below these; sometimes a translation has been added; also such notes as seemed desirable.

M. Rénier reads the end of the last line but one titulum marmoreum anno primo Severiani, viri clarissimi. If this be right, as seems very probable (though De Rossi feels some doubts, Prod. Inscr. Urb. Rom. p. xi.), the mode of dating is very unusual. Other Mauretanian inscriptions are dated by the era of the province, i. e. 40 A.D. when it was reduced by the Romans (McCauley, Christ. Epit. p. 37).

The words ecclesia fratrum indicate the restoration of the inscription to be "assai anteo" (De Rossi); the original was probably broken during the tumults against the Christians, A.D. 258–304, as De Rossi thinks; and the restored marble tablet would seem to have been put up in the first year of Severianus, probably the Roman governor of Mauretania. One of the earliest Christian inscriptions, not being an epitaph, which have come down to us in any form.

The date of this consulpship of Gratian with Merobaudas is A.D. 377, the earliest date of any public monument yet known, bearing the chrisma. The next earliest is A.D. 390, on a column of St. Paul's basilica, extra muros, Rome. It is wonderful that the former church should be spoken of as old so early as A.D. 377; it can hardly be doubted that it was a Christian or a Christianised building. Le Blant's observation that this church-restoration is precisely contemporaneous with the greatest abundance of Mithraic monuments and those of Cybele is worthy to be noted. The abbreviations at the end are probably for vir praepositus praetorio dedicavit. Tales, i. e. men like Asclepiodotus. De Rossi, however (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 25), who evidently considers Asclepiodotus to be the author of the verses, refers tales to aedes ("che li dedicò alla repubblica"). He takes the building to be "il palazzo dei presidi imperiali," the chrisma and devotio notwithstanding.

IN HONOREM S. IOANNIS BAPTISTAE

HILARIVS EPISCOPVS DEI FAMVLVS OFFERT.

Hilarus was pope from A.D. 462 to 467; and the inscription has the appearance of being contemporary. The ancient baptisteries were commonly placed under the patronage of St. John the Baptist; and both they and the fonts which they contained were frequently inscribed. Ciampini gives both kinds of inscriptions from the Baptistery of the Lateran, which are said to have been there in the 5th century; but this edifice has been often remodelled. (See Ciamp. de Sacr. Edif. c. iii., Mart. Dict., p. 321; Hübsch, Arch. Chret. p. 5, Guerber's French transl. 1866.)

For this class of inscriptions generally see the posthumous papers of Marini published by Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Collect. t. v., pp. 167–177.

Diction barbarous, as frequently in these Spanish inscriptions. The church seems to have been completed under the auspices of a nun, named Marispalla: probably the text really is per Marispallam Deo votam, the last letters having a stroke above them, which may have been obliterated or accidentally omitted. The inscription is interesting as being doubly dated, both by the Spanish era and by the reign of the Visigothic king. The Spanish era, whose origin is uncertain, but which appears to commence B.C. 38 (see Hübner, praef. p. vi.), is the era most commonly used to mark the time of the Spanish Christian inscriptions: about 100 of them are thus dated (Hübner, p. 109), the earliest appears to be A.D. 466, and the latest A.D. 762. Both the proper names in the inscription are Gothic (see Hübner, praef. p. vii., who gives several others); the remark of M'Caul (u. s., p. xxi.) that Gothic names are "very rarely" found in inscriptions does not apply to Spain.

6. Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, i. 87, n. 42. Found at Lyons, formerly on the exterior of the church of St. Romanus, where Spon saw it in the 17th century; now lost.

Date, as Spon believed, of the 5th or 6th century. He thus restores and rectifies the lines—

The motive of the founders is here sufficiently clearly expressed, that they may enjoy eternal rest through the prayers of the saint. They do not, however, actually invoke him.

Holy Mary, God-bearer (Deipara), guard the kingdom of the Christ-loving Justinian and his faithful servant Victorinus with them that live godly in Corinth.

Sixth century, between A.D. 527 and 565. Other and even stronger invocations of saints occur about this time. In one, too long to quote at length, Demetrius is invoked by Justinian to aid him against his enemies, in the capacity of a mediator with God (ὁ μεγαλομάρτυς Δημήτριε μεσίτευσον πρὸς θεὸν ἡμεῖς, κ.τ.λ. n. 8642). Another inscription, mutilated, from Thera (Sanctorin), of uncertain date, not later than the 4th or 5th century at latest according to Ross, begins—ἀγίε καὶ φοβέρε Μιχαὴλ ἀρχάγγελε, CHRIST. ANT.

βοήθει τῇ δούλῳ σου Ὁρίμῳ (n. 8911). Votive tablets were also erected to saints; one from the cemetery of Cyriace in Rome runs thus: Petrus et Pancara botum posuent (sic) marture Felicitati. (Marini, u. s., p. 15.) In another, found near the baths of Diocletian, Camasius and Victorinus pay their vows (votum reddunt) Domnis Sanctis Papro et Mauroleoni marturibus (Id. p. 14).

The expression, μήτηρ Θεοῦ (Mother of God), the usual title of the Virgin on the early medieval camei (see GEMS) had not yet come into common use in the Greek church, as appears from Ephraim, patriarch of Antioch, a contemporary of Justinian. See Pearson On the Creed, Art. III.

8. Sec. Voy. de deux Bénédict. p. 234 (quoted by Martigny, Dict. p. 321). On a silver chalice given by Remigius, archbishop of Rheims (died A.D. 533) to his cathedral church.

This is considered by Martigny to be in all appearance the "ministerial" (sacramental) chalice given by St. Remigius himself to the church of Rheims; see also Archaeol. Journ. 1846, p. 134. The magnificent chalice of gold which goes by the name of Remigius, formerly at Rheims, now in the Paris Library, is of the 12th century (Arch. Journ. u. s.). For other inscriptions on chalices, see Marini, u. s. p. 197.

9. Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, ii. 348, n. 574. Engraved on the four scalloped edges of a square marble altar slab formerly in the ancient cathedral of Rodez.

DEVSDEDIT EPS INDI:VNVS FIERI IVSSIT HANC ARAM.

Deusdedit is supposed to have been bishop of Rodez about the end of the 6th century: the inscription is doubtless a contemporary composition, but the letters and the sign of contraction ̃ are suspected of having been restored.

The name Deusdedit occurs also on a gem (see GEMS); the form Deusdet is likewise found more than once in inscriptions (Le Blant, u. s. p. 433); for similar instances, see Names below. For the altars of Christian churches ara (though as old as Tertullian) is less commonly used than altare, especially in prose. For other inscriptions on altars see Marini (u. s. pp. 74–80). This and the altar at Ham of the 7th century are among the earliest that are inscribed (Le Blant, n. 91).

10. Camden, Britan. § "Brigantes," ed. 1600: "Accepimus crucem hic (at Dewsbury, Yorkshire) exstitisse, in qua inscriptum fuit:

PAVLINVS HIC PRAEDICAVIT ET CELE-BRAVIT."

Paulinus was bishop of York, A.D. 625–664.

The inscription upon it is among the earliest that we have in England, which are not sepulchral. Fragments of the ancient cross itself, probably broken at the Reformation, which Leland, in his Itinerary, mentions having seen, bearing the above inscription (temp. Henr. VIII.), have been built up against the church there. The miracles of Cana and the multiplication of five loaves and two fishes were represented thereon, and a few Latin words of the Gospels in Runesque characters can still be read. (Figured and described by the Rev. J. T. Fowler, in a recent number of the Yorkshire Archaeol. and Top. Journal.)

The most remarkable cross of the same kind as the present is that at Ruthwell, near Dumfries (then part of Northumbria), with Scriptural and other scenes, and Latin legends from the Gospels, &c.; also having extracts from a poem by Cædman, entitled A Dream of the Holy Rood, written in Runes, near the edges. It is between seventeen and eighteen feet high, and appears to be of the 8th century. For a full account of it see Stephens, Runic Mon., vol. ii., pp. 405-448, with figure.

It is now over the nave-arch of the church, "and may be original" (Fowler, in litt.). The forms of the letters O and C, and their inconsistency, quite favour this supposition.

The date is A.D. 685, determined by the reign of Egfrith, king of Northumbria. One of the very few early English inscriptions which bear a date.

The basilica or chapel of the monastery has been converted into the parish church, some remaining parts of which "are generally supposed to be of ante-Norman date" (G. G. Scott's Report). For the history, see Flor. Wigorn. s. a. 682. Benedict Biscop should rather be called the founder than Ceolfriht, whom he appointed as the first abbot.

The above scanty selection must suffice for this place. More is to be sought in other articles under AMPULLA, GEMS, GLASS, LAMPS, MONEY, MOSAICS, SEALS, and TOMBS.

(v.) Language and Style of the Christian Inscriptions.

A. Orthography, Inflections, and choice of Words.—While some of the Christian inscriptions are composed with correctness and even with elegance both in prose and verse, there are others which are written barbarously as respects the letters, the forms of words, the declensions, the genders, the conjugations, the syntax, and the prosody.

It would scarcely fall within the province of this article to enter into the grammar or rather non-grammar of the language of the latter sort. It partakes of the barbarisms with which various non-Christian inscriptions are more or less disfigured,¹ and which have even found their way into literature in their most aggravated shapes, if the Formularies of the monk Marculfus (circa 660 A.D.) can be called literature. In the Greek Christian inscriptions the frequent and various changes of vowels and diphthongs are the most noticeable particularity. Thus κείται is written κιτε, or κιτη, or κητη, Ἡράκλειος becomes Ηρακληος or Ηρακλιος, κοιμητήριον is changed into κυμητεριον, τελειώθεις becomes τελιοθεις, ἐτών is written ετον, νικᾷ is simply νικα, and the i adscript of the dative is generally omitted. The change of consonants, as κόλπος for κόλπος, ταυμασία for θαυμάσια, γληγορει for γρηγορει, κωριω for χωριω, is more rare. There is also an occasional tendency to abbreviate words, so as to substitute μνηθητι for μνήσθητι, διακων for διάκονος, &c., or to enlarge them, as κολλυπτις or κολλυπτι for κόλποισι. Sometimes Coptic influence is discernible; sometimes uncouth late forms as μεγαλότατος, make their appearance (Böckh, passim).

In the Latin the changes are much more remarkable." From the selection of inscriptions (including the notes) given above and under TOMBS, also under GEMS and GLASS, and from a few others we obtain such changes as Agustas for Augustas, eclesia or aeclesia for ecclesia, quere for quære, que for quæ, hec for hæc, bixit or vixit or vicxit or visit or bixit or vixit or visit, posuete, posuent for posuit, posuerunt, bobis for vobis, botum for votum, vibi for vivi, staviles for stabilis, provata for probatâ, omnebus for omnibus, quesquas, gesquet, and reqviscit, for quiescas, quiescit, reqviscit, speitit for spectat (expectat), jacit for jacet, annus for annos, huc for hoc, epytaphium for epitaphium, marturibus for martyribus, ozza for ossa, ed for et, es for ex, in pace for in pace, anathema for anathema, chanones for canones, tinta for tincta, pelem for pellem, meses or misit for menses, zaconus for diaconus, Istephanus for Stephanus, slinatarius for linatarius, Zesus for Jesus, Zenuaria for Januaria, Gerosale for Jerusalem, and various other words which contain barbarous substitutions of consonants and vowels and also of diphthongs. Again, neuter substantives are sometimes treated as masculines, e. g. hunc templum, and conversely masculines as neuters, e. g. hoc tumulum. The regimen of the cases is frequently violated in the use of prepositions (see below), and also in such expressions as vixit annis (or even annus or annorum) and the like. See more in Martigny, Dict. pp. 309-311; and McCaul, u. s. pp. xii. and xiii.; the latter of whom observes: "The student should beware of regarding what may be new to him in Christian epitaphs, as peculiar to them. Very many of the variations from classical usage are to be found in Pagan inscriptions, and some of them in authors that are not commonly read."

The actual words also vary little from the Pagan ones; requiescit, refrigerat, and even *depositus (about which Cardinal Wiseman in his

at the end of the volumes of the Corp. Inscr. Lat. now being published at Berlin, under Res grammatica, will be found still more useful. They go far to establish the truth of Martigny's remark.

* M. Le Blant refers to a work by A. Fuchs, Die Romanischen Sprachen in ihrem Verhältnisse zum Lateinischen, which the writer has not seen.

² It was not after all so very common in the earliest Christian times. "La formule deposuit—depositio caractérisé particulièrement les inscriptions des quatrième Fabiola (p. 145) has written so prettily, as implying a 'precious thing, intrusted to faithful, but temporary keeping') and some others which seem Christian in their tone occur sometimes in Pagan inscriptions (see McCaul, u. s. pp. xiv. 4, 29; Tertull. De Test. Anim. c. 4, commented on by Fleetwood, Inscr. Ant., Index, p. 6, who is deceived, however, in thinking that no Christians of Tertullian's age "refrigerium mortuis suis comprecatos esse." See De Monag. c. 10). And conversely some words and expressions which are not Christian, find their way occasionally from Pagan into Christian inscriptions, as domus aeterna, percipere (baptisma sc. said primarily of the rites of Mithras and Cybele), contra votum, Divus (said of emperors deceased); and even occasionally D. M., or in full Dis Manibus, so usual at the head of Pagan inscriptions (see TOMB, and McCaul, u. s. p. 54, and his Index, s. v. Pagan usages). In fact there is a very small residuum indeed of mere words, i. e. not necessarily involving peculiar doctrines or religious distinctions⁷ which are exclusively Pagan, or exclusively Christian.⁸ Dr. McCaul remarks that there is scarcely one of the designations of the place of burial used in Christian epitaphs, that is peculiar to them, so far as he remembers, although he has not observed quadrismus (locus) in any Pagan epitaph. Likewise he does not remember seeing sepultus in any Christian inscription of the first six centuries, and but rarely in Pagan ones; but yet sepulcrum occurs in both not rarely.⁹ Again he says praecedo is characet cinquième siècles, bien qu'on en ait quelques exemples antérieurs." Martigny, Dict. p. 319. Neither is the word universal, being very rarely found in Gaul.

⁹ Since this sentence was penned, the writer has discovered an example of sepultus in an ancient Christian epitaph of Mauretania (Rénier, n. 4026). It is very possibly as early as the third century, to which several Pagan inscriptions in that region certainly belong. There is a second example in the same region, A.D. 416 (n. 3675), and a third, A.D. 389 (n. 3710). We have another instance occurring in an epitaph of Rimini, A.D. 523 (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 15). The word is found also in Christian epitaphs of Spain, dated and undated, but perhaps in no case before the seventh century (Hübner, p. x. and the references). We have in fine in a Perugian inscription of Roman times (Vermigli, Inscr. Perug. t. ii. p. 442) in qua (basilica sc.) sepelliri non debet. Cardinal Wiseman therefore is not strictly accurate in saying (Fabiola, teristically Christian, while abscedo he thinks occurs only (and that rarely) in Pagan epitaphs (u. s. pp. xiv. xv. 53). But who does not see that any new discovery may upset the supposed distinction? There are indeed phrases which appear to have an exclusively Christian meaning, such as Deo reddere spiritum sanctum, apud Deum acceptus, decessit or exiit de saeculo, absolutus de corpore, receptus ad Deum, arcessitus ab angelis, and a few others of the same kind.^b (Mart. Dict. p. 315; McCaul, u. s. p. xv.). The expression, in pace, is derived from the Jewish epitaphs, and passes over, both as an acclamation and otherwise, to the Christian inscriptions; its occurrence is generally considered to be a certain proof that the monument is not pagan. (See, however, MONEY.) "Dictio illa In Pace Christiana tota est" (Morcelli, De Stil. Inscr. Lat. ii. p. 77; and so Martigny Dict. s. v. "In Pace," q. v.).

Upon the whole, it will perhaps be thought enough to give the following extract from the Edinburgh Review relative to the Latinity of the Christian inscriptions, with the addition of a few notes.

"The reader at once recognises in the Latinity of these epitaphs [of Italy and Gaul]^c the germ of that total change in the government of prepositions, which is one of the great sources of distinction between the ancient and the modern languages of Italy.^d The old distinction of government between the ablative and the accusative has evidently begun to disappear. Many of the prepositions are used indiscriminately with both those cases. Thus we read (De Rossi, Ins. Urb. Rom. p. 82) that Pelegrinus "lived in peace cum uxorem suam Silvanam;" and in another place (p. 108), Agrippina erects a monument to her "sweetest husband, cum quem vixit sine lesione animi, annos tres et menses decem."

p. 145) "The word to bury is unknown in Christian inscriptions." It occurs even at Rome, which he had more particularly in his eye, in an inscription thought to be of the third century: ἐτάφη ὡς Εὐσέβης (Böckh, n. 9612). At the same time, for whatever reason, the word appears to be decidedly rare. But as it seems to be not much more common in Pagan inscriptions there is no great force in the cardinal's remark.

^b There are also various expressions relating to light, as lumen clarum, praemia lucis, lux nova, &c. occurring in Christian epitaphs which contrast remarkably with the lucē caret, jaceo in tenebris, &c. of the Pagans. See Mart. Dict. p. 380. But this is a difference of feeling rather than of language. There are other similar contrasts which we can hardly discuss here. See McCaul p. xii.; Edinb. Rev. u. s. p. 242. But some of the earliest Christian inscriptions express no feeling of any sort. See De Rossi, nos. 3, 6, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22, all of the first three centuries.

^c Much the same remarks may be made of the sepulchral inscriptions of Britain and of Africa. See TOMBS.

^d And of France. We have this interesting inscription of Berre, Maria virgo minester de tempulo (= temple) Gerusalem (= Jerusalem), Le Blant, n. 542, A. The same author points out various other links of connection between the epigraphical Latin and the French language. Thus qui, which is invariable for both genders in French, is twice found on the epitaph of a nun, A.D. 431. (In an inscription of Piedmont qui in like manner agrees with Maria. Gazzera, Mem. Acc. Tor. u. s. p. 191.) In the fifth century we have also santa, which prepares the way for the modern sainte from ispiritus ("que l'on entend encore aux offices de villages") comes esprit (Manuel, p. 194).

A third monument is erected pro caritatem (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. Gaul. vol. i. p. 400). In a fourth, a mother is entreated to pray for the child she has left behind, "pro hunc unum ora subolem" (De Rossi, p. 133). Conversely, we find de sua omnia (De Rossi, p. 133) and decessit de saeculum (p. 103). And although an occasional solecism of this kind might be explained by the rude and illiterate character of the individual author of the inscription, the frequency of the occurrence clearly indicates the settled tendency of the popular usage of the prepositions towards the abolition of all distinction in the government of cases.* We may add that the same confusion of case is found in the inscriptions of the Jewish catacombs published by Father Garrucci, among which we read, on the one hand, cum with the accusative, as cum virginium (p. 50), and cum Celerinum (p. 52); and on the other, inter with the ablative, as inter dicacis.

"It is hardly worth while, perhaps, to advert to such solecisms as pauperorum for pauperum (although it is plain from the recurrence of the same form in other words, as omnium for omnium, that the change is not an accidental error); or to the occasional use of forms rare, but not entirely unexampled, in classical Latin, as nectus (Le Blant, p. 15) as the participle of neco, or utere (De Rossi, p. 233) as the ablative of uter, a rare form following the third, instead of the second declension.† But it is impossible not to discern a foreshadowing of the modern idiom of Italy in such words as pulla, and still more Pizzinina, which is the direct prototype of the Italian Piccinina. The same may be said of the orthography, which, in many cases, points clearly towards the modern pronunciation. The form santa for sancta already appears; and the x, as in sesi-s for series, begins to give place to the modern s. This tendency goes, however, beyond individual words, and seems to indicate certain general principles of usage. We do not mean those broad characteristics which distinguish Italians and foreigners generally from ourselves, in the sounds of the vowels and diphthongs of the ancient languages, although in all these the interchanges of the characters of the two languages which the inscriptions frequently exhibit and the characters employed in each to represent equivalent sounds of the other,

* Martigny (Dict. p. 320) thinks that if an inscription has cum or de followed by an accusative, it must be placed in the fourth or fifth century. This seems very doubtful. We have certainly inter sanctis in an inscription of 268 A.D., and perhaps cum eum in another of 279 A.D. (see De Rossi, pp. 16, 21). Before this cum soales occurs at Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. n. 221).

† Dr. McCaul notes some very singular instances of inflection, as the datives Niceni, Agapeni, Leopardeti, Ireneti (also Ireni), Mercuraveti from Nice, Agape, Leoparde, Eirone, Mercuriane (Mercuriane); also ispeti for spei; likewise Victorias for Victoriae (u. s. p. xiii. and 18, 19). The same forms, as was to be expected, occur in Pagan inscriptions. Thus we find Glyceri, Staplyleni, &c. in Spain (C. I. L. ii. Index, p. 779). We have also Junariæ for Jannia iæ, at Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. n. 2233), and several similar examples; and Ampliatæ in Spain (C. I. L. ii. n. 4975, 60). Professor Hübner, in fine, observes in a few Christian inscriptions of Spain, Joanni, Pastori, &c. as the genitives of Joannes, Pastor, &c. (p. xlii.), and conversely we have Saturnis, Mercuris as the genitives of Saturnus, Mercurius (De Rossi, nos. 172, 475).

are quite decisive against the English usage. We refer rather to certain peculiarities of Italian pronunciation, which are regarded as defects even by the Italians themselves, and which nevertheless find their counterpart here. One of these is the well-known oïta or additional vowel sound, which Italian speakers often attach to words ending with a consonant. Of this there are numberless examples in De Rossi's volume; as posueto for posuit (p. 18). In like manner we find a type for the vowel sound prefixed to words; as ispiritus for spiritus, iscribit for scribit (p. 228); and the actual Italian sound of h (ch or k) between two vowels, which has long been the subject of ridicule, is found directly expressed in these inscriptions, in which michi is one of the forms of mihī.

"It is amusing too, to meet in the Roman catacombs, or among the Christians of ancient Gaul, the prototype of the cockney aspirate and its contrary. Thus we find upon the one hand (Le Blant, vol. i. p. 2-3), Hossa (for ossa), Hordine, Hoctobres, Heterna; and upon the other oc for hoc (Le Blant, p. 93), ic for hic, Ilarus, ora, Onorius, &c." (Edinb. Rev. 1864, pp. 234-5).

The Index Grammaticus added at the end of Hübner's Christian Inscriptions of Spain, gives a rich harvest of similar barbarisms. Nearly all the vowels are blundered in one way or other, and no small number of consonants; without dwelling on them we have the following: hunc edificium; in annibus; post funere; in hunc tumulum requiescit; cum operarios vernolos; offeret (for offert); besides other less heinous sins against inflections. For the Saxon forms which occur in inscriptions in England the reader is referred to Stephens' Runic Monuments, and for the Celtic forms in the Irish inscriptions to Petrie and Stokes' work thereon (see above).

Examples of bilingual inscriptions (Greek and Latin) and of Latin inscriptions in Greek characters, also of double rendering of words into Runic and Roman characters, as well as Celtic words in Ogham characters, will be noticed under TOMB.

B. Proper Names used in Christian Inscriptions.—For the proper names used in Christian inscriptions see careful and interesting notices in De Rossi, I. U. R. Prol. cxii.-cxiv.; McCaul, u. s. pp. xix.-xxi.; Hübner, u. s. pp. vi. vii., and the references.

The Edinburgh Reviewer has treated this matter so well for the Latin inscriptions of Italy, Gaul, and Africa, taking also some slight notice of the Greek inscriptions, that his words are set down with little abridgment. The account has been supplemented by a few words about the Spanish, British, and Irish names which occur in the early Christian inscriptions of those countries.

"The small proportion of patrician families among the early Christians will hardly suffice to explain the rapid disappearance among them of the use of the three names, which had hitherto been the peculiar privilege of the aristocratic class. Not a single inscription after Constantine presents three names; and of the ante-Constantinian inscriptions, there are but two [rather, is but one] in which the three names occur * * *. After Constantine, except Flavius, which continued in partial use, prænomena may be said entirely to disappear. The old distinctive Gentile name too, quickly followed. The inscriptions before Constantine abound with Aurlīi

Cornelli, Clandii, Antonii, &c. * * * * Thus, in the Aurelian age, we find Aurelius or Aurelia repeated seven times; and under Constantius and his sons, Constantinus, Constantius and Constans, have their turn of popularity. The Gentile name, however, was quickly displaced by new forms terminating in ntius as Lactantius, Dignantius, Crescentius, Leontius; or in osus, as Bonosus. A favourite form in the third and succeeding centuries was some laudatory epithet, as Benignus, Castus, Grata, Castula. Often, especially in Africa, in the superlative degree; as Dignissimus, Felicissimus, Acceptissima. Sometimes similar adjectives appear in the comparative degree, as Dignior, Nobilior; and occasionally the abstract quality itself, as Prudentia, Ἀγάπη, &c., is found as the name. The names of the fourth, fifth, and later centuries would be found on examination to furnish the type, if not the exact equivalent of most of the ancient appellatives of the palmy days of puritanism. We meet, not merely with simple forms such as πῖστις, ἑλπίς, ἀγάπη, Decentia, Prudentia, Dignitas, Idonitas, σωφροσύνη; or Renatus, Redemptus, Refrigerius, Projectus; or the more self-abasing appellatives, Stercorius or Contumeliosus, but compound names of the true Puritan stamp, such as Deus Dedit, Servus Dei, Adeodatus, Quod vult Deus * * *

"In a few instances occasion is taken from the name to introduce into the sentiment of the epitaph some playful allusion to the etymological import of the name; and although this practice is more consonant with the tastes of the later times, yet the inscriptions of the classic period, present examples of a similar play upon words, of which we may instance the sentence from the very pretty epitaph of Claudia given by Orelli (vol. i. p. 547).

"HIC EST SEPULCRUM HAUD PULCRUM PULCRAI FEMINAE." [Pulcher was a cognomen of the gens Claudia.] These allusions in the Christian epitaphs are commonly very simple. Thus we meet INFELIX FELICITAS, and INFAUSTUS FELIX. A monument is erected to Innocentius in recognition of his innuence, PRO INNOCENTIA SUA. GLYCO (γλυκύς, sweet) is described as "sweeter than his name." The sorrowing friends of ANTHUS bemoan his years "stript of their flowers:" and even in a very tender poetical epitaph, addressed to the memory of Verus, by his wife Quintilla (whose grief for his loss proclaims itself so extreme that it is only the fear of God that restrains her from following him to the grave, and that she vows to remain a widow for his sake), room is found, in the midst of all the writer's passionate expressions of sorrow, for a pun upon the name of "HIC VERUS, QUI SEMPER VERA LOCUTUS,"^a a pun exactly similar to that contained in the epitaph of the emperor Probus, which Vopiscus has preserved—"HIC PROBUS IMPERATOR, ET VERE PROBUS, SITUS EST" (u. s. pp. 235-237).

The proper names which occur on the Christian inscriptions of Spain (Hubner, praef. pp. vi. sqq.) are more varied. The old Roman nomina gentilicia are rare, and generally occur alone, as Aurelius, Julius, Licinia, &c., but with a provincial cognomen occasionally added, such as A. (Aurelius) Vincentius. We have also numerous examples of old Roman cognomina, as Avitus,

^a A remarkably pretty specimen is given in De Rossi's Roma Sotteranea, vol. i. p. 262, where Faith makes an epitaph to her sister Hope which runs thus—

PISTE SPEI
SoRoRI DVL
CISSIMAE

FEcit. (Dove.)

But it ought to be remembered that Spes is a name not infrequent in Roman Pagan epitaphs, so that the now famous fragment of the Bristol inscription which contains it is not on that account presumably Christian: apart from the symbols, dog, cock, and asp, and the portrait (?), it now reads only SPES C. SEN I (fili).

^b This Christian epitaph is published by Fabretti, pli. 630.

Dexter, Felix, Crispinus, Camilla. Of the more modern names are those which are of truly Latin origin, as Aeternalis, Amator, Asella, Dominicus, Februarius, Honorius, Sanctus, which seem to be generally diffused in the provinces of the empire; also the following, which appear to be peculiar to Spain (including of course Portugal): Bracarius, Cerevella, Cuparius, Granniola, Lilliolus, Salvianella, &c. There are also many which come from the Greek, as Arcadius, Basilia, Glaucus, Leontius, Macarius, Theodosius, Zenon, &c. Others are still more modern, such as Agilo, Ermengond, Froila, Gulfinus, Huniric, Oppila, Reccisvinthus, Reswentus, Sonnica, Marispalla (fem.), Swinthiliuba (fem.), all which are probably Gothic; also "Anna Gaudiosa sive Africa" (n. 71) and Maurus, which are of course both African; and Bacauda and Camulaelus, which appear to be Gaulish. The origin of others, as Istorna, Locuber, Macona (fem.), Quinigia, Quistricia, and Rexina, is unknown. To these must be added Scriptural names, as Emmanuel, Johannes, Maria, Sallomon, Susanna, Thomas, &c.; those of the puritanical type mentioned above appear to be wanting.

With regard to Great Britain we find (for the British period) some Latin names, as Viventius and Florentius (in Scotland), also Silius, Paulinus, Saturninus, and Carausius (in Wales and Cornwall), and some of these forms, as Augustinus and Paulinus, were re-imported from Rome in Saxon times. But there are also Celtic names occurring, as Isnioc (in Cornwall), Pascent (or Pasgen), Cadfan, Cyngen, Pabo, Boduoc (in Wales), and Drost, Voret, Forcas (Fergus?) and others (in Scotland); as well as Saxon or Scandinavian names, such as Sinnik (in Scotland), Herebricht, Hildithrith, Wulfhere, and the like (in England). A Saxon name is occasionally Latinised, as Wini into Ovinus. In Ireland the great mass of the names is Celtic, but occasionally a Latin form is Hibernized, as Columbanus into Cholumban: very occasionally a Latin form, as Martinus, survives.

C. Words and Formulae employed in different ages and places.—The words and phrases relating to burial and other matters vary a good deal in different places, and in the same place at different times. M. Le Blant has collected these "formules d'épigraphie chrétienne" with considerable industry; but a good many additions might easily be made. He even takes no notice at all of some provinces, e.g. Dalmatia and Pannonia, which however have some formulae and words of interest.¹

Several of the selected inscriptions (sepulchral and others) have been chosen partly on account of the formulae therein contained, and some remarks upon them are made in their places.

But it is well observed by Hubner that until the Christian inscriptions of all parts of the world have been collected and edited, it is impossible to say what formulae are peculiar to each: those which we consider to be peculiar may turn out to be universal or common to many provinces (u. s. p. vii.).^{*}

¹ E.g. an inscription from Sabaria (Stein an Angar) speaking of a dead child, has "requiem acceperit in Deo patre nostro, et Christo ejus" (Corp. Inscr. Lat. t. iiii. n. 4221, edited by Mommsen). Another (n. 4220) from the same place begins: "Bonememorie, in Deo vivas. Iodorus Civ. Graec. ex reg. Ladic. q. vix. an. L. &c. (Bonaememorius occurs in Gaul, Le Blant, Man. p. 77). See also n. 6399 sqq. from Dalmatia, where we have hic in pace jacet, depositus, &c.

The following is a translation with slight omissions and additions¹ and a few tacit corrections, mostly for the Greek, of M. Le Blant's Manuel d'Epigraphie Chrét. pp. 75-85 (Paris, 1860), omitting the references to his own work for Gaul and to those of others, as De Rossi (Rome), Gazzera (Piedmont), Mommsen (kingdom of Naples), Rénier (Algeria), and (for the Greek) Böckh. To this has been added (besides some Roman phrases) a collection of Spanish formulae derived from Hübner; also a notice of the few formulae which occur in Great Britain and Ireland.

"That which is true for ancient coins, as also for the works of architecture, is not less so in that which concerns the monuments of epigraphy. In each new place which he visits, the antiquary sees variations of the formulae, the symbols, the writing, the disposition, the ornaments of the marbles. Though apparently of little importance, these marked differences are worthy of being studied with care. Arising sometimes from the difference of the times, as well as from that of the places, they are able to serve as guides in the restoration of the texts, to fix the nationality of personages, the age of the inscriptions, and even to furnish materials for the history of ideas.

"I must appeal to the patience of the reader in undertaking to place before him some features of the localisation of the types and formulae of Christian epigraphy. Below are those which seem to me the most remarkable in different provinces:

Germania Prima:

Mayer: IN HOC TITVLO REQVIESCIT FELICITER. Worms: TITVLVM POSVIT.

Belgica Prima:

Treves: PRO CARITATE, and the like; TITVLVM POSVIT; HIC IACET; HIC IACET IN PACE; PATRES (titulum posuerunt).

Belgica Secunda:

Amiens: VBI FECIT NOVEMBER DIES XV, and the like; DEFVNCTVS EST.

Viennensis:

SVRRECTVRS IN XPO, and analogous formulae. Briord: HVMANITAS; ABSTVTVS (i. e. astutus, in a good sense). Briord and Vienne: VOLVNTAS. Vaison and Arles: PAX TECVM. Marseilles: RECESSIT, retained even when this word has disappeared in other places from the epigraphical formulary.

^{*} Dr. McCaul, usually most accurate, illustrates this remark by a statement that among the many expressions for our "here lies" we have "hic jacet (not often), ἐνθάδε κεῖται (often)," p. xiii. We may safely say of hic jacet that it occurs almost everywhere, being found first in Rome, then in Gaul, Spain, Dalmatia, Algeria, and Britain, in which last country it is almost the only formula. Nor does there seem to be any reason to think it rare in any of those countries. M. Le Blant, however, only notices it under Gaul. The Greek rendering of this, ἐνθάδε κεῖται, or κατέκειται, is also very general, but perhaps not quite so common: it occurs in Rome, Sicily, Gaul; in Egypt, Dalmatia, and Greece; Algeria, and Cyrene; also in Asia Minor, but not everywhere. In truth M. Le Blant's is only a sketch partially worked out, but still very interesting.

D. Acclamations.—There is still one point relating to the phraseology of Christian inscriptions, on which it may be convenient to say a little more. Many of those on gems and glass, and a large number of the epitaphs contain what are termed acclamations, or short expressions addressed to, or in behalf of, the living, or to or in behalf of the dead. Both one and the other existed for the Pagans, and both one and the other were adopted with various modifications by the Christians.

(1.) To begin with those which concern the living. The sentiment on the inscription AMICUM VIVIMVS VIVAMVS (Gruter, p. 609, 3) on the glass in NOMINE HERCVLIS ACCERENTINO (Acherontini), FELICES VIVATIS (Garrucci, Vetri, t. xxxv. f. 1), and on the gem VIBAS (sic) LVXVRI HOMO BONE (King's Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. i. p. 311), was adopted by the Christians in the sense of living in God; and they engraved VIVE or VIVAS IN DEO, and cognate expressions expressive of hope both for time and for eternity on their own gems and glass vessels, and occasionally on a lamp or an amulet. Sometimes a saint is added, as VIVAS IN CHRISTO ET LAVRENTIO, or a saint only is expressed, as VIVAS IN NOMINE LAVRENTII. Sometimes again a married couple, or a man and his family, are the subjects of this kind of good wish. Sometimes, however, the name of God or Christ was omitted, but a Christian symbol, as a palm or a chrisma, was introduced in order to insure the Christian significance. The Christians did not indeed refuse the sense of enjoying this life, when they wrote PIE (sic) ZESES, or ZESES only on their glass drinking-cups, which were employed in sacred festivities, but the sacred representations which accompanied the legend would be a witness against any intemperate use. A smaller number of acclamations inscribed on glass, prays that the persons addressed may live in the peace of God. Thus one in favor of a married couple: VIVATIS IN PACE DEI (Garrucci, Vetri, t. i. f. 3); on another we have BIBAS (vivas) IN PACE DEI (Id. t. vi. f. 7), or VIVAS IM PACE DEI (Id. t. vii. f. 2).

For the matters here touched on see GEMS, GLASS, LAMPS, SEALS. That this kind of acclamation exhorting to live was usually addressed to the living, is clear upon the face of it: but there are a few cases where it is less certain, whether the persons addressed were alive or dead. Thus it has been made a question whether HILARIS VIVAS CVM TVIS FELICITER SEMPER REFRIGERES IN PACE DEI is an acclamation to a living or dead person: Martigny (Dict. p. 8) relying principally on the word expressing a desire for his refreshment, looks on him as dead. Garrucci, probably with greater reason, interprets: sui sempre lieto et ti refrigera nella pace di Dio, cioè con la grazia di lui, shewing that refrigerium is not rarely used of living persons u. s. p. 126).

On Christian epitaphs the living are sometimes addressed by the living, sometimes by the dead. Of the former are requests to the reader to pray for the soul of the person buried. These are very rare for the earlier periods. Dr. McCaul says, "I recollect but two examples in Christian epitaphs of the first six centuries of the address to the reader for his prayers, so common in mediæval times." In the early mediæval examples will be seen under TOMB. At other times the readers are saluted by the author of the inscription, SALVETE FRATRES (Rénier n.

4025; see above), or asked to pray for him (Le Blant, n. 619).

The dead person sometimes prays the living not to meddle with his bones, as PRECOR EGO HILPERICVS NON AVFERANTVR HINC OZZA MEA (Le Blant, n. 207. See similar examples in his notes on this inscription and TOMB).

Sometimes the survivors are exhorted not to weep: and the notitie dolere parentes, hoc faciendum fuit (Mus. Disn. i. 117, pl. liii.) becomes on a Christian epitaph—

"Parcite vos lacrimis, dulcis cum conuge natae, Viventemque Deo credite fieri nefas."

De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 843 (A.D. 472).

More strange are the epitaphs counted to be Christian, μή λυπού, τέκνον, οὐδέις ἀθάνατος (Böckh, n. 9589), and θάσι, Ταρία μήτηρ, οὐδέις ἀθάνατος (Id. 9624), both from the Roman catacombs. A Jewish epitaph in a Roman cemetery runs similarly (Id. n. 9917).

(2.) Of acclamations addressed to the dead we have the following.*

VIVAS or VIVATIS IN DEO; this and the allied forms VIVE or VIVAS IN CHRISTO, DOMINO, INTER SANCTIS (sic, De Rossi, u. s. n. 10, A.D. 268), IN NOMINE CHRISTI (Marini, p. 455); also IN NOMINE PETRI (Boldetti, p. 388), the same, or nearly so, as those which have just been noticed as addressed to the living, recur abundantly on the sepulchral monuments of Rome and other places (De Rossi, I. U. R. Prol. p. cx; Le Blant, n. 576; Mart. Dict. p. 7, and TOMB).

Epitaph of Aeternalis and Servilia, Sivaux, France. Taken by De Rossi, judging from the style and palaeography, to be earlier than Constantine (Bull. Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 47, whose fig. is copied); if so it probably gives the oldest known example of the Chrisma. Fifth century, according to Le Blant (n. 576).

Similarly in Greek ζήσεις ἐν θεῷ (Böckh, n. 9800), ζήσεις ἐν κυρίῳ (Id. n. 9673). They proceed on the supposition that the Christian life is continuous, and that expressions in the form of good wishes, which primarily belong to this life, may when their fulfilment is ac-

* Of Pagan acclamations addressed in behalf of the dead we have, among others, the following: Sit tibi terra levis, Ossa tua bene quiescant, Ave, Vale, Di tibi beneficiant, Χαίρε, δώη σοι Ὅσπερς τὸ ψυχρὸν ἕδωρ (McCaul, u. s. p. xviii.).

longer doubtful, be transferred to the life to come.^p

Other forms express to the dead good wishes for their rest or peace. Thus on a gem, found in a grave B (bene) QVESQVAS, (quiescas) (see GEMS), and on tombs QUESCE IN PACE (Marini, p. 366), CESQVAS BENE IN PACE (Id. p. 385). Nor can we well take such phrases as PAX TECUM (Le Blant, n. 490, &c.), εἰρήνη σοι (Böckh, n. 9486), ἰρήνη (εἰρήνη) σοι ἐν οὐρανῷ (Id. n. 9844), and εἰρήνη πᾶσι, with or without ἐν θεῷ (Id. nos. 9487-8), as other than good wishes addressed to the departed, not affirmations of a fait accompli, but a confident prayer, or rather a sure hope, that the state of peace may continue. In other inscriptions, however, it is evidently regarded as already accomplished, e. g., ἀνέπαυσεν Ἀπία ἐν εἰρήνῃ (Marini, p. 456). Compare ἐν εἰρήνῃ πρόδωκε (Böckh, n. 9645 and 9632); OB-DORMIVIT IN PACE IESV, QVEM DILEXIT, OBIIT IN PACE DEI (Hübner, u. s. p. x.). The full expression εἰρήνη σοι ἦτω, PAX VOBISCVM SIT, also occurs (Böckh, n. 9710; Le Blant, n. 526). More interesting are the acclamations which relate to refrigerium, which God himself is often elsewhere invoked to bestow on the departed. De Rossi notes the occurrence of spiritum tuum Deus refrigeret,^q and the like, as occurring in early Christian epitaphs (Prol. p. cx.). But here the deceased is addressed, in the hope that he is in receipt of that refreshment, or as being sure to receive it. Thus we have the neuter verb refrigerare, to enjoy a cool repose, in this connection, IN BONO REFRIGERES (Marini, p. 420), i. e., may you enjoy refreshment in a good place, by which is intended Paradise, or the bosom of Abraham; REFRIGERA CVM SPIRITV SANCTO, i. e., in thine own holy soul^r (Marangoni, Cose Gent. p. 460. See Tertull. adv. Marc. lib. iv. c. 34). More rarely ACCEPTA SIS IN CRISTO (Marini, p. 454) is the form which the acclamation assumes, with which Χριστὸς μετὰ σου (Böckh, n. 9697) may be compared, as well as AETERNA TIBI LUX IN CHRISTO (Marini, u. s. p. 450), the last word being expressed by the chrisma. Some addresses to the dead, however, are congratulatory, as BENE VIXISTI (sic), VENE CONSUMASTI (Marini p. 434), ANIMA TVA CVM IVSTIS (Id. p. 381), IN REFRIGERIO ANIMA TVA (Fabretti, p. 547), where est rather than sit seems to be understood.

The Greek acclamation θάππαι (i. e. θάππει) is sometimes placed at the end of an epitaph (Böckh, n. 9821); and sometimes at the beginning (Id. n. 9789), addressed in each case to the departed. Another imperative γρηγόρει (wake up!) in singular contrast to the quiescas above, is occasionally found at the end of Christian inscriptions (Id. 9599, 9570); it may probably contemplate the return of the Saviour. Εὐμοίρι also occurs (Id. 9800).

The Latin classical form Ave, much used by the Pagans, is found also in a Christian epitaph, and written A B E (Böckh, n. 9653). We have also HAVE VALE on the same monument (Le Blant, n. 495).

In the last place are to be noted prayers or requests to the departed to pray to God for the survivors.^s De Rossi notes that in the earlier undated inscriptions of the catacombs (i. e., those before the peace of Constantine), we have pete pro nobis, pro parentibus, pro conjuge, pro filiis, pro sorore (Prol. p. cx.). To these Dr. McCaul adds roga, ora pro nobis, but adds at the same time that there are "comparatively few among the thousands" of these undated inscriptions, which contain these prayers, and "that instances of the mention in such forms of others than the members of the family of the deceased are extremely rare." He has observed only one dated example, of the year 380 A.D. (De Rossi, n. 288) which contains any such request; it has the expression PRO HVNC VNVM ORA SVBOLEM (u. s. p. xviii.). With respect to such acclamations of affection as vulcis anima, anima pura et munda, anima innox, puer innocens, ψυχὴ καλὴ, and the like, they are applied in Christian inscriptions of various kinds both to the living and the dead, and need hardly be dwelt upon in this place (see Garrucci, u. s. Index, s. v. dulcis anima; Martigny, Dict. p. 7; Perret, Catac. de Rome, t. v. pl. 17; Böckh, n. 9697).

E. Style and Structure.—Such inscriptions as relate to public works, churches, basilicas, fountains, or to sacred objects and furniture, altars, chalices, crosses, liturgical book-covers, &c., or to votive offerings and the like, need hardly be taken into the present account. They exist in prose and verse, both in Greek and in Latin, and are of very various styles and lengths. A large number of such are collected by Marini, and edited by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. tom. v. pp. 1-286); to this work more especially the reader is referred. Many of them, however, are later than the period embraced in his work. Very few inscriptions, if any, which belong to this class, go back before the time of Constantine, so far as the writer is aware, and can hardly be called numerous till after the close of the 4th century. With regard, however, to the sepulchral inscriptions the case is somewhat different. They can, to some extent at least, be classified by their style. But the first thing to be borne in mind is that inscriptions of one country are no rule for those of another. Those of Britain and of Ireland, for example, are both unlike each other, and unlike those of Gaul, Spain, and Italy, of nearly the same period. The Greek inscriptions, again, admit for the most part of but little comparison with the Latin ones; the Greek and ^p The indicative is likewise found, as in Deo decessit e vitā (Hüllner, u. s. p. xi.); and both expressions mean in reality the same thing. The reader, however, may see Martigny, Dict. s. v. "Purgatoire" for a different view of the optative formulae.

^q The verb is then used transitively. In the Latin version of St. Irenaeus, refrigerare is the rendering of ἀναπαύσασθαι, and Ducauge accordingly (Gloss. s. v.) explains the Latin word by requiescere, which is substantially correct. Refrigerium as used by Tertullian and in the acclamations does not mean "a release from pain, but an enjoyment of positive though imperfect happiness on the part of the just from the very moment of their dissolution in that separate abode which Tertullian supposes our Lord to distinguish by the appellation of Abraham's bosom."—Faber, Diff. of Roman sm. book i. c. v.

^r See De Rossi (u. s.). The words occur in this sense in the epitaph of St. Severa at Rome. See Tomb.

^s The invocation of the Virgin and of saints (see above § iv.) are scarcely to be accounted acclamations, and are better considered separately.

Latin inscriptions to Dometius, written on the same slab, are a good illustration of this (Le Blant, Insc. Chrét. Gaul. n. 613A).

With few exceptions the earlier inscriptions are characterised by their brevity and simplicity, while from the 4th century onwards they assume in some countries, as in Italy, Gaul, and Spain, a more complex and ornate character. In the earlier epitaphs, moreover, sometimes occur traits more or less similar to the pagan epitaphs, e.g. mention of those who made the tomb, which by degrees disappear. They also contain a much greater number of acclamations, most of which soon vanish completely. In the 4th century Christian Latin epigraphy began to make a style of its own, and for the first time we now get at Rome such opening words as hic requiescit in pace, or in somno pacis, hic quiescit, hic jacet, hic positus est, &c.; and new rhetorical phrases, as mirae innocentiae, supientiae, sanctitatis, &c., begin to make their appearance. It is not until about this time that any mention of the secular profession of the deceased occurs in the Latin inscriptions; and it is not very commonly mentioned at any time. The chrisma and the cross, signs of a triumphant faith, now come in abundantly. The inscriptions of Gaul followed the style of Rome a good deal, and the same or similar formulae appear upon them at a somewhat later time. It is in these Roman and Gaulish inscriptions that changes of style can best be studied, because they are so numerous, because so many of them bear dates, and, in fine, because they have been so admirably edited. M. De Rossi makes some remarks on the changes of style in the Roman inscriptions (Insc. Urb. Rom., Prolegom., pp. cx.-cxvi.), and will in another volume discuss totam stili epigraphici Christiani doctrinam. M. Le Blant, in the first fifty-eight pages of his Manuel, treats of the successive variations in the Gaulish inscriptions (few of which, however, are before the age of Constantine), and also establishes the fact that blank formulae were in circulation for the use of stonecutters, where of course the number of years of the deceased or of the reigning king could only be expressed by the word tot or tantus, and that the stonecutter has sometimes neglected to replace the tantus by the particular number required. (See Le Blant, u. s. pp. 59-74.) Similarly in Spain traces of blank formulae can be recognised (Hübner, u. s. p. viii.).

By means of a careful study of the phrases of the dated inscriptions a close approximation may sometimes be made to the date of an undated one; great caution, however, is necessary, as certain expressions held their place for a long period. (See Le Blant, u. s. pp. 31-33).

(vi.). Dates of Christian Inscriptions.

(a) Christian inscriptions, when dated, most usually bear the names of consuls, and all the earliest are thus dated. Sometimes one, more usually both consuls, are given, the names being commonly contracted. The abbreviation COS for consulibus was in use up to the middle of the 3rd century, after which COSS, CONS, and CONSS, came to be successively adopted: COS is very seldom found during the 4th century, and almost never in the 5th or 6th: COSS fell into disuse about the first quarter of the 5th century, and after that CONS was used.¹

The numerals, to designate a second or third consulate, are frequently prefixed to COS and the other abbreviated forms; but where there is no ambiguity they are sometimes omitted. A very strange abbreviation was occasionally used, though in Christian inscriptions it is exceedingly rare: the names of the consuls were omitted and the numbers only retained. In an epitaph from a Christian crypt at Motya, in Sicily, to "Euterpe, the companion of the Muses," her death is fixed to Nov. 27, ὡς ἡμεῖς τῶν κυ[ρίων] τὸ ἰ καὶ τὸ γ' ἐν τῇ consulship of our Lords for the tenth time and for the third time, i. e. 360 A.D., when Constantius was in his tenth consulate, and Julian in his third. (Böckh, n. 9524.)

Another form of dating was by a post-consulate, i. e. the words POST CONSVLATVM, or the abbreviations POST CONS, POST CONSS (or from the middle of the 5th century), P C, and even POST (or POS) only was placed before the consuls' names of the year preceding, "when it was not known who were the consuls of the year, or when the name of but one was known, or when it was necessary or expedient not to mention them" (McCaul, u. s. p. xxvi.). This formula, which is said to have arisen in the troublesome times of Maxentius, 307 A.D., rarely appears in Christian inscriptions till 542 A.D., when the post-consulate of Basil the younger was taken as a point of departure for almost the whole empire, and the years post consulatum Basilii extend up to xxix. The consulate of Justin in 566 A.D. gave birth to another era of post-consulates, which lasted nine years.

There are various other matters connected with consular dates which are intentionally passed over here. For the whole subject see De Rossi (Insc. Urb. Rom. pp. xiii.-liv.); and for an epitome of the more important parts, McCaul (u. s. p. xxiii.-xxvii.).²

(b) Other inscriptions are dated by an era, whether of a province or of a city. Examples of the former are seen in Spain and Mauretania; of the latter in various parts of Asia, where the eras of Antioch and Bostra (among others) obtained currency. Examples of these will be found above, and below under TOMB. In all these parts of the empire Christian inscriptions were very rarely dated by the consuls, and those are mostly of the 6th century (De Rossi, u. s. p. xiii.). For other eras employed in Christian inscriptions, see De Rossi (u. s. pp. v. vi.).

(c) Dates by Indictions³ (or cycles of fifteen years) are not found in Christian inscriptions of Rome before the beginning of the 6th century. The earliest seems to be 522 A.D. (De Rossi, J. U. R. n. 984). In Gaul, however, we find an inscription dated Ind. XV. Olibrio juniore cuns (consule), i. e. 491. A.D. (Le Blant, n. 388). The indictions themselves (which commence 312 A.D.), unless accompanied by other notes of time (as they often are), do not suffice to determine even approximately the year A.D. For the first year of each cycle is counted as the first indiction, and thus the tenth indiction merely signifies the tenth year in some undetermined indiction. See De Rossi (u. s. De Cyclo Indictionum, pp. xlvii.—ci.)

(d) For the mode of dating by solar and lunar cycles, i. e. by the day of the month, the day of the week, and the day of the moon, as compared with each other and with the year, the reader who desires to enter into so difficult a subject must consult De Rossi (u. s. pp. lxx.—xcvii.). See also MONTH; WEEK.

There are now to be noticed a few eras or modes of dating which are peculiar to the Christians.

(e) The era of the martyrs is only used in Egypt and the adjoining regions. A barbarous Greek inscription (n. 9121 Böckh) dates March 30, ἀπὸ μαρτύρων σθ, i. e. 209 of the Dioclesian era, which commenced August 29, 284 A.D., and so corresponding to 494 A.D. This era, invented and first used by the pagans, was adopted afterwards by the Christians, who more usually changed its name (Martigny, Dict. p. 532, and the references, also Böckh, n. 9134).

(f) Episcopal dates. A Roman epitaph (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 139) is dated DEPOSITA IN PACE SUB LIBE[RIO EP.], and another (n. 190) has RECESSIT III NON. IN PACE SVB DAMASO EPISCO. These are the only examples of the kind known, and do not prove that epitaphs were then dated purely and simply by the papal era, but rather that those who put them up wished to express their adhesion to the orthodox pontiffs and not to their opponents Felix and Ursicinus.*

But from the end of the 4th century it became common at Rome to date sacred buildings by inscriptions in which the pope's name occurred; thus we have in such connections SALVO SIRICIO EPISCOPO (like the SALVIS DD. NN. AUGUSTIS) and TEMPORIBVS SANCTI INNOCENTII EPISCOPI, and the still remaining inscription in the basilica of St. Sabina:

CVLMEV APSTOLICVM CVM CAELESTINVS
HABERET
PRIMVS ET IN TOTO FVLGERET EPISCOPVS
ORBE.

(De Rossi, u. s. pp. viii., ix). In the 5th and following century the custom of dating sacred buildings by bishops and other ecclesiastics spread abroad, and at length became very general throughout Europe; but public monuments of the provinces of the 4th, 5th, and even 6th and later centuries are dated by the eras of Mauretania or of Bostra or Antioch, or by consuls, or by the reigns of emperors (De Rossi, u. s. p. ix. and the references). Sometimes, but very rarely, the exact year of office of the bishop or abbot is given (De Rossi, u. s. and above, § iv. n. 11).

There are two other eras much employed in inscriptions soon after the period with which we are concerned, and which indeed at length almost superseded the others in common use—the Dionysian epoch of the Incarnation,* and the mundane era, which reckons the Creation at 5508 B.C. [ERA.]

(g) Bede brought the former into vogue in the beginning of the 8th century, and there are also some early inscriptions dated thereby. De Rossi affirms that he knows of no inscription of the first six centuries so dated. There is one of the year 617 A.D., which records the construction and consecration of a baptistery, at Brixia, by Domina nostra Flavia Theodolinda, which is thus dated at the end: vivente domino nostro Adalvaldo sacrae salutis saeculo CCC CCC XVII (Marini, u. s. p. 170); besides this there is one at Interamna (Merni), dated AN. S. DCC. XXVII. (Marini, u. s. p. 157); others just below our period are a little differently expressed: one is dated AN. INCARNAT. DNI DCCCLVII IND V REGE LOVDOWICO IMP. AVG. (Marini, u. s. p. 85), and another is placed ANNO DOMINI DCCC LXIII (Marini, u. s. pp. 164, 5). All these are in connection with the dedication or building of sacred edifices.

(h) An early example* of the mundane era is furnished by an inscription on a tower at Nicaea in Bithynia, ἔτους ςτ'is, in the year 6316, corresponding to 808 A.D. (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8669). But as it is called "the tower of Michael, the great king in Christ, emperor," some error in the date (as edited) has slipped in. For Michael I. reigned from 811–813 A.D., and Michael II. from 820–829 A.D. Possibly the ς is a misreading for θ: if so, the date is 811 A.D. Another mutilated inscription, relative to the foundation of an arsenal (τοῦτον μεγαλότατον (sic) ἀρσηνάριον) by "Theophilus the king, son of Michael the king," is doubly dated, ἀπὸ κτισσεως (sic) κόσμου ςτμβ, ἀπὸ δὲ Χριστοῦ ἔτους ωλδ', in the year 6342 of the mundane era, corresponding to the year 834 of the Christian era (Id. n. 8680).

(i) There are, in fine, inscriptions dated by the reigns or by the years of the reigns of the sovereigns of the kingdoms which sprung out of the ruins of the western empire. Examples occur in England, France, Spain, and Italy. (See above § iv., Nos. 5, 11, and TOMB.)

In like manner, after the consulate came to an end in 541 A.D., the year of the Byzantine emperor's reign, was occasionally placed on inscriptions as a date. An early example of the year 592 A.D., in the 11th year of Justinian II. (in an inscription relating to a church), is given in Böckh's C. I. G. n. 8651. Another less precise is dated by the joint reign (842–857 A.D.) of Theodora, Michael, and Thecla (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8683).

More than one mode of dating often occurs on the same monument, as by consuls and an indiction conjointly; by an era and a king conjointly;

* This was devised in 525 A.D. by Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot. For his purpose, which was neither literary nor historical, but simply had reference to Easter, see the late Professor Grote in the Cambridge Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, vol. i. pp. 68 69, in a paper entitled 'On the dating of Ancient History,' where several subjects here touched upon are discussed.

* Probably there may exist somewhat earlier inscriptions dated by this era than those here referred to. "It began to prevail in the 7th century, and appears in the Paschal Chronicle" (C. I. G. n. p. 66).

or by a king and an ecclesiastic conjointly. In addition to the years the months are often noted; these are in general the Roman months.

But the day of the month, whether of the death or of the burial, is sometimes in the more ancient inscriptions alone set down. Thus in a Roman inscription we have simply Fortunatus depositus III Kal. Oct. in pace; and in another, Laurentiu (sic) idus Ienuras (sic) decessit, followed by the chrisma (Marini, u. s. pp. 380, 387).

In Egypt, however, the Egyptian months are set down, either alone (Böckh, n. 9110), or together with an indiction (id. n. 9111), or with the era of "the martyrs" (id. 9121), or with an indiction together with the same era, under its proper name, "the year of Diocletian" (id. 9134).

The days are added to the months when these occur: usually computed according to the Roman kalendar by kalends, ides, and nones; but the cyclic inscriptions have the days of the week (die Beneris, die Saturnis (sic), &c.; also die Sabbati, die dominica), the days of the moon, or the octave of Easter. (See De Rossi, u. s.; McCaul, u. s. pp. 53-58.) In Egypt the day of the month is reckoned numerically, as the 21st of Tybi, the 10th of Phaophi, &c.

We have also examples, though they are not numerous, of epitaphs dated by saints' days. One at Briord, of about the 6th or 7th century, records of "Ricelfus et jugalis sua Guntello" that "obierunt in die Sci Martini, who probably himself died Nov. 8, A.D. 397 (Butler's Lives of Saints, under Nov. 11). M. Le Blant, who gives this inscription (n. 380), quotes other and earlier examples from the catacombs; such as Natale Susti, Natale Domnes Sitivitis, postea die martirorum, ante natale Domini Asteri, d. nat. Sci Marci.

In addition to the day the hour is sometimes added, and occasionally even the fraction (scrupulus) of the hour. See TOMB.

(vii.) Abbreviations used in Christian Inscriptions.—This catalogue might no doubt be enlarged considerably: it has been taken from Martigny (Dict. pp. 322-324, omitting, however, the numerals, L for quinquaginta, X for decem, and the like); and the writer has made various additions to it, mostly by help of Hubner's Index to his Spanish Inscriptions, p. 115.

^b Cardinal Wiseman says of the deceased Christians in early times that "annual commemoration had to be made on the very day of their departure, and accurate knowledge of this was necessary. Therefore, it alone was recorded" (Fabiola, p. 147). Even if this be the true reason (which is very much to be doubted), it remains to be explained why the day of burial alone is sometimes recorded. The truth seems to be, that some little incident which would be sufficient to remind the friends of the deceased, was sometimes regarded as date enough.

INSINUATIO. The making certain customary payments to the bishop on appointment to a church. See Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 1, c. 56). Justinian (Novell. 56, col. 5, tit. 11, § 1) provides that if any of the clergy make the payments which are called insinuatives, "quae vocantur insinuativa," except in the great church of Constantinople, the bishops who exact them shall be deprived of their office.

[P. O.]

INSTALLATION. [BISHOP, p. 224.]

INSTRUCTION. 1. For the Christian instruction of children in general, see CATECHUMEN, CHILDREN.

2. In a more special sense, the lections from the Old Testament read to the candidates for baptism immediately after the benediction of the taper, and before the benediction of the font, on Easter Eve, were called "Instructiones baptizandorum." See the Gelasian Sacramentary (i. c. 43), and the Gregorian (p. 70). Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 19) gives mystical reasons why the lections should be four in number, which however is by no means invariably the case. They are four in the Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, p. 25), but the Gelasian Sacramentary gives ten and the Gregorian eight. Instruction of this kind seems to be alluded to in Palladius's description of the scene which took place when soldiers burst into John Chrysostom's church at Constantinople on Easter Eve; "some of the presbyters," he says (Vita Chrysost. c. 9) "were reading Holy Scriptures, others baptizing the catechumens." So Paschasius Lilybetanus, in a letter to Leo the Great (quoted by Martene), speaks of a case in which, after the accustomed lections of Easter Eve had been gone through, the candidates were not baptized, for lack of water (Martene, De Rit. Ant. i. i. 13, § 3). As in the responses of the candidates at Rome both Latin and Greek were used, so also the lections in baptism were in ancient times recited in Latin and Greek. Thus Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, p. 25), after noticing that the reader does not announce the lection in the usual way, "Lectio libri Genesis," but begins at once "In principio," goes on to say, "First it is read in Greek, and then immediately by another in Latin." The next lection is read first in Greek and then in Latin; and so on. Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. ii. 1) says of this custom, that lections were recited by the ancient Romans in Greek and in Latin, partly because Greeks were present who did not understand Latin, and Latins who did not understand Greek; partly to show the unanimity of the two peoples. Anastasius tells us (p. 251, ed. Muratori) that pope Benedict III. (855–858) caused a volume to be prepared in which the lessons for Easter Eve and Pentecost were written out in Greek and in Latin, which volume, in a silver binding of beautiful workmanship, he offered to a Roman church. [C.]

INSTRUMENTA. By the word instrumenta we understand vessels, &c. employed in the sacred ministry; thus, pope Siricius, A.D. 385 (Epist. I. ad Himerum, c. 14), forbidding persons who had incurred public penance to be ordained, says, "nulla debent gerendorum sacramentorum instrumenta suscipere qui dudum fuerunt vasa vitiorum."

By the words "instrumentorum traditio" is technically designated the handing to a person on ordination some vessel or instrument used in his office. Thus, the African statutes at the end of the 4th century (Conc. Carth. IV. c. 5) order the bishop to hand to a subdeacon on ordination an empty chalice and an empty paten, and the archdeacon to hand to him a water vessel with a napkin, because he receives no imposition of hands. Similarly the acolyte (c. 6) is to receive from the archdeacon a candlestick with taper; the exorcist (c. 7) is to receive from the hand of the bishop the book of exorcisms; the reader (c. 8) the codex from which he is to read; the doorkeeper (c. 9) the keys of the church.

In these cases it is to be observed that the "instrumentorum traditio" takes place only in the case of those ordained to minor orders (sacramentali ministri) who received no imposition of hands.

The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, provides (c. 28) that a bishop who is restored to his orders shall receive from the bishops, before the altar, stole, ring, and staff; a priest, stole and chasuble; a deacon, stole and alb; a sub-deacon, paten and chalice; and that those in other orders shall receive back on restoration those instruments which they had first received on ordination. We see from this that the appropriate vestments were regarded in the 7th century as the outward sign of the bestowal of the higher orders. The delivery of the pastoral staff and ring also forms part of the ceremony of the ordination of a bishop in the Pontificals of Gregory the Great and of Egbert [BISHOP, p. 222].

In later times, the handing of the chalice with wine and the paten with a host to a priest on ordination came to be regarded as the "matter" of the sacrament, while the "form" was the words "Accipe potestatem offerre sacrificium Deo missas celebrare tam pro vivis quam pro defunctis in nomine Domini." But this opinion not only has no support in Scripture, but it seems to have been totally unknown in the church for at least nine hundred years; Isidore, Amalarius, Rabanus, and Walafrid Strabo, know nothing of it. (Martene, De Rit. Ant. I. viii. 9, § 16.) [C.]

INSULANI. A designation of monks in Southern France in the 5th century, on account of the great reputation of the monasteries and of their schools on the islands near the coast, especially on the island Lerina (Lerins) (Bingh. Orig. Eccl. VII. ii. 14). [I. G. S.]

INTERCESSION (Intercessio, ἐντεύξις). It does not fall within the scope of the present work to discuss or to investigate historically the doctrine of the intercession of the saints, or of the nature and efficacy of intercessory prayer generally; the subject is considered here simply in its relation to liturgical forms. And here we have to consider (1) the persons whose intercession is asked; (2) the objects on behalf of which intercession is made.

(1.) a. Throughout the Western church a large portion of the prayers end with a pleading of the merits of Christ, the great Intercessor; generally in the form "per Christum Dominum nostrum." This is in fact an extension to all prayer of the principle laid down for the altar-prayers, "cum altari adassistitur semper ad Patrem dirigatur oratio" (Conc. Carth. III. c. 23); when the prayer is addressed to the Father, it is through the intercession of the Son. This principle is not adopted in the East, where the prayers, being addressed to the Triune Deity, generally end with an ascription of glory; if with a pleading of merits, it is of the Virgin Mary or the saints (Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, i. 373).

b. We may take the words of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. V. 9, p. 328) as an authentic account of the manner in which the intercession of the saints departed was invoked in the church of Jerusalem in the middle of the 4th century. "Then we also commemorate those who have gone to rest before us (τῶν προκεκοιμημένων), first patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs; that God at their prayers and intercessions (πρεσβείαις) would receive our supplication." It appears then that in Cyril's time the church asked the intercession of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs; for the rest of the faithful departed, including "holy fathers and bishops," it interceded [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269; DIPTYCHS, p. 560]. But it is "beyond all question that the early church offered the eucharistic sacrifice as well for the highest saints, and even for the blessed Virgin Mary, as for the common multitude of the departed faithful" (Neale, Eastern Ch. Int. 510). The intercession of saints, for whom at the same time intercession is made, is asked in the so-called liturgy of St. Chrysostom, where we have the following form (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 360):—"We offer to Thee also this reasonable service on behalf of (ὡς ἑπὶ) those who are at rest in the faith, our forefathers, fathers, patriarchs . . . and every just spirit made perfect in the faith; especially our most holy . . . Lady Mary, Mother of God and ever Virgin . . . for the holy Prophet, Forerunner, and Baptist, John; for the glorious and highly-praised Apostles; for Saint N. whose commemoration we are celebrating, and all Thy saints; at whose supplications (ἱκεταῖς) look upon us, O God. And remember all who have gone to rest before us in hope of the resurrection to eternal life." Then follow the diptychs. The Syriac St. James (Renaudot, Litt. Orient. ii. 36), after commemorating holy Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, St. John Baptist, St. Stephen, the Virgin, and all Saints, proceeds, "Therefore do we commemorate them, that when they stand before Thy throne, they may remember us in our weakness and frailty, and offer with us to Thee this awful and unbloody sacrifice, for the safe-keeping of those who are living, for the consolation of the feeble and unworthy, such as ourselves; for the rest and good memory of those who have passed away in the true faith, our fathers, brethren, and masters." Here the saints departed are represented as joining in one great act of intercession with those on earth, rather than as interceding for them. These may serve as examples of the manner of asking the intercession of the saints in the Eastern church.

Of the Western liturgies, Mabillon's Gallican (Daniel's Codex Lit. i. 75) has, after the oblation of the unconsecrated elements, "We pray for the souls of Thy servants, our fathers and former teachers, Aurelian, Peter, Florentinus . . . and all our brothers whom Thou hast vouchsafed to call hence to Thee; . . . for the souls of all faithful servants and pilgrims deceased in the peace of the church; that Thou, O Lord our God, wouldest grant them pardon, and rest eternal: by the merits and intercession of Thy Saints, Mary mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, Stephen, Peter, Paul, John, James, Andrew, Philip, Thomas, Bartholomew, Matthew, James, Simon, Jude, Matthias, Genesius, Symphorianus, Bandilius, Victor, Hilary, bishop and confessor, Martin, bishop and confessor, Caesarius, bishop, vouchsafe in mercy to hear and grant these petitions, who livest and reignest in the unity of the Holy Spirit, God for ever and ever." The Roman has the following in the Communicantes of the CANON, "Claiming fellowship with and venerating the memory of, first, the glorious ever-virgin Mary, mother of our God and Lord Jesus Christ; and also of Thy blessed apostles and martyrs, Peter and Paul, Andrew, James, John, Thomas, James, Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Simon, and Thad-daus: Linus, Cletus, Clemens, Xystus, Cornelius, Cyprian, Laurence, Chrysogonus, John and Paul, Cosmas and Damian: and all Thy saints: in consideration of whose merits and prayers, grant that in all things we may be guarded by the help of Thy protection." The Ambrosian (Daniel i. 84) has, besides these, the names of Apollinaris, Vitalis, Nazarius and Celsus, Protasius and Gervasius. [Compare IMAGES, § viii.; INSCRIPTIONS, p. 856.]

The rule of the church in St. Augustine's time drew a broad distinction between martyrs and other saints; for that father observes (In Joann. Tract. 84), "So at the Table of the Lord we do not commemorate martyrs in the same way that we do others who rest in peace, so as to pray for them, but rather that they may pray for us, that we may follow in their footsteps;" and again (De Vir. Apost. 17), "martyrs are recited at the altar of God in that place where prayer is not made for them; for the rest of the dead who are commemorated prayer is made." It is in accordance with this that the Roman canon, besides the Virgin and the twelve apostles, recites as intercessors twelve martyrs. Other churches however, out of respect to their local saints, did not (as we see in the Gallican and the Milanese) draw so rigid a line, and inserted the names of confessors as well as martyrs. The martyrs of the Roman canon seem to be all connected with the city or see of Rome. [See LIBELLI, MARTYRS.]

In the EMBOLISMUS of the Lord's Prayer, the Roman and Ambrosian liturgies pray for peace in our days at the intercession of (intercedente) the Virgin Mary with the apostles Peter and Paul and Andrew and all the saints (Daniel i. 96). In the benediction of incense, in the Roman use (Dan. i. 72), the priest prays that God will bless it, at the intercession (per intercessionem) of Michael the archangel, who stands at the right hand of the altar of incense.

(2.) With regard to the objects of intercession, we may say that Christians have been taught to make intercession for all things of which they know that their brethren have need. Such intercessions are scattered over a great variety of offices or litanies [LITANY]. With regard specially to the intercessions made in the eucharist, we will take the form of the Greek St. James (Daniel, iv. 14) as a specimen of the objects recited in the great eucharistic intercession. When the priest, after consecration, has prayed that the Body and Blood of Christ may be to the partakers for remission of sins, for the strengthening of the Holy Catholic Church, etc., he proceeds—"We offer (προσφέρουμεν) to Thee, Lord, on behalf of (ὕπέρ) the Holy Places, especially Sion; the Holy Catholic Church; holy fathers, brethren, bishops; all cities and countries and the orthodox who dwell there; those who are journeying; those fathers and brethren who are in bonds, imprisonment, mines or tortures; the sick and demoniac; every Christian soul in trouble; those who labour in Christ's name; for all men, for peace, and for the dispersion of scandal and heresy; for rain and fruitful seasons; for those who have adorned the churches or shown pity to the poor; for those who desire to be remembered in our prayers; those who have offered; the celebrant and his deacons; all spirits and all flesh, from Abel even to this day, "give them rest in the land of the living, in Thy kingdom, in the bliss of Paradise, in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, our holy fathers, whence sorrow and grief and mourning have fled away;" for the forgiveness of sins, "by the grace and mercy and compassion of Thy only-begotten Son;" for (ὕπέρ) the Gifts, that God may receive them into His spiritual sanctuary.

Some of the more remarkable peculiarities of the Intercessions of different churches are noted under CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 273. [C.]

INTERCESSION, EPISCOPAL. By a custom which grew up less by any definite enactment than by the general respect attaching to their office, the bishops came to be looked upon as protectors of those who were oppressed by the secular power. The patrimony of widows and orphans was often placed under the protection of the churches and bishops (Aug. Ep. 252). Flavian, bishop of Antioch, interceded successfully in A.D. 387 with the Emperor Theodosius, on behalf of the city, which had been guilty of a riot. So Theodoret with the Empress Pulcheria. Many other instances might be cited. These interpositions obtained the technical name of intercessio, and were recognised by the law. The bishop was expected to visit the public prisons on Thursday and Friday (Codex Justinian. lib. i. tit. 4). They were charged with a special oversight of such as held civil office in their dioceses (Concil. Arelat. I. c. 56, Conc. Arel. ii. c. 13, "ut comites iudices, seu reliquis populus obediens sit episcopo, et invicem consentiant ad justitias faciendas, et munera pro iudicio non recipiant, nec falsos testes, ne per hoc pervertant iudicia iustorum," Conc. Gener. tom. ii. p. 618, ed. Crabbe). The right of sanctuary for fugitives in the churches grew up in the same period, and was very frequently exercised (Cod. Theodos. l. ix. tit. 45, ap. Neander). See Neale, Introd. to Eastern Church, and essay by Moultrie in Neale's Ecclesiology, pp. 427-474; Neander's Church History, vol. iii. sect. 2. [BISHOP, p. 237; IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY, p. 824.]

INTERCESSORES or INTERVENTORES. In the African churches when a see was vacant the senior bishop appointed one of his suffragans as guardian or procurator. He was styled Intercessor or Interventor. The fifth council of Carthage made a canon that no intercessor should remain in this office more than a year, and that if the vacancy was not then filled, another should be appointed. No intercessor was permitted to be chosen bishop of the vacant see himself. So also in the Roman province, as we learn from the letters of Symmachus (Ep. v. c. 9) and Gregory the Great (Ep. ii. 16); Suicer (Thesaurus, s. v. μετρήτης); Bingham (Ant. lib. ii. c. 15, and iv. c. 2). [BISHOP, p. 237.]

INTERMENT. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD.]

INTERPRETER. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. n. 21) speaks of interpreters of the languages employed both in reading the Scriptures and the sermons, and ranks them among the lower orders of the clergy, after the exorcists. An instance of their existence is afforded in the case of Procopius, who is said to have discharged three offices in the church of Palestine, having been reader, exorcist, and interpreter of the Syrian language. (Acta Procop. apud Vales.; note in Euseb. Martyr. I alest. c. 1.) [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE.] [P. O.]

INTERROGATIO (sc. de fide). This is a questioning a candidate for baptism as to his belief, before he was baptized, and formed part of the office of baptism from very early times. After the RENUNCIATION (Abrenunciatio) of the devil by the candidate for baptism, and his anointing, and before he was baptized he was questioned as to his faith, and called upon to make public profession of it. The custom is frequently alluded to by the fathers. It is sufficient here to refer: (1) For the custom: to St. Augustine (de Animâ et origine ejus, i. 10). "Ideo cum baptizantur (i. e. pueri) jam et symbolum reddunt, et ipsi pro se ad interrogata respondent." (2) For its object to St. Cyprian (Ep. 70 ad Januarius de baptizandis hæreticis). "Ipsa interrogatio quæ fit in baptismo testis est veritatis." (3). For its substance, to St. Ambrose (de Mysteriis, v. 28). "Descendisti igitur (i. e. in fontem) recordare quid responderis, quod credas in Patrem, credas in Filium, credas in Spiritum Sanctum;" and more fully de Sacramentis lib. ii. vii. "Interrogatus es: Credis in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem? Dixisti: Credo, et mersisti, hoc est, sepultus es. Iterum interrogatus es; Credis in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, et in crucem ejus? Dixisti: Credo, et mersisti; ideo et Christo es conspultus; qui enim Christo conspелitur, cum Christo resurgit. Tercio interrogatus es; Credis et in Spiritum Sanctum? Dixisti: Credo, tertio mersisti; ut multiplicem lapsum superioris ætatis absolvet t. r. a. confessio."

The rite is still retained in the office of Baptism in the Roman church, in the same position as of old; and in the Greek church in the preliminary office of "making a catechumen" (εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι κατηχούμενον).

The forms of the questions closely resemble the old forms [v. Rit. Rom. de Sacramento Baptismali, and Euchologion εὐχολ εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι κατηχούμενον]. For further details and patristic references see Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. 47. See also BAPTISM, §§ 43, 46, pp. 159, 160; CREED § 4, p. 489; PROFESSION.

INTERSTITIA. These are intervals of time which according to the regulations of the church ought to elapse between the reception of one order and the admission to a superior. Their object was to exercise a cleric in the functions of his order, and to test his fitness for promotion to a higher. The institution is an old one in the church. The tenth canon of the council of Sardica decrees "Habebit autem unusquisque ordinis gradus non minimi scilicet temporis longitudinem per quod et fides et morum probitas et constantia et moderatio possit cognosci." The duration of these interstices was not determined at the first, and it has varied much at different times and places. Zosimus e. g., A.D. 417 (Ep. 1 ad Hesychium) proposes the following rule. "If any one has been designed for ecclesiastical ministration from his infancy, he is to remain among the readers till his twentieth year. If he has devoted himself to the sacred ministry when grown and of ripe age, provided he has done so immediately after baptism, he is to be kept among the readers or exorcists five years.

CHRIST. ANT.

Then he is to spend four years as an acolyte or subdeacon. Then if deserving he is to be promoted to the diaconate, in which order he is to remain five years, and, if worthy, promoted to the priesthood." Another canon prescribes that a bishop must have been at least four years a priest. [It must be remembered that in the early church the age required for conferring holy orders was more advanced than is the case at present, twenty-five being the ordinary age for a deacon, and thirty for a priest.]

Gelasius (A.D. 492) shortened the prescribed intervals between the different sacred orders, and in cases of urgency they were occasionally altogether dispensed with. Of this the most conspicuous instance is that of St. Ambrose, who is said to have passed through all the sacred orders and to have been consecrated bishop on the eighth day after his baptism.

In process of time, as the proper functions assigned to the several minor orders fell into disuse, the interstices between them ceased to be observed, and the modern practice is to confer the four minor orders simultaneously. The council of Trent requires a year between the minor orders and the subdiaconate, between the subdiaconate and the diaconate, and between the diaconate and the priesthood. Legitimate exceptions are recognised, and dispensations under certain conditions allowed; but two (major) orders are not to be conferred on the same day: "Duo sacri ordines non eadem die, privilegiis ac indultis . . . non obstantibus quibuscunque" (Con. Trent. Sept. xxiii. col. 3; De Reform.) [ORDINATION.] [H. J. H.]

INTERVENTORES. [INTERCESSORES.]

INTROIT. Introitus is the name commonly given throughout the Latin church to the anthem at the beginning of the eucharistic office. At Rome it was originally called Antiphona ad Introitum, as in the earliest editions of the Ordo Romanus (i. n. 8, ii. n. 3, iii. n. 8, in Musæe Ital. tom. ii.). In Ordo Romanus VI. (n. 2, ib.), probably a little later than our period, it is first called introitus simply. Meanwhile in one Ordo (v. n. 5, ib.), we find the name of invitatory given to it. At Milan it was termed ingressa (Ambros. Miss. Rit. in Pamelii Lituale SS. P. P. tom. i. p. 293), a word of the same meaning as introitus. In Spain (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, pp. 18, 55, 64, &c.) and in England (the missals of Sarum, York, Hereford; Maskell's Ancient Liturgy, pp. 20, 21) the introit was called officium, or officium missæ. This arose from a mistake. The several masses in the early missals were headed by the words Ad Missam Officium (Leslie, u. s. pp. 1, 7, 10, &c.; Missale Sarum, coll. 1, 18, 27, &c., ed. Forbes), which were the heading of the whole office, but were supposed to refer to the introit which followed immediately without any heading of its own. The antiphon had this name in all the churches of Normandy, and in many others (Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe, p. ii. art. 1), and in the missals of the Carthusians, Carmelites, and Dominicans. This extended use would be a sufficient proof of its great antiquity, were we without the evidence of the Mozarabic ritual. In the barbarous Expositio Missæ, ascribed to Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, and certainly not much later than his time, the introit, as used in the old Gallican liturgy, is called praelegere, or antiphona ad praelegendo (sic), because it preceded the eucharistic lessons (Expos. printed in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. lit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. 1).

The origin of the introit is obscure. At the earliest period the office began with lessons from holy Scripture, of which psalms said or sung formed a part, but this psalmody is in the West to be traced in the GRADUAL and TRACT. In the Syrian rite a psalm is sung before as well as after the epistle, but this appears to have had the same origin (Ordo Communis; Renaud. Liturg. Orient. tom. ii. p. 7). The introit is clearly another rite, and of later introduction. It seems to have been introduced partly as a fitting accompaniment of the solemn entrance (introitus, ingressa) of the celebrant into that part of the church in which the altar stood, and partly as a means of employing and solemnizing the minds of the people before the service began. The name invitatory suggests that the people were still entering the church while it was being sung.

The Ordo Romanus in its earliest state, about 730, gives us some suggestive information respecting the introit as sung in the churches of Rome at that time. The bishop having vested is still in the secretarium, the choir waiting in the church for an order from him to begin "the antiphon for the entrance" (introitum). On a signal from him "ut psallant," a subdeacon enters the church, orders the candles to be lighted, and then stands with a censer before the door of the secretarium, while one of the leaders of the choir, who has also been in waiting, carries the order for the singing to commence. As soon as this is heard two deacons enter, and each taking a hand of the bishop lead him into the church, up to the altar. He is preceded by the subdeacon with incense, and seven acolytes bearing candles. On his way to the altar the Sancta or FERMENTUM is brought to him that he may select what is necessary for the celebration. After private prayer at the altar, and giving the peace to the ministers, he stops the singing by giving a signal for the Gloria Patri (Ord. Rom. I. nn. 7, 8; comp. ii. nn. 4, 5, iii. nn. 7, 8, v. n. 5, vi. n. 3).

The Liber Pontificalis is supposed to ascribe the introduction of the introit to Celestine, A.D. 423, when it tells us that he "ordered the 150 psalms of David to be sung antiphonally before the sacrifice" (Anastas. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 44). The tradition probably refers to the introit, although the next statement shows that the author connects it with the earlier Gradual. For he adds:—"This was not done before, only the epistles of the apostle Paul were recited and the holy gospel, and so masses were celebrated." It will be observed that the Ordo cited calls the introit an antiphon, though it uses the word psallere. Gregory the Great, A.D. 595, is said to have compiled the antiphons, selecting proper verses from the psalms, and retaining the Gloria, which was then said, as now, at the end of every psalm. Some ancient writers, as Amalarius (De Eccl. Officiis, lib. iii. c. 5), Walafrid Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 22), and Micrologus (De Eccl. Observ. c. 1), suppose that this selection was the work of Celestine; but Honorius of Autun, more in consonance with the words of the Liber Pontificalis, and with the circumstantial evidence of the case, says,—"Pope Celestine ordered psalms to be sung at the introit of the mass, from which pope Gregory afterwards arranged and compiled antiphons for the introit of the mass" (Gemma Animae, lib. i. c. 87). All the psalms in the antiphonary ascribed to Gregory are taken from the old Italic version, as it stood before the corrections of St. Jerome, but this is no proof of an earlier antiquity of the introits than we ascribe to them. For Gregory himself professed to use the Italic and the Vulgate versions of the Bible indifferently (Ep. ad Leandr. c. 5, in fine; Expos. in Lib. Job. praef.), and Jerome's corrected Italic psalter, long called the Gallican psalter, did not take the place of the original at Rome until the time of Pius V. (Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 3, § 4). The following example of the Gregorian introit is for the first Sunday in Advent:—"Antiph. Ad Te, Domine, levavi animam meam. Deus meus in Te confido: non erubescam neque irrideat me inimicus meus (Vulg. irrideant me inimici mei) etenim universi qui Te expectant (Vulg. sustinent Te) non confundentur (Ps. xxv. 1-3). Psal. Vias Tuas, Domine, demonstra mihi et semitas tuas edoce me" (ib. v. 4). Durandus (Rationale, lib. iv. c. 5, n. 5) tells us that "in some churches tropes are said for the psalms, according to the appointment of pope Gregory, to represent greater joy on account of the coming of Christ." The introit itself had long been thought designed to "bring back His advent to our mind" (Amalar. De Eccl. Off. lib. iii. c. 5); but Durandus is without doubt wrong in ascribing to Gregory the attempt to emphasize that meaning by the addition of tropes. We cannot, however, say at what period subsequent to his they first appeared. They were not like the Greek troparia, independent of the antiphons in connection with which they were sung, but were farsings or interpolations in the antiphons of the Gregorian introit. In the following example the farsing is in italics. The antiphon is that for the Epiphany:—"Eja, Sion gaude, et lactare aspectu Dei tui. Ecce adventit dominator Dominus; cui materies coeli et terrae famulantur; et regnum in manu ejus. Ipsi manet Deus (sic) gloria atque jubilatio; et potestas et imperium" (Pamelii, Rituale, tom. ii. p. 613; comp. p. 73).

Of the Gallican introit we only know that like the Roman it was sung before the office of the mass began. "While the clerks are singing psalms" (psallentibus), says Germanus (u. s.), "the priest comes forth out of the sacrum" (here=secretarium). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, appears to recognize the introit, when it orders that as in other churches "collects be said in order by the bishops and presbyters after the antiphons" (cap. 30). The following is the introit (taken from the original Italic version of Ps. xciii. 1) used in the Mozarabic liturgy on every Sunday between Whitsunday and Advent, and again on the Circumcision and the Sunday before and after the Epiphany:—"Dominus regnavit; decorem induit: Alleluia. Ÿ. Induit Dominus fortitudinem et praecinxit se. P. (Presbyter.) Alleluia. Ÿ. Gloria et honor Patri: et Filio: et Spiritui Sancto in saecula saeculorum: Amen. P. Alleluia." It will be seen that this belongs to the later period, when the celebrant was at the altar before the choir began, a rule which has prevailed in the church of Rome also for many ages. See Sala, Annot. 11, in Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1; and Le Brun, Explication, p. ii. art. 1. The Ambrosian ingressa is very simple. The following is for Christmas Day, from Is. ix. 6, Ital. vers. "Puer natus est nobis, et filius datus est nobis, cuius imperium super humerum ejus, et vocabitur nomen ejus magni consilii angelus" (Pamelius, u. s. tom. i. p. 293). "It is an anthem without psalm, or Gloria, or repetition" (Le Brun, Diss. iii. art. 2).

The following hymn is sung in the liturgy of St. James before the priest enters to the altar. It is preceded by the rubric, "Then the deacon begins to sing in the entrance," which at once suggests an analogy to the Western introit. "Only begotten Son and Word of God, who being immortal didst for our salvation take upon Thee to be incarnate of the holy Mary, mother of God and ever Virgin, and didst unchangeably become man, and wast crucified, O Christ (our) God, and didst by death trample on death, being one of the Holy Trinity, glorified together with the Father and the Holy Ghost, save us" (Liturgiae SS. PP. p. 6, Bas. 1560). The matter of this hymn proves it to be later than the outbreak of the Nestorian heresy; but its great antiquity is sufficiently attested by its appearing also in the liturgies of St. Mark (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. tom. i. p. 136), in copies, apparently the older, of St. Basil (Eucholog. Goar, p. 180, and the old Latin version, Liturgiae, sive Missae SS. PP. p. 32, Par. 1560), in many copies of St. Chrysostom (Goar, u. s. pp. 101, 105), and in the Armenian (Neale's Introd. to Hist. of East. Church, p. 380). In St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, however, we have a nearer approach to, and the probable origin of, the Western introit, viz., in three antiphons, composed for common days, of three or four verses (Rubric in St. Basil, Goar, p. 180, and the old Latin, p. 32) of the 92nd, 93rd, and 95th psalms (as numbered in E. V.). See Goar, pp. 101, 104, 105. While each antiphon is sung, a prayer is said secretly by the priest; and it may be interesting to mention that the "Prayer of St. Chrysostom," in our daily office, is in the Greek liturgy (Lit. PP. pp. 45, 81) the "Prayer of the Third Antiphon." The revisers of our offices were familiar with it in the translation of St. Chrysostom by Leo Thuscus, A.D. 1180 (printed by Hofmeister, in 1540), and in the Greek and Latin of the editions of Venice, 1528, and Paris, 1537, and introduced it at the end of the litany in 1544. When the Greek antiphons were first used is not known. Amalarius, writing about the year 833, says that he had heard the 95th psalm sung at Constantinople "in the church of St. Sophia at the beginning of mass" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 21). The use of the antiphon by the Nestorians and Jacobites seems to carry us up to the 5th century, in which they were separated from the church. On Sundays the Greek church commonly substituted "typica" (so-called because they were forms prescribed by the rubrics) for the first two antiphons, and the Beatitudes for the third (Goar, pp. 65-67; Liturg. PP. pp. 44, 80-82), with verses (ὑποδάψα) commemorating the saint of the day (Goar, u. s.). The liturgic typica are from the 103rd and 146th psalms (Demetrius Ducas, in Lebrun, Diss. VI. art. iv.; Leo Allatius, De Libris Eccl. Diss. I. p. 14). For the third antiphon may also be used on common days, the third and sixth canticle (when thus united called τρίκτετη) of the matin office (Goar, pp. 67, 124). The typica, we must add, are not sung on every Sunday. "It should be known," says the Typicon of Sabas, "that from New Sunday to the Feast of All Saints (i. e. from the octave of Easter to that of Whitsunday) the church sings antiphons and not typica. We sing the antiphons likewise in the Twelve Days (between Christmas and Epiphany), and on the memorials of saints which we keep as feasts" (In Leo Allat. u. s.).

The Syrian rite preserves a fragment of the 93rd psalm and nearly the whole of the 95th, at the beginning of the service. They are sung while the veils and the altar are being censed (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 3, 4). In the Nestorian liturgies, the priest and deacon, standing near the altar, say, in alternate verses, on common days, parts of psalms 15, 150, 117: and proper hymns on Sundays and the greater festivals (Badger's Nestorians, vol. ii. p. 215; Raulin, Liturgia Malabarica, p. 294; Renaud. tom. ii. p. 584). In the Armenian, beside the hymn before mentioned, there are hymns proper to the day, sung where the Greek has its antiphons (Le Brun, Diss. X. art. 12).

Cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1) suggests that "perhaps Celestine (in adopting the introit) transferred to the Western churches a custom which had long flourished in the Eastern." The great use made, as we have seen, of the 93rd psalm (Dominus regnavit) in the introits of Spain, creates a strong suspicion that Spain was a borrower from the Greeks, in whose liturgy that psalm was used on all common days and many Sundays in the year. Hence it is probable that the introit was, like some other rites, derived by Rome from the East through Spain.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS. [Cross, FINDING OF THE, p. 503.]

INVESTITURE. The Latin word Investitura (from vestire, to put into possession; see Ducange s. v.), is of later date than the 9th century; nor had the thing signified by it really commenced by then, in the sense which concerns us here: the putting ecclesiastics in possession of their temporalities by a formal act of the civil power. When Siegbert, quoted by Gratian (Dist. lxxiii. c. 22), in enumerating the privileges supposed by him to have been conferred on Charlemagne by Adrian I., says of that pope: "Insuper archiepiscopos et episcopos per singulas provincias ab eo investituram accipere definivit: et nisi a rege laudetur et investiat episcopus, a nemine consecratur," he is, apart from the doubtfulness of the fact (on which see De Marca, de Concord. viii. 12), making the pope depose, not merely to language, but to customs unknown in his day. Landulph, who was contemporary with Siegbert, is bolder still; making Adrian the inventor of both. "Qui primus," as he says of him, "annulos et virgas ad investiendum episcopatus Carolo donavit" (Hist. Mediol. ii. 11); but then he couples another incident with this tale, which explains its origin. The absence of notice in the Caroline capitularies of any such custom, and their apparent ignorance of the word itself, seems conclusive against the existence of either at that date: particularly as the word "vestitura" is of frequent occurrence in them, denoting either possession, or the payment for it. Of course there were symbolical forms also then in use for giving possession, but none peculiar, as yet, to the clergy; and the common name for the act of doing this was "traditio." Hence, probably, the new word arose from joining the two words, "in vestitura," in one; and then understanding it of the special formality by which the clergy were put in possession of their temporalities, on this becoming essential to possession in their case. That Charlemagne, as well as his predecessors, appointed bishops of his own choosing occasionally to sees in his dominions, is no more than had been done by the Greek emperors ages before, where investiture in its Western acceptance has never been known. Neither the Theodosian Code, nor the Code or Novels of Justinian exhibit traces of anything approaching to it, though by the latter limits are prescribed to the fees for enthronization (Novel. cxxiii. 3: see also Du Cange and Hofman, s. v.; Sirmond ap. Baluz. Capitul. ii. 802; and Thomassin. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discipl. II. ii. 38). [E. S. Ff.]

INVITATORIUM. In the Gregorian and Benedictine* offices the psalm "Venite exultemus Domino" xciv. [E. V. xcv.] is said daily at the beginning of Nocturns prefaced by an antiphon which is called the Invitatorium. It is of precisely the same character as other antiphons to psalms, and varies with the day, but is said differently from other antiphons, and repeated several times during the course of the psalm as well as at the beginning and end. Thus the ordinary Sunday invitatory is "Adoremus Dominum, qui fecit nos," which is said twice at the beginning of the psalm, and repeated in whole or in part five times during its course, and again after the Gloria.

On the Epiphany no invitatory was said; but the psalmody began, and still begins, with the psalms of the first nocturn with their antiphons [Hodie non cantamus Invitatorium, sed absolute incipimus. Rubric ex Antiphonario Vaticano Rom. Eccl.]^b and the psalm "Venite" was said with its own antiphon as the last psalm of the second nocturn. [Later it was said as the first psalm of the third nocturn, and its antiphon repeated during its course in the ordinary manner of an invitatory]. Amalarius (lib. iv. c. 33) and Durandus (lib. vi. c. 36) suggest that the reason for this omission may have been to mark the difference between the invitation to the faithful to praise God, and that which Herod gave to the scribes and doctors to find out where Christ should be born. More probably it was omitted [Martene de Rit. lib. iv. c. 14] simply because the psalm to which it belonged was said in another place, though why the psalm should be displaced from its ordinary position is not so clear.

The psalm "Venite" is also known as the "Invitatory Psalm."

In the Ambrosian psalter, "Venite" is not said at the beginning of the office, and there is no antiphon which corresponds to the Gregorian Invitatorium. [H. J. H.]

Auxilius and Iserninus. At least the 34 canons passed at the first run in their joint names. The discipline prescribed in them, indicates very primitive manners. By the 6th any clerk, from the doorkeeper to the priest seen abroad without his shirt, and with his nakedness uncovered, if his hair be not tonsured in the Roman style, and his wife walk out with her head unveiled, is to be lightly regarded by the laity, and excluded from the church. Thirty-one canons of a similar description are given to the other council. But these 65 by no means exhaust the number ascribed to St. Patrick. Seventeen more from other sources are supplied by Mansi (vi. 519-22). Another collection of Irish canons, supposed to be earlier than the 8th century, may be seen in Dachery's Spicil. by Baluze, i. 491 and seq., and a supplement to them in Martene and Durand, Anec. iv. 1-21. JAMES THE GREATER, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend.—By the name of James the Greater, the son of Zebedee is distinguished from the other apostle of the same name. The epithet would seem to have regard either to stature or to age, though some, with apparently less likelihood, would make it refer (1) to priority in the call to the apostleship, or (2) to higher privileges in intercourse with Christ, or (3) to the dignity of an earlier martyrdom.

The elder brother of St. John, universally believed to have been the last survivor of the apostles, St. James was the first to be called away, having been beheaded by Herod Agrippa I., shortly before the Passover of 44 A.D. Out of a mass of tradition concerning him, the only point supported by any adequate evidence is the incident related by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 9) on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, of the conversion of St. James's accuser as the apostle was led away to death. Struck by his steadfastness, he too embraced Christ, and the apostle and his accuser suffered together.

The stories, however, of St. James's connection with Spain are deserving of very little credit. In spite of such plain statements as Acts viii. 1 (very lamely met by Baronius), the apostle is made to undertake a missionary journey into Spain after the death of Stephen, returning to Jerusalem before A.D. 44. The ancient evidence for such a story is of the weakest. Isidore of Seville (ob. 636 A.D.) does say (de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, c. 71; Patrol. lxxxiii. 151), if indeed the work is his, which is certainly doubtful, that St. James preached the gospel to the natives of Spain and the Western regions;^a and the same statement is found in the Collectanea, once wrongly attributed to Bede (Patrol. xciv. 545). Mere unsupported statements, however, of so late a date can amount to very little. It is worthy of notice too that at a much earlier period, Innocent I. (ob. 417 A.D.) states that no church had been founded throughout Italy, Gaul, or Spain, except by those who owed their authority directly or indirectly to St. Peter (Ep. 25 ad Decentium, c. 2: Patrol. xx. 552). With every allowance for the desire of a bishop of Rome to exalt the see of St. Peter, so sweeping a statement could hardly have been ventured on, had there been a strongly established tradition as to St. James's connection with Spain. Ambrose evidently knew no such legend, for he speaks of St. Paul's projected journey into Spain being "quia illic Christus non erat praedicatus" (Comm. in Ep. ad Rom. xv. 24; Patrol. xvii. 176); nor did Jerome, for he mentions St. Paul's journeys having reached even to Spain, immediately after referring to the apostle's never building "super alterius fundamentum, ubi jam fuerat praedicatum" (Comm. in Amos, v. 8 sqq.; vol. vi. 291, ed. Vallarsi). Baronius (notes to Martyrologium Romanum; July 25), in summing up concerning these legends, can only urge "non esse adeo impossibilia, vel haberi pro monstro, ut putant aliqui."

The story of the translation of the apostle's body into Spain is obviously totally apocryphal. It is to the effect that after his body had been interred at Jerusalem, his disciples removed it to Iria Flavia, in the far north-west of Spain. (For an elementary form of the story see the Martyrologies [July 25] of Usuard and Notker; Patrol. cxxiv. 295, cxxxi. 1125: those of Bede and Wandalbert ignore it.) Here it was discovered early in the 9th century, and removed to Compostella (a corruption of Giazom Postola, ad Jacobum Apostolum), a few miles distant, by order of Alphonso II., king of Asturias and Leon (ob. 842 A.D.). For a very full account of these legends, see Cuper in the Acta Sanctorum (July, vol. v. pp. 3 sqq.); also Mariana, De adventu Jacobi Apostoli majoris in Hispaniam, in his Tractatus, Col. Agr. 1609; Tolra, Justificacion historico-critica de la venida de Santiago el Mayor a España, y de su sepulcro in Compostela. Matriti, 1797; Arevalus, Isidoriana, c. 61 (Patrol. lxxxi. 382 sqq.), and sundry writings in connection with St. James, wrongly attributed to pope Callixtus II. (Patrol. clxiii. 1370 sqq.). Strangely, however, in spite of this lack of evidence, the legend took such root in Spain, as practically to count there as an article of faith, and thus we find Luther holding it necessary to protest against such a view (Sämmtliche Schriften, xv. 1864, ed. Walch).

For the wild legends connecting St. James with the false teachers Hermogenes and Philetus, reference may be made to the Historia Apostolica of the pseudo-Abdias, lib. iv., in which, it may be remarked in passing, there is no allusion whatever to Spain (Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, vol. ii. p. 516 sqq. ed. 1719).

2. Festival of St. James.—The date when St. James was first commemorated by a festival cannot be determined very closely. It is well known that at first the only apostles who had a special festival were St. Peter and St. Paul, and that the others gradually obtained separate commemorations afterwards. In the case of St. James, the notices are such as to point to the conclusion that the festival was one which only made its way very gradually, and that the date at which it had attained general observance was quite late. We find a mention, it is true, in the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense, where for December 27 is this notice: "vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae [here probably Evangelistae should be read] et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). On the other hand, many ancient Sacramentaries give no indication of the existence of a festival of St. James. The Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 403) and Gregorian (col. 115, ed. Menard), as we now have them, do so, the forms being almost identical in the two cases; but the Leonine and Gelasian pass it over. In the ancient Gallican Liturgy edited by Mabillon, to which we have referred below, it will be seen that St. James is commemorated, together with his brother, on December 27, but in the Gallican Lectionary the festival is of St. John alone, and in the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry's Spicilegium, xiii. 390), the notice is "vi. Kal. Jan. Ordinatio Episcopatus Jacobi Apostoli fratris Domini et Adsumptio Sancti Joannis Evangelistae." In the Gothic Breviary edited by Lorenzana, a form is provided for a festival of St. James on December 30 (Patrol. lxxvi. 1306), but there is none in the Mozarabic Missal. The Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (ob. 766 A.D.) has no notice of such a festival. Additional evidence to the same effect may be found in the fact that the earliest traces of a vigil of a festival of St.

^a This writing speaks of St. James as buried "in Mar-marica" (al. Carmarica, &c.), a name which does not seem to have been satisfactorily explained.

James are of very late date. Binterim (Denkw. v. 1. 401) asserts that the vigil does not occur at all in calendars before the 10th century. Even so late, however, as the 13th century, the festival itself does not appear to have attained universal acceptance; for in the canons of the council of Oxford (1222 A.D.) it is not included in the list of the chief festivals observed in England (can. 8; Labbe xi. 274). At the council of Cognac in France (1256 A.D.) the case is somewhat doubtful, yet taking the context into consideration (cf. can. 19), the words "duodecim Apostolorum, et maxime Petri et Pauli, Andreae, Jacobi . . ." perhaps point to separate festivals and not to the collective festival of the apostles (can. 21; Labbe xi. 749: cf. Conc. Tolosanum [1229 A.D.], can. 26, op. cit. 433, where the probability seems to incline the other way). We may appeal, however, finally to the proceedings of the synod of Exeter (1287 A.D.), where the festivals to be observed are named in their several months, and where the entry for July is, "Translationis S. Thomae martyris, Sanctae Mariae Magdaleneae, S. Jacobi Apostoli majoris" (can. 23, op. cit. 1288).

Besides this vagueness as to the date of the origin of the festival, the utmost latitude also prevails as to the day when it was to be celebrated. We have evidence indeed of a kind which is wanting in the case of every other apostle, for from Acts xii. 4 we may assume that St. James was put to death shortly before the Passover. Still, in the Western church, perhaps from the wish not to have a celebration of a martyrdom in Lent and Eastertide, we generally find St. James's festival on July 25.^b The calendar of the church of Carthage associates him, as we have seen, with his brother John on December 27; as does also the Gothico-Gallic Missal, where the heading for the day is "in Natale Apostolorum Jacobi et Johannis" (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. iii. p. 196). [In the Gothic calendar, however, prefixed to Lorenzana's edition of the Gothic Breviary, we find on December 30, "Jacobus frater Joannis Apostoli et Evangelistae," following the notice on December 29, "Jacobus, frater Domini," Patrol. lxxvi. 19.] The same combination too meets us in the calendar of the Armenian church on December 28 (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 804), and in that of the Ethiopic church on September 27 (Ludolf, Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 5). The calendar of the Byzantine church appoints April 30 for the commemoration of St. James, and so we find in the Greek metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxv). Κεῖναι μάχαρὰ φόνοῦ Ἰακώβου ἐν τριακόστῃ. In the martyrology given by Cardinal Sirletus, besides the commemoration on April 30, there is also noted on November 15, "Natalis SS. Baruch et Jacobi, fratris Joannis Theologi" (see Canisius, Thesaurus, vol. iii. pp. 427, 486).

The spring period is also recognised in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars. In the former, besides the festival mentioned above, there are also commemorations on February 4 and April 12 of St. James, apparently the son of Zebedee (Ludolf, pp. 20, 26). The Coptic calendar has generally a very close affinity with the preceding, and, like it, has a festival of St. James (defined as the son of Zebedee) on April 12; and also on February 12 of a James, presumably the present, and on April 30 of a James, defined as the son of Zebedee.^c

3. Whether or no it is due to the early date of this apostle's martyrdom, but little literature is directly associated with his name. The canonical epistle of James is indeed assigned to him in the subscription of a Corbey MS. of the old Latin version cited by Tischendorf (in loc.), and also in the passage of Isidore already referred to. This theory, however, is exceedingly improbable, and need not be further referred to here.

A pretended discovery was made near Granada in Spain in 1595 A.D. of the remains of two of St. James's disciples, and with them of eighteen books on leaden plates, including several by St. James, which with the others were condemned by Innocent XI. in 1682 A.D. (Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 352, iii. 725; Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. vii. pp. 285, 393).

JAMES THE LESS, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend, &c.—It does not fall within our present province to discuss the question whether James, the son of Alphaeus, one of the twelve apostles, is or is not the same as James, the Lord's brother, bishop of Jerusalem. The probability seems to incline in favour of the non-identity of the two, but there are considerable difficulties attending either hypothesis; and the matter will be found discussed at length in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. Of ancient liturgies, martyrologies and calendars, some identify, while others distinguish them; and hence it may perhaps be most convenient here to collect together the various notices under either designation.

It may be remarked at the outset that if James, the son of Alphaeus, be a different person from James the Lord's brother, there is almost a complete lack of tradition as to his history. The ancient so-called Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks of his being martyred in Persia (Patrol. xxx. 478), and the Greek metrical Ephemerides, which we have cited below, assert that he was crucified; but it is impossible to say what amount of belief is to be given to either of these statements. James, the ^b The statement of some writers (e.g. Augusti, Denkw. iii. 227) that this particular day is the anniversary of the translation of the saint's remains to Compostella, is one whose proof and disproof is equally impossible.

^c It should be noticed that sundry slight variations from Ludolf's calendar of the Egyptian church occur in those given by Selden (de Synedris Veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 210 sqq.; ed. Amsterdam, 1679). Here one calendar gives Feb. 11, the other Feb. 12; one April 11, the other April 12; and one (the other has no entry) has April 29 for April 30.

Lord's brother, on the other hand, fills a prominent place in the history of the Acts, he is referred to by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians in a way that sufficiently indicates his importance, and there can be no doubt that it is to him we owe the so-called Catholic Epistle of St. James. Ecclesiastical tradition also tells much concerning him, and the account of his martyrdom given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 23) from Hegesippus is doubtless substantially correct. It is not, however, necessary to repeat here what has already been said in the Bible Dictionary, to which reference may be made.

2. Festiv. d.—The exact date of the rise of a special festival of St. James, whether as the son of Alphaeus or as the Lord's brother, is hard to fix. Like those of most of the apostles, it is comparatively late. Among the earliest witnesses, we may mention the Martyrologium Hieronymi, the metrical martyrology of Bede, and the ancient liturgies referred to below. The first of these, as well as other early Roman martyrologies, commemorates James, the son of Alphaeus, on June 22, and also James, the Lord's brother, on March 15, April 25, and December 27. On the last of these there is associated with the "Assumptio S. Joannis Evangelistae," also the "Ordinatio episcopatus S. Jacobi fratris Domini," a combination to which we shall again refer. There is also in this martyrology, as we now have it, a commemoration of James, not further defined, but obviously the present, on May 1. The metrical martyrology of Bede commemorates St. Philip and St. James together on May 1, the latter, it will be seen, defined as the Lord's brother,

"Jacobus Domini frater pius atque Philippus Mirifico Maias venerantur honore Calendas."

This has been the general custom throughout the Western church, and so we find it in the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv. 1161), Gregorian (col. 101, ed. Menard) and Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 370) liturgies. The reason for this combination of apostles, and for the choice of this particular day does not appear. Schulting (Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica ii. 130) simply states that it is because of the translation of the relics of the two on that day in the Pontificate of Pelagius I. (ob. 560 A.D.). We are not aware that anything can be adduced in support of this statement beyond the remark of Anastasius Bibliothecarius that under Pelagius I., "initia est basilica Apostolorum Philippi et Jacobi" (Vitae Pontificum; Pelagius I. Patrol. cxxviii. 614), where we see the two names already associated.

It is stated by the Micrologus that this festival was originally one of all the apostles; there seems, however, to be no real evidence for the assertion "ideo etiam invenitur in martyrologiis sive in Sacramentariis festivitas Sanctorum Jacobi et Philippi et omnium Apostolorum" (de Eccl. Observ. c. 55; Patrol. cli. 1017). This is followed, however, by sundry liturgical writers, e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis (Gemma Animae iii. 140; Patrol. clxxii. 681), and Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. vii. 10).

Besides the festival of May 1, the Ambrosian liturgy also commemorates on Dec. 30 the "ordinatio B. Jacobi Alphaei Apostoli" (op. cit. 309), resembling the already cited notice of the Martyrologium Hieronymi; and we may again refer to the entry in the Martyrologium Gellonense quoted in the preceding article. The Gallican liturgy, published by Mabillon, omits altogether the festival of St. James, whether as son of Alphaeus or as brother of the Lord; but in the Mozarabic missal we find a commemoration of "S. Jacobus, frater Domini" on Dec. 29. We may take this opportunity of adding that the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel there are respectively Wisdom xviii. 20-24; i. Tim. i. 18-ii. 8; Luke viii. 23, 27, John xii. 24-26, xiii. 16, 17, 20, xv. 6, 12, 13 (Patrol. lxxxv. 104). In the Mozarabic Breviary, the form is merely headed "in festo S. Jacobi Apostoli" (Patrol. lxxxvi. 136), but there are numerous references to the martyrdom of James, the Lord's brother, at Jerusalem.

The Byzantine calendar distinguishes the son of Alphaeus from the Lord's brother, the former being commemorated on Oct. 9, the latter on Oct. 23; and so we find in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. xlviii.),—ἀμφ' ἐνάτη Ἰάκωβος ἐν σταυρῷ τετάνυστο, and ἐσθλὸν ἀδελφόν σου τριτάτη ἑλὼν εἰκάδι πλῆξαν. In the Armenian church, besides the commemoration of the two sons of Zebedee on Dec. 28, there are also commemorations on August 31 of "Thomas and James, Apostles," and on Dec. 23 of "James, Apostle" (Neale, Eastern Church; Intro. pp. 801, 804). In the calendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches given in Ludolf's Fusti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, we find that the former commemorates James, the son of Alphaeus, on October 2, and James, the Lord's brother, on October 23, and that they both commemorate this latter on July 12. Besides this, the Coptic calendar has on Feb. 12, and the Ethiopic on Feb. 4, a James, an apostle, not otherwise specified.^a

It may be remarked here that many of the customs which still characterize the day on which the Western church commemorates St. James, have obviously sprung from lingering heathen usages. These are, as a rule, connected with the idea of the return of spring, and thus are in some sense parallel to those associated with the festivals of Christmas and St. John the Baptist's day, which dwell on the idea of the returning and retreating sun. [CHRISTMAS; JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FIRE OF.]

Thus the gathering of flowers and the adorning of houses with them on May-day morning may fairly be connected with the Roman festival of the Floralia held on the five days following April 28; similar festivals to which were also held in other places, as the Anthesphoria in Sicily, etc.

A trace of the ancient sun-worship is still to be found in one of the customs prevalent on this day among Celtic peoples, and notably the Irish and Highland peasantry, viz., the lighting of great fires in the open air; and thus the common Irish name for the day, is La Beul-time (day of Beal's or Baal's fire), and similarly in Gaelic.

^a It may be noted that one of the Egyptian calendars, given by Selden (de Synedriis Veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 215, 219; ed. Amsterdam, 1670) puts Feb. 11 for Feb. 12, and July 11 for July 12.

Customs also with the same central idea existed among the ancient Gothic nations (see Olaus Magnus, Historia de Gentibus Septentrionalibus xv. 8, p. 503, ed. Rome, 1555).

3. With the name of the person or persons now before us, more literature is associated than in the case of the son of Zebedee. Besides the Canonical Epistle of St. James, there are still extant the so-called Protevangelium Jacobi, the most respectable of the Apocryphal gospels, and the so-called liturgy of St. James. It is possible too that at one time there existed other pseudonymous writings bearing the name of St. James, for we find Innocent I. in alluding to sundry works of this class, mention those which "sub nomine . . . Jacobi minoris . . . damnanda" (Ep. 6 ad Exsuperium c. 7, Patrol. xx. 502). Again, in the records of a council held at Rome in 494 A.D., under the episcopate of Gelasius, it is ruled "Evangelium [al. Evangelia] nomine Jacobi minoris, Apocryphum" (Patrol. lix. 162, 175, 176). Apocryphal letters to St. James from St. Peter and St. Clement are prefixed to the various editions of the Clementine Homilies (see e.g. Cotelierius, Patres Apost. i. 602, ed. 1700). The Apostolic Constitutions again (viii. 23), cite James, the son of Alphaeus, as giving rules respecting confessors and virgins; and some forms of the text, but apparently not the best, give (c. xxxv.) rules as to divine service claiming the authority of James, the Lord's brother.

JERUSALEM, COUNCILS OF (Hierosolymitana Concilia). (1) A.D. 47, says Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 38); Baronius and others, A.D. 51: the third, in chronological order, of the meetings of the Apostles recorded in their Acts, but the only one deserving the name of a synod. Its proceedings are described there (c. xv.). A controversy having arisen at Antioch, over which according to Eusebius (Chron. ad l.) Euodius had been appointed bishop as far back as A.D. 43, on the necessity of circumcising the Gentile converts and obliging them to keep the law of Moses, it was referred to the Apostles and elders at Jerusalem for decision, SS. Paul and Barnabas being sent thither for that purpose. The Apostles and elders came together, accordingly, to consider of it. St. Peter spoke first, and gave his opinion against burdening the disciples with any such yoke. Then all the multitude—in other words, the body of believers, or brethren who were present—listened to the reports given of the conversion of the Gentiles that had been achieved on their first expedition as missionaries into Asia Minor by SS. Paul and Barnabas. After which St. James, as bishop, doubtless, of Jerusalem, delivered his "sentence," which was embodied in the synodical letter, addressed in the name of the Apostles and elders and brethren, finally, to the brethren of the Gentiles in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, and sent by two principal men of their own number, in addition to SS. Paul and Barnabas. On reaching Antioch, the bearers of this epistle gathered the multitude together and delivered it, when its contents having been read caused great joy.

(2) Mansi's reasons for dating this council A.D. 349 seem conclusive (ii. 171, note). Constans, who ruled in the West, threatened his brother Constantius with hostilities, if St. Athanasius, in whose favour the Sardican council had pronounced two years before, was not restored to his see; and Gregory, his rival, having died in the early part of this year, his return was allowed. In his way he stopped at Jerusalem, when a synod was held under its orthodox bishop, Maximus, and a letter despatched from it to congratulate the Alexandrians on this act of grace on the part of the emperors: which Constans, however, did not live to see carried out, as he was slain in Jan. 350. And Maximus having held this synod without leave from his metropolitan, Acacius, bishop of Caesarea, was ejected by him in another synod a few months later, to be succeeded by St. Cyril, then catechist, and a supposed Arian.

(3) A.D. 399. A synod of bishops, met to celebrate the feast of the dedication of the church there, acknowledge the receipt of a synodical epistle from Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, condemning some of the errors of Origen lately revived in his diocese, and profess their agreement with it (Mansi, iii. 989-92).

(4) A.D. 415. What we should call a diocesan synod: of presbyters, that is, under their bishop, John. Orosius, the historian, then on a mission from St. Augustine to St. Jerome, was present at it, and gives an account of its proceedings. Pelagius being there, and accused by him of heresy, was invited to come in, and put on his defence. Neither what he said, nor what Orosius said, were considered altogether unexceptionable by the bishop, who proposed that letters should be sent to Pope Innocent of Rome on the subject, and that all should abide by what he decreed (Mansi, iv. 307-12).

(5) A.D. 518, to express its adhesion to the Constantinopolitan synod of the same year (see the art.): its own synodical letter being also preserved in the subsequent council under Mennas.

(6) A.D. 536, Sept. 19: under Peter, its patriarch, on receipt of the acts of the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, between four and five months previously, with the edict of the Emperor Justinian confirming them, and a letter from Mennas to Peter acquainting him with their contents (see the article on this council). The deacon and notary present having recited them, they were received synodically by Peter, and subscribed to by forty-eight bishops, with himself at their head (Mansi, viii. 1164-76).

(7) A.D. 553, under its patriarch, Eustochius, at which the acts of the 5th council were received and confirmed.

(8) A.D. 634, under Sophronius, on his elevation as patriarch, to condemn Monothelism, against which he had contended with so much ardour as monk previously. The encyclical epistle sent by him on this occasion to the bishops of Rome and Constantinople is preserved in the 11th action of the 6th council where it was recited (Mansi, x. 649-52). [E. S. Ff.]

JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS

OF. 1. The symbolic representations of the Lord are discussed severally, as under the titles FISH, IXΘΥC, LAMB, VINE; see also SYMBOLISM. For the pictorial types of the Lord derived from the Old Testament, see OLD TESTAMENT IN CHRISTIAN ART; for pagan types used to represent Him, see PAGANISM IN CHRISTIAN ART. For representations on gems, see GEMS, §§ xii. and xiii. p. 718; on the bottoms of cups, see GLASS, CHRISTIAN, p. 732. See also IMAGES, p. 813; and NUMISMATICS. Setting aside such representations as these, it is to be observed, in the first instance, that He is represented in the human form from the earliest times of Christian art as the Good Shepherd; and this symbolic picture, though in no case whatever considered as a portrait, must have made the idea of representations of His human form a very familiar one at all times in the Roman and other Western churches—and in earlier centuries, in the Byzantine also. One of the latest, and the most important perhaps of all these, is the often described Good Shepherd of the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna, middle fifth century: and one of the earliest ideal portraits of our Lord is found in the church of St. Apollinaris, built a century later within the walls of that city. In art these two figures mark the transition from the elder Graeco-Roman ideas and traditions of art to the later style, properly called Byzantine. The leading difference in feeling and principle between them will be illustrated in the course of this article: for the present it may briefly be thus stated: that in the earlier illustration of the Lord's Parable of Himself, the attempt at beauty predominates, and is far from unsuccessful; whereas in the Byzantine picture of St. Apollinaris, though considerable beauty of feature is retained, the tendency to the ascetic or melancholy ideal of later art, both Italian and German, is unmistakably visible.

JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS OF

It is perhaps fortunate that the words of St. Augustine (De Trinitate viii. 4, 5) put it apparently beyond question, that the world cannot possess now, and did not possess in his time, any authentic record whatever of the bodily appearance of Jesus Christ the God-Man on earth. "Nam et ipsius Dominicæ facies Carnis innumera bilium cogitationum diversitate variatur et fingitur; quæ tamen una erat, quæcunque erat." Two centuries before, indeed, St. Irenæus (contra Hæreses 1. 25) had spoken, with indignant absence of comment, of certain Gnostic representations of Christ, both painted and sculptured, as it appears. "Quasdam quidem [imagines] quasi depictas, quasdam autem et de reliquâ materiâ fabricatas habent, dicentes formam Christi factam a Pilato, illo in tempore quo fuit Jesus cum hominibus. Et has coronant, et proponunt eas cum imaginibus mundi philosophorum, videlicet cum imagine Pythagoræ, et Platonis, et Aristotelis." These passages seem conclusive to the effect that no real portrait of our Lord existed, or was remembered as existing, in the 2nd century. Indeed as Martigny observes, the controversy (dating from the 2nd century) with regard to the human comeliness of our Lord's body visible on earth, makes it perfectly certain, were proof necessary, that no authentic portrait of Him ever existed. Augustine acknowledges without blame the universal tendency of thought to picture to itself persons and events by imaginative effort, instancing St. Paul in particular, and taking it for certain, as it probably may be, that each of all the innumerable readers of the epistles will form a different idea of his own about the author's appearance, though none can say whose will be nearest the truth.

In his mind then, and indeed in our own, all ideal or fancy portraits of our Lord, so called, are merely symbolic of His humanity; and in this view, the crucifix itself may be taken as a symbol only of the fact of His death and the doctrine of His sacrifice for man; however the word sacrifice be defined or enlarged upon: and this may certainly make its presence in Christian churches not only allowable but desirable. We may observe on the different relation of the church to the arts in Augustine's days, when Christian art of a well marked and distinctive character existed, from the state of things in the time of Tertullian, who protests against all simulacra, likenesses, or representations whatever, and, as he well might in the presence of the whole Pantheon, considers all images or likenesses practically the same as idols.^a Human art, however, was adopted by the church along with human thought and learning. We cannot tell whether Tertullian knew or cared for the catacomb-paintings of Rome. Some of them, as those in the more ancient part of St. Domitilla, were certainly in existence before his time; but he seems, in the presence of the heathen, to protest against all paintings whatever, and the fact that St. Augustine not unwillingly accepts them, is an illustration of a highly natural change of Christian feeling on the matter.^b

The more ancient usage of representing the Lord as the Good Shepherd culminates in the Mosaic of Galla Placidia's chapel. A far higher antiquity is claimed for the no-longer existing portrait-head of Christ, which Bosio represents, from a chapel of the Callixtine catacomb.

Head of Christ from the Callixtine catacomb. (Martigny.)

There is a general opinion that it may have been of as early date as the 2nd century: and what we know of it may well induce us to believe that it was the original of that ideal of our Lord's countenance which has passed, through Leonardo da Vinci, into all Christian painting. Lord Lindsay, however, says that the traditional Head with which Europe is so familiar, was unknown in the West till the 4th century, when the original was sent to Constantia, sister of Constantine, by Eusebius of Caesarea. It is therefore of Byzantine or Eastern origin. The earliest example, he continues, is a supposed 4th century mosaic, found originally in the Callixtine, and now in the Vatican. See Eusebius's letter in Labbe, Conc. t. vi. col. 493 sq. This letter repudiates (rhetorically but with sincerity) any idea of our Lord's real appearance, and from it and the passage in Hist. Ecc. (viii. 19) it appears that Eusebius had not seen any historic portrait which he (or indeed others) believed on evidence to be a genuine likeness [IMAGES, § III.]. Others of the same type are repeated on sarcophagi, dating from that of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359; see Bottari, tav. xv. xxi.-xxv. xliii. xlv.; the latter represents the paintings in the catacomb of St. Pontianus, probably renewed over older pictures in the time of pope Adrian I. (A.D. 772-775). This catacomb also contains a highly ornamented cross, which is evidently intended to represent the person of our Lord [CROSS].

^a De Idololatriâ, c. iii.: "Idolum aliquamdiu retro non erat;" he says, "sola templa et vacuae aedes. At ubi artifices statuarum et imaginum, et omnis generis simulacrorum diabolus seculo intulit (rude illud negotium humanæ calamitatis) et nomen de Idolis consecutum est."

The assertion of the idea that our Lord not only took upon Him the flesh of mankind, but the "form of a servant," or slave, all bodily ugliness instead of beauty, is derived from meditation on the prophetic text (Is. liii. 2), "He hath no form nor comeliness;" as the natural thought of His beauty from the Messianic Psalm (xlv. 3), "Thou art fairer than the children of men." The former view seems to have been entertained, or is nowise discouraged by Justin Martyr, who twice uses the word αἰδώς of our Lord: meaning evidently to repeat the expression of Isaiah (Dial. cum Tryph. cc. 85 and 88). So Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. III. 1) appeals to the two texts to which we have referred on the same side. Compare Stromata, ii. 5, § 22; iii. 17, § 103; vi. 17, § 151. Tertullian may be supposed to have thought likewise (Adv. Jul. c. 14): "Ne aspectu quidem honestus;" (De carne Christi, c. 9) "Adeo nec humanæ honestatis corpus fuit." He infers from the cruelty of Jews and soldiers at the crucifixion, that such insults could not have been offered to the Lord, had His person possessed any beauty. So Origen (c. Cels. vi. 75, p. 327, Spencer), who, however, held that the Lord could appear in whatever form he pleased (Ib. ii. p. 99f.). A list is given by Molanus (Hist. Sacrarum Imaginum, p. 403) by which it appears that St. Jerome (in Matt. ix. 9; Epist. 65, ad Princip. c. 8), St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 [al. 28] in Matt. p. 328; and on Ps. 44 [45] p. 162), and Theodoret, followed the text which speaks of Him as fairest of all men, St. Basil and St. Cyril of Alexandria (little to our surprise) taking the other side. This unifying controversy belongs to art rather than to theology. The Oriental, or Egyptian, or ascetic view of the human body, would necessarily have weight on the ill-favoured side, theologically speaking. And in practical art, the want of skill, and also of models possessing any degree of earthly good looks, must have borne strongly in the same direction. Beauty of expression was too subtle a thing for the hands of the Mosaicists of the 8th and 9th centuries.

There were various reasons why the ideal of bodily beauty should gradually be lost, up to the 12th century. It has often been remarked that as the ascetic life was more and more severely enforced on the faithful, and the sufferings of the later Roman world bore more and more severely on the whole community, the honour of the body of man was lost and forgotten. In the earlier Gothic days, strength and manly beauty must have been associated in the eyes of the Monastic Church only with the ignorance and fierceness of barbarian soldiers. The Christian assembly on earth, under the hands of Alaric and Genseric, Attila and Alboin, was utterly hopeless of any good on earth. The eastern end of a Byzantine or Romanesque church from the 6th century, begins accordingly to be adorned as a mystical representation of heaven, beyond the wilderness of earth, with the portrait figure of Christ as its centre. The Lord, whom all seek so piteously, shall suddenly come to His temple; and the eyes of distressed congregations are allowed a vision in symbol of His presence breaking in on the distresses of later days. One of the earliest examples of churches thus ornamented is that of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome. Here the figure of our Lord coming with clouds and standing on the firmament, is grand and sublime in the highest degree, and is perhaps the earliest or greatest instance of very early date, in which passionate conception, supported by powerful colour, forces itself, without any other advantage, into the foremost ranks of art-creation. The towering and all commanding form of the Lord must have seemed to "fill the whole temple;" with the symbolic hand of the First Person of the Trinity above His Head, and the Holy Dove on His right hand. The mystic Jordan, or River of Death, is at His feet, and on its other side, with small rocks and trees to indicate the wilderness of this world, are the twelve sheep of His flock, with the houses of Jerusalem and Bethlehem; He, Himself, appearing again in the centre on earth as the Lamb of the elder dispensation. The same idea is similarly treated in the early 9th century decorations of St. Prassede. The form of the Lord is tall and spare, not without grandeur, but markedly ascetic: the signs of the other Two Persons of the Holy Trinity are with Him, and He is surrounded with all the imagery of the Apocalypse; with this grand addition, that on the spandrels of the Arch of Triumph before Him, the twenty-four elders are inlaid in white and gold mosaic, in the united act of casting their crowns before Him. He appears below as the Lamb; and the same symbol is repeated at the top of the Arch of Triumph, laid on an ornamented altar-table—as the Paschal Lamb that was slain. The Offering of the Crowns by the Elders was also represented on the triumphal arch of S. Paolo fuori le Mura, and the author of an interesting article on Portraits of Christ (Quarterly Rev. Oct. 1867) says it still exists, having been rescued from the flames in 1823. There were, or still exist, similar figures, in the Vatican Basilica of St. Peter (De Sac. Aedif. xiii. xiv.) in St. Constantia, (ib. xxxii.) St. Andrew in Barbara (V. M. I. lxxvi.) St. Agatha Major in Ravenna (I. xli.) and St. Michael of Ravenna (II. xvii.) &c. The greater part of these mosaics will be found photographed in the unique collection of Mr. J. H. Parker, which, in spite of all the deficiencies of the photographs, gives an idea of the tessellated work which does not exist elsewhere. To historians, or students of Christian art, their importance is, that by the presence of the sheep of Christ's church, they connect His Glorified Form with the more ancient catacomb representations of the Good Shepherd.

In St. Andrea in Barbara, the Lord stands on the Rock of the Four Rivers, and He is thus represented very frequently on the sarcophagi. See Aringhi, vol. I. p. 280 (Probus and Proba) and pp. 293, 297. On that of Junius Bassus (Aringhi I. 277) and elsewhere, He is sitting above a half-veiled figure representing the firmament or clouds of heaven [FIRMAMENT].

The figure described above from SS. Cosmas and Damianus possesses awe and grandeur, and can dispense with regularity or sweetness of feature. But the very earliest ideal portraits certainly possessed this; and it is one instance of the cheerfulness of spirit which Mr. Lecky notices in the Primitive Church, that the remnants of Graeco-Roman skill were devoted to such works as Bosio's picture (above) must have been; or the other mentioned by Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimiteri pp. 21 and 64) as "maestosa figura del Salvatore, come quella dipinta nel cimitero di Ponziano." The question stands on and indicates one of those great human divergences of character and thought, which determine the lives and conduct of whole generations; and it will be remembered how the Mediaeval German or hard-featured ideal was set forth against the Lionardesque; not altogether without the countenance of Dürer and Holbein. On this subject, the last chapter but one of vol. iv. of Ruskin's Modern Painters, is worthy of grave attention. There is no doubt, further, that Protestant asceticism often resembles that of earlier days, in a certain suspicion of beauty as carnal and idolatrous.

The Gnostic images of our Lord (see St. Irenaeus supra) are also worthy of attention. One was set up by Marcellina (Aug. de Haeres. vii.), a follower of Carpocrates, and adored along with others of St. Paul, Homer, and Pythagoras; and the eclectic Lararium of Alexander Severus, containing the statues of Christ, of Abraham, Orpheus, and Apollonius of Tyana, is mentioned by Lampridius (In Alex. Severum xxix.). Raoul Rochette (Discours sur les types imit. p. 21), is referred to by Martigny for a "pierre basilidienne," which he thinks may give an idea of the type of portraiture which was in vogue among that class of sectaries. It is altogether different, in any case, from that of the Callixtine and other catacombs; and for further contrast with it, he gives a woodcut (reproduced above) of that which he considers, on De Rossi's authority, indisputably the most ancient of all representations of our Lord. It is taken from a portrait on ivory, in the Christian Museum of the Vatican.

The classic type which insists on personal beauty, is by far the most common on the sarcophagi, and all early monuments. Christian artists in fact seem, as was natural, to have invested their ideal with comeliness as long as they had skill to do so. The dress (of course excepting the Good-Shepherd representations), is invariably the tunic and pallium, sometimes ornamented with the stripes or clavi (Ciampini Vet. Mon. ii. p. 60, i. 184, xlv.). The idea of white raiment generally seems to be intended, though gold, dark imperial blue, and other colours are used in the mosaics. The white and glistening raiment of the Transfiguration will account for this (Ciampini Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xvi. i. tab. lxxvii.). Our Lord is generally shod with sandals, if at all. The cothurnus is given apparently in Aringhi, vol. i. lib. ii. c. x. pp. 332, 333, and something resembling it is worn by the Good Shepherd (Aringhi, vol. ii. pp. 63, 67, 75, 79, &c.)

Portraits of our Lord are generally youthful, as symbolizing His eternal nature, even (Aringhi, vol. ii. p. 213) when He instructs the apostles (Bottari, cxl.). In the dispute with the doctors His youth is of course insisted on, but He is not made small of stature, whereas in pictures of the miracles, as has been frequently remarked, His figure greatly exceeds His human companions in height. This is the case also (Aringhi, i. pp. 307, 313 and passim), where any dead persons are carved on their tomb as presented before him, as in many 'bisomatus' sarcophagi of husband and wife. A beautiful illustration of this tradition of early Christian work in later times will be found in Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. iii. p. 78, where this distinction is used by the artist, with the detail of the human figures partly hiding themselves in the folds of the robes of attendant angels, who are inferior in size to the divine figure, though of superhuman stature. The Lord sometimes stands or sits on a sphere (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 270, tab. vii.), probably to give the idea of all things being put under his feet. He is accompanied by attesting angels, or His form is represented, full length or half-size, on a medallion supported by angels, as in the diptych of Rambona, and very frequently in the mosaics of Rome and Ravenna. These medallions are sometimes called IMAGINES CLIPEATAE, the use of them being probably derived from portrait-images on shields of ancient times. The cross sometimes represents our Lord thus borne. This seems to point to the Ascension, and to his glory as Lord of Hosts or of Sabaoth. It is not our work to follow the idea into its various developments in the angelic choirs of the middle ages, for which we may refer to Lord Lindsay, and to Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art. But a curious example of transition from the circular or oval medallion into the Gothic quatrefoil, containing the figure of our Lord, and supported by angels, still remains in the College-Hall or Refectory at Worcester, and is certainly derived from classic or Byzantine antiquity.

Our Lord frequently bears a rod or wand, especially in representations of the miracles, apparently as an emblem of his power over nature, or as the leader of His people in the wilderness, with a reference to Moses. The roll or volume very often appears in His hand, as committed to St. Peter and St. Paul or other apostles, or when He instructs the disciples. The full-grown rather than the youthful type appears in such examples, as in Bottari, clxxvi. See woodcut reproduced below.

Frequent representations of the Second Person of the Trinity as present at some transaction narrated in the Old Testament, or as the anti-type of some typical event or person. Martigny mentions a glass vessel in Garrucci (Vetri, xiii. 13), in which He is with Daniel, who is giving the cakes to the dragon. A more certain and satisfactory example is in His appearance with the three holy children in the furnace, Bottari, xxii. xli. See also Gori (Thes. diptych. t. iii. tab. 8) where He stretches the cross out over the flames. The representation of the holy Three appearing to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 2), in S. Vitale at Ravenna is well-known, and Ciampini's plate is now supplemented or super-

We may conclude with the mnemonic lines of St. Damasus (Carm. vi. Patrolog. Migne, t. xiii. col. 378), of the symbolic or other names and titles applied to our Lord up to his days.

II. Besides the representations of the Lord which strictly belong to art, there are others which have an archaeological rather than an artistic interest. We have ancient accounts (1) of portraits of the Lord produced in the ordinary manner; and (2) of portraits of the Lord produced miraculously. Some of both kinds are even believed still to exist.

(1) Ordinary Representations. — Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 18) tells us that at Caesarea Philippi [Panaas] there existed a group in bronze representing a woman kneeling before a dignified man, who stretched out his hand benignantly towards her. This group Eusebius says that he had himself seen. He adds, that it was long unknown whom this statue represented; but as it was observed that a plant of healing virtues grew at its foot, care was taken at last to cleanse it, so as to make the inscription legible; then it was discovered that the woman cured of the issue of blood, who lived at Paneas, had erected the statue in honour of the Saviour. On this discovery it was at once removed into the Diaconicum or Sacristy of the church. That such a statue existed seems past all doubt; as to its original intention, the opinion of most modern archaeologists is, that it had been erected in honour of Hadrian, or some other who had benefitted the province, which was represented as a kneeling woman at the feet of her benefactor. Similar representations are frequently found on coins, especially of the time of Hadrian. Supposing some such expression as "σωτήρι," or "σωτήρι τοῦ κόσμου"—titles at that time very frequently given to emperors—to have been found on the inscription, while the name had become illegible, the statue would naturally be referred by the Christians of the fourth century to the true "Saviour of the World" (Hefele, Beiträge, ii. 257). The emperor Julian, angry at the respect paid to this statue, caused it to be thrown down and his own substituted. This is related by Sozomen (H. E. v. 21), who adds, that the statue of Julian was soon afterwards struck by lightning and partly destroyed, while some fragments of the statue of Christ, which the heathens had dragged about the street, were collected by the Christians and restored to the church. Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 3) gives nearly the same account, except that he says nothing of any edict of Julian, but attributes the whole transaction to the pagan inhabitants of Paneas, and that he gives the more exact detail, that the head of the statue was preserved. This however was again lost at a later period. Asterius of Amasea (Conc. Nic. II., Labbe, vii. 210) gives again a different account, attributing the destruction of the statue to Maximin, who (he says) was nevertheless unable to destroy the fame of the miracle related in the Gospel.

Eusebius also says (H. E. vii. 18) that he had discovered that, besides this statue, there existed coloured pictures of Christ (εἰκόνες διὰ χρωμάτων ἐν γραφαῖς), as well as of the apostles Paul and Peter.

In the time of the Iconoclastic controversy, pope Gregory II. asserted in his letter to the emperor Leo III., about A.D. 727, that portraits of Christ, of St. James the Lord's brother, of St. Stephen, and of other martyrs, had been made in their life-time (Labbe, vii. 12). And it was probably about this time that the legend arose that St. Luke had painted portraits of Christ, of His Mother, and of SS. Peter and Paul. This story is found in Simeon Metaphrastes, in the Menologium of the emperor Basil, and in the history of Nicephorus Callisti (ii. 43). At a yet earlier date (about A.D. 518) Theodorus Lector (fragment in Valesius, p. 551, ed. Mentz) spoke of a portrait of St. Mary painted by St. Luke, which was sent by Eudocia to Fulcheria, but said nothing of any picture of Christ. Such portraits of the Virgin are said even still to be in existence; one is shown, for instance, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome.

Nicodemus is sometimes described as a wood-carver, and an image of Christ of cedar-wood from his hand is said by Aringhi (Roma Subterr. lib. iv. c. 47) to have existed at Lucca. Some have ventured to identify this with a wonder-working image at Berytus, mentioned in the pseudo-Athanasian document read before the second council of Nicaea, A.D. 786 (Labbe vii. 217). Leo Diaconus, in the tenth century, says that his contemporary, the Byzantine emperor Nicephorus, placed this statue in the church of the Saviour at Constantinople; but neither he nor the pseudo-Athanasius says anything of its having been the work of Nicodemus. The legend attached to the image of Lucca is of course destitute of every shadow of probability.

Among the likenesses of the Lord reported once to have existed, we must reckon one said to have been the work of the Virgin herself, described in Adamant's account of Arculf's visit to the holy places in the seventh century (De Locis Sanctis, i. 10; in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 460). Among the wonders of Jerusalem he mentions a napkin, partly red and partly green, said to have been woven by the Virgin Mary herself, containing pictures of the twelve apostles and of the Lord Himself.

(2) Images not made with hands.—Another class of portraits of Christ are the εἰκόνες ἀχειροποίητοι, images of miraculous origin, of which the most famous are (a) the Abgarus portrait, (b) the Veronica.

(a) The story of a correspondence between the Lord and Abgarus of Edessa is found as early as the time of Eusebius (H. E. i. 13). Evagrius, in the sixth century* (H. E. iv. 27) speaks also of a divinely-fashioned likeness (εἰκὼν θεότευκτος) which Christ sent to Abgarus on his desiring to see him, and which saved Edessa when it was besieged by Chosroes in the year 540.

This story is alluded to by Gregory II. in his letter to Leo before referred to, when the famous picture had already become an object of pilgrimage. "Send"—he adjures the iconoclastic emperor—"to that image not made with hands, and see; to it flock all the peoples of the East, and pray; and many such there are made with hands." His contemporary, John of Damascus (De Fide Orthod. iv. 16) gives more detail. A story was current, he says, that Abgarus, king of Edessa, sent a painter to take a portrait of the Lord; and that when he was unable to perform his task in consequence of the brightness of His countenance, the Lord himself put his outer garment (ἱμάτιον) to His own face and impressed upon it a perfect likeness (ἀπεικόνισμα) of His countenance, which He sent to Abgarus. Leo Diaconus (Hist. iv. 10, in Niebuhr's Scriptt. Byzant. xi. 70) adds to this a wonderful story of a tile having received the impression from this robe. The tile is also alluded to by Zonaras (Annal. xvi. 25). The image on the cloth was brought to Constantinople in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenetes, A.D. 944; its translation is celebrated by the Byzantine church on August 16, which is a great festival. What became of the picture when that city was taken by the Turks is not recorded, but pictures claiming to be this miraculous portrait are found in Italy. The Genoese lay claim to the possession of it, and say that it was brought to their city by Leonardo de Montalto, who presented it to the Armenian church of St. Bartholomew, where it is still exhibited once a year. St. Sylvester's at Rome also claims to possess the original Abgarus-picture. This is (according to Hefele) of the Byzantine type, and represents the countenance of the Lord in the bloom of youthful power and beauty; with high and open forehead, clear eyes, long and straight nose, parted hair, and a thick, auburn, bifurcated beard. Dr. Glückselig contends that the Edessa portrait furnished the type for the pictures of Christ in mosaics from the fourth century onward; before that time (he believes) no attempt at portraiture of the Lord was made, the early representations in the catacombs being mere symbols or adaptations of pagan types.

(b) The opposite of the calm and beautiful face represented in the Abgarus-portrait is the "Veronica" picture of the suffering Saviour crowned with thorns. The legend attached to this picture is, that as the Lord was bending under the cross on his way to Golgotha, a pious woman, Veronica, offered Him her veil, or a napkin, to dry the sweat on His face; an image of the face remained miraculously impressed on the cloth. In the Martyrology of Usuard, for instance, (ed. Greven.) we have under March 25, "Veronicae sanctae matronae cui Dominus imaginem faciei suae sudario impressam reliquit." Gervase of Tilbury (Otia Imperialia, c. 25, in Leibnitz's Scriptt. Brun. i. 968), who wrote in the thirteenth century, speaking of the "figura Domini quae Veronica dicitur," informs us that some say that it was brought to Rome by an unknown person, Veronica; but the account given by the most ancient writers is (he proceeds) that the woman who brought it was Martha, the sister of Lazarus. From the tradition of the elders we learn that she had a likeness of the Lord's countenance painted on panel, which Volusianus, a friend of Tiberius Caesar, who was sent by the emperor to Jerusalem to report on the deeds and miracles of Christ, caused to be taken away from her, that by means of it Tiberius might be healed of his disease. Martha, however, it is said, followed the "countenance of her guest," came to Rome, and at the very first sight healed Tiberius. Whence it came to pass (continues the veracious chronicler) that Christianity was known in Rome before the arrival of the apostles, and that Tiberius, instead of the mildest of sheep, became the fiercest of wolves, raging against the Senate because they refused to recognise Christ according to his wish—certainly a remarkable way of accounting for the aberrations of Tiberius's later years.

The Veronica-portrait is said to have been brought to Rome as early as the year 700; in the year 1011 an altar was dedicated in its honour, and even to this day it is one of the relics exhibited in St. Peter's, though only on extraordinary occasions. It was exhibited on the 8th December, 1854, when Rome was crowded with bishops assembled to be present at the promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. On that occasion it was seen by M.

"The Holy Face is enclosed in a frame of silver, partially gilt, and square, of a severe character, and little adorned. The simplicity of the bordering gives prominence to the interior of the picture, which is protected by a thin plate of crystal. Unfortunately, by one of those customs so common in Italy, a sheet of metal covers the field, and only leaves apparent the figure indicating its outline. By this outline one is led to conjecture flowing hair reaching to the shoulders, and a short beard, bifurcated and small. The other features are so vaguely indicated, or so completely effaced, that it requires the liveliest imagination in the world to perceive traces of eyes or nose. In short, one does not see the material of the substance because of the useless intervention of a metal plate, and the place of the impression exhibits only a blackish surface, not giving any evidence of human features."

For many years the explanation of the name Veronica given by Mabillon and Papebroch was generally adopted; that "Veronica" is simply an anagram of "vera icon," a true image. Mediaeval writers do in fact use the word Veronica rather to designate the picture itself than as the name of a woman. Thus Gervase of Tilbury, as we have seen, speaks of "figura Domini quae veronica dicitur;" and he afterwards uses the expression, "Est ergo veronica pictura Domini vera." But more recently W. Grimm has maintained a different view. He notices the fact, that the woman with the issue of blood who was healed, is said in the gospel of Nicodemus (c. 7), probably of the fifth century, and by John Malalas, a Byzantine historian of the sixth (Hist. Chron., p. 305, ed. Oxon. 1691), to have been named Beronice (Βερονίκη); and supposes that the legend of the veil or napkin in question arose from some confusion of the Panæas statue with the Abgarus-portrait; the Veronica-legend is, he believes, no more than a Latin rival-story or metamorphosis of the Greek Abgarus-legend, with the Veronica introduced from another source. M. Maury (Croyances et Legendes) connects the name Βερονίκη with the Gnostic feminine symbol ἡ Προβήκος, but this conjecture seems rather ingenious than sound.

(3) In the eighth century the iconoclastic party, seeing the great variety of pictures of Christ, very naturally asked which they were to consider the true portrait; were they to adopt the Roman type, or the Indian, or the Greek, or the Egyptian? To this Photius (Epist. 64) replies, that the difference between these representations is much the same as the difference between the gospels circulating in the several countries, which are written in one character by the Romans, in another by the Indians, in another by the Hebrews, in another by the Ethiopians, and which differ, not only in the forms of letters, but in the pronunciation and significance of the words. If Photius's illustration is to be taken exactly, it seems to imply that all the pictures of which he knew anything represented the same face, and were only made to differ by the peculiarities, whether individual or national, of the painter; and it is probable enough that the Byzantine type was so far determined in his time, that all the pictures which he had seen might have passed for copies, of various degrees of merit, of one original.

(4) The descriptions of the Lord given by John of Damascus in the eighth century, and by the supposed Publius Lentulus at a later period, no doubt had considerable influence on the representations of Christ. The former (Epist. ad Theoph. c. 3), referring to the testimony of still earlier writers, describes the Lord as having been somewhat bent even in youth, with meeting eyebrows, beautiful eyes, large nose, curling hair, dark beard and tint the colour of wheat, like His mother. The latter is supposed to be written to the Senate of Rome by one Publius Lentulus, a friend of Pontius Pilate. The age of this document is unknown (see Gabler, de atheniæ Epistolæ Pub. Lentuli ad Senatum; Jena, 1819), but it does not seem to be quoted in its present form by any earlier writer than Anselm of Canterbury († 1109). Another description of the Lord's person is given by Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. i. 40), but this, as it is of the fourteenth century and does not claim to rest on earlier authorities, may be passed over.

JEWS AS REPRESENTED ON CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS. The Jews of our Lord's time appear in various sculptures of His life and works (Bottari, tav. lxxxv. et passim; Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lxxv. et passim). They are generally distinguished, especially in all subjects connected with the Wilderness, by wearing a flat cap or beretta, as in the above plates from sarcophagi. The Old Testament mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore are without the limits of our work, and Roman dress and armour prevail in them. The supposed arrest of St. Peter contains some of these figures, but though Aringhi, Bottari, and Buonarroti are against him, Martigny is still inclined to think the group in question intended to represent Moses attacked by the rebellious people in the Wilderness, when (Exodus xxiv. &c.) they were ready to stone him. This subject constantly accompanies that of the Rock in Horeb, where their complaints were silenced by miracle. Moses or St. Peter (whichever figure may be intended), always has his head uncovered in it, and the other Hebrews wear the flat head covering, short tunics, cloaks or sags fastened with fibulae, and sandals (Exod. xii. 11). The cap may have been a common or distinctive part of Jewish dress.

JEWS, TREATMENT OF. The fortunes of the Jews after the rise of Christianity are matters of general history. An account of their relation towards the expanding power of the church will be found in Milman's Hist. of Jews (iii. 167-203). This article only gives a brief summary of the ecclesiastical enactments against connivance with Jewish practices, or against the Jews themselves. To desert Christianity for Judaism was APOSTASY; to confound together the rites or doctrines of the two religions was HERESY; see Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 43, 44; ibid. XVI. viii. de Judæis Coelivolis et Samaritanis. But in addition to these graver offences, Christians were ordered to hold themselves separate from various Jewish customs. Thus resting on the Sabbath (Saturday) was denounced (Conc. Laod. c. 29) on the ground of its being a relic of Judaism; it was also forbidden (ibid. c. 37, 38) to receive festival presents, or unleavened bread, from the Jews, or to share in their feasts. A similar injunction against participating in Jewish festivals or fasts appears in the Apostolic Canons (c. 69, 70) under pain of excommunication, and also in the Trullan council (c. 11). The council of Eliberis, A.D. 305, initiating the violent hostility against the Jews which prevailed in Spain up to and through the time of the Inquisition, forbade (c. 49) any landlord to call upon a Jew to bless his crops; and in the next canon prohibited a Christian from eating with a Jew. This prohibition against sharing food with a Jew, because he regarded certain meats as unclean, is enacted in many subsequent Gallic councils (Conc. Venet. c. 12, Conc. Agath. c. 40; Conc. Epaon. c. 15, 3 Conc. Aurel. c. 13; 1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 15). Intermarriage with Jews was guarded against as strictly as with heathen (1 Conc. Arvern. c. 6; 3 Conc. Aurel. c. 13; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 14; 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 63). The dangers which were supposed to lurk in association with the Jews are exemplified at length in Chrysostom's 6 Homilies in Judaeos, also in Hom. 23 ad eos qui primo Pasch. jejuntant, and Hom. 24 ad eos qui Judaeorum jejuniis jejuntant (tom. 6 Ed. Savil.). One of the matters regarded with special jealousy by the church was the right of the Jews to hold Christian slaves. By a law of Constantine (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 27), the right had been considerably restricted; but the law appears to have fallen into disuse. The 3rd council of

Orleans, A.D. 538 (c. 13) recognises Christian servitude, but decrees that if a Christian slave takes sanctuary because his Jewish master interferes with his religion, the slave is not to be surrendered, but redeemed at a fair valuation. This decree was repeated and enlarged by subsequent councils (4 Conc. Aurel. c. 30, 31; 1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 15). In Spain the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 66) sanctioned the royal decree which declared it altogether unlawful for a Jew to hold a Christian in bondage, but the desire of gain was too strong for both church and state, for a little later the 10th council, A.D. 656, complains that even the clergy sold Christian captives to the Jews. The treatment of the Jews in Spain occupies no inconsiderable portion of the numerous canons of the synods held in Toledo in the 7th century. Under the reign of Recared, the first Gothic king, and again under Sisebut, the Jews had been subjected to fierce persecution. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, over which Isidore of Seville presided, gave them some relief, but this leniency was partial and shortlived. In the 57th canon of that council it was enacted that no Jew should be converted by violence; but the later canons contain more stringent regulations; children of Jews, who have been baptised, are to be separated from their parents and placed in monasteries or in God-fearing families (c. 60); the testimony of Jews is to be rejected (c. 64), because those who are unfaithful to God cannot be faithful to man; and (c. 65), they are to be excluded from all public offices. A few years later all trace of toleration has disappeared, owing perhaps to the absence of Isidore, who had died in the interval, and the civil law which banished Jews from the kingdom, was ratified by the church (6 Conc. Tolet. c. 3; 8 Conc. Tolet. c. 12). The 12th council, A.D. 681, in response to an exhortation from the king to extirpate the pest of the Jews, proscribed (c. 9) in detail each distinctive Jewish practice. Shortly afterwards the Saracenic invasion swept over the Peninsula, and the Jews enjoyed more peace. In France there is no notice of the Jews earlier than the 6th century. The 3rd council of Orleans, A.D. 538, contains an ordinance (c. 30), forbidding Jews to appear in the streets or hold any intercourse with Christians for four days, from Maundy Thursday till Easter Monday (1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 14). The council of Narbonne, A.D. 589 (c. 9) forbade Jews to hold religious services at the burial of their dead, under a fine of six ounces of gold, a sum which indicates their wealth at that date. By the 5th council of Paris, A.D. 615 (c. 15) no Jew was to hold any public office which made Christians subordinate to him, except on condition of being baptised with his whole family (Conc. Remens. c. 11; Conc. Cabil. c. 9). Later, under Charlemagne, Jews were not only tolerated but treated with consideration. [G. M.]

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FESTIVALS AND LEGEND OF.

1. History of Festivals. (a.) Nativity of Baptist.—The Festival of St. John the Baptist stands in remarkable contrast with those of other saints commemorated by the church, in that with these it is their death which is celebrated, as the birth into the better life, whereas here it is the actual birthday; a circumstance only elsewhere commemorated in the case of our Blessed Lord Himself, that of the Virgin Mary on September 8 being of quite later date; and thus we find St. Augustine saying (Serm. 287, vol. v. 1692, ed. Gaume) "solos duos natales celebrat [ecclesia], hujus [i.e. Johannis] et Christi." There is a very obvious reason to be found for this exceptional state of things from the close historical connection between the birth of the Forerunner and that of the Saviour. This reason is plainly dwelt on in many ancient liturgies, and the Preface in the first mass for the festival in the Leonine Sacramentary may specially be noted.

What claims June 24, the day on which this nativity is celebrated, has to be considered the actual birthday of St. John, it is of course impossible to say definitely. We know from Luke i. 26, that the Baptist was six months older than our Lord, and therefore the difficulty resolves itself into the more important matter as to the correctness of the view which places Christmas on December 25, a question which will be found discussed elsewhere* [CHRISTMAS].

Attention has there been called to the coincidence of Christmas Day with the period of the winter solstice, and the possible reasons underlying that coincidence. The festival of the Nativity of St. John will consequently coincide with the period of the summer solstice, which, like the winter solstice, was a time specially observed in many of the older heathen religions. From this source many superstitious heathen observances in connection with this day passed into early Christianity. One of these, the so-called Fire of St. John the Baptist, will be found touched upon in the following article: another is reprehended by Augustine, "Natali Johannis . . . de sollemnitate superstitiosa pagana Christiani ad mare veniebant et ibi se baptizabant . . . Adjuvo per ipsum, qui hodie natus est, nemo faciat" (Serm. 196 in Nat. Dom. vol. v. 1310).^b

A curious mystical idea was early suggested by the times on which the two birthdays were

* It is true that in the present church year, beginning with Advent, the festival of the Nativity of the Baptist seems to follow by six months that of our Lord; but of course, when, as was originally the case, the year began with Easter, the natural order of sequence prevailed.

^b This practice, as existing among the Mandaeans, is referred to below.

kept, in connection with the Baptist's own words (John iii. 30), "He must increase, but I must decrease," so that from our Lord's nativity the days began to lengthen, and from St. John's to shorten. This idea is found dwelt upon in Augustine (Serm. 287, § 4, vol. v. 1692). See also a sermon formerly attributed to Augustine [Serm. 197 in Append. § 2, ib. 2856], but now referred to Caesarius of Arles: and Maximus Taurinensis (Serm. 4 in Append., Patrol. lix. 850); and the presence of numerous homilies for the festival of the Baptist among the writings of this father show at how early a date it was commemorated. A remark of his may further be added, that it was kept "majorum traditione" (Serm. 292, § 1, vol. v. 1717). Consequently with all allowances for a rhetorical way of speaking, this will carry back the festival at any rate as far as the middle of the fourth century. We find it also mentioned in the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense, where the notice is "viii. Kalend. Jul. Sancti Joannis Baptistae" (Patrol. xiii. 1221)^c. It is wanting, however, in the calendar of Bucherius, which is generally referred to the middle of the fourth century, and in the list of festivals in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 33). These, however, are mere passing exceptions, for its otherwise universal presence in ancient liturgies, martyrologies, and calendars, and the numerous homilies for it in the writings of the fathers (Augustine, Maximus Taurinensis, etc.) are evidence of the wide-spread observance and early date of the festival. The council of Agde (506 A.D.) in ruling concerning private chapels, includes the Nativity of St. John the Baptist among the most important festivals on which a man was not to forsake his proper church, the only others specified being Easter, Christmas, Epiphany, the Ascension, and Whitsunday (Conc. Agathense, can. 21; Labbe, iv. 1386).

It may next be remarked that, as might have been expected from the interdependence of the dates of the natiivities of our Lord and of the Baptist, the East agrees almost unanimously with the West as to the particular day on which the latter is to be commemorated. See e.g. besides the regular Byzantine calendar, the notice in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. xxxii.), Πρόδρομον ἀπὸ τετάρτη εἰκάδι γελῶστο μήνηρ; the curious design in the Moscow pictorial calendar (ibid.); and the calendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches published by Ludolf (Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 32). So far as we have observed, the Armenian church, the only church that does not celebrate Christmas on December 25, is also the only one that does not commemorate the Nativity of the Baptist on June 24, keeping it on Jan. 14 (Neale, Eastern Church, Intro. p. 797).^d as we have shown below, in the Leonine Sacramentary, though not specified by name as in the Ambrosian. We need not, however, with Papebroch, consider St. Ambrose to have been the first to institute the vigil. It is also found included in the later Roman Sacramentaries, the Gelasian and Gregorian, and its observance throughout Gaul and Germany is shown by its presence in ancient martyrologies and calendars of those countries, e.g. [in one form of] the Mart. Gellonense (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 424), the Mart. Autissidorensis (Martene, Collectio Ampliss. vol. vi. 709), and a calendar of the 9th century described by Binterim. This writer refers also to a German Sacramentary published by Gerbert, where the notice for the day is, "jejunium St. Joannis Baptistae, una cum Missa pro more vigiliarum" (Denkw. v. i. 377). It may be mentioned that the council of Seligenstadt (1022 A.D.) ordered that all Christians should abstain from flesh and blood for fourteen days before the festival of St. John the Baptist (can. 1, Labbe ix. 844).

As regards the octave, it would appear that Papebroch is in error in considering that no earlier traces of it could be found than of the 13th or 14th centuries, for Binterim cites several calendars of the 9th and 10th centuries which mark it, e.g. the Cal. Frisingense of the 10th century (Eckhart, Franc. Orient. i. 835). It will be remembered that this octave has a special importance of its own, as being the day on which the Baptist was circumcised and received the divinely declared name of John, and on which the speech of Zacharias was miraculously restored.

(B.) Decollation of the Baptist.—Besides the festival of the Nativity of St. John, there are other Johannine festivals of comparatively minor importance, the chief of which is that of the Decollation, generally commemorated on August 29,^e the chief exception being that the Armenian church celebrated it on April 13, and the Gallican church, according to one view, on the octave of the Nativity of the Baptist, and according to another view on September 24.^f

This festival, too, must be of comparatively early date, for we find it in the Gelasian and [in some forms of] the Gregorian Sacramentaries, to its presence in which Bede alludes (Expos. in Marc. lib. ii.; Patrol. xcii. 192). Again in the Eastern church, we may appeal to the Byzantine and Russian calendars, and reference may be made to the Moscow pictorial calendar and the Greek metrical Iphenides, the notice in the latter being, εἰκάδι ἀπὸ ἑνάτης Προδρόμου ῥάμεν αὐχένα ξίφος. See also Ludolf's Egyptian and Ethiopic calendars (p. 1): here, however, there is a simple commemoration of the Baptist on August 29, and the festival of the Decollation on August 30.

With reference to the usage of the Gallican church alluded to above, the fact that in their liturgy the festival of the Decollation almost im-

^c The other mention in this calendar of St. John the Baptist [vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae et Jacobi Apostoli quem Herodes occidit] is probably due to a copyist's error, because of the constant association of St. John the Evangelist with Dec. 27. It has been maintained, however, that this is an early African form of the festival of the Decollation of St. John the Baptist.

^d For a possible variation from general usage in the case of the church of Tours, see Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. x. 31 (Patrol. lxxi. 666).

^e The Martyrologium Hieronymi (Patrol. xxx. 488), and a MS. of the Martyrology of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 1025), place it on Aug. 30. So also the Egyptian calendar in Selden (p. 221, ed. Amsterdam, 1679).

^f Augusti (Denkw. ii. 156) argues that the Decollation was not originally a distinct festival from that of the Nativity of the Baptist, but the evidence for this view, it must be said, is hardly conclusive.

mediately followed the Nativity of the Baptist, induced Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. v. p. 608) to maintain that the former commemoration was probably held there on the octave of the latter. Mabillon, on the other hand, appeals to a letter which bears the name of Augustine, to one Bibianus, a Gallican bishop, which asserts that the conception and death of St. John fell on the same day (i.e. Sept. 23 or 24), and further refers to August 29 as the day "quando inventum legitur caput domini praeursoris" (Patrol. lxxii. 431). This letter, while obviously spurious, may be taken as evidence as to ancient Gallican custom, and we find the same usage, at any rate partially, among the Goths of Spain. (See Leslie's notes to the Mozarabic Missal; Patrol. lxxxv. 837.)

Legend.—This will perhaps be the most convenient place to give a very brief résumé of the legends respecting the body of St. John. This was said to have been buried at Sebaste, a town on the site of the earlier Samaria. In the time of the emperor Julian, the coffin was broken open, the bones burnt, and the dust scattered abroad. With this definite statement, it might have been thought that the history of the relics was at an end; but the story runs that the Christians saved some of the remains, which were sent to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Alexandria to Athanasius (Rufinus, Hist. Eccles. xi. 28: Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iii. 3; vol. iii. 918, ed. Schulze and Neesselt: Theophanes, Chronographia, vol. i. 117, ed. Classen); part also were obtained by Theodoret for his own church of Cyrus (see his Relig. Hist. vol. iii. 1245). In order to contain the relics of the Baptist, a church was some time afterwards (circa 390 A.D.) built in Alexandria on the site of the temple of Serapis by the emperor Theodosius, and finished in the reign of his son Arcadius. Concerning the Head of the Baptist also there is a long series of traditions. These are often plainly conflicting, and it is to be regretted that a scholar with Papebroch's great learning should have wasted time on the attempt to reconcile them. The Head was said to have been buried in Herod's palace, where it was first discovered about the year 330 A.D. and taken into Cilicia. In the time of the emperor Valens it was moved as far as a place named Cosilaus, but about 390 A.D. Theodosius transferred it to Constantinople (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii. 21). Besides all this, however, we read of a finding of the Head at Emesa in 454 A.D., a discovery which can hardly harmonize with the preceding, and which was not improbably due to a growing demand of the age for relics. However, there is a further story of another translation of the Head, from Emesa to Constantinople in 850 A.D., to preserve it from the Saracens, and here it remained till 1204 A.D., when Constantinople was taken by the Latins. The Head then, or part of it, was brought to France by one Walo de Sartone, a canon of Avions. The further legends given by Papebroch, compared with which the above almost rises to the dignity of history, we pass over.

We find at a comparatively early period evidence of the existence of literature on the subject of the Finding of the Head, for at a council held at Rome in 494 A.D. under the episcopate of Gelasius, such writings are with others ordered to be read with caution. ("Scripta de inventione capitis Joannis Baptistae novellae quaedam relationes sunt, et nonnulli eas Catholici legunt. Sed cum haec ad Catholicorum manus pervenerint, beati Pauli apostoli praececat sententia, Omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete." Patrol. lix. 161.)

(γ.) We are now naturally brought to the third of the Johannine festivals, the Finding of the Head. It would appear that different supposed findings are commemorated, and that this accounts for the various days on which the commemorations are held. The letter of the Pseudo-Augustine already quoted names August 29 as the day on which the Head was found, and in connection with this we may cite one form of the martyrology of Bede, "Passio et decollatio vel potius inventio capitis beati Joannis Baptistae . . ." (Patrol. xciv. 1025). That day, however, has ordinarily been reserved for the Decollation, and Feb. 24, for the Finding. In that arrangement, generally speaking, Western, Byzantine, Coptic, and Ethiopic calendars agree: and the Byzantine also commemorates another finding on May 25. There is besides a commemoration of the "Apparition corporis" ["inventio ossium" Copt.] in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars on May 27, and of the "depositio capitis" on Oct. 27 [26, Selden] in the latter. The notice for Feb. 24 in the Greek metrical Ephemerides is εἰκόστη προδρομοιο φάνη κάρη ἀμφι τεράττην.

(δ.) The festival of the Conception of the Baptist on Sept. 23 [or 24] is also found in the above calendars, and in many Western martyrologies. It is not recognised, however, in the Armenian calendar. The notice for Sept. 23, in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, is εἰκόδι δὲ τρίτῃ γαστήρ λάβε προδρομον εἶσω.

(ε.) Besides the two preceding, comparatively unimportant festivals, we find also a commemoration of the imprisonment on Aug. 24 in the Ethiopic calendar (Ludolf, p. 39), and general commemorations of the Baptist in the same, on Aug. 29 and April 10 (ib. pp. 1, 25): and on June 6 and September 5 in the Armenian calendar (Neale, pp. 799, 801).

2. Liturgical Notices.—The oldest Roman Sacramentary, the Leonine, contains no less than five masses for the festival of the Nativity of the Baptist. The first of these evidently belongs to the vigil, for though included with the second and third under the general heading Natale S. Jo. Bapt., still the point is settled by the words of the preface (also occurring, be it said, in the Gregorian and Ambrosian liturgies in the service for the vigil) " . . . exhibentes solemne jejunium, quo nati Joannis Baptistae natalitia praevenimus" (Leonis Opera; vol. ii. 28, ed. Ballerini). The fourth and fifth masses, portions of which are also found in the Gelasian Sacramentary, are headed ad fontem, showing the use made of the day as a solemn season for baptism. The Gelasian Sacramentary both has services for the vigil and Nativity, each with its own title (Patrol. lxxiv. 1165), and also for the Decollation (dies passionis) of the Baptist (ib. 1175): and the same too is the case with the Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturgg. Lat. i. 392, 420), and the Gregorian Sacramentary (coll. 108, 126; ed. Menard). In this last, while the first mass is headed in vigilia, the second bears the title In prima missa de nocte.

In the ancient Gallican Lectionary, published by Mabillon, we find no mention of a vigil: the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel, are respectively Isaiah xl. 1-20; Acts xiii. 16-47; Luke i. 5-25, 39-47, 56-68, [to the words Dominus Deus Israel], 80. This is immediately followed by the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, and this by the "Passio S. Joannis Baptistae" for which the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel are respectively Isaiah xliii. 1-13, 22, —xlv. 5; Heb. xi. 33—xii. 7; Matt. xiv. 1-14 (de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. pp. 158, 160). The same too is the case in the Gallican missal, save that there the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul is immediately followed by a mass "In Natale unius Apostoli et Martyris" (Op. cit. lib. iii. 271, 275). In the Mozarabic missal we find forms given for the Sunday "pro adventu S. Johannis," as well as for the festival of the Nativity itself, and for that of the Decollation. The prophetic lection, epistle and gospel in the three cases are Isaiah xl. 1-9, Eph. iv. 1-14, Mark i. 1-8; Jer. i. 5-10, 17-19; Gal. i. 11-24, Luke i. 57-70, 80; Wisdom iv. 7-15, 2 Cor. xii. 2-10, Matt. xiv. 1-15. Sundry variations to the above occurring in ancient lectionaries are mentioned (in loc.) in the notes to Leslie's edition of the Mozarabic missal. (Patrol. lxxxv. 751, 756, 837; and for the Breviary [June 24, Sept. 24], Patrol. lxxxvi. 1129, 1133, 1209.)

3. Miscellaneous Notices.—We have hitherto spoken of the Baptist solely from the Christian point of view, we shall now dwell briefly on some further references. Josephus's account (Antiq. xviii. 5. 2) is practically the same as that of the New Testament, but he adds that, besides other causes, Herod Antipas was more or less moved to the murder of St. John by political reasons, the dread of a revolution.*

There are, moreover, some curious associations connecting St. John with some semi-Christian, or rather non-Christian, religions. The Clementine Homilies (ii. 23) make Simon Magus to have been the chief (πρώτος καὶ δοκιμώτατος) disciple of St. John, who is further described as a ἡμεροβαπτιστής (see Hegesippus apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 22; Justin Martyr Dial. cum Tryph. c. 80; and esp. Epiphanius, Haer. 17). We may perhaps, therefore, connect the Hemero-baptistae with the so called Mandaean (or properly Mandaeans), known also as the Zabians, disciples of St. John, Christians of St. John. This sect, which still exists, chiefly near the Tigris, claims to be the lineal successors of the actual disciples of St. John, respecting whom they give some wild traditions, and whom they regard as superior to Christ. They totally ignore his beheading, and say that on his death-bed he bid his disciples to crucify his body, in reference to the death that should befall his kinsman Jesus. The body was then preserved in a crystal sarcophagus at Sijster in Persia. (Ignatius a Jesu, Narratio originis, rituum et errorum Christianorum Johannis, Romae, 1652; Kaempfer, Amoenitates Ezoticae pp. 435-454, Lemgoviae 1712; Norberg, De religione et lingua Subaeorum; Petermann in Herzog's Real-Encycl. s. vv. Mendäer, Zabier :

Chwolsohn, Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus pp. 100-138, St. Petersburg, 1856.) They celebrate in August (or April, according to Ignatius a Jesu) an annual festival of three days' duration, in honour of the Baptist, and an annual festival in June of five days' duration, when all the sect receive baptism. (Kaempfer, p. 446.) This reminds us of Augustine's protest cited above. Their chief sacred book, the Sidra Adem or Book of Adam, edited by Norberg (Codex Nasaraeus, liber Adami appellatus, Hafniae), and recently by Petermann (Lipsiae, 1867), contains several references to St. John (see vol. i. 108, vol. ii. 20, 22, 24, 60; ed. Norberg). They also possess a "Book of John [the Baptist]" reported to have been given to their ancestors by John himself; of which there is a MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (Norberg de lingua, &c., p. 4). Among their most curious superstitions is one in connection with the baptism of our Lord by St. John, which accounts for the view they take of blue as an unholy colour (Kaempfer, p. 447).

For a possible connection of the sect of the Elxaites with the teaching of St. John, see Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum iii. 158. Chwolsohn (Op. cit. p. 112) views Elxai as the actual founder of the Mandaean, another point of coincidence.

Among the Mohammedans, St. John is accounted as a prophet, and he is mentioned in the Koran in terms of high respect (Sura iii. 39). The passage in Sale's translation runs, "John, who shall bear witness to the word which cometh from God, an honourable person, chaste, and one of the righteous prophets."

We must in conclusion only allude in the briefest terms to a point, which though not strictly within our province, must not be absolutely passed over, the position of St. John the Baptist as the patron saint of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John, and his association in some form with the esoteric rites of the order of the Templars, though probably here there has been at times a confusion with St. John the Evangelist. For the possible connection with St. John the Baptist in such rites as the Baphomet, the dissevered head, etc., see Von Hammer, Mysterium Baphometis revelatum. Vindobonae, 1818. Reference may also be made to Von Wedekind, Das Johannis-Fest in der Frey-Maurerei. Frankfurt, 1818.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FIRE OF. We called attention in the previous article to the way in which early Christian writers dwell on the mystical significance of the fact that the festival of St. John the Baptist coincides with the period of the summer solstice, and we also referred in passing to various superstitious rites and customs, which Christianity evidently inherited from heathenism. The most prominent of these is that which has long been known under the name of the Fire of St. John the Baptist,

* As a parallel to this we may mention the story of Herod the Great's attempt to slay the infant John from the fear lest he might hereafter prove the king of Israel (Protév. Jacobi, c. 23) which, with numerous attendant customs, is obviously nothing more than a relic of ancient sun-worship, connected with that period of the year when the sun has reached the turning point of his annual course. This custom of kindling great fires in the open air on Midsummer's Eve has been shown to exist (and in not a few places even to the present day) among almost all European nations, as well as in the East* (see Jac. Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie pp. 583 sqq., ed. 2); and it can hardly be rightly viewed unless we associate it with the universally observed festival at the winter solstice, the Natalis Invicti, when the sun is, as it were, born again for the coming year [CHRISTMAS], with that on May-day, the la Beal-tine of the Irish, when the sun's warmth has awakened the dormant earth [JAMES THE LESS, ST., FESTIVAL OF], and with other similar instances.

Thus, it will be seen, there is plainly no original connection of St. John the Baptist with the practice now under consideration. The birthday of our Lord having been once fixed, by whatsoever means, at the winter solstice (and there is certainly no inconsiderable body of evidence pointing to the conclusion that the well-nigh universal prevalence of a festival at that time of the year had much to do with the matter, and that it is a case of the transference of worship from the material sun to Christ, the sun of righteousness), then, since there was a difference of six months between the ages of our Lord and of the Baptist, the birthday of the latter would naturally be assigned to the summer solstice. The existing heathen practices, at first strongly opposed by the church, gradually came to be tolerated and finally to be recognised; while the attempt was continually made to associate the customs of the day with the saint whose festival had thus happened to coincide with the older celebration.

A curious view on this subject, which may just claim a passing notice, is found in Hislop's Two Babylons (p. 184), which refers the great Midsummer festival of many heathenisms primarily to the Babylonian festival of Tammuz, who is further identified with Oannes, the Fish-God mentioned by Berosus (lib. i. p. 48, ed. Richter). It is there maintained that this name was suggestive of that of Joannes, and thus a Christian festival grew out of a heathen one, with hardly a change in the name of the object of the festival. More evidence, however, and less theorizing is wanted, before such a view can be seriously entertained.

To return now to the main part of our subject;—we shall cite, as showing the church's original point of view in the matter, a passage from one of the sermons of Augustine first edited by Frangipane in 1819, where he protests strongly against this practice of the lighting of fires on St. John's Eve:—"Cessent religiones sacrilegiorum, cessent studia atque joca vanitatum; non fiant illa quae fieri solent, non quaedam jam in daemonum honorem, sed adhuc tamen secundum daemonum morem. Hesterno die post vesperam putrescentibus flammis antiquitus more daemo-niorum tota civitas flagrabat atque putrescebat, et universam aerem fumus obduxerat" (Serm. 8 de S. Joh. Bapt. § 3; Patrol. xlv. 996). Theodoret again (Quaest. in iv. Reg. [xvi. 3], Interr. 47, vol. i. 539, ed. Schulze) in referring to Ahaz's "causing his sons to pass through the fire," sees in it an underlying reference to a custom existing in his time, of lighting fires in the streets, over which men and boys leaped, and even infants were carried by their mothers. Theodoret states that this was done once a year, and though he does not further define the time, there is a probable reference to the Midsummer fire. The Quinisext or Trullan council (circa 692, A.D.) forbids the lighting of such fires before houses, etc., and the leaping over them; and penalties are laid down for all, cleric or lay, who followed the practice (can. 65, Labbe vi. 1172). In this last case, however, the periods are distinctly specified as the times of the new moon, but the superstition legislated against is clearly a parallel one; and, at any rate, Theodore Balsamon (cited by Paciaudius, infra), in his comments on this canon, makes special mention of the fires on St. John the Baptist's Eve. One more such instance may suffice: the German council, which sat under the authority of St. Boniface, either at Augsburg or Ratisbon in 742 A.D., forbids "illos sacrilegos ignes, quos Ned-frates [Nodfyr, Niedfyr] vocant" (can. 5, Labbe vi. 1535).

We have already referred to the change of feeling with which such practices were regarded by the church as time went on, and to the consequent attempt to connect them directly with the Baptist. As examples of this we may cite Joh. Beletth (Rat. div. off. c. 137; Patrol. ccii. 141), who wrote about 1170 A.D., and Durandus (Rat. div. off. vii. 12. 10). In these passages reference is made to three customs practised at this season, the lighting of fires (which are described as being made of "ossa et quaedam alia immunda"), the carrying of firebrands about the fields, and the rolling of a wheel. After a strange explanation of the first of these as being a means for driving away dragons, another reason is given, namely, that it was done in memory of the burning of the bones of St. John the Baptist at Sebaste (see last article). The carrying about of firebrands is explained as having reference to him who was a "burning and shining light" (John v. 35); while the rolling of the wheel, which has an obvious reference to the course of the sun, is made further to refer to the glory of St. John waning before Him who was the True Light.

An attempt to disprove the idea of the connection of the Fire of St. John with heathen rites is made by Paciaudius (de Cultu S. Joh. Bapt. Antiquitates Christianae, pp. 335 sqq.), who, however, is mainly combating the idea of its connection with the Roman Palilia, a point urged by Reiske, Zeumer (infra), and other writers. The arguments here, however, though ingenious, rest altogether on too narrow a footing.

In addition to works already cited, reference may also be made to F. C. de Khautz de ritu ignis in Natali S. Joh. Bapt. accensi. * Nor need this remark be confined to the old world, for we find the same class of rites prevailing also among the Peruvians under the dominion of the Incas (Prescott, Conquest of Peru, i. pp. 96 sqq.; 10th ed.).

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., IN ART, ETC.

1. Iconography.—We find abundant evidence that representations of St. John the Baptist were very frequent in early Christian times. Epiphanius (Conc. Nic. II. Act. vi.; Labbe, vii. 538) tells us that those who delighted in "soft clothing" were rebuked by the figure of the Baptist in his "raiment of camel's hair;" in this garb, indeed, he is most usually represented, especially in the Baptism of the Saviour [see JORDAN], a subject of very frequent recurrence in early Christian art, as for instance, in the well-known painting in the cemetery of Pontianus, in many mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xxiii.), and on various engraved stones and bronze medals (Vettori, Nun. ver. explic. p. 68 and frontispiece), where he is shown in the act of pouring water from a shell on the Lord's head; he carries a staff in his left hand.

Sometimes the Forerunner points with his finger to the Messiah, represented in the form of a lamb, or in person (Concil. in Trull. can. lxxii.). He has been figured by some artists in tunic and pallium, as for example on the bottom of a cup given by Buonarroti (Vetri, tav. vi. No. 1), and assigned to St. John the Baptist. If this assumption be correct, we have here one of the most ancient representations of this saint, but many competent judges believe that it is a representation of St. Paul. Be this as it may, we find the Baptist clad in a similar manner, and also nimbused, in a mosaic of the 6th century (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxxi.), in the centre of an ivory cross of almost the same date (Paciaudi, De cultu Joann. Bapt. p. 182, see woodcut), in an ancient diptych figured by Gori (The-saur. Diptych. vol. iii. p. 235), and also in bust upon a chalcedony attributed to the 5th century (Paciaudi, u. s. p. 189).

In the Menaea of the Greeks the figure of St. John the Baptist is winged, in allusion to the passage of Isaiah quoted by St. Mark (i. 2), and applied by the Lord Himself to the Forerunner: "Behold! I send My Messenger before Thy Face which shall prepare Thy way before Thee." His right hand is raised in the act of exhortation, and in his left he carries a cross, and a scroll inscribed with these words.

The annunciation of the birth of the Baptist is depicted in mosaic on the great arch of St. Maria Maggiore, A.D. 443. The angel is ad-dressing Zacharias, who stands before the altar of incense (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. xlix. nn. 1, 2, 3). In the ancient mosaic on the por-tico of St. John Lateran the head of John the Baptist is carried in a dish by a lictor, while the decapitated body remains still kneeling before the executioner whose sword is still raised.

2. Dedications.—The first church dedicated to him was probably the basilica built by Constantine, and dedicated to the Forerunner, upon the Coelian Mount, near the Lateran. It is, however, not improbable that the name was transferred to it from the baptistery of Constantine, a short distance from it, which was dedicated to St. John.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius states that Constantine built churches dedicated to the same saint at Ostia and at Albano (in S. Sylvest. §§ 45, 46; Migne, cxxvii. 1524 f.), and Du Cange mentions one at Constantinople (Constantinop. Christ. lib. iv. § 4), of which, however, we can find no other record. At Naples it is commonly asserted that a church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was built in that city by Constantine on the site of the temple of Hadrian, in fulfilment of a vow made during a violent storm on his voyage from Sicily. But it has been proved by Majocchi, that this founder could not have been Constantine the Great, though he may possibly have been the younger Constantine, son of Constans (De Cath. Neap. part ii. 3). It appears certain that at Florence in early times a church was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, who became the tutelary saint and protector of the city (Villani, Chroniche, l. i. c. 60). St. Benedict dedicated to the Baptist one of the two oratories which he erected on the site of the temple of Apollo on Mount Cassino (Greg. Dialog. ii. 8, in Migne, lxi. col. 152 B). Tradition asserts that at Milan a temple of Janus was converted into a church, and dedicated as "Sancti Joannis ad quatuor facies" (Castellione, Mediæv. Antiq. pars 1, fasc. 2). There were at Ravenna in the 6th and 7th centuries two churches dedicated to this saint, one of which, called In Marmorario, specially commemorated his decollation (Rubeus, Hist. Raven. ii. and iii.). At Monza, queen Theodelinda built a church in honour of St. John the Baptist, on which she lavished wealthy endowments and precious gifts of every description. Agilulph, her husband, followed her example at Turin (Paciaudi u. s. pp. 15 and 16). Paciaudi enumerates many other churches dedicated to the Baptist in different places and in later times. Altars dedicated to him were usually to be found in the baptisteries; these were always placed under his protection, adorned with paintings and sculptures in which he is the principal figure, and sometimes enriched with his relics. (Paciaudi, De Cultu Joann. Bapt.; Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. t. v.). [C.]

JOHN THE EVANGELIST, ST., FESTIVAL OF.

1. History of Festival.—It is not necessary to enter here upon a discussion of the various early legends respecting St. John the Evangelist, which will be found treated of in the Bible Dictionary, to which reference may be made. We shall here merely speak of the festivals of St. John, and add a notice of the chief pseudonymous works attributed to him.

We hardly find the festival of St. John standing out in early times with that prominence which we should expect in the case of one so essentially of the chief of the apostles. As we have already mentioned in the article on the festival of St. John the Baptist, there is a not improbable commemoration of the evangelist in the ancient Calendarium Carthaginense, if, as seems reasonable, we assume the word Baptistae to have been written "per incuriam scribae" for Evangelistae. The notice is "vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae, et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). On this assumption then we have a joint commemoration of the two brothers, the sons of Zebedee; and the same combination is also found in the Gothico-Gallic missal (infra). The Armenian church commemorates the two brothers together on Dec. 28 (Neale, Eastern Church; Introd. p. 804); and the Ethiopic church on Sep. 27 (Ludolf, Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 5).

In the West, however, the name of St. John alone is ordinarily found associated with Dec. 27, a day which by its close proximity to Christmas seems especially appropriate for the commemoration of the beloved disciple, as also those of the Innocents, the first martyrs for Christ, and of Stephen the first conscious martyr. This idea is often dwelt upon by mediaeval writers, some of whom allude further to a tradition that the Evangelist died on the day which is now the festival of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, but that his commemoration was transferred to a day in the octave of Christmas (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. vii. 42). As we have implied above, however, there is a lack of recognition of this festival in the writings of the earlier fathers, scarcely any of whom furnish us with homilies for the day, even those who have written them for the festivals of St. Stephen and the Innocents.

It may be noted here that in many ancient calendars December 27 is marked not as the Natale or Nativitas, but as the Assumptio or Transitus of St. John. Thus we find, e.g., in the ancient so-called Martyrologium Hieronymi "vi. Kal. Januarii Assumptio S. Joannis Evangelistae apud Ephesum" (Patrol. xxx. 137), and similarly the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achéry, Spicilegium xiii. 390). This wording is doubtlessly due to the belief in some of the curious legends as to the death of this apostle. Of this we find no trace in the earliest writers; thus Polycrates, a near successor of St. John, simply says ἐν Ἐφέσῳ κεκοίμηται (Polyer. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii. 31). Soon, however, the legendary element showed itself, and as early as the time of Augustine the story prevailed that the apostle had been laid in the tomb merely in the semblance of death, but that he really lived was shown by the movements of the ground where he was laid, and the appearance as of dust expelled from the grave by the process of breathing (August. Tractatus 124 in Joannem c. 2; vol. iii. 2467, ed. Gaume). Later writers speak of this dust by the title of manna (see e.g. Gregor. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum i. 30, Patrol. lxxi. 730; Hildebert Turon. Serm. in festo S. Johan., Patrol. clxxi. 726 sqq.). It is this which appears to be specially dwelt on by the Greek church in their commemoration of St. John on May 8 (infra). In some writers the legend makes St. John live to the end of the world, to witness with Enoch and Elijah to the truth (see e.g. Ephraemius Antioch. apud Photium, Bibliotheca, cod. 229; Patrol. Gr. ciii. 985). According to another form, he died in the ordinary course of nature, and was immediately raised from the dead and translated into paradise (see e.g. Nicephorus Hist. Eccles. ii. 42). All these legends have doubtlessly grown from a misunderstanding of our Lord's words in John xxi. 22.

We may add further that the festival of St. John "ad portam Latinam" on May 6, which commemorates the apostle's having been thrown at that place into a cauldron of boiling oil and escaping unhurt, is often noted as the "Nativitas (Natalis) ad portam Latinam" (e.g. in the Gregorian Sacramentary and some forms of the Martyrologium Hieronymi) the apostle having there as fully won the martyr's crown as though no miraculous deliverance had been wrought.^a Whatever truth there may be in this story, it is at any rate as old as the time of Tertullian (see de Praescript. c. 36; cf. Jerome, adv. Jovinian. i. 26, vol. ii. 280 [where he appeals to Tertullian], Comm. in Matthaeum xxi. 23, vol. vii. 155).

In later times a church was built near the Latin gate in memory of this event. It may reasonably be inferred that it is to this church that Anastasius Bibliothecarius refers as being restored by Adrian I. (ob. 795 A.D.), though he describes it as "ecclesiam beati Johannis Baptistae sitam juxta portam Latinam" (Vitae Pontificum, Adrian I.; Patrol. cxxviii. 1191). On this point see further G. M. Crescimbeni, L'Istoria della chiesa di S. Giovanni avanti Porta Latina; Roma, 1716.

In the Greek church St. John is commemorated on May 8 and September 26, regard being had on the former day to the miracle of the "manna," and on the latter to his translation. Thus in the Greek metrical Ephemerides published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i., pp. xxvii. xlv.) the notices are ὁδοῦν τε πελέουσι βοδισμὸν^b Βροντόγονοι, πρὸς γε θεὸν μετέστη βρόντης παῖς εἰκάδι ἔκτη. The latter festival is also found in the calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic churches^c (Ludolf, p. 5), which also commemorate St. John on December 30, and also his translation on May 11 (ib. pp. 16, 28).

Before passing on to the next part of our subject, we may refer briefly to a custom prevalent in the middle ages of sending to friends on St. John's day presents of wine which had been previously blessed (Benedictio or Hausstus S. Joannis). The origin of this custom is not certainly known. Some have viewed it as a continuation of the old Roman custom of sending to friends at the beginning of January presents in honour of Janus. Whether or no there be any connection between the two customs, it seems probable that there must be some reference to the legend of the poisoned wine cup sent to St. John, who signed it with the cross and drank it unhurt (see e.g. Isid. Hispal. de ortu et obitu Patrum c. 72; Patrol. lxxxiii. 151). This legend has very likely arisen from our Lord's words (Matt. xx. 23: cf. also Mark xvi. 18), and has itself obviously been the source of a common mediæval representation of St. John, as holding a cup round which a serpent is entwined.

^a Polycrates (l.c.) calls St. John μάρτυς, and the Gothico-Gallic Missal (infra) speaks of the two sons of Zebedee together as martyrs.

^b So Ephraemius (l.c.) τὸ ἅγιον ἔχειν μύρον.

2. Liturgical Notices.—In the Leonine Sacramentary we have two masses for the festival of St. John on December 27 (Leonis Opp. ii. 153, ed. Ballerini). There is, however, but one in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1060), and in the Gregorian, as given by Menard (col. 10); he mentions, however, that two occur in the Cl. Rotoldi, and in the text of Pamelius, and also in the Gregorian Antiphony (ib. col. 659). We may probably assume that one mass was for early morning, and another for a later service. In some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary is also a mass for May 6, "Nativitas S. Joannis ante portam Latinam" (ib. col. 87). The Ambrosian liturgy gives one mass for December 27 (Pamelius, Liturgg. Lat. i. 307).

In the ancient Gallican lectionary published by Mabillon, Dec. 27 is inscribed in festo S. Johannis, but in the Gothico-Gallic missal the heading is in Natale Apostolorum Jacobi et Johannis (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallican., lib. ii. 111, iii. 196). In the former case the epistle and gospel assigned for the day (no prophetic lection is provided) are Rev. xiv. 1-7, Mark x. 35 . . . (one leaf of the MS. is here torn away). The Gothico-Gallic missal has also a commemoration of St. John, "ante portam Latinam"^d (Op. cit. iii. 262).

The Mozarabic liturgy commemorates St. John alone on Dec. 27 (Patrol. lxxxv. 199), the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel being respectively, Wisdom x. 10-18, 1 Thess. iv. 12-17, John xxi. 15-24. (For sundry variations from these, see Leslie's notes to the Mozarabic liturgy (loc.) For the service in the Mozarabic breviary, see Patrol. lxxxvi. 127.

The so-called Liber C mitis provides for the festival of December 27 an Old Testament lection and gospel, Eccles. xv. 1-6, and John xxi. 19-24 (Patrol. xxx. 489).

3. Apocryphal Literature.—With the name of St. John is associated a considerable amount of pseudonymus literature. First among these we may mention the book de transitu Mariæ, first edited by Tischendorf (Apocalypses Apocryphæ, pp. 70 sqq.; see also his Prolegomena, pp. xxxiv. sqq., and Fabricius, C dex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 352, ed. 1719). This was one of the books condemned by the council at Rome under Gelasius in 494 A.D., where it is simply spoken of as "Liber qui appellatur Transitus, id est, Assumptio Sanctæ Mariæ" (Patrol. lix. 162); and the false claim to the name of John the θεολόγος is referred to by Epiphanius Monachus (de Vita B. Virginis, c. 1; Patrol. Gr. cxx. 188). Fabricius also refers to another apocryphal document found attached to a copy of the above, ὑπόμνημα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς τὴν ἀποκαθάρσιν αὐτοῦ συγγραφείσα (sic) παρὰ τοῦ ἁγίου θεολόγου. A passing allusion may be made here to the Templars' mutilated recension of the canonical gospel of St. John, published by Thilo (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti i. 817) as the Codex Evangelii Johannis Parisiis in sacro Templariorum tabulario asservato, and also to the Book of St. John, said to have been in use among the Albigenses, and brought to light by the Inquisition of Carcassonne (Op. cit. 884).

We may next mention the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, the Greek text of which was first edited in Tischendorf's Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha (pp. 266 sqq.), and a Syriac version of the latter part of it in Dr. Wright's Apocryphal Acts. Any detailed account of this document is out of place here; reference may be made to Tischendorf (pp. lxxiii. sqq.): it may, however, be noted that it was known to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25). A history of St. John at Ephesus, in a Syriac translation of an unknown Greek original, has been published by Dr. Wright (Op. cit.).

There is also an apocryphal Apocalypse of St. John, first edited by Birch in 1804, and subsequently by Tischendorf (Apocal. Apocr. pp. 70 sqq. cf. pp. xviii. sqq.). Assemani (Bibliotheca Orientalis, iii. part 1, 282) mentions three MSS. of an Arabic version of this document. Less important than the above, but claiming a passing notice, are the Epistle ad Hydropicum quemdam given by the Pseudo-Prochorus (see Fabricius, i. 926), the Prayer of St. John, cited from Martene by Fabricius (iii. 334), and the Prophetia de Consummatione Mundi, said to have been discovered with a commentary of Caecilius in 1588 A.D., in Granada (ib. iii. 720). In connection with St. John may also be mentioned the Historia Apostolica (lib. v.) of the Pseudo-Abdias (ib. i. 531 sqq.) and the Passio S. Johannis Evangelistæ of Melitius (ib. iii. 604). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 16) connect with the name of St. John the regulations as to the ordination of presbyters. Finally, we may mention the Syro-Jacobite liturgy of St. John the Evangelist. A Latin translation of this is given by Renaudot (Liturgg. Orientalium Collectio, ii. 163, ed. 1847).

In addition to works already cited, reference may also be made to Tillemont (Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclésiastique, vol. i. pp. 370 sqq. and notes 17 and 18, ed. 1693) and to Augusti (Uenkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, i. 288 sqq., iii. 242 sqq.). [R. S.]

JOHN, ST., THE EVANGELIST, IN ART. From very early times the eagle has been assigned to St. John as his emblem among the four living creatures which have always been held symbolical of the four Evangelists; indeed the most ancient method of representing the beloved disciple appears to have been by this symbol alone. [EVANGELISTS.]

Perhaps the oldest personal representations of ^d This mass occurs between those for the "Finding of the Cross" and those for the Rogation days. It contains, however, it must be stated, no reference to the event "ad portam Latinam."

him are to be found on two glass cups, where he is figured in bust conversing with St. Peter; the names SIMON, JOHANNES being given (Garucci, Vetri ornati di fig. in oro, tav. xxiv 4 and 5). In some mosaics of the 6th century we find him as a young man—all representations make him young—with long hair; a nimbus surrounds his head; he wears the tunic and pallium, and carries his Gospel pressed to his heart. In the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna a mosaic of A.D. 547, shows the Evangelist seated, holding the codex of his Gospel open in his hands; before him is a small table with a pen and ink-bottle, and the symbolical eagle appears above his head. (See woodcut.) Lamberti (Biblioth. Caesar. Vindobon. vol. ii. pars i. p. 571) gives an illumination from a very early Greek manuscript in which St. John is represented seated, dictating his Gospel to a deacon.

We find him standing with a volume in his hand in a mosaic which dates from the 9th century, in the church of St. Maria Novele. This figure and those of three other apostles occupy four small niches, which are placed two on each side of a large niche, containing the seated figure of the Virgin with the infant Jesus on her lap (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tav. liii.).

In the crypt of St. Urban in Caffarella, at Rome, we find a somewhat coarse and very curious painting of the same date, in which St. John appears with similar surroundings. He stands on the right of the Virgin and St. Urban on the left (Perret, vol. i. p. lxxxiii.).

The attempted martyrdom of St. John before the Latin Gate is figured in an ancient mosaic on the portico of St. John Lateran (Ciamp. De Sac. Aedif. tab. ii. 8). The scene is now very imperfectly represented because the mosaic is much damaged, but the flagellation of the apostle can still be distinguished, and also the cutting off of his hair. In the oldest representations of the Crucifixion, St. John uniformly occupies the position he assumes in his own narrative (John xix. 25, 26), standing with the Virgin at the foot of the cross, the faces of both resting upon their hands in token of grief. He appears thus in a fresco in the cemetery of St. Julius (Bottari, xciii.) and in the celebrated diptych of Rambona, figured by Buonarroti (Vetri Ornati, p. 285). Over his head are the words, DISSIPULE (sic) ECCE (mater tua).

An almost identical representation is found upon the very ancient ivory tablet in the form of a pax, mentioned by Florentino, taken from the collegiate church of Civitalis, in the diocese of Aquileia. St. John stands by the Lord's side with this inscription: AP. ECCE M TVA (Apostole ecce mater tua).

Basilicas were dedicated to St. John the Evangelist in very early times; among others, we may mention that of St. John Lateran. The ancient Vatican had also an altar raised to his honour by pope Symmachus (Ciamp. De Sac. Aedif. p. 60, 1 D). (Martigny, Dict. des Antig. Chrét. s. v.) [C.]

JORDAN, THE RIVER, IN ART. The representations of the river Jordan in early Christian art, especially those sculptured on sarcophagi (Bottari, tav. xxix.), are generally copied, with more or less exactness, from the river-gods of pagan antiquity. Thus we find him personified as an old man with a crown and sceptre of reeds, sometimes leaning upon an urn from which flows a stream of water. He is thus represented in the mosaic in the baptistery of St. John in fonte at Ravenna, with the name

Mosaic at Ravenna. From Ciampini.

JORDANN, written over his head (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tav. lxx., see woodcut); also in an illumination in a copy of the Book of Judges, in the Vatican. The same mythological type appears again at Ravenna, in a mosaic in the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin; in this instance, however, two horns are substituted for the crown of reeds on the head of the figure (Id. ibid. II. tav. xxiii.).

The Jordan, simply as a stream, appears in some sculptured representations of the translation of Elijah (Bottari, Sculpture, tav. lii. 2), in a painting of the baptism of the Lord in the cemetery of Pontianus, in another fresco in the cemetery of Callixtus (Bottari, lxxii.), on a bronze medallion of the baptism of the Lord with the name of the river below, JORDA (Vettori, Nouv. Aer. explic. frontisp.), in some bottoms of cups, where it flows at the feet of the Saviour (Buonarrotti, tav. vi. 1), and in various mosaics, that of SS. Cosmas and Damian at Rome, for example, with the inscription

JORDANES (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tav. xvi.). See JESUS CHRIST, p. 876. On some sarcophagi the Lord appears seated, in the act of teaching, and, at his feet, a half-length human figure holding with both hands a piece of cloth, which inflated by the wind, spreads above his head in the form of an arch. This has been supposed to be another emblem of the river Jordan (Cavedoni, Ragguol. crit. p. 50), on the banks of which several of the Lord's discourses were delivered. But see FIRMAMENT. JOSEPH, ST. Early Christian art has left us no work in which St. Joseph appears alone, or even as a principal figure. In such subjects as the Nativity, the Adoration of the Shepherds, and of the Magi, and the finding of Jesus in the Temple, he appears only as an accessory; never in an exalted, seldom even in a prominent, position.

St. Joseph. Carving in Ivory, from Martigny.

He is represented as a middle-aged man, sometimes bald (Bottari, tav. lxxxvi.), sometimes with thick hair (Id. lxxxv.; Allegranza, Monum. Sacr. di Milano, tav. iv.); he is generally robed in tunic and pallium, and carries some carpenter's tool, as the distinctive mark of his calling (Molanus, de Hist. SS. Imag. p. 269). Thus in a diptych in Milan cathedral he is represented with a saw (Bugati, Memor. di S. Celso, p. 282), on the sarcophagus of Celsus, also in Milan, he carries an adze (Bugati, u. s. p.

242), and wears the everyday costume of an artisan.

In all these cases St. Joseph retains the unobtrusive position assigned to him in the gospel narratives—always in the background, and apparently full of earnest thought. He appears absorbed in his duty as the protector of the Holy Family; in an attitude of watchful love he stands behind the Virgin while the Holy Child sleeps upon her knees; sometimes his hand is stretched over them in token of protection (Perret, vol. v. pl. xii.); sometimes, seated near the cradle, he guards the slumbers of the Divine Infant.

Bandini gives an ancient ivory (In tabulam eburn. in fine; see woodcut), which shows two scenes in the life of St. Joseph. Above, the dream; an angel standing by a bed extends his arm over the sleeper in the attitude of exhortation. Below, we have the journey to Bethlehem: an angel leads the ass on which the Virgin is seated; her arm encircles Joseph's neck, and his whole attitude expresses the most reverent affection. JOURNEYING. All travellers and strangers were expected to bring COMMENDATORY LETTERS, i.e. testimonials from their own bishop, and were then admitted to communicate in the Eucharist. Persons who had not provided themselves with these, might share if they needed it, in the hospitality provided by the churches and religious houses, but were not admitted to communion. This was to guard against the admission of excommunicated persons. The Apostolical Canons order that if any person was received without commendatory letters, and it afterwards appeared that he was excommunicate, both the receiver and received should be cast out of communion (Can. xiii.). From an allusion in the letters of Gregory the Great, we learn that those who travelled by sea sometimes took the reserved sacrament in both kinds with them in the ship, so as not to be deprived of communion. (Gregor. Dialog. III., c. 36, apud Baron. an. 404). "Peregrina Communio," or the Communion of Strangers, is a well-known phrase in Canons, but is not well understood (Bingham, xvii. 3; and COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417). From the fifth century downwards, these rules were of continual application, in consequence of the increasing practice of going on pilgrimages. [PILGRIMAGE.] [S. J. E.]

JUDE THE APOSTLE, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend, &c.—With the name of this apostle considerable difficulties are associated; the questions as to the identity of Jude with Lebbaeus and Thaddaeus, the identity of Jude the apostle with Judas the Lord's brother, and, on the hypothesis which distinguishes these two last, the question as to which was the author of the canonical epistle. As to the first point, in spite of some curious complications, we can hardly hesitate to assume the identity of the three; it is not conceivable that the Evangelists should have actually varied in the lists of the Twelve. It is not necessary to enter at length into this point here, as it will be found discussed in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE; a few further remarks, however, may be made. The most prominent tradition in connection with the name of this apostle is the mission to Abgarus, king of Edessa, to which we shall again refer. The case is, however, complicated by the fact that some writers describe this Thaddaeus as the apostle (e.g. Jerome, Comm. in Matt. x. 4; vol. vii. pt. 1, 57, ed. Vallarsi; and the Acta Thaddaei, infra), while others (e.g. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 13) speak of him as one of the Seventy disciples, who was sent to Edessa by the apostle Thomas. This last writer introduces another difficulty by stating (l.c.) that the name of Thomas was really Judas.* Yet another element of confusion has been brought in by those who identify Lebbaeus with Levi (cf. Origen contra Celsum, i. 62). Any discussion, however, on these theories is quite beyond our present province, and we shall therefore assume the identity of Jude, Lebbaeus, and Thaddaeus; and in collecting the various notices of Thaddaeus we shall include all as belonging to the apostle, except those which distinctly refer to him as one of the Seventy. As to the varying forms of the traditions about Thaddaeus's labours and death, it is utterly impossible to say how far they are to be viewed as distinctly con-

* In the Syriac Acts of Thomas, published by Dr. Wright, the name Thomas appears as a mere occasional addition to Judas. See also Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 318.

ing legends, and how far they are to be explained as referring to two different men.

We shall now proceed briefly to glance through the various legends. The Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks in its Prologue of St. Simon and St. Jude having suffered together "in Susia, civitate magna apud Persidem" (Patrol. xxx. 451), though in the body of the work the scene of the martyrdom is simply given as "alibi" (ib. 495). The Martyrology of Bede speaks of previous labours of St. Jude in Mesopotamia (Patrol. xciv. 184): so also the Western Martyrologies^b generally, see e.g. those of Wand-albert (Patrol. ccxi. 616) and Usuard (Patrol. ccxiv. 630). So also Isidore, who refers to labours in Mesopotamia, Pontus, and Armenia (de ortu et obitu Patrum, c. 78, Patrol. lxxxiii. 453) and Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270). Paulinus of Nola does indeed speak of his labours among the Libyans (Poema xix. 82; Patrol. lxi. 514), but a mere unsupported statement of this kind need not count for much.^c The account given by Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. ii. 40) varies somewhat, and, as will be seen, we cannot account for the variation by referring it to the other Thaddaeus. The apostle is spoken of as labouring in Judaea, Galilee, Samaria, Idumaea, Arabia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, finally dying peaceably at Edessa; on his arrival at which place he found that Thaddaeus, one of the Seventy disciples, had been there before him. The Apocryphal Acts of Thaddaeus (infra) differ again. According to these, Thaddaeus was a native of Edessa, who was a disciple of St. John the Baptist before he followed Christ. Abgarus, king of Edessa, having been healed by a miraculous portrait sent him by our Lord, is visited by Thaddaeus after the Ascension. The apostle, after making many converts, journeys to Amis on the Tigris, and thence to Berytus in Phoenicia where he apparently dies a natural death.

Syrian traditions almost universally distinguish Thaddaeus, the apostle of Edessa, from St. Jude; though, like Western authorities, they assign Mesopotamia to the latter as the sphere of his labours; the former, however, whom they ordinarily name Adai, they maintain to be one of the Seventy (see Assemani, Bibl. Orient. i. 318; iii. part 1, 297, 302; from which last reference it appears that practically the only exception to the general character of the stream of Syrian tradition is Jesuabius, bishop of Nisibis, with whom Adai is the same as the apostle St. Jude:—for the history of this Adai, see Op. cit. iii. part 2, pp. 8–13).

2. Festival.—As in the case of not a few others of the apostles, there is a lack of evidence for any early special commemoration of St. Jude; and its absence from the earlier Sacramentaries, as well as the fact that hardly any ancient Homilies^d are extant for such a festival, points in the same direction. In the West the commemoration of St. Jude has been joined with that of St. Simon on October 28, but this combination does not occur in Eastern calendars. The reason for this association of the two names it is impossible to ascertain; it may have been from the belief that the two apostles were brothers, or from the tradition of their having suffered martyrdom on the same day, but as in the parallel case of St. Philip and St. James it is perfectly useless to theorize. It may merely be remarked that as regards the first of these theories, there is no trace of such a combination of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and but little of one of St. James and St. John: as regards the latter, the tradition can have been by no means a wide-spread one, inasmuch as only the Western church commemorates the two apostles on the same day.

We have already remarked as to the absence of this festival from the oldest liturgical authorities. Thus we find no trace of it in the Leonine or Gelasian Sacramentaries, in Mabillon's Gallican liturgy, in Muratori's Gregorian Sacramentary and in the calendar of Fronto: nor is it recognized in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (ob. 766 A.D.). It is found, however, in the Gregorian Sacramentary as edited by Menard (col. 137), where also a separate mass is provided for the vigil. The vigil is also recognized with the festival in Menard's Gregorian Antiphonary (col. 711), and in the St. Gall MS. of the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 427). A mass for the festival is given in the Ambrosian liturgy, part of which is the same as that in the Gregorian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 427); and in the Mozarabic missal, where, however, it must be noticed that the greater part of the service is borrowed from that for another festival, that for St. Peter and St. Paul (Patrol. lxxv. 888, where see Leslie's note: also for the form in the Mozarabic breviary, see Patrol. lxxvi. 1236). The Comes Hieronymi, as published by Pamelius (Liturg. Lat. ii. 53) gives an Old Testament lection [or epistle] and gospel for the vigil and the festival; Wisdom iii. 1 sqq., John xv. 1 sqq., and Romans viii. 28 sqq., John xv. 17 sqq.

Besides the festival of October 28, it may be noted that some Western calendars give other commemorations of St. Simon and St. Jude: thus the Martyrologium Hieronymi, as given by D'Achèry from the Corbey MS., adds one on July 1 (Patrol. xxx. 464), and the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, 405) two, on June 29 and July 1.

In the Eastern church, as we have already said, St. Jude is commemorated apart from St. Simon, on June 19. There is also a festival on August 21 of Thaddaeus, whom we should assume to be the apostle of Edessa viewed as distinct from St. Jude. Papebroch, however (infra), evidently refers both to the same St. Jude in his notes to the Greek metrical Ephemerides published by him in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. pp. xxxii. xl.). The notices here are—ἔννεα καὶ δεκάτῃ θνήσκει Βελέεσσιν Ἰούδας, καὶ εἰκάδι πρώτη Θαδδαῖος Βούτιο ἀπέπτην. In the Armenian calendar we find commemorations of Thaddaeus on July 20 and of Thaddaeus and Bartholomew on November 30 (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 800, 804). Whether, however, both of these are to be referred to St. Jude we are unable to say. We may refer lastly to the commemoration of St. Jude has been joined with that of St. Simon on October 28, but this combination does not occur in Eastern calendars. The reason for this association of the two names it is impossible to ascertain; it may have been from the belief that the two apostles were brothers, or from the tradition of their having suffered martyrdom on the same day, but as in the parallel case of St. Philip and St. James it is perfectly useless to theorize. It may merely be remarked that as regards the first of these theories, there is no trace of such a combination of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and but little of one of St. James and St. John: as regards the latter, the tradition can have been by no means a wide-spread one, inasmuch as only the Western church commemorates the two apostles on the same day.

^b The Martyrologium Gellonense speaks of St. Jude's having been buried "in Nerito Arminiae urbe" (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 390). This is probably a false reading for "in Beryto," so Isidore (l.c.) "in Beryto Armeniae."

^c Muratori (not. in loc.) tries to account for the discrepancy by supposing Libya to be the place of sepulture, but not of death, but this is palpably over refining.

^d Among the very few, we may note that of Nicetas Paphlago (Patrol. Gr. cv. 254); that once attributed to Bede (Patrol. xciv. 489) is spurious.

lendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches published by Ludolf (Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae). Here we find "Jude, Apostle," commemorated by the former church on Jan. 26 and May 10 (pp. 19, 28); and a commemoration by both churches of Thaddaeus on June 26 (p. 32), and of the Translation of the body of Thaddaeus on July 23 (p. 35). The last two are perhaps to be referred to Thaddaeus viewed as external to the Twelve.

3. Whether the apostle St. Jude is to be considered as the author of the canonical epistle bearing the name of Jude, we do not discuss here: reference may be made on this point to the Dictionary of the Bible. But little pseudonymous literature is connected with the name of St. Jude; an apocryphal gospel bearing the name of Thaddaeus is mentioned in some forms of the records of the council held at Rome in 494 A.D. under the episcopate of Gelasius (Patrol. lix. 162). It has been suggested, but does not seem probable, that Thaddaei is a false reading for Matthiae. There are also extant Acta Thaddaei, of which the Greek text was first published by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. 261 sqq.). In this is contained the letter of Abgarus to our Lord in a somewhat different form from that given by Eusebius. The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 25) give, in the name of "Lebbaeus, surnamed Thaddaeus," the regulation as to the order of widows in the church, and also as to exorcists. Finally, we may refer for the legendary history to the Historia Apostolica of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. vi.; Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 591 sqq., ed. 1719). In addition to works already cited, see also Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, vol. iii. pp. 206 sqq. JUDGE. The early ecclesiastical jurisdiction was exercised without formality or strict adherence to legal rights and requirements, in a quasi-paternal manner. [Compare DISCIPLINE.] No special training was therefore required for it. The bishop himself was the usual and "ordinary" judge; and appeals from him went to the provincial synod or to the metropolitan, primate or patriarch in person. [APPEAL; AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS; BISHOP, p. 236.]

The earliest officer of the bishop occupying in any sense an independent position was the OECONOMUS or treasurer. This office was often united with that of the defensor or guardian and advocate of the liberties of the church, who is spoken of in the 2nd canon of the council of Chalcedon. [ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH.] Gothofredus (in Cod. I. iii. 33. 2) says that the defensor became in time a judge in small causes: and his office is supposed by Ayliffe (Parerg. 160) to have been the original of the modern official or chancellor.

The word "official", the technical word in later times (as in the 12th century) for the officer exercising coercive jurisdiction on behalf of the bishop or metropolitan, is not used in this sense in the Code or in the Novells. The word indeed often occurs in them, but as the name of a secular officer.

The 9th canon of the council of Chalcedon speaks of arbitrators being chosen with the bishop's consent to determine civil controversies between clerks, instead of the bishop.

The greater formality and style of the ecclesiastical courts grew up with the increase of jurisdiction over civil matters and with the appointment of "officials" in the 12th century. The presence of a registrar to make solemn record of the decrees of the court was first ordered in the council of Lateran held under Innocent III. A.D. 1215; though it was probably customary to have a scribe or notary present at the formal sittings of the courts for some time before this; and we actually hear of notaries at the pseudo-council of Ephesus, A.D. 449. Apparitors or summoners to the bishop's courts are spoken of in the Code and Novells, where the fees to be taken by them are specially regulated.

In what has been said as to the bishop being the "ordinary" judge, it is not intended to imply that he decided, at any rate grave cases, alone, or without the advice and concurrence of his clergy.

Similarly the metropolitan, even if he did not convene the whole provincial synod, collected some of the bishops of the province to assist him in deciding the causes brought before him. In some cases the canons or imperial laws speak of the metropolitan, in others of the synod, as the proper court.

The jurisdiction of abbots [ABBAT] had hardly grown up during the period of which we are treating. They had at the utmost a sort of parental authority subordinate to the bishop. [JURISDICTION.] [W. G. F. P.]

JURISDICTION. Before the time of Constantine the Great such jurisdiction as was exercised in the church must have been of a purely spiritual character, and its sanctions must have been purely spiritual. Sinners were brought before the tribunal of the bishop, who judged and inflicted spiritual censures, and inflicted them probably without appeal.

Upon the recognition by Constantine of the church as a collegium licitum, these spiritual judgments and censures began to have an effect; of which the civil law could take cognizance, and a civil effect was given to them. They were also made use of to assist or sometimes even take the place of the sanctions of the civil law.

In criminal causes where the accused was a clerk, or in any way specially connected with the performance of religious observances, there was an early tendency to make the bishop the judge, first in conjunction with the lay judge and in time as the sole judge. Judging as a spiritual judge over spiritual persons, a confusion arose between the sentences which he imposed in execution of the discipline of the Church, and those which he imposed as a delegate of the power of the State and armed with the authority of a criminal judge. The two matters are so intertwined, that it will be convenient to discuss together the jurisdiction in spiritual matters and that over spiritual persons.

A second fountain of jurisdiction in the courts of the church was arbitration. Bishops were encouraged by the Christian Emperors to arbitrate on moral grounds between Christians disputing as to matters of right and property, and the civil law gave a civil force to their judgments. Where clerks were parties, the propriety of a recourse to the tribunal of the bishop was considered to be greater. Where a clerk was defendant, his right to escape the annoyance of appearing before a secular tribunal was paralleled to and strengthened by his privilege to be tried by the bishop when defendant on a criminal charge. Hence arose jurisdiction between parties generally.

Lastly, certain special matters of civil litigation began to be considered, irrespective of the parties, as being peculiarly fit for the cognizance of the ecclesiastical judge. Hence arose a jurisdiction over special civil causes.

Jurisdiction in spiritual matters and over spiritual persons.—We have here first to consider the difference between the forum internum and the forum externum. The forum internum was the tribunal in which the bishop or sometimes the priest decided on cases of conscience, gave spiritual directions, and counselled with fatherly authority penitential discipline. The procedure and the decision of this tribunal were not, except in the cases where public penance was required, necessarily known to any but the penitent and his judge. The terror of conscience was the only sanction, and there could be no formal appeal. But along with this forum the church from its earliest time possessed also a forum externum (see 1 Cor. v.; 1 Tim. i. 20). [PENITENCE.]

When the gravity of the offence altered the relation of the parties and converted the father into the avenger, or made it necessary to prefer the public weal of the community to the individual welfare, the sentences of deposition or excommunication were inflicted.

These sentences on clerk or layman were inflicted by the bishop. They were or ought to be recognized by all other bishops, and there was originally no appeal. The so-called Apostolical Canons, though requiring the imposition of these sentences in several cases, are silent as to the procedure by which they were to be inflicted. The Nicene Canons for the first time provide a limited right of appeal.

The 5th canon says that clerics or la separated from communion by their own bishop, shall be held everywhere to be so separated; but that in order that no one should be expelled from communion through a contentious or harsh spirit of their bishop, the occasion of their expulsion shall be inquired into by the provincial synod, which is to be held for this purpose twice a year. The decision of the synod is to be final. It was not till considerably later, when, it does not exactly appear, that further appeals were allowed. [APEAL; INDULGENCE.]

The original discipline of the church had made all crimes as importing sins the subjects of the penitential discipline or the forum internum, and by consequence in the graver and more public cases, or where penitence was not shown, of the forum externum. It became however obviously impossible, as the church tribunals took a more formal shape and as appeals came to be allowed, that ordinary criminal offences against the laws of the state should be tried in any fashion by the church courts; and hence a division arose, whereby certain offences became the subject of the almost exclusive jurisdiction of the church courts, while on other offences they were not allowed to sit in judgment.

Offences of laymen subject to the jurisdiction of the church courts were heresy (Van Espen Jus Eccles. Univ. pars iii. tit. iv. cap. 2, and the article HERESY), magic (can. 10, caus. 26, q. 5), blasphemy, to be punished by bishop or court according to the capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. vi. cap. 101), and probably cases of laying violent hands on clerks. It seems that incest and incontinence were not distinctly reckoned as offences over which the church had coercive jurisdiction till late in the 9th or the 10th century, though they were of course subject to penitential discipline [FORNICATION; HARLOT; INCEST].

Every offence which when committed by a layman subjected him to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court, subjected a fortiori a clerk.

But the subjection of clerks to the ecclesiastical tribunals was much wider than this. In A.D. 376 a law of Gratian and Valentinian is said to have subjected clerks for small offences or offences of an ecclesiastical nature to their diocesan synod (L. 23, Cod. Theod. de Episcopis et Clericis). But a special exception was made of such offences as gave rise to a criminal action before the ordinary or extraordinary judges or the higher officials classed as the Illustris. So in A.D. 399, Arcadius and Honorius are said (L. 1, Cod. Theod. De Religione) to have ordered causes relating to religion to be tried by the bishops, but questions which related to the civil law to be tried according to the law (i.e. by the lay judges). Rather stronger is an edict attributed to Valentinian Theodosius and Arcadius (L. 3 Cod. Theod. de Episcop. Jud.) Van Espen (Jus Eccl. pars iii. tit. iii. cap. i.) cites a constitution of Honorius, A.D. 412 (L. 41, Cod. Theod. de Episcop. et Cleric.) which would apparently subject the clerk for all offences to the bishop; but it is held that the words, though vague and general, do not really refer to other than ecclesiastical offences.

We come next to Justinian. The Code contains an enumeration of the courts by which an accused clerk is to be tried as follows: he is to be tried before his bishop. If the bishop be "suspected" there is to be an appeal (or possibly an original trial) before the metropolitan. If his decision be not satisfactory, an appeal lies to the provincial synod and thence to the patriarch, whose judgment (subject to certain peculiar rights in the patriarch of Constantinople) is to be final. The law then proceeds as follows: "As for these proceedings, if they relate to ecclesiastical matters, we order that they be of necessity tried only by the most religious bishops or metropolitans, or by the sacred synods, or by the most holy patriarchs. But if there is a controversy as to civil matters, though we will allow those who wish it to bring the question before the bishops, yet we will not compel them, since there are civil tribunals, if they prefer to go to them, before which tribunals also criminal proceedings can be had" (Cod. i. iv. 29).

This law seems to confuse civil and criminal proceedings, and has a relation to both. The 83rd Novell is more precise. It recites a request of Menas or Mennas, the patriarch of Constantinople, and proceeds to confer certain privileges upon clerks. The first relate to civil suits. As to criminal causes, it enacts that where they relate to secular matters they shall be tried before the lay judge; but before the lay judge proceeds to execute the sentence, he shall allow the bishop to depose or degrade his clerk. Criminal causes relating to ecclesiastical matters are to be tried by the bishop. The 123rd Novell effected a further alteration (cap. xxi.) Making the same reservations as to ecclesiastical causes, it provides that a clerk accused of a secular criminal offence shall be brought before the bishop, who if he find him guilty shall depose him ab honore et gradu, from his office and order, and send him to the lay judge for secular punishment; or he may be brought before the lay judge first, in which case the lay judge is to transmit the evidences of his guilt to the bishop, who is to depose him and send him back to the lay judge for secular punishment. This Novell extends to monks, deaconesses, and nuns.

Van Espen (loc. cit.) quotes some canons of the 6th century as going further in this respect, and the capitularies of the Frank kings enact that clerks shall not be judged by lay judges, but by ecclesiastical ones (lib. i. cap. 38); and that no one shall presume to accuse a clerk, monk, or nun before a lay judge (lib. v. cap. 378).

In England it is well known that the distinction between secular and ecclesiastical courts did not exist during the Anglo-Saxon rule, the sheriff and the bishop sitting side by side on the same bench.

The punishments or censures inflicted by the episcopal tribunals were at first mere acts of penance, the discipline retaining its original penitential character. So early indeed as the Theodosian Code (L. 21 De Hæreticis) a fine of ten pounds of gold seems to have been imposed on any clerk or bishop who was convicted of heresy; but it does not appear whether this fine was imposed by the ecclesiastical judge or by the lay judge after sentence by the ecclesiastical judge. [FINES, p. 671.]

Seclusion in a monastery both for laymen and more especially for clerks and bishops was an earlier punishment. It seems to be mentioned in the Epistles of St. Gregory (lib. 2 Epist. 27, 40), and in a canonical rule of about the year 816 as a substitute for scourging. [IMPRISONMENT, p. 829.]

The 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) orders that any bishop who has been by law expelled from his see, yet returns to the city, shall be shut up in a monastery.

Relegation or banishment from the city they disturbed, or in which the public offence was committed, seems to have been first used as an ecclesiastical punishment towards the close of the period of which we are writing (see Epist. of St. Gregory, lib. 9, Ep. 66). It is very doubtful though whether it was ever exercised in invitum, unless it was supported by a special decree of the civil authority. The bishops of large towns, particularly Constantinople, were however often armed with a power of sending back to their own dioceses clerks disorderly frequenting the capital.

Scourging, as a means of penitential discipline, is mentioned by St. Augustine (Epist. 133) and St. Gregory (Epist. lib. 2, Epist. 52, lib. 9, Epist. 66) [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT]. It seems to have been used by bishops with reference to their younger clerks, and by abbots with reference to monks. In the canon law (can. 10, caus. 26, q. 5) an epistle of St. Gregory is quoted in which he orders practisers of magic if they be slaves to be scourged, if free men, to be secluded till they are penitent. The 38th of the Apostolical Canons orders that any bishop, priest, or deacon, who endeavours to make himself feared by scourging either sinners or men outside the Christian community who have done wrong shall be deposed. St. Paul requires as a qualification of a bishop that he should be "no striker" (1 Tim. iii. 3). The 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) forbids the bishop to beat any one with his hands.

Besides these corporal punishments, the ecclesiastical courts continued to administer and inflict their old censures, now become also of worldly import, of excommunication and deposition or degradation.

So clearly was the distinction between these last censures and matters of internal and penitential discipline now marked, that St. Augustine seems to say that bishops cannot prohibit any one from communicating unless the penitent has confessed his crime or been convicted by a secular or an ecclesiastical judge; "nos a communione prohibere quenquam non possumus . . . nisi aut sponte confessum, aut in aliquo sive saeculari sive ecclesiastico iudicio nominatum atque convictum" (Serm. 351, § 16; Opp. v. 1359, ed. Bened.). Conformably to this the 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) forbids the excommunication of any one till after a full trial.

It should be said here that monks, who were originally subject to their bishops like any other laymen, were made in a special and further degree subject to them by the council of Chalcedon at the suggestion of the emperor Marcian (Van, Espen pars III. tit. xii. cap. 1). There seems to have been no question of their exemption from episcopal authority till the 6th century; and even then the exemptions conferred on them were not exemptions from jurisdiction, but from despotic invasion of their internal rights.

The abbot or dean exercised a subordinate jurisdiction, such as remains now with our deacons and chapters; and actual exemption from their bishop's authority sometimes was conferred on monasteries. [EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES.]

The trial of bishops has been reserved for separate mention.

It is first provided for in the Apostolical Canons (can. 74). This is the more remarkable as there are no provisions in these canons regulating the trials of clergy or laity.

This canon provides that a bishop when accused by credible persons shall be summoned by other bishops (that is, the other bishops of the province), to appear before them. If he appears and confesses, or is convicted, his punishment is to be decreed. If he does not appear, he is to be summoned a second time personally by two bishops, and so if necessary a third time, after which he is to be tried and condemned in his absence. The 75th canon prevents heretics from giving evidence against a bishop, and requires the evidence of two witnesses.

The Nicene Canon (can. 5) as to the appeal of clerks and laymen to the diocesan synod (quoted p. 894 supra) has been held by many, notably by St. Augustine (see Van Espen, pars III. tit. iii. cap. 5) to relate also to the trial of bishops. However this may be, the 6th canon of the council of Constantinople undoubtedly provides for the trial of bishops. After refusing the evidence of heretics, excommunicated persons and persons accused of crimes, it proceeds to enact that if any not disqualified person has any ecclesiastical charge to prefer against a bishop, he shall bring it before the provincial synod. If the synod cannot correct the crime, the bishops thereof shall go before the greater synod of that "diocese" (diocese is here used in the imperial sense of a larger province, exarchate or patriarchate), but shall not bring their accusation till they have submitted to undergo a like penalty, if they are found calumniators. The decree is to be then made by the greater synod, and there is to be no appeal either to the emperor or to a general council from it.

The 9th canon of the council of Chalcedon seems to relate primarily to civil suits. It orders that any dispute between a clerk and a bishop (whether his own bishop or not) shall be tried by the provincial synod. If bishop or clerk have a dispute with the metropolitan, the trial should be before the exarch of the diocese or the emperor.

The 123rd Novell provides (cap. viii.) that a bishop shall not, whether in a pecuniary (civil) or criminal cause, be brought against his will before any civil or military judge; and (cap. xxii.) that disputes between bishops, whether on ecclesiastical or other matters, shall be tried in the first instance by the metropolitan and his synod, with an appeal to the patriarch; while bishops accused of crimes are to be tried by the metropolitan (apparently alone), from whom an appeal lies first to the archbishop (that is probably the primate or exarch or president of the greater synod), and thence to the patriarch.

Jurisdiction between parties.—In the early days of the church, when Christians formed a small and separate society, it was natural and almost necessary that disputes between them should be settled by arbitration within their own body, to avoid the scandals to which references to heathen judges might give rise. St. Paul expressly reprobates the practice of "brother going to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers" (1 Cor. vi. 6).

The arbitrator chosen would naturally be the bishop, and this appears to have been the case.

After the recognition of the church by Constantine, provision was made for giving a legal sanction to these arbitrations. Constantine himself is said (Van Espen, pars III. tit. i. cap. 2) to have allowed litigants to choose the bishop instead of the lay judge, and to have ordered effect to be given to the sentence of a bishop so judging. A constitution of Arcadius and Honorius is preserved in the Code (I. iv. 7) allowing litigants to go before the bishop in civil matters only and as before an arbitrator.

Another constitution of Honorius and Theodosius (Cod. I. iv. 8) orders that the bishop's judgment shall be binding on all those who have chosen him as judge, and shall have as much force as a judgment of the praetorian praefect, from whom there could be no appeal.

It appears that at this time Jews had the privilege of trying their disputes if they pleased before their rabbi or "patriarch."

Valentinian III. allowed the same result to be obtained by means of a previous formal "compromissum" or submission to arbitration.

None of these constitutions, however, in the least degree compel the resort to the ecclesiastical tribunal, unless the matter in question be of an ecclesiastical nature, not even though the defendant be a clerk.

So the emperor Marcian (Cod. I. iii. 25) speaks of an episcopal audience for clerks who are sued at law, but gives the plaintiff the power of choosing the lay tribunal.

The 67th Novell makes provision for the mode of trial, which is to be summary.

There being the power of resorting to the arbitration of the bishop, the church compelled by threats of censure every clerk at least to resort only to the tribunal of the bishop. Among other canons on this subject may be cited that of the council of Chalcedon (can. 9) which orders that any clerk who shall have a dispute with another clerk shall not go before the secular tribunals, but shall plead his cause first before his bishop, or before such person, with the consent of the bishop, as both parties shall choose to decide the question.

The 9th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage orders that any bishop, priest, deacon, or clerk, who has a civil matter in dispute, and brings it before the secular tribunals, shall lose all that he gains by the sentence of the secular tribunal, or shall be deprived of his office. There are also canons of the 4th council of Carthage to the same effect.

The 79th Novell (cap. i.) gives the fori privilegium for the first time. It provides that any one having a cause with any of the venerable holy men (the monks) or the holy virgins, or any women living in nunneries, shall go before the bishop. The bishop is to send to the monastery and to provide for the appearance of the defendants before him, either by the intervention of their abbots or of agents (responsible) or otherwise. He is then to try the cause; which is on no account to come before the secular judges.

The 83rd Novell, which has been already referred to,^a extends the privileges. Any one having a pecuniary cause against a clerk is to go before the bishop,^b who is to decide summarily without writing. His sentence may, however, be put in writing. There is to be no recourse to the civil tribunals; but the main object of the Novell is to avoid long delays and pleadings, rather than to change the tribunal which is to adjudge.

The 123rd Novell puts the privilege on a firm basis. Clerks, monks, deaconesses, nuns, and ascetic women, are to be impleaded before the bishop. The lay judge is to execute the bishop's sentence, if there is no appeal. But either of the parties may appeal within ten days to the local lay judge. If he decides in accordance with the bishop's judgment, the decision is final.

If the lay judge decides contrary to the bishop, his sentence may be appealed from in the regular way of civil suits.

If the bishop delayed to hear or decide on the cause, the plaintiff might go at once before the lay judge. This Novell expressly reserves all ecclesiastical suits for the sole cognizance of the bishop.

The capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. i. cap. 28) ordered all disputes between clerks to be settled by their bishop, and not by secular judges: while another capitulary (lib. vi. cap. 366) recites and enforces an edict, attributed to Theodosius, declaring that the sentences of the bishops, however declared, and apparently in whatever causes, shall be ever held inviolate. This edict was declared by Charlemagne to be binding over all parts of his empire.

The object of these laws also seems to have been to avoid prolixity of pleadings, technicality of procedure, and long disputes, distracting holy men from their proper avocations, rather than any supposed impropriety of secular judges exercising jurisdiction over clerks.

The constitution of the special court of his bishop for the clerk or monk, seems to have been considered by the secular authorities as a privilege given to him, which he might waive, the secular court having always the capacity to exercise jurisdiction over him, if the privilegium fori were not set up. But the canons and decrees of the councils and synods leave the clerk no option, forbidding him to sue, or to abstain from raising his privilege when sued, in the lay court.

The secular authorities seem to have retained nevertheless their view of this exemption as a privilege and capable of waiver. Gothofred (in Concl. l. iii. 33 and 51) cites a constitution of the emperor Frederic (apparently Frederic II.) strongly denouncing any assertion of jurisdiction by the lay judge in civil or criminal matters; but yet allowing the clerk to waive his privilege and submit to the jurisdiction.

The emperor Alexius Comnenus brought the matter under the general rule "actor sequitur forum rei" (Constit. Imp. 289, § 11).

Jurisdiction over special civil causes.—This is mainly the outgrowth of a period later than that prescribed for this work.

^a Supra, p. 895.

^b The text seems to say "archbishop," but this must be a mistake.

The jurisdiction over testamentary causes did not arise in Western Europe till the 12th century. It appears to have arisen early in the 12th century in England; not till the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century in France.

The only indication of testamentary jurisdiction in Eastern or Western Europe during the period of which we treat, appears in the commission given by the Christian emperors to the bishops, to take care that the wishes of the dead should be faithfully performed.

Charlemagne especially intrusted the bishops with the duty of protecting wards, widows, and paupers, and of seeing that no wrong was done to them. This led in time, but not during our period, to a sort of jurisdiction over all cases where a member of one of these classes was concerned.

Matrimonial causes, though infringements of the marriage vow were probably treated of with other matters of spiritual discipline, did not as involving formal legal rights or questions of property, fall to the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical tribunals till the 11th century.

Suits relating to ecclesiastical matters are in many of the imperial Constitutions mentioned as unquestionably matters for the bishop's jurisdiction. The term "ecclesiastical matters" is vague, and probably varied at different times; but before the expiry of our period, causes relating to tithes and offerings were probably considered as coming within its meaning.

CALENDS

CALENDS (Kalendae), the first day of each month in the Roman calendar. The Rule of Fructuosus (c. 10) orders that on the first of each month (per capita mensium), the abbats of a district shall meet in one place, and earnestly celebrate monthly litanies, and implore the help of the Lord for the souls committed to their charge. The monks of Fulda in their petition to Charles the Great (§ 1, Migne, Patrologia, cv. 419) beg that they may be allowed, according to the custom of their fathers, to hold one vigil and say fifty psalms on the calends of each month, for their brethren departed this life. This was in addition to the daily commemoration. (Martene, de Rit. Monach. II. xiii. 1.) For the observance of the Kalends of January in particular, see CIRCUMCISION, I. 394; NEW YEAR. [C.]

KEIVIN (or COEMGIN), abbat of Glendaloch [valley of the two lakes], in the county of Wicklow in Ireland, and bishop (ob. circa A.D. 618). He is commemorated on June 3 (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. i. p. 303). [R. S.]

KELLAC, bishop and martyr in Ireland (died early in the 7th century, A.D.), commemorated [especially at Eisceach, in Galway] on May 1. (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. i. p. 106.) [R. S.]

KENELM, boy-martyr in England (ob. A.D. 819), son of Kenulf, king of Mercia, commemorated on July 17; especially at Winchelcombe Abbey, which had been built by his father. In the Sarum Breviary are three lections for the day (add. to Usuard, Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. iv. p. 297). [R. S.]

KENTIGERN, bishop of Glasgow (circa A.D. 560), commemorated on Jan. 13. Some martyrologies also give July 1, "In Scotia, Translatio S. Kentigerni, ep. et conf." The reference, however, is quite unknown. (Molanus, Add. to Usuard; Acta Sanctorum, Jan. vol. ii. p. 97.) [R. S.]

KESSOG (or MACKESSOG), bishop of the provinces of Leven and Boin in Scotland (ob. circa A.D. 560), commemorated on March 10.

KEYS OF ST. PETER

(Breviarium Aberdonense; Acta Sanctorum, Mar. vol. ii. p. 35.) [R. S.]

KEYNA, virgin recluse of Brecon in South Wales, in the 5th or 6th century. From her Keynsham in Somersetshire, one of her abodes, is said to take its name; where the ammonites found in the neighbouring quarries were long attributed to her miraculous destruction of the serpents. She is commemorated on Oct. 8. (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. iv. p. 275.) [R. S.]

KEYS OF ST. PETER (IN ART.) The key or keys appear to be one of the natural emblems of early civilisation, always conveying the idea of deputed authority and power. The abbé Auber (Symbolisme Religieux, vol. i. p. 199) speaks of the symbolic meaning of the keys in the Scandinavian-Gothic household. He further connects the prophecy of Isaiah xxii. 22, "I will set on his shoulder the key of the house of David," with Rev. iii. 7, where the church of Philadelphia is said to be in possession of the key of the house of David, and gives various interpretations of that expression, making it refer, very properly as it appears, to the Lord's Incarnation as a member of the house of David after the flesh, as the key or central doctrine of the Gospel. It seems unnecessary to follow him into the further meanings of the keys of hell in the Apocalypse; but it is preferable to take the symbol in its obvious meaning of deputed power, committed to the holder by a higher authority, as the Northern or Roman husband committed the keys of his house to the custody of his wife. (Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. s.v. Matrimonium; Festus, s.v. Clavis.) "The bride saluted her husband with the words 'Ubi tu Caius ego Caia,' and after she had entered the house with distaff and spindle, she was placed on a sheepskin; and there the keys of the house were delivered into her hands." The distaff, spindle, and sheepskin will remind the Christian archaeologist of their frequent appearance on the sarcophagi.

The delivery of the keys to St. Peter occurs in early bas-reliefs. See D'Agincourt, Sculpture, planche viii. 11, where the apostle is certainly receiving a key, as it appears a single one, though two are delivered to him on other monuments. In Aringhi (t. i. p. 293) there appear to be two handles, though the wards of only one key are visible. On the sarcophagus on which this subject occurs, St. Peter is bearing the cross and receiving a roll of the Gospel from the Lord's hand, with another apostle. Martigny refers to Perret (vol. i. pl. vii.) for a remarkable but dubious fresco of the catacomb called Platonie,^a where our Lord is seen half issuing from a cloud, with St. Peter on His right and St. Paul on the left, and giving the keys to the former. From Bottari (i. 185) we give a woodcut of this subject, which Bianchini regards as of great antiquity (note in Anast. Vita Urbani, n. 18). It forms part of the bas-relief round a vase. St. Peter and the keys appear next to our Lord in the church of St. Cecilia, in a mosaic restored by Paschal I., about 820 (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. lii. 160).

From Martigny, after Bottari.

St. Peter is also represented with the keys on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Museum Veron. p. 484; Arch. Num. vii. 22), and in the mosaic of the great vault of the basilica of St. Peter, on the Via Ostiensis, dated 441 (Ciampini, V. M. tab. lxxviii.); also in that of S. Maria in Cosmedin, at Ravenna, A.D. 553, where he seems to be presenting them before the throne of the Lamb (ibid. ii. tab. xxiii.). Martigny mentions a Greek MS. in the Vatican, dating as far back as the emperor Justin I., where St. Peter holds three keys on a large ring. (Alemanni, de Lateranens. parietin. tab. vii. p. 55. See also Perret, vol. iii. pl. xii.) Alemanni considers the third key as conveying authority over the Empire and the temporal power in general. [R. St. J. T.]

KEYS, POWER OF THE. The metaphor implied in the symbolic use of the word "key" is obviously derived from the fact that he who has the key of a house can admit or exclude whom he will. Thus in Isaiah xxii. 22, the promise is given to Eliakim that on his shoulder shall be laid "the key of the house of David, . . . so he shall open and none shall shut; and he shall shut and none shall open." With a similar intention the Lord Himself is said (Rev. iii. 7) to have the "key of David," and again (Rev. i. 18) to have "the keys of hell and of death."

With the same use of metaphor our Lord gave the famous promise to St. Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xvi. 19), implying a power of opening and shutting the portals of the church on earth. We are not here concerned with the critical interpretation of the passage, but simply with the use of the term "power of the keys" (clavium potestas) in the ancient church.

The general belief of the fathers was, that the words were addressed to St. Peter as representing the whole church (Van Espen, de Censur. Eccl. c. 2, § 1; Opp. tom. iv. ed. Colon. 1777). Cyprian (de Unit. Eccl. c. 4) identifies the power given to St. Peter with that given to all the apostles after the Resurrection; it was given in the first instance (he thinks) to one man to indicate more emphatically the oneness of the church; and he proceeds to insist on the oneness of the episcopate. This power he seems in another place (Epist. 73, 7) to limit to the remission of sins in baptism. The power of "binding and loosing," and of putting away sins by the healing method or treatment (curatione peccata dimitendi), is expressly assigned to bishops in the treatise De Alcatribus (c. 1) in Cyprian's works (vol. ii. p. 93, ed. Hartel).

Augustine (c. Advers. Legis, i. 17) says expressly that Christ gave the keys to the church, and that St. Peter in receiving them represented the church. So also in commenting on St. John (Tract. 50, quoted by Gratian, causa 24, qu. 1, c. 6), he repeats that St. Peter in receiving the keys symbolised (significavit) the holy church; and again (Tract. 124) he says, "the church which is founded on Christ received from Him the keys of the kingdom of Heaven in the person of Peter, that is the power of binding and loosing sins." Leo the Great (Serm. 3 in Anniv. suae Assumpt. and Serm. 2 de Nat. Apost. in Gratian, cau. 24, qu. 1, c. 5) holds that the power in the church derived from St. Peter must be administered in the spirit of St. Peter in order to have validity: "manet ergo Petri privilegium, ubicunque ex ipsius fertur aequitate iudicium, nec nimia est vel severitas vel remissio; ubi nihil erit ligatum, nihil solutum, nisi quod beatus Petrus aut solverit aut ligaverit."

The "power of the keys" then, is held to reside primarily in the church at large, though it be exercised through its bishops and other ministers. And, as Jansen (quoted by Van Espen, u. s.) has noted, in the primitive church sinners were in fact, after a first and second admonition, brought before the whole church of the place, that is, the whole body of Christians duly convened, and there, if found impenitent, excommunicated with the assent and approbation of all (1 Cor. v. 4). The evidence of Tertullian (Apol. c. 39) and Cyprian (Epist. 30, c. 5; 55, c. 5; 64, c. 1) shows that questions involving the reception or excommunication of a member of the church were not decided by the bishop alone, but by the bishop with the assent of the presbyters, deacons, and faithful laity. And although in after times the power of the keys came to be exercised by the ministers of the church and ecclesiastical judges without consulting the church, yet the source of that power remains in the church, so that it has always the right to prescribe the conditions on which that power is to be exercised. It is on the "power of the keys" that the right of the church to exclude offenders from its pale, and again to readmit them to its privileges and graces, to prescribe penance and grant absolution, is held to depend. The distinctions between the "forum internum," or penitential jurisdiction, and the "forum externum," or penal jurisdiction; and between the "potestas ordinis" and the "potestas jurisdictionis," were probably not drawn before the twelfth century (Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. vi. 25, § 12); with these therefore we are not here concerned. [EXCOMMUNICATION, PENITENCE.] [C.]

KIARA (or CEAR, CERA, etc.), virgin (ob. circa A.D. 680 according to her chronicler, though this date is probably too late), commemorated at Killchrea, in the south of Ireland, on Oct. 16. KILIAN (KYLLENA, KILLENA, KIL-LINUS, CHILIANUS, etc.), the apostle of Thuringia and bishop of Würzburg, in the latter part of the 7th century, commemorated on July 8 (Usuard, Wandelbert, Rabanus, Notker). This day had its proper office, and seems to have had a vigil at an early period (Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. ii. p. 609). [R. S.]

KINDRED. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

KINEBURGA and KINESWITHA, virgins, daughters of Penda, king of Mercia (ob. A.D. 655), who, with their kinswoman Tibba, are commemorated on March 6, or according to some martyrologies on March 5. In one case, a separate commemoration of Kineswitha is assigned to Jan. 31 (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. i. p. 443). [R. S.]

KINEDUS (KYNEDUS, KINETHUS, etc.), hermit and confessor in Gower, in South Wales, in the 6th century (ob. circa A.D. 529), commemorated on August 1. (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. vol. i. p. 68.) [R. S.]

KINGS, PRAYER FOR. Prayers for the reigning Sovereign were introduced into the Liturgy at a very early date, in obedience to the injunction of St. Paul. In the so-called Clementine Liturgy we read: "Furthermore we implore Thee, O Lord, on behalf of the King, and those in high station (ἐν ὑπεροχῇ), and all the army," &c. Tertullian writes (ad Scapulam, c. 2): "We sacrifice for the safety of the Emperor; but to our God, and his, but in the manner which God has commanded, in simple prayer." So Arnobius (Contra Gentes, iv. 36), in a passage thought to refer to the Diocletian persecution: "Why have our writings deserved to be given to the flames; our meetings to be cruelly broken up, in which prayer is made to the Supreme God; peace and pardon asked for all in authority; soldiers, kings, friends, enemies; alike for those who are still alive, and for those released from the bonds of the flesh?" So also Cyril of Jerus. (Catech. myst. v.): "Then after that spiritual sacrifice is completed . . . we beseech God for the common peace of the churches, for the tranquillity of the world, for kings, for soldiers," &c. Many other patristic references to the practice might be adduced.* St. Athanasius (Apol. ad Constan.) states that prayer was made in the liturgy for the heretical emperor Constantius; and Theophylact, on 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2, observes that the minds of Christians would probably be disturbed if ordered to pray for unbelieving kings at the time of the Holy Mysteries, and that St. Paul on this account gave as the motive for the command, and the inducement to obey it, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life.

In accordance with these passages the name of the reigning sovereign was inserted in the Diptychs which were read in the liturgy, and was so continued from the time of Leo the Great till the twelfth century.

The Liturgy of St. Chrysostom contains the following prayer in the canon (ἀναφορά); after the commemoration of the saints, and prayers for the orthodox bishop and clergy, the church and the "religious," follows:—"Moreover we offer unto Thee this reasonable service . . . on behalf of our most faithful and Christ-loving kings, and all their court [lit. palace, παλάτιον] and army. Grant them, O Lord, a peaceful reign, that in their tranquillity we too may lead a calm and quiet life in all righteousness and holiness." The Liturgy of St. Basil, in the corresponding place, contains the prayer: "Remember, O Lord, our most religious and faithful kings, whom Thou hast ordained to have rule upon earth. Invest them [lit. crown, στεφάνοισιν] with the armour of truth, with the armour of Thy blessing: shelter their head in the day of battle: strengthen their arm: exalt their right hand: confirm their kingdom: subdue to them all barbarian nations, who wish for war: grant to them a deep peace which shall not be taken away: speak to their hearts good things concerning Thy Church and all Thy people, that in their tranquillity we may lead a calm and quiet life in all righteousness and holiness. Remember, O Lord, all rulers and authorities, and our brethren who are in the palace,^b and all the army."

Both the Liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil contain also the following prayer, immediately after that for the bishop and clergy, in the εἰρηικά [see LITANY] at the beginning of the service, which are the same for both liturgies: "For our most religious and divinely-protected kings, for all their court (παλάτιον) and army, let us beseech the Lord,

"R. Kyrie Eleison.

"For his help to them in war, and that He will put under their feet every enemy and foe, let us beseech the Lord,

"R. Kyrie Eleison."^c

The Roman canon contains, near the beginning: "Imprimis, quæ tibi offerimus pro ecclesia tua Sancta Catholica . . . una cum famulo tuo Papa nostro N., et Antistite nostro N., et Rege nostro N., et omnibus orthodoxis," &c.

There are also votive masses, pro imperatore and pro rege.

The following prayer is found in Roman missals from an early date.^d It is one of a series of intercessory prayers said on Good Friday, after the reading of the Passion according to St. John, headed successively: "Pro pace ecclesiae," "Pro Papa," "Pro universis gradibus ecclesiae," "Pro Imperatore," &c., and each introduced with its own preface of "Oremus," &c. That for the emperor is as follows:—

"Oremus et pro christianissimo Imperatore nostro N., ut Deus et Dominus noster subditas illi faciat omnes barbaras nationes ad nostram perpetuam pacem.

"Oremus. Flectamus genua. Levate. Omnipotens sempiternæ Deus, in cujus manu sunt omnium potestates et omnium jura regnorum, respice ad Romanum benignus imperium; ut gentes, quæ in sua feritate confidunt potentiae tuæ dextera comprimantur. Per Dominum. Amen."

The Ambrosian canon has nearly the same words as the Roman: "una cum famulo et sacerdote tuo Papa nostro III.,^e et Pontifice nostro III. et famulo tuo III. Imperatore, sed et omnibus orthodoxis," &c.; and the two missal Litanies said on the Sundays in Lent, each contained a similar prayer: "Pro famulo tuo III. Imperatore, et famula tuâ III. Imperatrice, et omni exercitu eorum. R. Kyrie Eleison."

[Litany used on first, third, and fifth Sundays in Lent.]

The litany used on the alternate Sundays has an almost identical clause.

The Mozarabic Liturgy, in which the eucharistic intercession is short, contains, in its present form,^f no special prayer for the king.

Prayers for the king, however, are by no means confined to the Liturgy, but are found under varied forms scattered throughout the offices of the church.

Thus in those of the Greek Church the intercessions (εἰρηναῖα) at the end of the daily midnight office contain the clause, "Let us pray . . . for our most religious and divinely-protected kings,

"R. Kyrie Eleison.

"For the prosperity and the efficiency of the Christ-loving army,

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

Also at the end of Vespers is a prayer headed by the rubric, "And we confirm the kings, say—ing" (καὶ ἡμεῖς στερεοῦμεν τοὺς βασιλεῖς λέγοντες), which begins thus: "O King of heaven, confirm our faithful kings, establish the faith, calm the nations, give peace to the world," &c. The Euchology again contains a long prayer "for the king and his army," to be used in time of war and threatenings of war.

^c This clause is omitted in some modern editions of St. Chrysostom's liturgy.

^d It is in the collection of liturgies by Pamelius.

In the Latin Church we may refer to the ordinary form of Litany said according to Roman use on Fridays in Lent, St. Mark's Day, and the Rogation Days, which contains the petition, "Ut regibus et principibus Christianis pacem et veram concordiam [atque victoriam Sarum] donare digneris,

"Te rogamus audi nos."

And also to the verse "Domine saluum fac regem, R. Et exaudi nos in die qua invocaverimus te," which enters into the preces of Lauds and Vespers according to the Roman Breviary, and into those of Prime according to the Ambrosian.

[H. J. H.]

Prayer was also made for kings in the daily hour-offices. Thus the Council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 15, de Septem Canonicis Horis), desires the clergy, secular and monastic, in saying the ordinary offices, not to neglect to pray for kings and for the safety of the Christian church (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 367); and the monks of Fulda in their petition to Charles the Great (c. i. Migne, Patrol. cv. 419), pray the emperor, in the first place, that they may be permitted to continue their daily prayer for him and his children, and all Christian people, which they said after the Capitulum. KINGS, THE THREE. [EPIPHANY, I. 620.]

KISS—KISS OF PEACE (ἀσπασμός, εἰρήνη, osculum pacis, pax, salutation).

The kiss, the instinctive token of amity and affection, from the earliest time found a place in the life and the worship of the Christian Church. The symbol of peace and love could nowhere find a more appropriate home, in its highest and purest idea, than in the religion of peace and love. As a form of Christian greeting, indicating the inner communion of spirit, "a holy kiss" is four times enjoined by St. Paul at the close of his Epistles (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26); and "a kiss of charity" (or "of love") once by St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 14). No limitation is expressed or implied. The Christians were simply bidden thus to "greet one another." Nor is there any doubt that the primitive usage was for the "holy kiss" to be given promiscuously, without any restriction as to sexes or ranks, among those who were all one in Christ Jesus; who thus, in St. Augustine's words, "in token of Catholic unity, when about to communicate in the church, demonstrated their inward peace by the outward kiss" (de Amicit. c. vi.). In the frequent allusions to the kiss of peace which occur in the early Christian worship, there is no reference to any restriction, while the cautions and admonitions we meet with as to its profanation and abuse plainly indicate the indiscriminate character of the salutation. A primitive extra-canonical scripture, quoted by Athenagoras, A.D. 177 (Legat. pro Christian. § 32), shows that the kiss was sometimes given a second time, in certain cases, for the gratification of appetite, adding, "therefore the kiss, or rather the salutation, should be given with the greatest care, since, if there be mixed with it the least defilement of thought, it excludes us from eternal life." Clement of Alexandria also condemns "the shameless use of the kiss which ought to be mystic," with which certain persons "made the churches resound, occasioning foul suspicions and evil reports" (Paedagog. lib. iii. c. 11). Origen, too, commenting on Rom. xvi. 16, after stating that this and similar passages had given rise to the custom among the churches, for Christians after prayer to receive one another with a kiss, goes on to say that this kiss should be "holy, i.e. chaste and sincere; not like the kiss of Judas, but expressive of peace and simplicity unfeigned" (in Roman. lib. x. § 33). Tertullian speaks of the reluctance likely to be felt by a heathen husband that his wife should "meet any one of the brethren to exchange a kiss," "alicui fratrum ad osculum convenire" (ad Uxor. lib. ii. c. 4). The calumnious charges against the Christians to which this custom gave rise, joined to the real peril of it, especially when false brethren began to creep into the Church, led to the abrogation of the promiscuous salutation, and its restriction to persons of the same sex. The Apostolical Constitutions supply the earliest example of this distinction: "Let the deacon say to all, 'Salute ye one another with the holy kiss;' and let the clergy salute the bishop, the men of the laity salute the men, the women the women" (Const. Apostol. lib. viii. § 2). We find the same less distinctly stated in the 19th canon of the council of Laodicea (A.D. 371): "After the presbyters have given the peace to the bishop, then the laymen are to give the peace to one another" (Labbe, Concil. i. 1500). An early Oriental canon given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. Collect. vol. i. p. 222) from the collection of canons by Ebdnassalus (c. xii.), lays down the same rule: "The men shall kiss one another, but the women shall kiss other women; nor shall men give the kiss to them." It also prevailed in the Western Church. An Ordo Romanus, probably anterior to the 9th century, ordains that the "archdeacons should give the peace to the bishop first; then the rest in order; and the people, the men and women separately" (Muratori, tom. ii. p. 49). Amalarius, when speaking of the dangers and inconveniences which led to this limitation, remarks that if the men are distinguished from the women in their place in church, much more should they be in the reception of the kiss (de Eccl. Offic. lib. iii. c. 32).

This primitive custom seems to have been maintained in the Western Church till after the 13th century. We find from the acts of the Council of Frankfort, A.D. 794 (c. 50), and those of the Council of Mentz, A.D. 813 (c. 44), that it was practised in the 8th and 9th centuries. Cardinal Bona says that it is mentioned as still in use by Innocent III. (A.D. 1198-1216) in his Myst. Miss. (lib. vi. c. 5). But not long afterwards we first read of the introduction of a mechanical substitute for the actual kiss, in the shape of a small wooden tablet, or plate of metal, bearing a representation of the Crucifixion (Osculatorium, devotionalium, par). This, after having been kissed by the priest and deacon, was handed by the latter to the communicants, who, by all kissing it, were held to express their mutual love in Christ. This departure from primitive usage, in deference to the growing corruption, is attributed to the Franciscans by Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 7). The earliest notice of these instruments is in the records of English councils of the 13th century (Scudamore's Notit. Eucharist. p. 438). The rite of the holy kiss has not entirely ceased in the Greek Church. In the Armenian Church the people simply bow to one another; but in the strictly Oriental churches, of whatever language, the kiss is observed without any difference (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 76).

The holy kiss originally formed an element of every act of Christian worship. No sacrament or sacramental function was deemed complete in its absence. To quote the words of Bona, "Osculum non solius communionis, sed et omnium Ecclesiasticarum functionum signaculum et sigillum, quod in omnibus Sacramentis adhiberi solebat" (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 7). Even common prayer without the kiss was considered to lack something essential to its true character. Tertullian calls it "signaculum orationis," "the seal of prayer," and asks "what prayer is complete from which the holy kiss is divorced? what kind of sacrifice is that from which men depart without the peace?" (Tert. de Orat. c. 18).

(a.) Kiss of Peace at the Holy Communion.—The Holy Eucharist is the Christian rite with which the Kiss of Peace was most essentially connected, and in which it was preserved the longest. It is found in all primitive liturgies, and is mentioned or referred to by the earliest writers who describe the administration of the Lord's Supper. The primitive place of the holy kiss is that which it still maintains in the Oriental Church, between the dismissal of the non-communicants and the Oblation. The earliest author who mentions it, Justin Martyr, thus writes: "When we have ceased from prayer, we salute one another with a kiss. There is then brought to the president bread and a cup of wine," &c. (Apolog. i. c. 65.) St. Cyril of Jerusalem places it between the washing of the celebrant's hands and the Sursum corda. "Then the deacon cries aloud, 'Receive ye one another; and let us kiss one another.' . . . This kiss is the sign that our souls are mingled together, and have banished all remembrance of wrongs" (cf. Matt. v. 23), (Cit. Lect. xxiii., Myst. v. § 3). In the same way the 19th canon of the Council of Laodicea, already referred to, places "the Peace" before the holy oblation; and St. Chrysostom, "when the gift is about to be offered" (de Compunct. Cordis, lib. i. c. 3); and the Pseudo-Dionysius, at the time of the oblation of the bread and wine (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. 3). St. Chrysostom, in another passage, after describing the exclusion from the holy precincts of those who were unable to partake of the holy table, writes: "When it behoveth to give and receive peace, we all alike salute each other," and then proceeds to speak of the celebration of the "most awful mysteries" (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor. viii. 24, § 3).

The Apostolical Constitutions also introduce the Holy Kiss after the two prayers for the faithful before the Oblation (lib. viii. c. 11). The primitive liturgies are likewise unanimous in assigning to the kiss the same position in the Eucharistic ritual. In that of St. James it comes just before the Suscipio corda and the Vere dignum, &c. (Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 30); in that of St. Mark it follows the Great Entrance, and immediately precedes the creed and the oblation of the people (ib. vol. i. p. 143); in those of St. Basil and St. Cyril it also occurs before the Anaphora (ib. pp. 12, 39), and occupies the same place in that of St. Chrysostom (ib. vol. ii. p. 243). In all it is introduced by a prayer asking for the gift of peace and unfeigned love, undefiled by hypocrisy or deceit (Collectio ad Pacem, Εὐχὴ τῆς εἰρήνης). The rite is also found in all Oriental (as distinguished from Greek) liturgies, and always follows the departure of the non-communicants, and precedes the Anaphora and Preface (Renaudot, vol. ii. pp. 30, 76, 134, &c.). It is introduced by three prayers (cf. Concil. Laod. can. 19), that of the Veil, that of the Kiss, and another of Preparation, but in uncertain order (Scudamore, Not. Euch. p. 435).

When we turn from the Eastern to the Western church we find the Kiss of Peace generally occupying a different position in the Eucharistic rite. It is not at all probable that in primitive times the usage of the Occidental was different from that of the Oriental church on this point. Indeed, in the earliest liturgies of the Spanish and Gallican churches, as well as in the most ancient forms of the Ambrosian rite, the Holy Kiss occupies its primitive position between the dismissal of the catechumens and the Preface. In the Mozarabic liturgy the collect of peace follows the prayer and commemoration of the living and the dead. The priest then says, "Make the peace as ye stand," and proceeds to give the kiss to the deacon, or acolyte, who gives it to the people while the choir chant "My peace I give unto you" &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 4, art. 12; Ord. 2, vol. i. p. 461; Isidor. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 15). The Gallican use was similar. A Gothic missal printed by Muratori (Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. ii. col. 517, s. q.) gives the Collectio ad Pacem, with petitions referring to the Kiss, immediately before the Preface, after the recitation of the diptychs and the collect post nmina (cf. Martene, u. s. Ord. i. p. 454). Its position is the same in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Muratori, u. s. col. 698, s. q.), and the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (ib. col. 776 ff.), (cf. Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. 12, p. 369 ff.). The position of the kiss is also indicated by the mention of it by Germanus (bishop of Paris in the 6th century), immediately before the Preface (Exposit. de Missa, apud Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. vol. v. p. 95). But in the churches of Africa and Rome from the 5th century, when the earliest notices of it occur, onwards to the time of its virtual abrogation, it stands at a later period in the service, after the consecration, and immediately before the communion. Thus in a sermon included among those of St. Augustine, but more truly ascribed to Caesarius of Arles, we read: "When the consecration is completed, we say the Lord's Prayer. After that, Pax vobiscum is said, and Christians kiss one another with the Kiss which is the sign of peace." (Aug. Homil. de Diversis, lxxiii.)

The reference to the kiss in the undisputed works of St. Augustin (e. g. Contra literas Petilianas, lib. ii. c. 23; Homil. VI. in Joann. § 4) do not define its place in the ritual. From the letter to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium, ascribed to pope Innocent I., A.D. 416, "but certainly of later date" (Scudamore, Not. Euch. p. 437), we find that the Peace was given in some of the Latin churches previously to the consecration. Whether in the injunction that it should be given after the completion of the mysteries, that the laity might thus signify their assent to all that had been done, the writer was introducing a novelty, or reasserting the primitive Latin use, is warmly contested between Basnage (Annal. Eccl. Polit. anno 56) and Sala (iii. 352). Bona refutes the groundless assertion that the use of the Holy Kiss was first introduced into the Roman liturgy by Innocent I., "Non enim instituit, sed abusum emendavit" (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 6). The impugned custom must probably have been the remnant of an earlier rule. Whatever may have been the date of the change of the position of the Kiss, in which respect they differed from all the other liturgies of the East and West, it is certain that in the liturgies of Milan, Rome, and Africa, the Salutation of Peace followed instead of preceding the consecration. On the conclusion of the canon, the bread being broken, and divided for distribution, and the Lord's Prayer recited, the clergy and people interchanged the Kiss of Peace, and all communicated. In the sacramentary of Gregory, the salutation follows the Lord's Prayer and precedes the Agnus Dei (Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vetus, vol. ii. p. 6). The Ordo Romanus, earlier than the ninth century, given by Muratori (ib. col. 984, § 18), places it at the end of the canon while the host is being put into the chalice. "The archdeacon gives the peace to the bishop first, then to the rest" [of the ministers] "in order, and to the people" (§ 18). In the second Ordo, not much later, there is a slight variation in the rubric: "the rest [give the peace] in order; and the people, men and women, separately" (ib. col. 1027, § 12). In the liturgy of Milan, the Peace is bidden by the deacon before the priest communicates, in the words, "Offer the Peace to one another," to which the people respond, "Thanks be to God." The priest then says a secret prayer for the peace of the church, based on John xiv. 27, or, as an alternative, utters aloud, "Peace in heaven, peace on earth, peace among all people, peace to the priests of the church of God. The peace of Christ and the Church remain with us for ever." Then, according to the MS. printed in the revision of St. Charles Borromeo, A.D. 1560, he gives the peace with the formula, "Hold the bond of love and peace [habete vinculum instead of the more usual osculum], that ye may be meet for the sacrament mysteries of God" (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. vol. i. p. 478; lib. i. c. iv. art. 12, Ord. 3; Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 6, p. 584). This formula occurs also in the liturgies of York and Bangor, and may have been borrowed by Augustine from the older Gallican liturgies. The mention of the Kiss in the account of the Eucharist celebrated during a tempest at sea by Maximian, bishop of Syracuse—"they gave one another the kiss; they received the Body and the Blood of the Redeemer" (Gregor. Magn. Dial. lib. iii. c. 36)—also shews that at that time it came immediately before communion. In the modern Roman liturgy the Pax vobiscum stands in the same place, between the Lord's Prayer and the Agnus Dei.

At the conclusion of the eucharistic rite it was customary for the bishop to give the Kiss to the laity who had received it from him. On this custom see the notes of Valesius (in Cornel. Epist. IX. ad Fab.), in which he refers to Jerome (Epist. lxii.) and Paulus Diaconus (de Vit. Patr. Emeritens. c. vii.).

Before leaving this part of the subject, it may be mentioned that Tertullian informs us (de Orat. c. 18) that certain persons in his day objected to giving or receiving the Holy Kiss in public on a fast-day, "subtrahunt osculum pacis." This custom he strongly reprehends, not only because the kiss was the "seal of prayer," which was incomplete without it, but because such an omission of the accustomed rite proclaimed the act of fasting in violation of our Lord's injunction (Matt. vi. 17, 18). The same objection did not hold against the received custom of omitting the kiss on Good Friday, "die Paschae . . . merito deponimus osculum," because that was an universally acknowledged fast-day. An illustration of this omission may be derived from the remark of Procopius (Hist. Arcan. c. 9), that Justinian and Theodora began their reign with an evil omen, commencing it on Good Friday, a day when it was unlawful to give the salutation. The kiss was also omitted on Easter Eve, but was given on all other stated fasts (Muratori, in Tertull. loc. cit.). (Augusti, Handbuch der christ. Arch. vol. ii. p. 718, s. q.; Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. II. c. xvi. § 6-7; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xv. c. iii. § 3; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. part iii. p. 485, s. q.; Goar, Eucholog. p. 134; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iii. §§ 4, 5; Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vt. passim; Palmer, Antiq. of English Ritual vol. ii. pp. 100-103; Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental. Collect. vol. i. p. 222, ff.; vol. ii. p. 76, ff.; Scudamore, Notit. Eucharist. c. ii. § 2, pp. 434-442.)

(b.) The Kiss of Peace at Baptism.—After the administration of the sacrament of baptism, the newly-baptized person, whether infant or adult, received the Holy Kiss as a token of brotherly love, and a sign of admission into the family of Christ. The kiss was first given by the baptizer and then by the other members of the congregation. There is a reference to this custom in a letter of Cyprian (ad Fidum Episcopum, Ep. lxiv. (lviii.) § 4), where the language is so beautiful that it deserves to be given at length. Cyprian is correcting the erroneous idea that an infant, as still impure, should not be baptized before the eighth day after its birth, asserting that as soon as it was born it was meet for baptism. He writes: "No one ought to shudder at that which God hath condescended to make. For although the infant is still fresh from its birth, yet it is not just that any one should shudder at kissing it, in giving grace, and making peace; since in kissing an infant every one of us ought, for his very religion's sake, to bethink him of the hands of God themselves, still fresh, which in some sort we are kissing in the man lately formed and freshly born, when we are embracing that which God hath made." This custom of giving the Kiss of Peace to infants at baptism Martene erroneously confines to the African church. But it is referred to not only by Augustine (Contr. Epist. Pelag. lib. iv. c. 8), but also by Chrysostom, (Homil. 50 de Utilitat. legend. Script.): "Because before his baptism he was an enemy, but after baptism is made a friend of our common Lord; we therefore all rejoice with him. And upon this account the kiss is called 'peace' (τὸ φίλημα εἰρήνη καλεῖται), that we may learn thereby that God has ended the war, and brought us into friendship with Himself." A relic of this rite still survives in the Pax tecum found in many baptismal rituals (Augusti, Handbuch, vol. ii. p. 451; Bingham, bk. xii. c. iv. § 6; Binterim, vol. i. c. i. § 2, p. 163; Rheinwald, Kirchlich. Archäolog. II. iii. § 108).

(c.) The Kiss at Ordination.—The imparting of the brotherly kiss to the newly ordained formed an essential element of the service for the ordination of presbyters and bishops in all churches. It is enjoined in the Apostolical Constitutions in the ordination of bishops: "Let him [the newly consecrated bishop] be placed in his throne, in a place set apart for him among the rest of the bishops, they all giving him the kiss in the Lord" (ap. Const. lib. viii. c. 5), and is mentioned by the Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccl. hierarch. c. v. p. 2, § 6), who states that the newly ordained presbyter was kissed by the bishop and the rest of the clergy. So also in the Sacramentary of Gregory, in the consecration of a bishop, we find the direction, at the conclusion of the rite, after the delivery of the ring, staff, and gospels: "then the elect gives the kiss to the pope, and to all the deacons. The archdeacon holding him conveys him into the presbytery, and he gives the kiss to the bishop and the presbyters." He is again kissed by the pope on the reception of the host (Muratori, u. s. vol. ii. col. 442). At the ordination of presbyters they are similarly enjoined to give the kiss of peace to the ordaining bishop, and then to the bishops, presbyters, deacons, and other ministers who are present, and they receive it themselves from the ordaining bishop at the holy communion, and are thrice kissed by him at the conclusion of the rite with the words, pax Domini sit vobiscum (ibid. col. 429, 430). In the Greek church the order is the same, both with bishops and presbyters. In the ordination of the patriarch of Alexandria the kiss is given in the same place, and in the same order (Renaudot, vol. i. p. 481); while in that of a presbyter, after the imposition of hands, the stole is brought over the right shoulder of the new presbyter, the casula is put on, and he then kisses the bishop and presbyters, and goes and takes his stand among them, reading his missal. (Goar, Eucholog. p. 298, b; Bingham, bk. ii. c. xi. § 10; c. xix. § 17; bk. iv. c. vi. § 15; Binterim, vol. i. part i. p. 492; Augusti, Hdbch. vol. iii. p. 242.)

(d.) At Espousals.—On the espousals of two Christians, the contract was solemnly ratified by a kiss given by the man to his future wife. This was an innocent custom dictated by nature, adopted by the members of the church from their heathen ancestors, among whom the marriage rite was ratified by the kiss, "uxorem aut maritum tantum osculo putari" (Quintil. De amat. 276). It is mentioned by Tertullian as an old heathen custom (de Veland. Virgin. c. 11). So much stress is laid on the kiss as the ratification of espousals, that Constantine made the inheritance of half the espousal donations, on the death of one party before the consummation of the marriage, to depend on the kiss having been given or not. (Cod. Theodos. lib. iii. tit. 5; de Sponsalibus, leg. 5; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 3; de Donat. ante Nupt. leg. 16); (Bingham, bk. xxii. ch. iii. § 6; Binterim, vol. vi. part 2, p. 164.)

(e.) To the Dying.—The kiss dictated by natural affection to dying friends was not forbidden by the church of Christ. We find it mentioned by the Pseudo-Amphilochius in his life of St. Basil (c. 129). It is prescribed in several early monastic rituals in the case of a sick monk; e.g. in the ritual of the abbey of St. Giles of Noyon, ante ann. 500. After receiving extreme unction, the mouth of the sick man is washed, he then first kisses the cross, and afterwards all who are present; and in that of St. Ouen of Rouen, c. A.D. 400, where, after communion, the sick man kisses the cross, and is then kissed by the priest, and afterwards by all the monks present in succession, each asking pardon of him both before and after the kiss. (Martene, u. s. lib. ii. c. 11; lib. iii. c. 15; Ordo viii., xii.)

(f.) To the Dead.—At the funerals the voice of nature was again listened to, and a final kiss was given to the corpse before the actual interment. This tribute of natural affection is mentioned by Ambrose on the occasion of the funeral of his brother Satyrus: "Procedamus ad tumulum, sed prius ultimum coram populo valedico, pacem praedico, osculum solvo" (Ambros. de Excessu Satyri, c. 17). The Pseudo-Dionysius describes how, after the prayer made by the priest over the dead body, it is kissed by him, and then by all who are present (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. vii. § 8). We learn also from Goar that it was given to the dead (Eucholog. p. 542), and the custom is punctually observed in the Greek church to the present day. The prohibition of the kiss by the Council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (Concil. Autissiodor. can. 12) had reference to the superstitious practice of administering the eucharist, with which, as we have seen, the Osculum pacis was inseparably connected, to the dead: "Non licet mortuis nec Eucharistiam, nec osculum tradi" (Augusti, Hibch. vol. iii. p. 306; Bingham, bk. xxiii. ch. iii. § 14).

(g.) As a Mark of Reverence and Respect.—As a token of reverence it was the habit to kiss not only the hands, feet, and vestments of bishops and other ecclesiastics, but also the walls, doors, thresholds, and altars of the sacred buildings. The references to this custom are very frequent. Paulinus, the biographer of St. Ambrose, says this token of respect was commonly paid to priests in his day (Vit. Ambros. p. 2). St. Ambrose himself refers to the hands of priests being kissed by kings and princes when receiving their prayers (de Dignitat. Sacerd. c. ii.). and St. Chrysostom relates how, on the first arrival of Meletius at Antioch, the people eagerly touched his feet and kissed his hands (Hom. de Melet. § 2, p. 521). But no more need be remarked on a custom so common in all countries.

The custom of kissing the pope's feet is of considerable antiquity. In the ordinals included in the sacramentary of Gregory the newly ordained presbyter is enjoined to kiss the feet of the ordainer, and the newly consecrated bishop of the consecrating pontiff. In the latter case, if the pope be not the consecrator, the mouth is to be kissed instead of the feet (Muratori, u. s. cols. 429, 443). In the Ord. Romanus of a pontifical mass, the deacon is directed to kiss the pope's feet before reading the Gospels (ib. col. 1022, § 8). The earliest mention of this mark of homage in Anastasius (Vitae Pontif. Roman.) is in the case of Constantine, A.D. 708–714, before whom Justinian the younger prostrated himself, on meeting him in Bithynia, wearing his crown, and kissed his feet (Anastas. xc. § 17.).

The reverent affection of the early Christians for the house of God and everything belonging to it was indicated by embracing and kissing the doors, threshold, pillars, and pavement of the church, and above all, the holy altar. We have a striking example of this last in an account given by St. Ambrose of the eagerness manifested by the soldiers who brought the welcome intelligence of the revocation of the young Valentinian's decree for surrendering the Porcian basilica to the Arians, to rush to the altar and kiss it [Ambros. Epist. xxxiii. (xiv.)]. So Athanasius speaks of those who "approach the holy altar, and with fear and joy salute it" (Homil. adv. eos qui in Homine spem figunt, tom. ii. p. 304), and the Pseudo-Dionysius, of "saluting the holy table" (Eccl. Hierarch. c. ii. § 4). The custom of kissing the doors is vividly depicted in Chrysostom's words: "See ye not how many kiss even the porch (πρόθυρα) of this temple, some stooping down, others grasping it with their hand, and putting their hand to their mouth" (Homil. xxx. i.; 2 Cor. xiii. 12). Prudentius also speaks of those who

"Apostolorum et martyrum

These prostrations and kisses must be regarded as nothing more than natural tokens of reverence and affection. The kisses of the altar, the Book of the Gospels, the sacred vessels, &c., which occur so abundantly in the early rituals, have a distinctly liturgical character (see Martene, u. s. lib. i. c. iv. art. 3, § 2, and art. 5, § 6; Goar, Euchol. p. 298, b). KNEELERS. [PENITENTS.]

KNEELING. [GENUFLEXION, I. 723.]

KNOP (Nodus, pomellum), the bulbous ornament on the stem of a chalice. It is found in some of the earliest known chalices, though it could not be said that every chalice had a knop amongst the earliest Christians. The cups on all the so-called Jewish coins represented in Migne, Dictionnaire d'Archéologie Sacrée, all have a knop. It will be enough, he says, to consult these in order to get an idea of the form of the chalice actually used by our blessed Lord at the institution of the Eucharist. It may be observed that all the chalices figured on Jewish coins of the time of Simon the Maccabee (B.C. 143—B.C. 135) seem to be uniformly provided with a knop (Madden, History of Jewish Coinage, p. 43, ed. 1864). Hence it appears that the knop in the sacred cup was pre-Christian.

The chalices that have survived to us from the period traversed in this work are extremely rare; and the examples of the knop within the same period are therefore rare also. (See Mr. Albert Way on 'Ancient Ornaments, Vessels, and Appliances of Sacred Use,' Archaeological Journal, vol. iii. p. 131). The knop, however, occurs in what Dr. Lubke describes as "the oldest* of the chalices known in Germany," which was given to the Monastery of Krensmünster by the Duke Tassilo, who founded the monastery in the year 777 (Ecclesiastical Art in Germany, p. 140, ed. 1876, Engl. transl.). Amongst the decorations of this chalice is a figure of our Lord, in the act of benediction. From the position of His hand the chalice seems to be of Eastern origin. The Gourdon Chalice, which Labarte (Histoire des Arts industriels, vol. i. p. 495, ed. 1864) shews to have been buried between A.D. 518 and A.D. 527, stands upon a conical stem, and has a bead, the germ of the knop, at the junction. This is the earliest example known. [CHALICE, I. 338.]

It is a mistake to suppose that the knop was invented for the purpose of adding strength to the chalice-stem,—a result which it could not effect, for the strength of a knopped stem would still be only the strength of its weakest or thinnest part. It may have been introduced first for the purpose of decoration, though afterwards it was expressly adopted to assist the priest in holding the chalice between his fingers in the act of consecration. He joins his finger and thumb, and then holds the chalice with the remaining fingers. In the Latin rite the priest while holding the sacred host in his right hand over the chalice is directed to hold the chalice itself in his left hand, "per nodum infra cuppam." The dates given above shew that the knop existed before the doctrine of Transubstantiation was formulated.

Authorities.—The writer is not aware of any monograph on the subject in any language. The knop is not even mentioned in the Hieroglossicon by the brothers Maeri. Fol. Romæ, 1677. But besides the works quoted above, the reader may consult Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxi. p. 336 and vol. xxii. p. 21; the Arundel Society's publication on Ecclesiastical Metal Work of the Middle Ages, and Diversarum Artium Schemata, by Theophilus. KOINONIKON (Κοινωνικόν). [Compare COMMENDATORY LETTERS, I. 407.] I. A letter of communion given to travellers enabling them to communicate with the Church in the place to which they journeyed. The Nomocanon of the Greeks (c. 454; Cotel. Mon. m. Gr. i. 142) orders that "no stranger be received (to communion) without a koinonikon." Such letters were also called ἐπιστόλια or εἰρηνικά, as by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Can. 11): "We have decreed that all the poor and those needing help shall, after investigation, travel with letters (epi-stolia), that is to say, with ecclesiastical eirenica only, and not with letters of commendation" (συνοστατικοί; comp. 2 Cor. iii. 1). The former word, epistolium, we find used in the West, as by the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 566, which decreed "that no one of the clergy or laity, except the bishop, presume to give epistolia" (Can. 6). The other name, eirenica, is used by the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341: "No stranger is to be received without letters of peace" (Can. 7); Sim. in the West, Conc. Elib., as below.

It appears that the issue of such letters of communion had to be watched and regulated in every part of the Church. Thus the Council of Antioch (Can. 8) allowed chorepiscopi to grant them, but forbade presbyters. From the Council of Eliberis, A.D. 305 (Can. 25), we learn that intending travellers sometimes obtained them from confessors, as the lapsed did their libelli: "To every one who has brought confessors' letters are to be given letters communicatory, the confessor's name being cancelled, forasmuch as, under the glory of this name, they everywhere astonish the simple." The same Council (Can. 31) forbade women (supposed to be the wives of bishops and presbyters) to write litteræ pacificæ for the laity, or to receive them. The Council of Arles, in 314 (Can. 9):—"Concerning those who present letters of confessors, it is decreed that such letters be taken from them, and that they receive others communicatory." The Council of Carthage, A.D. 348 (Can. 17): "Let no clerk or layman communicate in a strange congregation (in alienâ plebe) without his bishop's letters." The Council of Agatha, in 505 (Can. 52), and that of Epaone in 517 (can. 6): "Let no one grant communion to a presbyter, or deacon, or clerk, travelling without his bishop's letters."

In the Capitularies of the French kings we find these documents called litteræ peregrinorum, travellers' letters (cap. v. an. 806, tom. i. col. 456), and formatae (1225). The last name is given to them by the Council of Milevi, A.D. 416 (Can. 20): "It is decreed that any clerk who desires to go to court, wherever it be, on his own business, shall receive a formata from his bishop. But if he shall choose to go without a formata, let him be removed from communion." [FORMA, I. 682.]

II. The same names were given to those letters which bishops, on their ordination, sent to other bishops as an offer and claim of communion, and to letters which passed between bishops at any time as a token of adherence to the same faith. Thus Cyril of Alexandria, "If John, the most religious bishop of Antioch, subscribe it (a confession of faith), . . . then give to him τὰ κοινωνικά" (Inter Acta Conc. Eph. Labbe, iii.); that is, as the ancient translation of the West renders it,—"the letters communicatory" (Nov. Coll. Conc. col. 910; Baluz. Synodicon, c. 204). A more common expression was κοινωνικά γράμματα. This is used by the Council of Antioch, A.D. 269, when announcing to the popes of Alexandria and Rome the election of Domnus to the see of Antioch. It requested them to send him letters of communion, that they might receive the like from him in return (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30). Using the same term, St. Basil challenges those who accused him of being in communion with Apollinarius to produce any letters of communion that had passed between them (Epist. 345; tom. ii. p. 1122). The same expression used by Cyril of Alexandria (Ep. ad Macsimian. inter Acta Conc. Eph. c. 81) is rendered in the ancient Latin version of the Acts of the Council of Ephesus by the unusual phrase of litterae communicativae (Baluz. Nova Collect. Concil. col. 597). In the version of his epistle to Theognostus (Synod. c. 85) we have the more common litterae communicatoriae (col. 793). St. Augustine, writing in 397, says: "We wrote to some of the chiefs of the Donatists, not letters of communion (communicatorias litteras), which now for a long time, owing to their perversion from the Catholic unity throughout the world, they do not receive, but such private letters as it is lawful for us to address even to Pagans" (Ep. xliiii. § 1). He repeats this in his work Contra Litteras Petiliani (I. 1). The same father declares the bishop of Carthage to be "united per communicatorias litteras to the Church at Rome, . . . and to other lands, whence the gospel had come to Africa" (Ep. xliiii. § 7). He again and again speaks of such letters as a sign and proof of the intercommunion of churches (ibid. §§ 8, 16, 19). These letters, like those granted to travellers, came under the general head of formatae. Thus Augustine, speaking of a schismatical bishop, says, "We asked whether he could give letters communicatory, which we call formatae, where I wished" (Ep. xliiv. § 5).

III. A troparion in the Greek liturgy, which is varied for "the day or the saint" (Goar, Lit. Chrys. p. 81; Typicon Sabae, 7). It is now sung after the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and before the hot infusion and fraction. Originally, however, it was sung, as its name implies, during the communion of the people. This is evident from the following statement in the Chronicon Paschale of Alexandria (tom. i. p. 714; ed. Niebuhr). "This year, in the month Artemisius, the Roman May, 12th Indiction, under Sergius the Patriarch of Constantinople, was first introduced the custom that after all have received the holy Mysteries, while the clerks are removing the precious fans, patens, and cups, and other sacred utensils, also after the distribution of the Eulogiae from the side-tables, and the singing of the last verse of the koinonikon, this antiphon should be sung, Let our mouth be filled with praise," &c. This was in the year 624 of our era. In the Liturgy of St. James, from which the Greek is derived, the words, "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is" (from Ps. 34), are both said by the priest and sung by the choir (Cod. Liturg. Assem. v. 57) before the communion of the former; but probably the Greek anthem rather took the place of four psalms (23, 34, 145, 117), which were said at the fraction in St. James. A shorter form would be sufficient, when the communicants became fewer. The words, "O taste," &c., were sung at Jerusalem in the 4th century, after the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and therefore also before the communion. St. Cyril, addressing the newly baptized, says (Catech. Myst. v. 17), "After this ye hear him who sings with divine melody, exhorting you and saying, 'O taste,'" &c. In St. Mark's Liturgy, the celebrant says a certain prayer, "or else, Like as the hart," &c., i.e. Psalm 42 (Liturg. Orient. Renaud. i. 162); but there is no proper koinonikon. In the Clementine "the 33rd Psalm (34th) is to be said while all the rest are communicating" (Coteler. i. 405). The Armenian Liturgy provides proper hymns to be sung by the choir, "while they who are worthy are communicating" (Le Brun, Miss. x. art. 21). In the Coptic rite "they sing from the psalm" during the fraction, which is followed immediately by the communion of the celebrant (Renaud. i. 24). In the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil, "the people say the 50th (51st) Psalm and the koinonikon for the day" between the fraction and the communion (Renaud. i. 84, 345). In that of St. Gregory, only the 105th Psalm is then said (ibid. 124). In the Syrian St. James, used both by Melchites and Jacobites, and therefore earlier than the schism, the koinonikon is represented by an invitory, sung by the deacon and subdeacons while the people are communicating (Renaud. ii. 42): "The Church cries, My brethren, receive the body of the Son; drink His blood with faith, and sing His glory," &c. A similar form occurs in the Nestorian Liturgy (ibid. 596; Lib. Malab. Raulin, 326). According to the Abyssinian, which comes from St. Mark, "skilled persons chant some verses, while the sacrament is ministered to the people, . . . which the people repeat singing" (Biblioth. Max. PP. xxvii. 663).

The Greek koinonikon corresponds to a hymn which they began to sing at Carthage in St. Augustine's time, "when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people" (Retract. ii. 11); to the Antiphona ad Communionem of Rome, said to have been introduced by Gregory I. (Honorius, Gemma Animae, i. 96); and to the Antiphona ad Accedentes of the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, p. 7). In the last, we may observe, the anthem from Whitsun Eve to Lent, and on All Saints' day is, "O taste and see," &c., so familiar to the East. It cannot now be ascertained whether anything was sung during the communion in the original liturgy of Gaul (Liturgia Gallicana, Mabill. 53). [W. E. S.]

LABARUM. In Christian antiquity the military standard bearing the sacred monogram ✠ P, adopted by the emperor Constantine as an imperial ensign subsequently to his celebrated vision and the victory over Maxentius, as described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. i. c. 28-31), and in later times the device itself, or the cross alone. The labarum has often been spoken of as if it were something altogether novel both in form and use (Gretser, de Cruce C. r. vol. i. p. 493). But the thing, and probably also the name, were already familiar in the Roman army. The labarum of Constantine was, in fact, nothing more than the ordinary cavalry-standard (vexillum), from which it differed only in the Christian character of its symbols and decorations. Like that it preserved the primitive type of a cloth fastened to the shaft of a spear, and consisted of a square piece of some textile material elevated on a gilt pole, and suspended from a cross bar, by which it was kept expanded. The eagle of victory surmounting the shaft was replaced by the sacred monogram contained within a chaplet. The emblems embroidered on the banner were also Christian. They were usually wrought in gold on a purple ground. To the eye of the early Christians, accustomed to discern the emblem of salvation in everything around them, the cruciform framework of the Roman standard had already marked it out as an appropriate symbol of the true faith. "In your trophies," writes Tertullian (Ap. log. c. 16), "the cross is the heart of the trophy . . . those hangings of the standards and banners (cantubrorum aliter labarorum) are the clothings of crosses": and Minucius Felix (c. 29), "the very standards, and banners (cantibra aliter labara), and flags of your camps, what are they but gilded crosses, imitating not only the appearance of the cross but that of the man hanging on it." Nor was there one of the Roman ensigns the consecration of which to the honour of Christ would have so powerful an influence, especially on the army. For, as Sozomen informs us, "it was valued beyond all others, being always carried before the emperor, and worshipped by the soldiery as the most honourable symbol of the Roman power" (Soz. H. E. lib. i. c. 4). When therefore Constantine adopted it, consecrated by the symbols of his newly adopted faith, as "the saving sign of the Roman empire" (σωτήριον σημεῖον τῆς Ῥωμαίων ἀρχῆς), he took the surest method of uniting both divisions of his troops, pagans and Christians, in a common worship, and leading those who still clung to the old religion to a purer faith, since, to quote Tertullian again (u. s.), "the camp religion of the Romans was all through a worship of the standards."

Neither was the word labarum a newly-coined one. Even if the various reading, labarum for cantabrum, in Tertullian and Minucius Felix is rejected, Sozomen, when describing the result of Constantine's vision, speaks of it as a word already in use—"he commanded the artists to remodel the standard called by the Romans labarum"—τὸ παρὰ Ῥωμαίους καλούμενον λάβαρον (H. E. lib. i. c. 4). According to Suicer (sub voce) the word came into use in the reign of Hadrian, and was probably adopted from one of the nations conquered by the Romans. The orthography varies in different writers, as is usual with a half-naturalised foreign word. It is written λάβαρον by Sozomen and Nicephorus (H. E. vii. 37), and λάβουρον by Chrysostom (Homil. iii. in 1 Tim.), who speaks of it as "the royal standard in war usually called laburum." Its derivation is still uncertain, "in spite," writes Gibbon, "of the efforts of the critics, who have ineffectually tortured the Latin, Greek, Spanish, Celtic, Teutonic, Illyric, Armenian, &c., in search of an etymology." We find λαμβάνω, "to seize;" ἐν λάβει, "piety;" λάφυρα, "spoils;" λαῖφος, a "cloak;" and even the Latin labor, with other still more far-fetched derivations enumerated by Gothofried (Cod. Theod. vol. ii. p. 142). Ducange's derivation from a supposed Celtic root, lab hair = panni-ulus exercitus, is repudiated by Celtic scholars. The word is most probably of Basque origin, in which language, according to Baillet (Dictionnaire Celtique, s. v.) labarva signifies a standard. According to Larramendi (Diccionario Trilingue), the word is of Cantabrian origin, and is derived from lauburu, signifying anything with four heads or limbs, such as the cruciform framework of a military standard. Cantabrum, used as a synonym for laburum, indicates the country from which it was derived.

The form of the labarum is very minutely described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. i. c. 31): "A long spear, overlaid with gold, formed the figure of a cross by means of a transverse bar at the top. At the summit of the whole was fixed a wreath of gold and precious stones, within which the symbol of the title of salvation was indicated by means of its first two letters, the letter P being intersected by X in the centre (χρῆσθμενον τοῦ ρ κατὰ τὸ μεσάταιον) . . . From the cross bar of the spear was suspended a square cloth of purple stuff profusely embroidered with gold and precious stones. Beneath the crown of the cross, immediately above the embroidered banner, the shaft bore golden medallions of the emperor and his children." This original standard formed the pattern of others which Constantine ordered to be made to be carried at the head of all his armies. Fifty of the stoutest and most religious soldiers, ὑπαπιστάι, were selected by him as the perpetual guard of the labarum, which was to be borne by them singly by turns. Eusebius relates a story he had heard from the emperor himself of a fierce engagement in which the soldier whose duty it was to carry it, panic struck, transferred the labarum to another and fled, paying for his cowardice with his life, while the soldier who boldly carried the sacred symbol escaped unhurt (Euseb. u. s. lib. ii. c. 8). Not content with having it represented on his standards, Constantine commanded that the monogram should also be engraved on the shields of his soldiers (ib. lib. iv. c. 21). Lactantius (de Mort. I ersec. c. 44) is silent as to the standard, and only records the representation on the shields—"transversa X litera, summo capite circumflecto (i. e. with a line drawn through the middle and turned into a loop at the top, forming the letter Rho) Christum in scutis notat."

Prudentius describes the monogram as decorating both the standards (the labarum proper) and the shields of Constantine's army on his triumphal entrance into Rome after the defeat of Maxentius.

"Christus purpureum gemmanti textus in auro
Signabit labarum; clypeorum insignia Christus
Scripserat; ardebat summis crux addita cristis."

Contr. Symmach. i. 487-489.

and again:

"Agnoscas Regina (Roma) libens mea signa necesse est,
In quibus effigies crucis aut gemmata refulget,
Aut longis solido ex auro praeferitur in hastis."

Ib. 464-466.

and speaks of its acceptance by the senate as an object of adoration:

"Tunc ille senatus
Militiae ultricis titulum, Christique verendum
Nomen adoravit quod collucebat in armis."

Ib. 494-496.

Paulinus furnishes us with a singularly detailed description of the monogram, forming a golden cross, depending from a "corona lucis," in the basilica of St. Felix at Nola, explaining how all the characters of XPICTOC are contained in it:

"Nam nota, qua his quinque notat numerante Latino Calculus, hanc Graecis chi scribitur, et mediam rho Culus apex et sigma tenet quod rursus ad ipsam Curvatus virgam facit o velut orbe peracto. Nam rigor obustus facit i quod in Hellade iota est; Tau idem stylus ipse brevi retro acuminis ductus Efficit," &c.—Poem. xix. (Carm. xi. in St. Felicem).

The notes of Muratori on this curious, and not very easily intelligible, passage, should by all means be consulted.

Once adopted by Constantine as the imperial ensign, it was continued by his successors. Ambrose, begging the emperor Theodosius to take forcible possession of a Jewish synagogue, exhorts him to order his troops to carry in "his victorious ensign," i.e. the labarum consecrated with the name of Christ (Epist. lib. vi. Ep. 29); and in another passage utters the following prayer for the success of Gratian's arms against the Goths: "Turn, O Lord, and raise the standard of Thy faith. Here it is not the eagles, nor the flight of birds that lead the army, but Thy Name, O Lord Jesus, and Thy worship" (Ambros. de Fide, lib. ii. ad fin.). The sacred symbols were naturally removed from the standards by Julian (Soz. H. E. lib. v. c. 17; Greg. Naz. cont. Julian I. tom. i. p. 75), but were restored by Jovian and his Christian successors, and continued to be borne by the later Byzantine emperors.

Examples of the labarum, both as a standard and as borne on the shield, in different forms, are abundantly furnished by the series of imperial medals given by Ducange in his Familiae Augustae Byzantinae, which usually forms part of the same volume with the Constantinopolis Christiana, from which the subsequent illustrations are chiefly drawn.

No. 2. Coin of Constantine II. and Constans.

Fig. 1 is from a tiny coin of Constantine II., "a third brass of the smallest size." The engravings are much larger than the coins they represent. This "most important of the numismatic memorials of the triumph of Christianity," "of a rarity commensurate with its interest," (C. W. King, Early Christian Numismatics, p. 25), represents the labarum as described by Eusebius. The spiked end of the shaft of the banner transfixes a serpent (cf. Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 3). On the banner are emblazoned three roundels (interpreted by Mr. King's engraver, but without sufficient warrant, as DEO), above is the sacred monogram; on the exergue CONS. The obverse bears "the boyish, not to be mistaken, features of Constantine II." (Ibid.) Examples of Constantine I. with the same reverse type are in existence [NUMISMATICS].

Fig. 2 of Constantine II. (tab. v. p. 21), represents him in military dress, standing on a galley, steered by Victory. He bears a phoenix on a globe in his right hand, and in his left the labarum in the form of a banner, with the sacred monogram; the motto is Fel[ici]m Temp[or]um reparatio. This was a favourite device with Constantius II. and Constans (King, u.s., p. 68). Fig. 3, a coin of Constans (tab. xi. p. 33),

This design is frequently repeated, e.g. tab. xii., xiii., pp. 35, 37; tab. ii. p. 56. The emperor is sometimes represented holding the labarum in one hand and seizing a captive in the other, e.g. a coin of Gratian (fig. 4, tab. ii. p. 56); at other times trampling a captive under foot (tab. xiii. p. 37). A not unfrequent design represents the labarum planted in the ground with fettered captives seated beside it, e.g. tab. vi. p. 23; vii. p. 25; viii. p. 27, &c. Sometimes we find the sacred monogram on a shield, as in fig. 5, a coin of Aelia Flaccilla, wife

LACUNARY WORK. (Lambris, Fr.) The lacunari or laquearia were hollow spaces or panels originally formed by the planks arranged at regular intervals, to compose the ceiling of a room. During the Romano-Byzantine period these were gilded and inlaid with ivory (Horace, Od. ii. 18); sometimes they were adorned with paintings (Suet. Vit. Ner. 31). The vaulted or waggon-roofed variety was called CAMARA or CAMERA. [DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANTIQ. s. v.] The panelling was applied also to the soffit or under surface of an arch; but this practice is apparently not earlier than the Renaissance, and was an innovation on the original custom, since earlier arches had no soffits properly so-called. The ancient basilicas had the ground of these recesses enriched with Caisons square, trefoil, hexagonal, in much variety; often again with roses, masques of animals, and such like; but these in later examples. The lacunary work was employed both in public and private buildings; "Laquearia, quae nunc in privatis domibus auro teguntur," says Pliny (Hi t. Natur. xxxiii. 18), and especially in Italy the ceilings of all the rooms of a house would be of this kind; some being more richly ornamented than others. It is to be distinguished from mosaic work (musivum opus); see MOSAIC.

When in the third and fourth centuries A.D. the Christians began to erect large and costly churches, the ceilings were often ornamented with this work. Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. iii. capp. 31-40) tells us that the church which Constantine built at Jerusalem had a vaulted roof (καμάραν λακωνάρην), of which the whole was divided into panels, carved and gilded.

Paulinus, bishop of Nola in Campania (A.D. 409-431), has described in one of his letters (Ep. 12, ad Severin.) a new church there, upon which the highest decorative art of the period appears to have been exercised. Of this the roof of the nave and galleries were panelled (lacunato). The term is frequently used by St. Jerome (A.D. 340-420), who did not altogether sympathise with the prevailing habit of lavishing adornment on churches. He says (Ep. 2 ad Nepotian.), "Marmora nitent auro, splendent laquearia, gemmis altare distinguitur," &c.

Patiens, bishop of Lyons, is recorded to have built a cathedral church in that city, of which we have a contemporary description from the pen of Sidonius Apollinaris (A.D. 431-482). He says:

"Intus lux micat, atque bracteatum
Sol sic sollicitatur ad lacunar
Fulvo ut concolor erret in metallo."

That is, the golden sunshine played over the golden plates of the panels in the church.

But yet the lacunar hardly appears to have been the prevailing style of ornamentation in these early centuries, at all events for churches. It was revived and much extended under the Renaissance. [S. J. E.]

LAITY. I. In the Old Testament, when the Israelites in general are distinguished from the priests, they are spoken of as "the people." In the Greek of the Septuagint this is ὁ λαός. See examples in Lev. iv. 3; Deut. xviii. 3; Ezra vii. 16; Is. xxiv. 2; Jer. i. 18, v. 31; Hosea iv. 9. Hence the use of λαϊκός to denote one not of the priesthood. Thus Clemens Alex. says that the hanging at the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xvi. 36) was a "protection against lay unbelief" (Strom. v. 5, 33). The author of the Questions and Answers to the Orthodox, ascribed to Justin Martyr, observes that while the law "destroys by fire a priest's daughter guilty of fornication, it slays by stoning the daughter of the layman" (τοῦ λαϊκοῦ ἀνδρός) (Resp. ad Qu. 97). Philo calls the layman of his nation ἰδιώτης, a private person. Thus he says that at the passover "the ἰδιῶται do not bring the victims to the altar, and the priests sacrifice; but the whole nation, by the ordinance of the law, assumes the priestly office" for the occasion (de Vit. Mos. iii.). Unless restrained by revelation, the first Christians, being educated as Jews, would naturally draw a somewhat similar line between their own office-bearers and the mass of believers. How far they were encouraged to do so by their inspired teachers may be gathered to a great extent from Scripture itself. Not to dwell on the relation of the whole body to the Apostles, whose commission was in some respects extraordinary, we find each local church or congregation subject to other rulers (ἡγούμενοις, Heb. xiii. 17), who were "over them in the Lord" (1 Thess. v. 12; comp. 1 Tim. iii. 5, v. 17), under the name of overseers (ἐπίσκοποι, bishops) and elders (πρεσβύτεροι, whence priests), to whose teaching, exhortation, and rebuke, and to whose judgment in some things, they were required to submit (1 Tim. iv. 6, 11, vi. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 2, iv. 2; Tit. i. 9, 13, ii. 15, iii. 10). To their care and oversight the "laity" were committed, as a flock to the shepherd (Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2). The distinction was observed everywhere; elders being ordained in every church (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5; comp. Acts xi. 30), and provision was made for the perpetuity of the system (2 Tim. ii. 2). Sometimes the laity were distinguished as "the church" or "the brethren." E.g. "when Paul and Barnabas were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders" (Acts xv. 4); and when "the apostles and elders, with the whole church" send a letter to "the brethren which were of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia," it begins thus, "The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren" (ib. 22, 23). This epistle was accordingly delivered, not to the rulers of the church at Antioch, but to "the multitude" (30). Compare Acts xii. 17: "Show these things unto James (the ruler) and to the brethren;" and 1 Tim. iv. 6: "If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ." The distinction visible in these passages is preserved in the earliest extra-Scriptural records.

of the church. Thus Clement, himself bishop of Rome, in an epistle by which he sought to allay dissensions at Corinth, addressing "the brethren" there, says, "Ye did all things without respect of persons, and walked by the laws of God, being subject to those who had the rule over you, and yielding due honour to the presbyters among you" (Ep. i. c. 1). He illustrates the relative position of the laity and clergy by the parallel of the Jewish priesthood and people: "To the high-priest his proper ministries have been assigned, and to the priests their proper place appointed, and on the Levites their services have been imposed. The layman (ὁ λαϊκός) is bound by the precepts that affect laymen. "Let each of you, brethren, give thanks unto God in his own station (τάγματι), keeping a good conscience, and not overstepping the appointed rule of his ministry" (cc. 40, 41). This state of things was to continue; for the apostles, he tells us, not only appointed the first rulers in each church, but also "gave direction how, at their decease, other approved men should succeed to their ministry" (c. 44). In the Visions of Hermas, which many critics assign to the age of Clement, the laity, under the name of "the elect," are spoken of as being taught and ministered to by the apostles and bishops and doctors (i. e. presbyters: see Pearson, Vind. Ignat. ii. 13, 3) and ministers" (i. e. deacons) (Vast. i. Vis. iii. 5). The following sentence from Ignatius is common to all the recensions: "My soul be surety for them who are subject to the bishops, presbyters, deacons" (Ep. ad Polycarp. c. vi.; Cureton, Corp. Ignat. p. 12). In the epistles known to Eusebius, A.D. 324 (Hi t. Eccl. iii. 30) such expressions are frequent. In Tertullian, A.D. 192, the word "laicus" occurs often. E. g. "The chief-priest, which is the bishop, has the right of giving (baptism). Then presbyters and deacons, not, however, without the authority of the bishop, for the honour of the church, which being saved, peace is saved. From another point of view even laymen have the right" (de Baptismo, xvii.). The same writer says of certain heretics that among them, "one man is to-day a bishop, next day another. To-day one is a deacon, who to-morrow will be a reader; to-day one is a presbyter, who to-morrow will be a layman; for they enjoin priestly (sacerdotalia) duties on laymen" (de Præscr. Hæret. c. 41). In the so-called apostolical canons, the first fifty of which, at least, are supposed to have been collected about the end of the 2nd century, the word layman is of very frequent occurrence. Thus, "If any clerk or layman who is segregated, or not received, goes to another city, and is there received (to communion) without letters commendatory, let both receiver and received be segregated" (can. 12). By can. 31, a presbyter who, in contempt of his bishop, gathers a separate congregation, and all the clerks who adhere to him are to be deposed, "but the laymen to be segregated." See also canons 15, 24, 43, 48, 57, 62-66, 69, 70, 71, 84, 85. Cyprian, A.D. 250, speaks of a "conference held with bishops, presbyters, deacons, confessors, and also with the laymen who stood firm" (in a persecution) for consultation on the treatment of the lapsed (Epist. 30, ad Rom.). Elsewhere he says, "The faith of the militant people (of God) is disarmed, while its vigour and the fear of Christ is taken away. Let the laity see how they provide for this. On the priest falls greater labour in asserting and defending the majesty of God" (Ep. 59, ad Cornel.). The more frequent name for the laity with this writer is plebs, e. g. "The clergy and people (plebs) and the whole brotherhood received with joy" certain schismatics who had returned to the church (Ep. 51, ad Corn.). He warned some unruly persons that "when a bishop was once made and approved by the testimony and judgment of his colleagues and the people (plebs), no other could in anywise be appointed" (Ep. 44, ad Corn.).

II. Laymen duly qualified might give religious instruction among the Jews. In the synagogues it was usual for the elder to ask anyone of repute to comment on the lesson for the day (Luke iv. 17; Acts xvii. 2), or to deliver a "word of exhortation" (Acts xiii. 15). This liberty was continued under the Gospel in the case of those who had the gift of "prophecy" (Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 10, 28, xiv. 1-6, 31, &c.). Among unbelievers all Christians were expected to teach the gospel as opportunity was given. "They that were scattered abroad" by the persecution on the death of Stephen "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts viii. 4). The majority of these would be laymen. Thus St. Paul, before he received the laying on of hands (Acts xiii. 3), "preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus" (Acts ix. 27); Aquila and Priscilla "expounded unto Apollos the way of God more perfectly" (ib. xviii. 26); and Apollos himself "mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ" (23). "At first all taught and baptized on whatever days and seasons occasion required . . . That the people might grow and multiply, it was at the beginning permitted to all to preach the gospel, and to baptize, and to explain the Scriptures in church, but when the church embraced all places, houses of assembly were constituted, and rulers (rectores) and the other offices in the church were instituted. . . . Hence it is that now neither do deacons preach in the congregation, nor clerks nor laymen baptize" (Hilar. Diac. Comm. in Ep. ad Eph. iv. 11, 12). When Demetrius of Alexandria complained that Origen, who was not a priest, had been asked by the bishops of the district to "discourse and to interpret holy Scripture publicly in church" at Caesarea, the bishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea denied the truth of one ground taken by Demetrius, viz. that laymen had never been known to preach before bishops. "If," said they, "any persons are anywhere found capable of benefiting the brethren, they are encouraged by the holy bishops to preach to the people. Thus at Larandi, Euelpis was asked by Neon; and at Iconium, Paulinus by Celsus; and at Smyrna, Theodore by Atticus;—our brethren now in bliss. And it is probable that this has been done in other places without our knowing it" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 19). Frumentius and Aedesius, while laymen, laid the foundation of the church in Abyssinia (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 19). The same service was rendered to Iberia (Georgia) by a female captive, who having healed by her prayers the king and his wife and son, exhorted them to believe in Christ, through whose name their cure had been effected (ib. c. 20).

A law of Valentinian and Theodosius, published in 394, "touching laymen who presume to dispute about religion," forbids the opportunity being permitted to any one of "coming into public and discussing or handling matters of religion" (Cod. Theodos. 2 in Capit. Car. Mag. vii. 195). Four years later a council held at Carthage decreed that "a layman should not dare to teach in the presence of clerics, unless they themselves asked him;" and absolutely, that "no woman, however learned or holy, should presume to teach men in a meeting" (cann. 98, 99). Leo I., A.D. 453, writing to Maximus the patriarch of Antioch, in view of danger from the growth of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, entreats him to take order "that beside those who are priests of the Lord, no one presume to claim for himself the right to teach or to preach, whether he be monk or layman" (Epist. 92, c. 6). He repeats this in a letter to Theodoret of Cyrus (Ep. 93, c. 6), and expresses a hope that his letter to Maximus would be dispersed by him and "come to the knowledge of all." The council in Trullo at Constantinople, A.D. 691, declares "that a layman ought not to dispute or teach publicly, thence arrogating to himself the right to teach, but that he should be obedient to the order handed down from the Lord." Those who should violate the canon were to be segregated for forty days (can. 64). There is, we think, no evidence that laymen were at any time permitted to read the eucharistic lessons, either in the East or West. A law of Charlemagne entirely forbids it: "A layman ought not to recite a lesson in church, nor to say the alleluia, but only the psalm or responsories without alleluia" (Capit. v. 112). [LECTION.]

III. Hilary, the deacon, as above quoted, appears to say that laymen could not confer baptism even in the first post-apostolic age. This was probably the general opinion; for the Greek compiler of the Clementine Constitutions ascribes the following prohibition to the apostles themselves: "We do not permit laymen to perform any of the sacerdotal functions, as sacrifice or baptism, or laying on of hands, or the lesser or greater benediction" (iii. 10). This would make them absolutely incapable; and the opinion of their incapacity was probably widely spread in the East to the end of the first four centuries after Christ. St. Basil, A.D. 370, implies that he held it, when he speaks with approbation of an argument against baptism by schismatical priests, which he attributes to Firmilian, one of his predecessors at Caesarea, and to St. Cyprian. It was to the effect that schismatical priests being cut off from the body of Christ, and thus losing their orders, having now "become laymen, have no power either to baptize or to ordain, being no longer able to impart to others the gift of the Holy Ghost, from which they have fallen themselves. On which account they commanded that those who came to the church from them (i.e. from any schismatical body) should be cleansed by the true baptism of the church" (Epist. ad Amphil. i. can. 1). An ancient Greek scholium, found in one MS. of this epistle (Cod. Amherb. ich.), enlarging on this point, says, "He falls from the sacerdotal grace, which he received from Him to whom he was united, and becomes for the future a layman," not able to impart to others that which he no longer has, nor able to obtain a new supply of it from the body which he has joined (Bever. Pand. ii. annot. 221). We must observe, however, that St. Basil, though with evident reluctance, admitted the baptisms of priests in schism, feeling himself overruled by numbers: "But since it has seemed good to some of those in Asia, out of consideration for the multitude, that their baptism should be received, let it be received" (Ep. u. s.). May we not suppose that he would also have confessed, if the question had come before him, that the church had power to authorise or accept, under special circumstances, the baptisms of laymen in full communion with her?

Tertullian, on the other hand, whom St. Cyprian used to call his master, teaches that, abstractedly, laymen have power to baptize, but that they can only exercise it by permission, expressed or understood. He argues that "what is received equally (by all) can be imparted equally" (by all); but he adds, "How much more is the discipline of reverence and modesty incumbent on the laity, seeing that it is the part of those greater than themselves (i.e. the priests and deacons) not to take on them the office of the episcopate, which is assigned to the bishops. Emulation is the mother of schisms" (de Bapt. 17). The principle laid down by Tertullian receives a curious illustration from the well-known story told by Rufinus, A.D. 390 (Hist. Eccl. i. 14), of some boys baptized in play by Athanasius when himself "quite a child" (Socr. A.D. 439, Hist. Eccl. i. 15). The bishop of Alexandria, who happened to see what was done from a distance, finding on inquiry that water had been duly used and the right form of words said, decided, after conference with his clergy, that the children should not be rebaptized, but he supplemented their irregular baptism by confirming them himself. There is a difficulty in the story from the great youth which it assigns to Athanasius about the year 312; but it would not have been related by Rufinus, or repeated at length by Sozomen, A.D. 460 (Hist. Eccl. ii. 17), without some protest, if the ground on which the bishop was said to have acted had not been widely accepted in the church at that time.

From the council of Elvira, about A.D. 300, we first learn under what circumstances it was held lawful for a layman to baptize. Its 38th canon decrees that "during foreign travel, at sea, or if there be no church near, one of the faithful, who has his own baptism entire (not clinic, duly confirmed, and probably also not impaired by lapse in persecution), and is not a bigamist, may baptize a catechumen in extremity of sickness, on condition that if he recover, he take him to the bishop that he may receive the benefit of the laying on of hands." St. Jerome, writing in 378, says that "without Christ and the command of the bishop, neither presbyter nor deacon have the right to baptize; which nevertheless we know to be often permitted to laymen, if necessity compel. For as one receives, so can he also give" (Contra Lucif. 9). The reader will observe here the reasoning of Tertullian very similarly expressed. St. Augustine, about 400: "If any layman, compelled by necessity, shall have given to a dying man that which, when he received it himself, he learnt the manner of giving, I know not if any one could piously say that it ought to be repeated. For to do it without necessity is to usurp the office of another; but to do it under pressure of necessity is either no fault or a venial" (Contra Epist. Parmen. ii. xiii. 29). In a work written shortly after this he shows a disposition to go further, and to recognise the outward act under whatever circumstances performed. He is speaking of several questions that might be raised,—“whether that baptism is to be owned which is received from one who has not himself received it;” whether it is valid, whatever the faith, or motive, or position (as a catholic or schismatic) of the giver or receiver, or of both, &c. He even includes the case of baptism conferred on the stage where the actors are heathens, and here he clearly leans to the affirmative, if the person baptized has had a sudden access of faith at the time; but when God has not thus interposed (neque ille qui ibi acciperet, ita crederet, sed totum ludicre et mimice et joculariter ageretur), he thinks that only an express revelation could decide. He would in all such questions defer to a “plenary council;” but an answer to the last must be sought by united and most earnest prayer (de Bapt. c. Donat. vii. 53). He says also that at all events he would at such a council “not hesitate to maintain that they have baptism who have received it consecrated by the words of the gospel anywhere and from any one whosoever without deceit on their own part and with some faith” (ib. § 102). In Gratian (P. iii. de Consecr. iv. 21) we have an extract from a letter ascribed to Augustine:—“We are wont to hear that even laymen are accustomed to give the sacrament which they have received in a case of necessity, when neither bishops, presbyters, nor any of the ministers are found, and the danger of him who seeks it, lest he die without that sacrament, is pressing.” In another passage from the same epistle we find a story (which the writer confesses to be uncertain) of a catechumen and a penitent in danger of being shipwrecked together. As they were the only Christians in the ship the penitent baptized the catechumen and was in turn reconciled by him. What they did was approved by all (ib. c. 36). The question raised by St. Augustine, as to the effect of a mock baptism on the stage, probably suggested a tale of wonder which we find, with differences of detail, both in the East and West. An actor who personated a catechumen receiving baptism was said to have been suddenly and miraculously converted. One version lays the scene at Rome in the presence of Diocletian, about 285, and gives the name of Genesius to the comedian. The other calls him Gelasius, and makes the place Heliopolis in Phoenicia, and the year 297. In both cases the neophyte is said to have been led forth to martyrdom (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. in St. Genés). The authorities are, for Gelasius, the Paschal Chronicle of Alexandria, compiled in 630 (p. 642); and for Genesius, some Acta of uncertain date which were copied by Ado in his Martyrologium (A.D. 859) at Aug. 25.

Gelasius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 494, speaking of deacons:—“Let them not presume to baptize without (the authority of) the bishops or presbyters, unless extreme necessity compel them,—those officers being perchance settled a long way off,—to do which is for the most part permitted even to lay Christians” (Epist. ad Episc. Lu.an. §c. § 7). Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, cites our Lord’s words to the apostles (John xx. 22, 23; Matt. xxviii. 19) to shew that it is “not lawful for laymen (privatis = ιδιώταις) nor for clerks not of the higher orders (sine gradu; see Uulg. 1 Tim. iii. 13), to baptize, but for priests only” (sacerdotibus = bishops and presbyters). Therefore, he concludes, it is not lawful even for deacons to do so “without (the authority of) the bishops and presbyters, except when they are far absent and the last necessity of illness compel,—which is for the most part permitted even to the lay faithful, lest any one should be called out of this world without the saving remedy” (de Eccl. Off. ii. 24).

IV. There is evidence to shew that during the earlier part of our period the laity came up to the holy table to make their offerings and to communicate. Dionysius, the pope of Alexandria, A.D. 254, speaks of a layman as “going up to the table,” and “standing at the table” (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 9). Even women (nisi in abscessu) were, according to him, then permitted to “approach the holy of holies” and to “draw near to the holy table” (Ep. ad Basilin. can. 2). St. Chrysostom:—“Let no Judas, no Simon, come up to the table” (Hom. 50, in St. Matt. § 3). By the 19th canon of the council of Laodicea, about 365, it was “permitted to those only who were in holy orders to enter the place of the altar and to communicate there.” This probably only sanctions a custom already becoming general. Theodosius the Great, at Milan in 390, took his offering up to the altar, but was not allowed to remain in the chancel for the communion (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 18). In the East, however, he had been accustomed to stay and to communicate within the bema (ib. comp. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 24). His grandson Theodosius says of himself in 431, “We draw near the most holy altar only to offer the gifts, and having gone into the enclosed tabernacle of the sacred circles, at once leave it” (Concil. Labbe, iii. 1237). For the East the rule was finally settled by the council in Trullo, A.D. 691. It forbade any of the laity to “enter within the sacred altar-place,” except the emperor, “when he wished to offer gifts to the Creator” (can. 69). Turning to the West we find the Council of Tours, A.D. 566, permitting “the holy of holies to be open to laymen and women for prayer and communion, as the custom is,” but forbidding laymen to “stand by the altar, at which the sacred mysteries are celebrated, either on vigils or at masses” (can. 4). This prohibition was confirmed by a council held at some uncertain place in France, about the year 744; but the permission is not also repeated (can. 6; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 153). The whole of the canon of Tours, however, appears in the Capitularies of Charlemagne (vii. 279). In the earliest editions of the Ordo Romanus, the bishop is represented as “going down” to receive the gifts of the people, and being “conducted back to the altar” after receiving them (Mus. Ital. ii. 10, 74). This exhibits the custom at Rome in the 8th century. At that time the men and women were on different sides of the church, and the clergy went to their several places to communicate them (ib. 10, 50). In an epistle of Theodosius and Valentinian (Cod. Theod. ix. 45) the nave (ὁ ναός) of the church is called εὐκτήριον τοῦ λαοῦ, "the praying-place of the laity." In a law of Justinian, A.D. 528 (Codex I. iii. xlii. 10), the clergy are exhorted to a punctual observance of their hours of prayer by an appeal to the example of "many of the laity, who for the good of their souls constantly frequent the most holy churches, and shew themselves diligent in the practice of psalmody." From this we may infer, as probable, that at that time laymen often met together in church to sing psalms out of the hours of public worship, and when the clergy were not present. [W. E. S.]

LAMB, THE HOLY. In the Orthodox Greek Church the oblation of bread for the Liturgy (ἡ προσφορά, oblata) is prepared of leavened bread, baked with special care, in the form of a moderate-sized, round,^a flat loaf or cake. In the centre is a square projecting portion, impressed with a stamp called the seal (σφραγίς),^b consisting of a cross, in the angles of which are stamped the words ΙC XC NI KA, i.e. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς νικᾷ. This square projection is called the Holy Lamb, or in the rubrics the Holy Bread (ὁ ἅγιος ἄρτος). The circular (στρογγυλοειδής) shape, as of a coin, is considered by Durandus (iv. c. 41) to symbolise the price of man's redemption. The form, however, seems to have varied. Gabriel of Philadelphia^c (Apol. pro Eccl. Orient.) states that the bread for the oblation was made either round or square; and adds that the round shape is symbolical of our Lord's Divinity, the square of the universality of redemption. Allatius, too (de Eccl. Occ. et Orient. Conc., lib. iii. c. 15, s. 18), writes: "The Greeks when they make the bread for the sacrifice, for the most part do not make it round (ut plurimum non rotundant), but draw it out into four arms in the form of a cross: they then impress the seal (sigillum), just explained,^d in the centre of the cross and at the extremities of each arm. The priest who is about to celebrate takes the bread, in the Prothesis, and divides it in such a manner that each portion has a complete seal, and these parts are called seals (σφραγίδες, signaculo)." [FRACTION.]

According to this description each portion would be approximately square; but whether the whole oblation be round or square, the Holy Lamb itself is square.

In the "office of the Prothesis," called διδραξις τῆς θείας καὶ ἱερᾶς λειτουργίας, which is performed in the chapel of the Prothesis, on the north side of the bema, as introductory to the liturgy, and in which the priest assumes the eucharistic vestments, and selects and prepares the elements for consecration; he separates the

"lamb" from the rest of the oblation, cutting it away squarewise with the "spear" (ἡ ἄγία λόγχη), which is a knife in the form of an elongated spear-head, with a short handle, ending in a cross, and symbolical of the spear which pierced our Lord's side; and lays it on the paten or disc (ὁ ἅγιος δίσκος), arranging afterwards in a specified order particles (μερίδες) cut in a pyramidal form from the oblation.

Five loaves or oblations are usually prepared in the Prothesis; in the Russian Church invariably so, according to King (p. 144), but in Greece one only is often prepared, and of old the number varied. The oblation thus prepared is covered with the "asteriscus" [p. 149], a sort of frame, consisting of two bars crossing each other and joined by a hinge at the centre, and bent into such a shape as to form, when they are at right angles, a support for the "veils," of which there are three; the innermost being called δισκοκάλυμμα, and the outer ἀήρ. It then remains in the Prothesis till the "great entrance," i.e. of the Elements in the liturgy.

At the "fraction" in the liturgy the priest breaks the Holy Lamb, there called "the Holy Bread" (τὸν ἅγιον ἄρτον), into four^e parts, and arranges them crosswise in the disc, thus—

He makes the sign of the cross over the chalice with the part ΙC, which he then puts into the chalice; he communicates himself and the assistants with the part XC, and the remaining two parts are divided among the lay communicants (Neale, Introd. 518).

LAMB, THE. [IN ART.] It appears best to treat early representations of the lamb as symbolic of our Lord (whether in the act of suffering or of triumph), apart from those of the sheep, which represent human members of the church of Christ. They are frequently brought together on the sarcophagi, and especially in the later mosaics within our period, as at SS. Cosmas and Damianus, and at St. Praxedis, in Rome; and ^d This is identical with that described as impressed on the Holy Lamb.

^e In the Roman Liturgy the Host (oblata) is divided into three parts: in the Mozarabic into nine, with special symbolism.

the distinction is often sustained by the simple expedient of making the Divine Lamb of larger size than His followers, as Aringhi, vol. i. p. 307 (lib. ii. cap. x.), or He bears the cross or monogram (ib. pp. 293, 295): both at p. 425. In the church of SS. Cosmas and Damianus (see Ciampini, Vetera Monumenta, vol. ii. tab. xv. xvi.) three symbolic phases of the form of the sheep or lamb are set forth. First He is represented above the keystone arch of triumph as prone, on a small highly-decorated altar, "as it were slain." Below stand full-length figures of our Lord and saints in glory, separated by the narrow belt of Jordan, JORDANES, from the sheep of the world below, who are issuing from the gates of "Jerusalem" and "Bethlehem," to gather round the central Lamb with the nimbus, representing the Lord in His humanity [BETHLEHEM]. After the crucifixion, every paschal supper must have been understood to prefigure the Lord's death by its symbolic lamb. But it was not perhaps till the triumph of the cross under Constantine, when the upright or penal cross had taken the place of the decussated symbol [CROSS: MONOGRAM],

From Aringhi, i. 293.

that the lamb, as victim, came to be a constant object of contemplation, and His image began to be combined with the cross. In the great distresses of the succeeding centuries, the hopes and imaginations of clergy and people may well have been drawn to the Book of Revelation, and the distinction between the lamb as slain in sacrifice and the lamb conquering and triumphant seems to have been strongly felt and freely insisted on. In the sixth century, and as the cross gradually became exclusively a symbol of the manner of the Lord's death, not as of old, of His person or humanity, the lamb with crown or nimbus was placed at the intersection of the limbs of crosses [CRUCIFIX], and was in fact a mystic crucifix, with reference to the image in the Apocalypse, until the human form was substituted or added after the Quinisext Council. See Borgia, de Cruce Vaticano and de Cruce Veltirna. On the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tav. xv.; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 277) the spandrels of its pillared front are ornamented with curious sculptures of the symbolic lamb performing miracles and acts of ministry, mystically selected from the Old and New Testaments. He is striking water from the rock, changing water into wine, administering baptism to a smaller lamb, touching a mummy Lazarus with a wand, and receiving the tables of the law.

The lamb appears in the vault mosaics of the chapel of Galla Placidia, in Ravenna, and is prominent on the ornamented capitals of St. Vitale.

In a quite distinct symbolism, the lamb is found accompanying Adam and Eve (Aringhi, i. pp. 613, 621, 623) as the sign of the appointed labours of the latter in spinning. Abel is also seen offering a lamb (Bosio, iii. v. p. 159; Bottari, tav. cxxxvii).

Under article GEMS [vol. i. p. 718] will be found a highly interesting engraving of an annular stone, representing the Lamb of God surrounded by a nimbus.

Tomb of Junius Bassus. (Aringhi, i. 277. Bottari, p. xv.)

The lamb appears with the insignia of the Good Shepherd (the pastoral crook and vessel of milk) in Aringhi (i. 557) from a painting in the Callixtine catacomb. Also with the monogram, Aringhi, i. 293, Woodcut, No. 1.

In Ciampini (de Sacr. Aedif. tab. xiii.), the usual procession of the sheep of the Hebrew and Gentile folds centres in a lamb, whose blood is received in a chalice, and flows away in five streams. This formerly existed in the ancient Basilica of the Vatican, but had been restored by Innocent III., and can perhaps with difficulty be taken, as it stands in Ciampini's plate, for an authentic copy of the ancient condition of the mosaic. He is represented on an altar table in Ciampini (V.M. tab. xv. vol. ii. ; also tab. xlvii.), perhaps with reference to the Paschal Feast.

From Ciampini, V. Mon. pl. xvi. vol. ii:

Two or more sheep of the church frequently accompany the Good Shepherd, besides the one which He bears on His shoulders. They are often made to look to Him with an expression of awe and affection, and His hand is sometimes extended to bless them (Airinghi, i. 531, 532, 573, 587, from catacomb paintings; on sarcophagi, i. 295, 303, 307).

The CHURCH is supposed to be symbolised by the curious painting of a lamb between two wolves [vol. i. p. 389]. The original is rude in execution. As an emblem of innocence, the lamb is found in Boldetti, p. 365, and with an Orante, Bosio, p. 445. [R. St. J. T.]

LAMB, OFFERING OF. The general rule as to oblations upon the altar was that nothing should be offered there but the first fruits of corn and grapes in their season (Can. Apost. 3, Conc. African. can. 4), and bread and wine for the eucharist were constantly offered. In some churches, as, e.g. the Gallican, the rule was not so strict, so that money and other things were permitted to be offered (Conc. Aurel. i. can. 16); and it appears from a passage in Walafrid Strabo (d. 849) (de R. eccl. c. 18), that a custom even existed in some places of consecrating a lamb, or offering it upon the altar, on Easter Day. This accusation is repeated by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 866, in his letter against the doctrines and practices of the West (Ep. 2, ad Patr.). The writers who replied to Photius in defence of the Western church, Ratramnus and Eneas, bishop of Paris, do not apparently deny the existence of such a custom. Du Pin (Cent. ix. p. 113) notices that an example of this usage is to be found in the life of St. Udalric, and that a form was provided in the old Ordo Romanus for consecrating the lamb to be sacrificed. Cardinal Bona, too (Rer. Liturg. ii. 8, n. 5), may be cited as a witness to the truth of the statement.

At first sight the practice looks very like a continuation of the Jewish passover. The strong repulsion, however, of the church from Jewish practices in those ages seems to render this unlikely; and we must probably regard it as being a singular and extremely crude way of indicating a mystical reference to the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God.

It can only have been an infrequent and obscure practice, and after the period mentioned we hear no more of it. [S. J. E.]

A church with shrine was erected on the site of the martyrdom, and Grimoald, son of Pepin, was killed there while praying for his sick father, A.D. 714. Thither, in A.D. 727, the relics of Lambert were translated from St. Peter's church, Maestricht, and the see also, and the saint became patron of the city of Liège, that grew up round his cathedral. The shrine was unhurt when the church was burnt by the Normans, A.D. 882 (Acta SS. Sept. v. 556). Dec. 2^d was the local anniversary of the translation (v. Reiner, ib. p. 552). There were also churches to him, before A.D. 770, at Nyvels and Hermael, near Maestricht, where the blind and lame were cured on occasion of the aforesaid translation (v. Godescalcus, ib. p. 580). Liège appears to have been a favourite pilgrimage. Sept. 17 is noted as a feast, in Cul. Verd., and a 9th cent. calendar discovered by Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, v. i. 460).

LAMMAS, a name applied in England to August 1, the festival of St. Peter in the Fetters (ad Vincula) [PETER, ST., FESTIVALS OF]. Somner's account of it (Dict. Sax. Lat. Angl. s.v.) is, that Lammas is a corruption of Hlafmaesse, or loaf-mass, because it was an ancient custom to offer on that day loaves made of the new corn [FRUITS, OFFERING OF; LOAVES, BENEDICTION OF]. A fanciful hypothesis is, that St. Peter became patron of lambs, from the Lord's words to him, "Feed my lambs" (John xxi. 15). [C.]

LAMPADARY (λαμπαδάριος). 1. An official of the Greek church, whose business it was to set the wax-tapers in their places before they were kindled. (Heineccius, Abbildung der Griechischen Kirche, ii. 299; iii. 48, 53.)

LAMPRA. Easter Day is sometimes called λαμπρά (sc. ἡμέρα or κυριακή) simply. Thus, the Pentecostarion (quoted by Suicer, Thesaurus

s. v.) speaks of οἱ κανόνες τῆς λαμπρᾶς μετὰ τῶν εἰρμῶν, the canons [of odes] for Easter Day, with the hirmoi. [C.]

LAMPS. The lamps of the early Christians have been found in many places in great abundance, more especially in the catacombs of Rome and other cemeteries. For the early Christians were accustomed, in common with Jews and pagans, to place lamps in the company of the dead* (Raoul Rochette in Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscri. t. xiii. pp. 758-764 (1838); Birch, Anc. Pott. part iv. c. ii.; Martigny, Dict. s. v. Lampes Chrétiennes, and the references). Lamps of clay were found upon sarcophagi, at Vulci, in 1834, with Christian symbols, in company with coins of Constantine and his successors (Raoul-Rochette, u. s. p. 763); and have been met with either outside or inside Christian tombs and chambers in Rome, Naples, Corneto, Syracuse, Arles, Lyons, Carthage, and Alexandria. Others, of bronze, with chains attached for suspension, have been exhumed from the subterranean galleries and crypts of Rome, and in some rare cases hanging from the roof or vault; also clay lamps and candlesticks have been discovered in niches in the same situations, to give light to guide the wanderer through the gloom (Martigny, u. s. and references). A few (of clay) have been found in churches in Egypt, and were probably used for evening service (see Ducange, s. v. Lucernarium). Clay lamps, with Christian symbols, have also been met with among the ruins of the Palatine in Rome, and of houses in Geneva (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, pp. 23-28), and in the recent excavations in and about Jerusalem, in other places beside tombs. Indeed clay lamps have been found in very many parts of the ancient Christian world; but not always bearing Christian symbols. Many from the Roman catacombs, for example, have only scallops and ornamental patterns of various kinds (Perret, Cat. de Rome, t. iv. pl. xix.); and the same remark may be made of some of the lamps from Jerusalem in the museum of the Palestine Exploration Fund, reasonably presumed to be Christian (Rev. G. J. Chester in Recovery of Jerusalem, pp. 484-486, with figures),^b as well as of others from Egypt and various other countries contained in the British Museum. In our own country early Christian lamps, like all other Christian works of the Roman period, are of the rarest possible occurrence. Hubner (Inscr. Brit. Lat. p. 240, n. 27) mentions one in the museum at Newcastle, with the chrisma (✠), and there is another, of red clay, in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, with the same device in the centre and palm branches at the sides, found in Cannon Street, London (very like that figured by Bartoli, Ant. Luc. part iii. t. 22). A third was found at Colchester, of pale terracotta, having the chrisma slightly raised and coloured black (Journ. Brit. Arch. Assoc. 1855, p. 91, and H. Syer Cuming, in litt.). Lamps were also, though rarely, made of silver. In an inventory of church plate delivered by Paul of Cirta to the persecutors in the time of Diocletian, occurs the item, "lucernae argenteae septem" (Ad calc. Optati, p. 266 in Bingham, u. s.); and it appears that a silver lamp has been found in Rome (R. Rochette, u. s. p. 759); a single example of an amber lamp, without any ornament, has also been met with in the same city, in the cemetery of St. Callixtus (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 297, t. i. 7). The forms and symbols which the terracotta and bronze lamps present are sufficiently different to make it desirable to describe them separately.

(A) Terra-cotta lamps.—They are of various forms, but one of the most common is that which much resembles a modern teapot. It has a round body, with one or two apertures for oil; an ascending handle, often looped or perforated for suspension; and a horizontal spout opposite the handle for the wick. But the handle, body, and spout, are all liable to modifications of form, and the first and last (often nearly obsolete) are sometimes wholly wanting. The lamp may thus approach the form of a boat or of a shoe, to both which it has been some-

* Many of them shew signs of having been much used, and there is little doubt that from about the 4th century lamps and candles were often kept alight before the tombs of the saints. This excited the indignation of Vigilantius (A.D. 404), who thought it heathenish and idolatrous; St. Jerome (adv. Vigil. c. 7), who is inclined to excuse it, as done "pro honore martyrum," nevertheless styles it "imperitia et simplicitas saecularium hominum vel certe religiosarum foeminarum." Not very long afterwards, however, Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, left provision in his will (A.D. 474), "ut oleum paretur pro Domini Martini s-pulcro indesinenter illustrando" (D'Achery, Spicil. t. iiii. p. 303, ed. 1723). At an earlier period more dislike was felt to keep lights burning during the day in cemeteries. The council of Elvira in Spain (A.D. 324?) says in its 34th canon: "Cereos pro diem placuit in coemeterio non incendi: inquietandi enim sanctorum spiritus non sunt," where, however, we have a converse superstition. See Bingham, Antiq. lib. viii. c. 6, § 21. The practice of placing lamps within sepulchres was easily explained in a pious sense, "ad significandum lumine fid-i illustratos sanctos decessisse, et modo in superna patria lumine gloriae splendere" (St. Jerome, quoted by Martigny, Dict. p. 351), but both the references (adv. Vigil. et Vit. Paulae, tacitly taken from Boldetti, Cimit. p. 525) are erroneous.

^b Among these is an Arabesque pattern, which may be intended for vine branches, where Mr. Chester supposes a reference to the Eucharist to be intended. The vine branch with grapes is realistically represented on a lamp of yellow unglazed clay of the common type from Melos, in the writer's possession, where many Christian lamps, nearly all bearing the cross, have been found; it may possibly be Christian. A not very legible potter's mark (?), perhaps EF: MH, is cut on the under side. Potter's marks have not been found on any Christian lamps at Jerusalem, and they would seem from the silence of authors to be very rare on Christian lamps generally. De Rossi mentions a lamp with the Good Shepherd and vine-branch-s, recently found in the Palatine excavations, having on the under side "the name of the potter or proprietor of the works stamped in beautiful letters, as on the pagan lamps, reading ANNI SER." probably, as he suggests, for Anni Serviani. The letters, he thinks, are of the 2nd or 3rd century; so that this will be amongst the earliest Christian lamps in existence (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 15, and 1870, p. 79, pl. vi. figs. 1, 2). Mr. H. Syer Cuming has a similar specimen.

times compared; indeed, it was sometimes made in direct imitation of these objects either in clay or in bronze.^c Occasionally the handle is of a whimsical form, as a female holding palm-branches (Perret, Cat. vol. iv. pl. xv. fig. 3), or, it may have a crescent outline (Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, pl. xxiv. n. 4). Pagan lamps are not rarely made in imitation of altars and other objects (see Birch, passim); and we have an example of a Christian lamp in the form of an altar (Perret, u. s. pl. xix. fig. 4).

The great mass of the terra-cotta lamps found in the catacombs of Rome, "lesquelles sont au premier rang des objets d'antiquité chrétienne qu'on en retire" (Raoul Rochette, Cat. de Rome, p. 49), appear to be of the 4th and 5th centuries; some are considered to be older (Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, passim), while a few seem to be later. Martigny (Dict. p. 152) thinks that a great many (un grand nombre) may be referred to the 2nd or to the 3rd century; but this is perhaps too much to say. Those of Gaul may be, like the sepulchral inscriptions, mostly of the 5th and 6th centuries; but it would be interesting to investigate the dates of Christian lamps more accurately than appears to have been done at present. Several recently found in the Palatine in Rome, bearing the fish, lamb, palm, chrisma, and cross, are considered by De Rossi to be of the 4th and 5th centuries; but others with the two last types (ornamented with gems) he inclines to place in the 6th century. Two of the three lamps from Geneva figured by him (one with the Apostles' heads, the other with a palm-tree), he places in the 4th century; the other bearing a chrisma, beautifully inlaid with crosses, squares, &c., about the beginning of the 6th. (See his Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, pp. 11, 24, 25.) Those from Egypt in the British Museum are probably of the 4th and 5th centuries. The principal^d types are as follows:—

(1) Christ as the Good Shepherd. Bearing a sheep on his shoulders, probably from Rome^e (Bartoli, Ant. Luc. Sep. pars iii. t. 28, Rome, 1691). The same type, with other sheep at his feet, sun and moon above, accompanied by ark and dove, scenes from Jonah's life, &c., catacombs of Rome. (Id. 29, and Perret, Cat. de

^c Without referring to pagan examples, we have a notable instance of the boat of St. Peter and St. Paul (see below); a bronze lamp, on whose handle a dove is perched, and which may therefore not improbably be Christian, the body of which is a foot in the soldier's shoe (caliga), is figured by Licetus (Luc. Ant. p. 776); another, in the form of a boot, with palm branches on the sides, of terra cotta, probably Christian, is figured by Boldetti, Cimit. p. 64.

^d It is probable that among the lamps found in Africa more especially, of which the museums of Turin and Algiers possess large collections, there may be types not here enumerated: See Martigny's remarks on the rarity of their emblems (Dict. p. 353). The figures of lamps in the older books of Licetus, &c., are but rarely quoted, being of rude execution. Some of these and various others are repeated in Matranga's edition (Rom. 1841) of Mamachi's Origines et Antiq. Christianae, especially in tom. iii., while some would seem to have been originally executed for Matranga's work. The subjects are (with the exception of the labarum, see below) of the same general character as those which are here mentioned independently.

^e When the locality of the lamps figured in this book is expressly mentioned, it is always Rome; where indeed the title-page professes that they were all found.

Rome, vol. iv. pl. xvii. fig. 2; De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, pp. 85–88.) The same type of the shepherd, vine branches at the sides, Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 1; see also a previous note.) Others in De Rossi, Bull. Arch. 1870, pl. 1 (from Ostia), and Sacken und Kenner, Die Sammlungen des K.K. Münz- und Antiken-Cabinetes, p. 256 (Wien, 1866), who, as well as other writers, observe the similarity of the style of the figure to that of Hermes Kriophoros. Some of these may probably be earlier than the 4th century.

Clay Lamp, with Pastor Bonus, and other subjects. (Bartoli.)

Clay Lamp, with Christ accompanied by angels, &c. (De Rossi.)

(2) Christ accompanied by angels. Christ standing, having a cruciform nimbus in the Byzantine style, bearing a long cross, between two flying angels, trampling on a lion and adder (cf. Ps. xci. 13). The Palatine, Rome; of the florid style, probably later than the 5th century. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 12, fig. 1. Another and more perfect example in the Castellani collection, exhibited (1876) in the British Museum.) Christ seated, front view, between two flying angels, each holding a crown. Found in a subterranean chamber at Corneto, full of Christian lamps, given to R. Rochette by Melch. Fossati, who regarded it as a Transfiguration, but this is doubtful. (R. Rochette, u. s., p. 762, note; Martigny, u. s. p. 352.)

(3) Fish, a symbol of Christ. Rome, Catacombs, and Palatine. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 5; Perret, u. s. pl. vii. fig. 1, and pl. ix. fig. 3.) Carthage (British Museum). Fish surrounded by six dolphins; very fine work in red clay, Algeria. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353.) See also below, under Inscriptions, and FISH (vol. i. p. 673).

(4) Lamb, a symbol of Christ. Rome, Catacombs, and Palatine. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 2; Perret, u. s. pl. ix. fig. 2.)

(5) Chrisma or monogram of Christ. As X combined with P (✠), having a circle in centre; palm-branches at the sides of the lamp (Bartoli, u. s. t. 22). With loop of P to left; beautiful gemmed work; probably about the 6th century;

Clay Lamp, with gemmed chrisma. (De Rossi.)

Rome. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 8. For similar work compare Birch, Anc. Pot. vol. ii. fig. 192.) Others in Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. vii.; De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, figs. 3 and 4; Perret, passim, &c. With loop of P to left, formed like a crook; Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. ix.) The chrisma, besides being found on Roman lamps in various forms, occurs also commonly in Gaul (Martigny, u. s.), and has been met with in Britain (see above), and in the catacombs of Syracuse (British Museum) and in Carthage (British Museum), and doubtless in many other places.

(6) Alpha and Omega (a monogram between them); Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. t. xxiv. fig. vi.) Chrisma between them, the letters inverted (Rev. S. S. Lewis).

(8) Apostles. Figure seated on a throne surrounded by twelve heads; De Rossi thinks a prince or other illustrious convert is represented as in the midst of the Apostles; Geneva, in the ruins of a house. Probably of the 5th century. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 25, fig. 1.) Heads of the twelve Apostles surrounding a gemmed chrisma; Roman catacombs. (Mus. Corton. t. 84; Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 2.) [Two heads, suggested to be Peter and Paul, in caps surmounted by cruciform stars, are really those of the Dioscuri; same locality. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. 5.)]

(9) Fisherman, as symbol of an Apostle. Holding net and staff in his right hand, a fish in his left; on reverse of lamp a gemmed cross. (Mus. Corton. t. 85.)

(10) Female saint between angels, Carthage. (British Museum.)

(11) Cock, symbol of vigilance (Martigny, u. s. p. 177), by some presumed to refer to St. Peter (Chester, u. s. p. 483); Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. ix. fig. 4. Compare one in Brit. Mus.)

(12) Dove, symbol of innocence, Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xv. fig. 4.) Common on lamps of Gaul. (Martigny, u. s.) Carthage; on one lamp two doves facing; on another, one only. (British Museum.) See also Sacken and Kenner, u. s.

(14) Horse, symbol of the end of life's course; Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xix. fig. 2.)

(15) Stag. (Cf. Ps. xlii. 1.) Rome? (Licet., de Lucern. Antiq. recond. p. 927, with fig.) Algeria (Münter, Symb. p. 112, referred to by Martigny, u. s. p. 353).

(16) Hare, supposed to be symbol of the swiftness of life, Lyons; on a vase of red clay, in the possession of the abbé Martigny. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353. See also p. 368, s. v. Lièvre.)

(17) Frog, as a symbol of the resurrection. Egypt, in the catacombs of Alexandria among other places, in conjunction with the cross. (Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. i. p. 52; Chester, u. s. p.

483. See also below under Inscriptions.) Several examples in the British Museum. Many lately found bear a late Greek A (Α), impressed on the bottom, probably for Alexandria, where they were made. Chester, in Academy, Feb. 5, 1876, p. 123, who has some valuable remarks on the varied forms of these lamps.

The symbolic interpretation of the frog may be regarded as determined by the inscription given below; but it is not so certain that some of the animals mentioned above were meant to have any symbolical interpretation whatever. Some of them occur on Pagan lamps (Birch, u. s. vol. ii. p. 289), as does also the lion, which likewise is found on a lamp, of Christian fabric apparently, in the British Museum. This animal was sometimes taken as a Christian symbol of watchful power. (Martigny, u. s. p. 369. See also the articles in this Dictionary under the titles of the animals named above.)

(18) Chalice, Western Christendom. (Chester, u. s. p. 483.) One with two handles, a tree springing from it, Calymna (British Museum). Cf. CHALICE, vol. i. p. 337.

(20) Palm branches, Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 4, and pl. xix. fig. 4.) Jerusalem, much conventionalised. (Chester, u. s. p. 483-4, one figured.) Egypt. (British Museum.)

(21) Star, inscription around; see below; Egypt. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxii. fig. 14.)

The following subjects, to say nothing of doubtful types, are from the Old Testament:—

(24) Spies bearing grapes, Carthage. (British Museum.)

(25) Jewish candlestick, under various forms. With seven branches, six being bent in the middle at right angles; palm branch (?) on either side. Catacombs and Palatine, Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. iii.; De Rossi, u. s. p. 7, fig. 12.) No palms, and branches of candlestick curved (Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. ii. fig. 192; Bartoli, u. s. t. 32; perhaps a Jewish work; probably from Rome). Quite conventionalised Rome (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 5); sometimes with a Christian inscription; Jerusalem. (Chester, u. s. pp. 484, 485, one figured.) Algeria. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353.) Carthage. (British Museum.)

Of pagan types, Christianised, we have the following:

(26) Venus holding apple, transformed into an Eve, as Séroux d'Agincourt suggests, but? Catacombs of Rome; good work, and probably of a very early period. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. 2.)

(27) Orpheus, who is made as a kind of symbol of Christ. Catacombs of Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xvii. n. i.)

There are also some other lamp-types of the Christian period, but which can hardly be intended to bear any Christian significance. The most curious is a fish swallowing an aquatic bird (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, tav. iv. n. 9, seemingly about the 6th century); another is a man killing a lion with a sword (British Museum). Some lamps appear to bear Christian portraits, either full-length (De Rossi, u. s. 1867, p. 25), or the bust only; one in the British Museum has apparently the head of an emperor, perhaps of Justinian.

Passeri (Lucern. Fict. vol. iii. pp. 126-7, t. xcii.) publishes a lamp of the usual type bearing the Graces, at the bottom of which is a cross, in dotted lines, which leads him to suspect that it is made by a Christian artist; and adds, "nam et aliae plures apud me asservantur, quae omnino Christianae sunt, et tamen ethnicorum symbolis atque imaginibus adornantur, praesertim Victoriae, Herculis, Palladis et Apollinis citharoedi sive Orphei, quas omnes, cum per otium licebit, sua in sede collocatas publicabimus." This promise does not appear to have been fulfilled; and the Christianity of such lamps (the Orpheus-type excepted) may be questioned. De Rossi cannot accept the cross on the bottom of a lamp "per segno certo di Christianesimo" (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, p. 80).

The same types, as was to be expected, are not found in all places where Christian lamps have been discovered in considerable numbers. The Rev. G. J. Chester observes of those of Jerusalem: "Many lamp-types of more Western Christendom, from the catacombs of Rome, Syracuse, and Carthage, such as the Good Shepherd, the Sacred Monogram, the Dove, the Cock of St. Peter, and the Chalice, are entirely absent; and the same may be said of the disgusting and probably Gnostic device of the toad" [rather frog] "associated with the cross, so often found in the catacombs of Alexandria and elsewhere, in Egypt. The earthenware bottles, with the effigy of St. Menas, an Egyptian saint, who flourished in the 4th century . . . so commonly found with Christian lamps in Egypt, are also absent. [See Böckh, C. I. G. p. 8978 and Academy, u. s.] The usual symbols of the Jerusalem lamps, which are all of a rude and cheap description . . . are the cross . . . ; the seven-branched candlestick . . . and the palm branch . . . These emblems, which the Christians of the mother of churches used and rejoiced in, in common with their brethren in more western lands, are all more or less conventionalised, and are represented in a distinctive and different manner." (Recovery of Jerusalem, pp. 483-4.)

The types commonly occupy the disc or centre of the body of the lamp, while the sides are either plain or more usually decorated with floral or geometrical ornaments, or with subordinate types, as a wreath of palm-branches, or medallions enclosing the chrisma, &c.; or, more rarely, they bear inscriptions. In the lamps of Palestine, however, the emblems are placed along the edge, and not in the body of the lamps, which are in most cases not round but pear-shaped (Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 484).

Inscriptions on terra-cotta lamps.—These are rare, only three being contained in Böckh's Greek-Christian inscriptions, though a few others are now known. The following are the most important:—

(1) Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, p. 59, pl. xxii. fig. 14; Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8980:

ΤΟΥ ΑΓΙΟΥ ΠΟΛΥΚΤΟC (sic),

i. e. τοῦ ἁγίου Πολυέκτου (the Holy Polycactus)

written near the edge of a lamp, with a star in the centre, found in a church at Coptos in Upper Egypt, probably dedicated to that saint. Others of the same character, bearing the names of St. Sergius, abbat, and St. Christina, abbes (ἀμμή), and St. Cyriacus, may be seen in Böckh, nos. 8979, 8981, and Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. i. p. 52. The lamp in the Roman College, on which is written in ink Ο ΑΓΘΟC CΑΚΕΡΔΟC, may have been destined for the priests' use. (See Martigny, u.s.)

Clay Lamp, with star and Greek inscription. (Sérour d'Agiucourt.)

(2) G. J. Chester, Recov. of Jerusalem, p. 485, with figure;

ΦΩC ΧΤ ΦΕΝΙ ΠΑCΙΝ,

i.e. φῶς Χριστοῦ φαίνει πᾶσιν (the light of Christ shines to all; adapted from 1 John ii. 8). Another, similar, accompanied by a cross; both are from Jerusalem. The same inscription variously blundered occurs on several lamps found in the same neighbourhood, on more than one of which the Jewish candlestick occupies the same position as the cross in the lamp here figured. The museum at Leyden has a lamp (from Egypt?) inscribed ΦΩC ΕΞ ΦΩΤΟC (Light of Light); and Dr. Birch mentions the same legend, and also ΘΕΟΛΟΓΙΑ ΘΕΟΥ ΧΑΡΙC (Theology is the grace of God), as occurring on Christian lamps from Egypt (u.s.). Of other lamps from Jerusalem one bears the same candlestick with seven lights, and reads in letters partly inverted, λυχνάρια καλὰ (beautiful lights), in allusion to the type. Another appears to have ΙΧΘ for ΙΧΘΥC (the Fish). See Chester, as above (where more information may be found), and the Egyptian lamps in the British Museum.

(3) Chabouillet, Catal. des Camées, &c. de la Bibl. Impér. p. 607. (A drawing sent to him by M. Muret.) A lamp, doubtless found in Egypt, formerly in the collection of the Abbé Greppo, has upon it the representation of a frog, with a cross and the inscription—

ΕΓΩ ΕΙΜΙ ΑΝΑΚΤΑCΙC.

The transformations of the frog seemed to the designer symbolical of the Resurrection; there seems no necessity to suppose any Gnostic feeling. The words are an adaptation from John xi. 25.

(4) A lamp is figured by Matranga in Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq. Christ. tom. iii. p. 37, tab. vi. fig. 2, on which a labarum of considerable size stands between two soldiers; on the tablet below the wreathed chrisma is written in two lines, ΕΝ ΤΟΥΤΩ (sic) ΝΙΚΑ. The margin is finely decorated with leaves, wreaths, and medallions. Apparently from the catacombs of Rome (in coemeteriis repertum). This is termed vetustissimum monumentum; it may be of about the 5th or 6th century, to judge from the figure.

Clay Lamp, with labarum between soldiers, reading ἐν τούτῳ (misspelt) νικά. (Matranga.)

(5) Raoul Rochette (u. s. p. 763) mentions that lamps of the 4th century were found in 1834 in a little Christian cemetery at Vulci, bearing the type of heads surrounded by a nimbus, with inscriptions terminating with PAX CUM SANTIS (sic) or CUM ANGELIS. The early part probably mentioned the name of the person buried.

With regard to the paste, glaze, and style of art, it varies a good deal. The greater part appear to be of the bright red unglazed ware, called false Samian, which have been found in Egypt, among other places, where, however, the art of making lamps "seems to have been in a very low condition, and certainly inferior to its state in Rome and the provinces of Greece and Asia Minor." (Birch, u. s. i. 52, ii. 291.) The lamps of Palestine are of unequal merit, none being very high; while among the Roman lamps, of various ages, some are of very good work.

The number of Christian lamps, of terra-cotta, which enrich the museums of Europe, to say nothing of those in private hands, is very large; Martigny calls them almost infinite (u. s.). In this country the museum of the Palestine Exploration Fund contains the largest collection of Christian lamps of that region: in the British Museum there is a considerable number (between one and two hundred) of others from various localities.

(B) Bronze lamps.—With regard to the lamps of bronze, which have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere, they are generally thought to be for the most part of a later age than those of clay; and some of those which are preserved in museums lie under a suspicion of being forgeries (Martigny, Dict. p. 352). They have sometimes one spout, sometimes two, and are generally pierced for suspension by chains, some of which still exist. The chains sometimes met in an inscribed tablet, which was itself suspended. The curved pin for trimming the wick is occasionally found attached (Boldetti, u. s. p. 64). The earlier symbols, as the fish, hardly ever occur; the chrisma is frequent, and also the cross. Several of these lamps are figured by Bartoli, p. iii.; Perret, tom. v. u. s. tabb. 23, 24, 25, 26, 30, 31; Bottari, Roma Sotterr. t. iii. tav. ccvi.–ccviii.; and the British Museum has about twenty others.^f

The following notice of the Christian types which occur on bronze lamps must suffice:—

(1) Chrisma.—The handle formed by the chrisma in a circle, surrounded by vine leaves (Bartoli, t. 23). The same, surrounded by Jonah and his gourd (ib. t. 30). The same, plain, with transverse bar, accompanied by a

^f There are also some figured in the older work of Licetus, partly taken from Casalius, which seem to be of metal. See a very curious one, if it be genuine, with two spouts, a star on the body of the lamp, and a horseman standing on the side attached to the handle, which is a circle enclosing a chrisma, p. 782; also another, p. 870 (not made for suspension), having the Good Shepherd bearing a sheep, his head radiated, a suspicious peculiarity. For others more like those mentioned in the text, see pp. 951, 954, 994, which last gives a female called a Venus, under a gourd, otherwise much resembling Bartoli, t. 30. If indeed the two figures represent the same specimen, the drawing of Licetus is very bad; yet this seems to be the case: see Bellori's remarks.

The writer desires to express his special obligation to Mr. Percy Gardner for drawing up descriptions of the more important bronze lamps contained in the British Museum, as well as to the other officers of the museum for affording him every facility to inspect the objects mentioned both in this and in his other articles.

and ω ; an inscribed tablet above (see figure, id. t. 24). The same form of chrisma, on which a dove perches (id. t. 26).

Bronze Lamp, with handle formed by the chrisma, and a and ω bearing the name of Nonius Atticus vir clarissimus et illustris (Bartoli).

(2) Cross.—Handle formed by a cross, above which dove (Perret, u. s. t. v. fig. 5). Other handles are formed by crosses of various forms (British Museum). By a cross, on the top of a gryphon's head, a chrisma on the body of the lamp (Bartoli, t. 25). Same type, but lamp has two spouts, and no chrisma (British Museum; same type, but done above cross; Syracuse, recently found; Rev. S. S. Lewis). By a cross placed between and overshadowed by wings (British Museum). A cross placed in the middle of an ornamented handle, with three central discs (British Museum). A few of the above lamps are somewhat boat-shaped.

(3) Bird.—Body of lamp in the shape of a phoenix (British Museum, two specimens). Cf. Licetus, p. 871 (with figure). Others in British Museum in form of a peacock or a duck, probably Christian.

(4) Palm branches.—Placed near the nozzles (Bottari, u. s. t. ccviii.).

(5) Boat, as a symbol of the Church (see Martigny, Dict. s. v. 'Navire').—(a) A bronze lamp in the form of a boat, is now in the cabinet of the Grand Duke of Tuscany (Bartoli, u. s. t. 31; Cahier et Martin, Mélanges Archéol. vol. iii. p. 15; Perret, u. s. t. 1). Two figures (Peter steering and Paul preaching) are at the ends of the boat, which bears an inscription on a label at the top of the mast in three lines:

DOMINVS LEGEM
DAT VALERIO SEVERO
EVETROIPI VIVAS.

This inscription has long been a puzzle for the learned. (See Bellori at the end of Bartoli, p. 11; also Martigny, Dict. p. 352.) De Rossi (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 28) seems to have hit on the true explanation, by suggesting that Eutropius is the praenomen of Valerius Severus; and that the acclamation congratulates him on having accepted the law of the Gospel, he having been previously a pagan.

Bronze Lamp, in form of a boat, in which are St. Peter and St. Paul. (Giniez in Cahier and Martin, whence Ferret.)

This most interesting lamp was discovered during excavations of the Mons Coelius at Rome, in the 17th century, and appears to have been first published by De la Chausse in his Museum Romanum, Rom. 1690, and has since been repeatedly noticed, but only recently correctly drawn by M. Giniez. It is probably one of the earliest Christian bronze lamps known, being found along with other antiquities "of a good period of the empire" (Bellori).

Bronze Lamp (boat?), bearing chrisma, gryphon, and dolphin. (De Rossi.)

(6) Bronze lamp, perhaps intended for a boat, of very fine work, terminating at the poop in a gryphon's head, an apple in his mouth; the chrisma, on which a dove is perched, is between its ears; on the body of the lamp is another chrisma; at the other end (the prow) is a dolphin, with a loaf (?) in his mouth.

The dolphin, though no true fish, is here, as elsewhere, taken to be the symbol of Christ (as a fish). The apple in the dragon's mouth is interpreted by Monsignor Bailles to be the apple of Eve; while the loaf in the dolphin's mouth is regarded by him as the living bread of the Eucharist. [See DOLPHIN, FISH, GEMS.]

Probably (see De Rossi) of the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th century. Found in the excavations of Porto. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1868, p. 77, tav. 1, fig. 1, and for 1870, pp. 72-76.)

It should be added that lamps as well as candles were, from the 4th century onwards, placed in churches on candelabra suspended from the roof. These were of metal, bronze, silver, or even gold. Allusion is repeatedly made to them in the Liber pontificalis, and elsewhere; they were often of large size and elaborate ornamentation. They were commonly known by the name of Pharos (watch-tower) or Corona, indicative of their general shape. (See Ducange, Gloss. under each word; and Martigny, Dict. p. 153.) They were of various forms as respects details. (See Papias, quoted by Ducange, u. s. Pharus.) A representation of one which approaches our period is given in a MS. of about the 9th century by Spallart, Tabl. Hist. des Cost. et Moeurs, pl. xx. n. 4, referred to by Guenebault (see below). It is in the form of an architectural composition surrounded by towers. See CORONA LUCIS. (For copious references to the earlier and later literature of Christian lamps, see Fabricius, Bibl. Antiq. pp. 1035, 1036; Guenebault, Dict. Iconogr. des Monum. Chrét. p. 105, Paris, 1843. In M. Cahier's paper on the Couronne de lumière d'Aix-la-Chapelle is much information about early Christian lamps and chandeliers (Cahier et Martin, Mél. d'Archéol. vol. iii. pp. 1-61). There are also treatises by Fanciulli, De Lampadibus et Lucernis pensilibus in sacris aedibus Christianorum, 4to. (with plates); and Greppo, Sur l'usage des Cierges et des Lampes dans les premiers siècles de l'Eglise, Lyon, 8vo. 1842, which the writer has not seen.)* [C. B.]

* Since the above was written the Rev. S. S. Lewis has called the writer's attention to an able paper by M. de Villefosse in the Musée Archéologique for 1875, entitled "Lampes Chrétiennes inédites" (3), to which is added an enumeration of the Christian lamps (15) in the Museum of the Louvre. Most of them have the same general types as those named in this article; but the following from Algeria and Tunis are additional:—(1) The Three Children in the furnace, in Phrygian caps, accompanied by the Guardian Angel; (2) The Magi (in Phrygian caps) and the Star (imperfect); both these are figured; (3) Bust of St. Paul (?); (4) Daniel (?). All are of clay. Mr. W. R. Cooper, in a paper On the Horus Myth in Relation to Christianity, read before the Victoria Institute (March 6, 1876), mentions two terra-cotta lamps, shewing the influence of the Horus myth on Christian works of art. One in the Boston Museum, of which he gives a figure, bears "a large Greek cross, which completely divides it into four sections, in the two lower of which is placed the cruz ansata, or the mystical cross of life, which was

LAMPS, LIGHTING OF. Lamps in churches were in early Christian times lighted just before the beginning of vespers, which were originally appointed to be said at the twelfth hour, i.e. the last hour before sunset, whence the office itself is sometimes called duodecima. "Prima sic dici debet, pungentibus jam radiis solis, et vespera adhuc declinantibus radiis ejus." "In aestivo vero tempore adhuc altius stante sole Lucernaria inchoentur propter breves noctes" (Reg. S. Bened. cc. c. 34). The Benedictine practice in the last century is said to have been to say vespers in the winter at 3 P.M., in the summer at 3½ P.M. (Grancolas. Com. in Brev. cap. xxxviii.)

The lighting of the lamps was accompanied by certain prayers and psalms. These were known as psalmi and preces lucernales (St. Basil, ad Amphil.; St. Jerome, Ep. ad Laetam, &c.), and the office of vespers as lucernarium or lucernalis v. lucernarii hora (St. Aug. Sermo i. ad fratres in Er.). "Hora nona [i.e. as the context shews, after the ninth hour] lucernarium facimus," and the hours of prayer are thus enumerated: "hora tertia, sexta, nona, lucernarium, medio noctis, gallicinio, mane primo." [S. Jerome in Ps. 119 (120).] The apostolic constitutions also bid the faithful come together at eventide to sing psalms and offer prayers, and they call Ps. 140 (141) ἐπιλύχνιον (i. 59 and viii. 35).

These psalms and prayers were originally said separately from, and as introductory to, vespers properly so called; later they were incorporated into the office, the first part of which was known as Lucernarium, or in Greek τὸ λυχνικόν, and the whole office of vespers was sometimes, though less accurately, called by the same name. The directions for the "lychnic" in the Greek Euchology, for a solemn vigil (ἀγρυπνία), are as follows: The officer who put the lamps or candles in their places was called λαμπαδάριος; he who lighted them, καταγοριάρχης (al. κατηγοριάρχης, Goar, 272).

The priest, having vested in the sacristy (ἱερατεῖον), comes out and censens the whole church and the icons, and, entering into the bema, censens the holy table, saying with a loud voice—"Glory be to the holy, and consubstantial, and life-giving and indivisible Trinity, in all places now and ever, and to ages of ages. R. Amen." Then the superior, or the appointed monk (ὁ προστάς ἢ ὁ ταχθεὶς μοναχός^b), sings the prooemiac psalm, i.e. Ps. 103 (104), the priest remaining within the bema, with the holy doors closed. At the verse, "When Thou openest Thy hand they are filled with good," he comes out with the canonarch (or precentor—μετὰ τοῦ Κανονάρχου^c), and, after a prescribed reverence, goes to his place: the canonarch remains standing in the centre, and recites the stichi, or versicles for the day. At the verse of the psalm, "In wisdom hast Thou made them all,"^d the priest removes, and, standing bare-headed, says the "prayers of the lychnic" before the holy doors. These prayers are seven prayers for pardon and protection during the night, each ending in the usual manner with the ascription of praise. After their conclusion the priest says the great "synapte" (τὴν μεγάλην συναπτήν). The appointed section (or Cathism—κάθισμα) of the Psalms is then said, and after that the deacon says the little "synapte."^e The office of vespers proper is then continued.

When there is no vigil, the rite is simple. The holy doors are not opened, but the priest, standing before them bare-headed and vested in a stole, says with a loud voice—"Blessed be our God in all places now and ever, and to ages of ages." Then the superior or the appointed monk recites the prooemiac psalm without modulation (χύμα, i.e. "fusā voce sine cantu," &c., Goar), and the rest of the office is gone through as before.

In the Ambrosian office, the antiphon at the opening of vespers is still called "Lucernarium," and contains an obvious allusion to the name.

That for ordinary Saturdays and Sunday is:

"For Thou, O Lord, shalt light my candle; O Lord my God, make my darkness to be light.

"V. For in thee I shall discomfit a host of men [Lat. eripiar a tentatione]; O Lord my God make my darkness to be light.

"Iteum. For Thou, O Lord," &c.

and that for other week days:

"The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom then shall I fear?

"V. The Lord is the strength of my life: of whom then shall I be afraid?

"Iteum. The Lord is my light," &c.

The Mozarabic vespers also begin (after the Kyrie Eleison and Paternoster, said secretly) with the salutation by the priest, "In nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi lumen cum pace. R. Deo Gratia," and the "Lauda" which, with its prayer, immediately follows, has reference to the old rite, and is of precisely the same character as the Ambrosian "lucernarium."

The well-known hymn attributed by some to St. Ambrose, "Deus qui certis legibus noctem discernis ac diem," said in the Mozarabic

^c This word is interpreted by Goar (p. 29), "Canonum dux et inceptor," and may be sufficiently nearly represented by Precentor.

^d There is a difficulty in understanding these directions, as the verse, "In wisdom," &c., occurs earlier in the psalm than "When thou openest," &c.

^e The word synapte (συναπτή) is explained by Goar as "prayers compiled (compositas) for various persons and objects, and collected into one; whence the Greeks call it συναπτή, we (i.e. the Latins) collecta." Its form is that of a Litany, with Kyrie Eleison repeated after each clause. Of the two forms, here called great and small, one is fuller than the other. Prayers of this character are also called ἐκτενῆ, from their length, sometimes also εἰρηνικά, because the first petition they contain is for peace, or διαφωνικά, because said by the deacon. They are of varied form and contents, and occur very frequently in the Greek offices. The earliest form of a synapte is given in the Apostolic Constitution, viii. 9.

always held in the hands of the Egyptian gods and goddesses, and which the good spirit applied to the lips of the mummy to bring it again to life." (Catacombs of Alexandria.) He considers the adaptation of Egyptian sacred emblems to Christian purposes to be clear enough in these figures. Another from Denderah, which he figures after Denon, has the crux ansata for the principal cross, the looped postern of which surrounds the mouth of the lamp, and the central stem is extended upwards, so as to resemble a Greek cross also. No inscription on either lamp.

breviary on the second Sunday in Lent, is headed in a hymnary printed by Thomasius, vol. ii., "recedente sole, ac die cessante, hora incensi Lucernæ;" and the hymn of Prudentius, "Inventor rutili Dux bone fulminis," is called "Hymnus ad incensum Lucernæ." This is the ordinary opinion. Lesley, however, in the preface to the Mozarabic Missal, gives reasons derived from the composition of the hymn in favour of its having been composed, not for daily use, but for the lighting of the Paschal candle on Easter Eve. The hymn is said in the Mozarabic breviary on the Sunday after the Octave of the Epiphany, and, according to the Sarum and York rites, on Easter Eves at the benediction of the Paschal candle.

Reference to the Lucernarium may be seen in the following collects, which are the first collects (orations) at vespers in the Ambrosian rite on an ordinary Wednesday and Friday.

On Friday.—Gratias tibi agimus, omnipotens Deus, quod declinante jam die, nos vespertini luminis claritate circumdas: petimus immensam clementiam tuam: ut, sicut nos hujus luminis claritate circumvallas, ita Sancti Spiritus tui luce corda nostra illuminare digneris. Per Dominum. [H. J. H.]

LAMPSACUS, COUNCIL OF (Lampsacenum concilium), held at Lampsaki on the Hellespont, A.D. 364, as Pagi shews. Orthodox bishops were invited to it; and it is described as a council of Homoiousians by Sozomen (vi. 7) if the reading is correct. But those who directed it must have been really Semi-Arians; for they professed to be partisans of the Homoiousian formula, and of the creed published at Antioch, besides siding with Macedonius by whom the godhead of the Holy Ghost was denied. What made Sozomen think well of them probably was that they were treated with marked favour by Valentinian; while they condemned the extreme party which Valens espoused, and which he ordered them into exile for dissenting from. On this too they seem to have despatched a still more orthodox account of themselves to Rome, which contented Liberius (Soc. iv. 12; comp. Mansi, iii. 378, and Roman Councils, 16). [E. S. Ff.]

LANCE, HOLY (ἁγία λόγχη, cultellus); a liturgical instrument of the Greek Church, in the shape of a small knife formed like a spear. The annexed representation from Goar gives its form. It is used in the common Greek rite in the preparatory office of prothesis to divide the Host from the holy loaf previous to consecration. This earlier fraction, the primitive antiquity of which is doubtful, is distinctly symbolical, and has no reference to the subsequent distribution, for which another fraction has always been made. The typical allusion to the circumstances of our Lord's Passion receives greater force and vividness in the Greek Church, from the use of the "holy spear" for the division of the loaf, as commemorative of the piercing of our Lord's body by the Roman soldier. The priest makes four cuts to separate the host from the oblation, and also stabs it more than once, accompanying every cut or stab with appropriate texts of Scripture, e.g. "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter," "One of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side," &c.

The use of the holy spear is not found in the purely Oriental liturgies, e.g. those of the Syrians and Egyptians, a fact which leads Renaudot to question whether the rite is of primitive antiquity, since these churches borrowed their discipline from the Greek Church in the earliest ages. It is entirely unknown in the Western Church.

LANDAFF, COUNCILS OF (Landarensia concilia). Three such are given in Mansi (ix. 763 sqq.) dated A.D. 560; but, even if genuine, they were simply meetings of the bishop, his three abbats, and his clergy, for excommunicating or absolving great offenders: in the 1st case Meuric, in the 2nd Morgan, kings of Glamorgan: in the 3rd Gwaednerth, king of Gwent; all of them under Oudocus third bishop of Landaff, and therefore scarcely before the 7th century. "The book, however, in which these records occur is a compilation of the 12th century" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, i., notes to pp. 125 and 147). [E. S. Ff.]

LANIPENDIA. In the Rule of Caesarius for Virgins (c. 27 in Acta SS. Jan. i. p. 732) the care of the wool from which the sisters' habits were to be made is committed to the care of the superior (praepositae) or the lanipendia, the sister appointed to take charge of the woollen manufacture. The word is used in a similar sense by Paulus, Digest. 24, 1, 38. [C.]

LANISTA. (1) A trainer of gladiators, who frequently contracted for the supply of swordsmen for Roman spectacles. The horror which the Christians felt for GLADIATORS [see the word] was of course intensified in the case of one who was regarded as a trader in man's flesh, and an accessory to murder. Thus Tertullian (de Idol. c. 11) says that if homicides are excluded from the church, lanistae are of course excluded. What they had done by the hands of others, they must be reputed to have done themselves.

Prudentius (c. Symmach. ii. 1095), speaking of the inhumanity of the vestals in going to the gladiatorial shows, seems to use lanista in the sense of a gladiator simply:

"sedet illa verendis

Vittarum insignis phaleris fruiturque lanistis."

(2) The word lanista was sometimes used contemptuously by Christian writers to designate a priest who actually slew victims with his hands. Thus Ennodius of Ticino († 521), in his sermon on the dedication of a church of the Apostles on the site of an idol's temple (Di t. ii.; in Migne, Patrol. 63, p. 268 c), speaks of the multitude of victims slain by the butcher-priests (per lanistas). He even speaks of the priest under the Mosaic law as "lanista Judaicus." (Bened. Cerei, Opusc. ix. 260 B.)

LANTERN. [IN ARCHITECTURE.] The elevated portion of the fabric covering the intersections of the nave and transepts of a church. In the earlier churches of the dromical or basilican plan the cruciform arrangement is not of frequent occurrence; where it is met with it is sometimes merely indicated by the position of the columns, no corresponding alteration being made in the roof. Sometimes the transept takes the form of another nave with its own continuous roof placed at right angles to the true nave, from which it is separated by the "arch of triumph." Neither of these arrangements allows of the introduction of a lantern. The earliest examples of this feature are met with in the Lombard churches, especially those of Pavia, in which a combination was attempted of the long nave and aisles of the old basilicas, and the dome of the Byzantine churches. The section of St. Michael's, at Pavia [GALLERY, I. 706], affords a very good example of this combination. We there see the centre of the cross elevated into a low octagonal tower, covered with a tiled roof containing a hemispherical cupola, supported on arched pendentives. We have a similar arrangement in the churches of San Pietro in cielo d'oro, built by king Luitprand, after A.D. 712, and San Teodoro, c. 750, in the same city. This novel feature speedily found general favour, and by the influence of the Carlovingian kings of Italy, the Lombard style having passed into the Rhenish provinces and into France, the lantern was universally adopted in later churches. [E. V.]

LAODICEA, COUNCILS OF (Laodicea Concilia).

(1) Held at Laodicea, in Phrygia, whither St. Paul, according to the inference drawn from Col. iv. 16, addressed a letter now lost (Westcott, Canon, p. 408, and App. E.): and St. John a remonstrance, as one of the churches named in the Apocalypse. Its date has been much canvassed. It was once thought contemporary with the council of Neo-Caesarea, and prior to that of Nicaea. Beveridge says the mention of the Photinians in the 7th canon negatives this, as there was no such sect then. But Ferrandus the deacon, in quoting this canon, omits the Photinians. The Isidorian version does the same. Besides, the classing of Photinians, who were fell heretics, between the Novatians and Quartodecimans, who were merely schismatics, in a canon where no others are named, seems more the act of a scribe than a council. Dionysius, however, bears out the Greek. On other grounds it may be said that these canons, having been from the earliest times placed after the canons of Antioch in the code of the church, we can hardly date them earlier than A.D. 341; and if their connexion with a council of Illyria, suggested by Beveridge (Annot. p. 193), and with the semi-Arian bishop Theodosius, suggested by Godfrey (ad Philostorg. viii. 3-4), be allowed, probably not earlier than A.D. 375 [ILLYRIAN COUNCIL, I. 813]. It would be thus a semi-Arian council, like that of Antioch, whose canons were received ultimately by the church for their intrinsic worth. We will consider the form in which they have come down to us further on. They were 59 in number, all on discipline: but the 59th, when given in full, is sometimes divided, so as to form a 60th.

By the 1st second marriages may be condoned after a time. By the 11th the appointment of female presbyters (πρεσβυτρίδες) is forbidden. Fourteen canons, beginning with the 14th, relate to services in church, and should all be studied, particularly the 19th, which is a locus classicus on the ordering of the liturgy. The 35th seems directed against the errors which St. Paul condemns (Col. ii. 18). The 45th forbids baptizing after the second week in Lent. The 46th appoints Maundy Thursday for the redditio symboli. The 50th forbids the breaking of the Lenten fast on that day. By the 52nd weddings and birth-days are not to be celebrated in Lent. By the 57th bishops are not to be ordained in future to villages and country places: and all who have been are to do nothing without leave from the city bishop. The presbyters destined to be their substitutes are to be similarly bound.

And now comes the 59th canon, of which there is a shorter and a longer form: the longer containing a catalogue of the books of the Old and New Testaments, specified as what ought to be read in church by this council. But this half of the canon is not found in the Latin version of these canons by Dionysius, nor in the Greek collection of John Scholasticus, any more than in the Latin collections of Martin or Cresconius all of which, however, exhibit the shorter form. Again, it is omitted in most Greek as well as Latin MSS. of these canons. On these grounds Professor Westcott, after considerable research, and with a praiseworthy desire to be impartial, has decided against its genuineness (Canon, pp. 382-90, and App. D. 1). But he has here deferred too much to his German authorities, and by so doing has missed more than one cardinal point in this inquiry. This is how the matter really stands. We seem to know of no Greek version of these canons earlier than the one represented by Dionysius in his translation. They form part of the 165 canons which he says he translated from the Greek. And this version could not have been known to the West much earlier than his own time, or these canons would not have been omitted entirely from the older Latin collection described as the Prisca Versio, of which the oldest MS. is in the Bodleian, and from other collections indicated by the Ballerini (de Ant. Coll. ii. 3).

Yet that there must have been another Greek version of them circulating in the West, coincidentally with, if not before, the Dionysian one, is clear, for this reason. The Isidorian version of these canons includes this catalogue: and among the canons attributed to the council of Agde, A.D. 506, by Hincmar and others (Mansi, viii. 323, with the note), no less than four of these Laodicean canons, the 20th, 21st, 30th, and 36th, are reproduced word for word, except where MSS. differ, in the Latin of the Isidorian version (ib. p. 366). Thus this catalogue must have been circulating in Spain and in the south of France, translated of course from the Greek when, or possibly before, Dionysius published his version in which it is wanting.

Another even more cardinal point remains. Anybody who will compare the form in which these canons are presented to us by Dionysius, with all the others translated by him, will see directly that it cannot have been the form in which they were passed, but that it is a mere abstract, identical with the form in which all canons are quoted in the Greek collection of John Scholasticus (περὶ τοῦ, &c.), and the Latin collections of Ferrandus and Martin. The abstract supplies merely the principle, not the details of each canon. Dionysius translated all the other canons in full, because the Greek contained them in full. Of the Laodicean he translated no more than a summary, because the Greek contained no more. The Greek from which the Isidorian version was made was likewise no less an abstract, except in this one case. Thus, except in this one case, the original canons have not been preserved, which accounts for their late appearance; and there is a reason both for this exception and also for its not having obtained general currency. Particular churches had their own catalogues of the Scriptures—their own use—which they would not have exchanged for another. Accordingly, Ferrandus and Martin have dispensed themselves from including any catalogue in their collections. Dionysius includes the African in his, because he was giving the African canons in full. Cresconius has it in his collection for the same reason, but omits it in his compendium, on grounds similar to those on which the Laodicean was omitted in the Greek copy which Dionysius and others had before them. John Scholasticus, patriarch of Constantinople, where probably there was no earlier use, gives that of the apostolic canons, as being most authoritative. Anyhow, he would have shrunk from borrowing on such a point from this synod, it being a semi-Arian synod. Professor Westcott has not failed to observe that the Laodicean Catalogue is identical with that of St. Cyril of Jerusalem. Just so, but was not St. Cyril connected at one time with the semi-Arians? Still further, may not its origin be thus held to account satisfactorily for its getting into the Spanish collection? In general the Latin-speaking churches were much attached to the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, of Tobit and Judith, which the African catalogue receives freely, but which this excludes, and to the Apocalypse, which this excludes also.

Let us now see which way intrinsic considerations point. The first half orders that no private psalms, nor uncanonical books, should be read in church. What were private psalms? There was just one such, at all events, that was popular in the Alexandrian church. It is called sometimes "a private psalm of David;" and sometimes "extra numerum." But it is reckoned the 151st psalm by St. Athanasius himself (Ep. ad Marcell. § 25); and it is also found as such in the Alexandrine Codex. Now, in the latter half, or catalogue, the Psalter is pointedly said to consist of 150 psalms, as if with the direct object of excluding this. Again, what is the one book of the New Testament which is not found in this catalogue? It is the Apocalypse—certainly not the least known in Asia Minor; yet when we recall the character of the special reference to the Laodicean church which it contains, its absence from the traditional list of books to be read in that church is surely natural.

But for this one omission in the New Testament, and saving that Baruch is coupled with Jeremiah in the old, and no reading of the Apocrypha tolerated in church at all, this Laodicean catalogue coincides with our own throughout: and it is identical with that of St. Cyril, as has been said, and embodies the mature judgment expressed by Eusebius, a still more pronounced partisan and contemporary. Thus its genuineness really presents no opening for attack on general grounds; while the special arguments in its favour, intrinsic as well as external, are full as strong as we could expect, always bearing in mind that these canons have come down to us through a collector, and not in the shape in which they passed (Mansi, iii. 563-600 with the notes; Hefele, § 93). The parallel case which occurs in Cresconius illustrates this to a nicety.

Possibly these canons had not been added to the code of the church when it was confirmed at Chalcedon; yet they must have formed part of it when Dionysius translated them, and as such been confirmed by the quinisext and 7th councils. But whether the 59th was confirmed in its longer or its shorter form, it was certainly not confirmed to the exclusion of the Apocalypse from the church catalogue.

LAPETA, COUNCIL OF (Lapetense Concilium), one of three synods held A.D. 495, or thereabouts, under Barsumas, Nestorian archbishop of Nisibis, at Lapeta, near Bagdad. Three canons are given to it; but a thirteenth has been cited. By the third of them all the clergy, as well as the laity, are permitted to marry at their discretion (Mansi, viii. 143, et seq.) [E. S. Ff.]

LAPIDES SACRI. I. Bounds or landmarks, so called because originally consecrated to Jupiter by Numa Pompilius (Festus, s. v. Terminus).

They must be distinguished from the milestones or milliaria, which were also known as lapides. (DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANT. art. Milliare; Terminalia.)

The reverence for boundaries was, however, of far older growth. The Mosaic law forbade the removal of a landmark (Deut. xvii. 17). Josephus (Antiq. Jud. lib. i. c. 2) attributes the first use of boundaries to Cain.

Among the Greeks landmarks were commonly put under the protection of some divinity (Plato, de Leg. viii.; Ulpian, Collat. Leg. Mosaic. xii.; Paulus, Sentent. i. 16, and v. 22, 2).

Caius Caesar (A.D. 37-41), in his agrarian law, imposed a fine on those who should remove landmarks, dolo malo, of fifty aurei, to go to the state (Digests, lib. xlviii.; tit. de Termino Moto, 22, n. 3).

Nero (A.D. 54-68) ordered the slave who should commit this offence to be put to death, unless his master would pay the penalty (ib. and see Callistratus, de Cognitionibus, lib. 3, 5).

Hadrian (A.D. 117-138) promulgated a law punishing the offence with various periods of imprisonment, with forced labour or with stripes, according to the position and age of the offender (ib. n. 2).

In the Corpus Juris Civilis a great mass of references has been collected by way of commentary on these laws, which may be consulted with advantage.

Later codes are much less distinct than the foregoing in their provisions, and less severe. In the code of Theodosius, A.D. 438 (lib. ix. tit. 1; de Accusatione, lib. 1), we have merely, "qui fines aliquos invaserit, publicis legibus subjungetur."

Similarly in that of Justinian, A.D. 529 (lib. ix. tit. 2, de Accusationibus et Inscriptiōibus), "eos qui terminos effoderunt, extraordinariā animadversione coerceri deberi, praeses provinciae non ignorabit."

II. This phrase is also employed to censure the effacing of the ancient boundaries of dioceses, by bishops desirous of extending their jurisdiction. Pope Innocent (A.D. 402-417), in one of his letters (Ep. 8, ad Florentium), reminds the bishop to whom he wrote that the Scriptures forbade the removing of boundaries, and that therefore he should abstain from endeavouring to reduce others under his rule. In this sense we find pope Leo I. (A.D. 440-461) also writing to Anastasius, bishop of Thessalonica (Ep. i. c. 8): "Suis igitur terminis contentus sit quisque, nec supra mensuram juris sui affectet augeri."

Among the False Decretals are to be found many instances of the employment of the phrase in this symbolic sense, which is so far an evidence of usage at the time when they were concocted.

III. In the record of the proceedings of the second Nicene Council, A.D. 787, we find sacred images or statues referred to under this phraseology. [S. J. E.]

LAPSI. The term applied to Christians who in time of persecution denied their faith. In the early persecution under Domitian, A.D. 95-6, when it may be presumed that all who had been converted to Christianity had counted the cost of their profession, the name does not occur. But the severe onslaught on Christianity which was made a century later, in the reign of Severus, found the Christians less prepared to resist unto blood in behalf of their religion. Some bribed the soldiers and accusers to overlook them, others paid a sort of periodical tax to secure toleration. The exemption thus purchased, though stopping short of a positive lapse, was at best a compromise; and although the usage was permitted by some bishops, it, like flight in time of persecution, was abhorrent to the rigid Montanism of Tertullian (Tertull. de Fugā in Persecutione, cc. 12, 13). The next persecution was that under the emperor Decius, A.D. 249-51. It was a systematic attempt to eradicate Christianity, not so much by putting its adherents to death, as by compelling them to recant. Participation in a heathen sacrifice was the test ordinarily applied. And the shameful eagerness with which Christians rushed to purge themselves by this test, and even carried their infants with them, is disclosed by Cyprian (de Lapsis, cc. 6, 7). Multitudes also only avoided the actual sacrifice by bringing certificates [LIBELLI] from the magistrates to the effect that they had offered. During the troubles of the church under Valerian, A.D. 258-60, instances of recantation were far more rare. But in the final persecution, which began under Diocletian, A.D. 303, and raged with intense severity until the edict of Constantine establishing religious equality, A.D. 313, the Christians were exposed to a new trial, to which numbers succumbed. An attempt was made to extirpate the sacred scriptures, and the lapsi who delivered up their books were branded with the name of TRADITORES.

The treatment of the lapsed who had polluted themselves with Paganism in the Decian persecution occupies a considerable part of the Epistles of Cyprian. His treatise de Lapsis, written immediately after the termination of the persecution, is an appeal to them to seek readmission into the church by penitence. The terms however on which they should be admitted were not easily decided. Cyprian himself had gone into concealment while the persecution was hottest, a course which somewhat compromised him in the eyes of the Roman clergy (Ep. viii.), but which he defended on the ground that he had received a divine direction (Ep. xvi. 3), and that his presence only exasperated the fury of the populace (Ep. xx. 1, de Lapsis, c. 8). From his concealment he had to determine how the lapsed should be treated. The matter was complicated by a practice which appears to have originated in the African church during the Severan persecution (Tertull. ad Martyr. c. 1), of confessors and martyrs giving letters of recommendation to penitents, requesting the bishops to shorten their penance. The practice was kept in some order by deacons visiting the martyrs in prison, and guiding and checking them in the distribution of their favours (Ep. xv. 1). On the cessation of the Decian persecution the privilege was greatly abused; for not only were letters given to any indiscriminately, but given in the name of martyrs who were dead (Ep. xxvii. 1, 2), and given in such a form as to include the friends of the petitioner (Ep. xv. 3). The custom afterwards led to such disorders as to call for the interference of councils (Conc. Eliber. c. 25, 1 Conc. Arclat. c. 9). The holders of these letters demanded immediate communion, which some bishops, yielding to the popular clamour, granted (Ep. xxvii. 3). The decision of Cyprian was that the holders of letters of martyrs who were pressed by sickness, might be at once restored after confession, even before a deacon if death was imminent (Ep. xviii.) and after imposition of hands (Ep. xix.); but that the rest must wait till tranquillity was restored and "the bishops meeting with the clergy and in the presence of the laity who stood fast," could grant them the public peace of the church. If any meanwhile received the lapsed into communion, they should themselves be excommunicated (Ep. xxiv. lv. 3). This decision was announced to the Roman clergy (Ep. xxvii.) and to the confessors at Rome (Ep. xxviii.), and met with the approval of the Roman church (Ep. xxx.).

In the spring of 251 Cyprian returned to Carthage, and, in a council with his bishops (Ep. lv. 4), made a formal investigation into the case of the lapsed. The conclusion announced was that libellatics were to be received at once (Ep. lv. 14); that some who had once sacrificed, but when put to the trial a second time, rather endured banishment and confiscation of goods, were likewise to be restored (Epp. xxiv. xxv.); that others who had at first confessed Christ, and when afterwards exposed to torture denied Him, and had been doing penance for three years, should no longer be excluded (Ep. lvi.); and that those who were sick should receive peace only at the point of death (Ep. lvii. 1). Of the remainder, the penance should be long protracted, but the hope of ultimate communion not denied (Ep. lv. 4). These decisions were also submitted to Rome, and accepted by Cornelius in a largely-attended synod (Ep. lv. 5). So matters remained till the following year, when Cyprian receiving, as he intimated, a divine warning of the renewal of the persecution, announced to Cornelius that a Carthaginian synod had resolved to receive into communion all the lapsed who desired to return (Ep. lvii.).

It was on the solution of these questions that Novatian broke away from the church. At the beginning of the difficulty two letters attributed to him (Epp. xxx. xxxvi. apud Cyp.) requested that the lapsed who were sick might be restored to communion. But afterwards, when his notions had become more rigid, he took up the position that the church had no power to restore them on any terms; he did not deny that they might personally repent, but that any repentance could ever lead to a re-admission to church communion. A lapser by a unanimous decree of the Western church was debarred from ordination (Ep. lxvii. 6). And a priest who lapsed was restored only to lay communion. Cyprian indignantly repudiates the libel that the lapsing priest Trophimus was allowed after due penitence to resume his sacerdotal functions (Ep. lv. 8). But in troubled times these rules could not always be enforced (Bingham, Antiq. VI. ii. 4). [Compare LIBELLI.] [G. M.]

LASREN, ORDER OF, or Molaisi, one of the eight orders of Irish monks. This Lasren was either (1) celebrated for love of a stone prison and of hospitality, or (2) "a flame of fire with his comely choristers." (Martyrology of Lonegal, Dublin, 1864, pp. 245-247.) [E. B. B.]

LASSARA, virgin, Jan. 29 (Colgan, AA. SS. Hibern.). Thirteen others are commemorated in the Mart. Donegal, q. v. [E. B. B.]

LATERAN, COUNCIL OF (Lateranense Concilium), held A.D. 649, soon after the accession of pope Martin, in the church called Constantine's, at his palace on the Lateran, and chronologically the first of that name. Its deliberations were purely doctrinal and antimonothelite. Its acts have come down to us in Greek as well as in Latin, though Latin was, of course, the language employed. The Greek documents are said to have been translated into Latin in each case by one of the Roman notaries, before they were read out: letters from the African church, being in Latin, were read out as they stood. The number of bishops subscribing to it was 106, almost all Italians, including the pope; and of its sessions, or secretaries—so called from being held in the sacristy—five. The first was opened by a speech from the pope, followed by a letter to him from Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, to the same effect, which was read and approved. At the second, other orthodox documents addressed to himself or his predecessor were recited. At the third, writings of a contrary description, by Theodore, bishop of Pharan, and the patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople, Cyrus and Sergius, together with the Ecthesis of the emperor Heraclius, inspired by the latter, were produced and reflected upon. At the fourth, after some further comments on what had been read at the third, two more documents of the same kind were rehearsed:—1, a letter of Paul, actual patriarch of Constantinople, to the late pope Theodore; and 2, the Type of Constans, the reigning emperor. Both having been pronounced unsound, codices of the dogmatic rulings of each of the previous five general councils were produced from the papal archives and read out in answer to them all. Among these was the celebrated ordinance at the end of the definition of the fourth council, on the unalterableness of the creed. Attention was again directed in the last session to that subject, by reciting what the fifth council had said of its entire agreement with the other four, and with all the great fathers and doctors of the church: extracts from whom were then read, to shew their harmony with each other. Similarly, passages were produced afterwards from the works of earlier heretics, to expose their agreement with the errors that were now broached. Twenty canons followed in condemnation of Monothelism and its patrons in the East, who are several times mentioned by name; complete reserve being maintained about pope Honorius throughout. Letters to announce this result, or in connexion with this subject, were despatched by the pope to the emperor Constans, the metropolitans of Carthage and Philadelphia, and other churches of the East; besides an encyclic to the faithful in general. In all of them he styles himself "servus servorum Dei." Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, it should be added, in writing to him, arrogates the same style. (Mansi, x. 789-1188.) [E. S. Ff.]

LATERCULUS. A tile or earthenware tablet on which the times of the moveable festivals, or at least of Easter, were inscribed, with the view of giving public notice of them. Thus the 4th council of Orleans (A.D. 541) enacted (c. 1) that Easter should be celebrated according to the laterculus or cycle of bishop Victorius. That confusion arose in Spain at a somewhat later date from the difference of the Paschal-cycles in use (diversa observantia laterculorum) is evident from the 5th canon of the 4th council of Toledo (A.D. 633), which enjoins the several metropolitans, three months before Epiphany, to consult each other, and when they have ascertained the proper day for the celebration of Easter to signify it to their comprovincial bishops.

LATIN, USE OF [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE].

LATINA, martyr, June 2 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LATINUS, bishop of Brescia (2nd century), March 24 (Acta Sanctorum, March, iii. 473). [E. B. B.]

LATOPOLIS, COUNCIL OF (Latopolitanum Concilium), A.D. 347, at Latopolis, in Upper Egypt, at which St. Pachomius was put on his defence. (Mansi, iii. 141.) [E. S. Ff.]

LATROCINALIS is a name given to the synod which met at Ephesus A.D. 449 [EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF (6), I. 615]. It was also applied by pope Nicolas to the "conciliabulum" assembled by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, in the year 863. [C.]

LATUINUS, first bishop of Seix in Normandy, † June 20 (Acta SS. Jun. v. 10). The name is almost certainly Teutonic. [E. B. B.]

LAUDA. (1) A short antiphon which occurs after the gospel in the Mozarabic mass. In the Reguli prefixed to the breviary, a lauda is thus distinguished from an antiphona—"Antiphona est, quae dicitur sine Alleluia; et Lauda quae cum Alleluia dicitur." But a lauda retains its name when Alleluia is omitted at the proper season. The Gospel is concluded with "Amen," and then after the salutation "The Lord be with you," R. "And with thy spirit," follows the Lauda. The normal form is a verse, usually, though not always, taken from the Psalms, preceded and followed by Alleluia. Thus the Lauda for Ascension Day is "Alleluia, V. God is gone up with a merry noise, and the Lord with the sound of the trumpet. Alleluia." After the first Sunday in Lent Alleluia is omitted till Easter Eve, when it is resumed; an additional lauda without Alleluia being said on that day after the Epistle. On the Thursday before Easter the Lauda is longer than usual, and consists of seven verses (not consecutive) of Ps. cviii. (cix. Eng. Ver.); and on Good Friday there is no Lauda, but Preces instead.

In the Ambrosian mass the corresponding antiphon is called Antiphona post Evangelium. In the Roman there is nothing which corresponds, and the Creed follows the Gospel immediately.

(2) An antiphon of the same character as the foregoing, but longer, and broken up into verse and response, several of which occur in the day-hours of the Mozarabic breviary. They vary with the office of the day. They are thus said:—

At Vespers, two; one at the beginning of the office, short, and usually with a reference to the time of day; the other before the hymn, somewhat longer, and with "Glory and honour," &c. (*), introduced before the last clause. Also at the close of the office after the benediction, additional laudae are found. Most frequently one, though often two or more (for instance, on the third Sunday in Lent there are as many as six), each followed by a short prayer (oratio), generally a reproduction of the sentiment of the Lauda. These correspond in some measure to the Commemorations of the Roman breviary.

At lauds two are said in the course of the office, and one, or sometimes more, each with its prayer at the end, as at vespers.

At each of the lesser hours, except compline, when there is none, a lauda is said before the hymn. This is the general arrangement, but there are of course exceptions. There is also a short "commemoration" (of the time of day) after vespers and lauds daily, which consists of a short lauda and a prayer.

As specimens of the ordinary form of lauda, those for the first vespers of the first Sunday in Advent may be given:—

Lauda at the beginning of the Office.—"From the rising up of the Sun, unto the going down of the same. P. The Lord's name be praised. V. Blessed be the name of the Lord, from this time forth for evermore."

[This Lauda never has "Alleluia."]

Before the Hymn.—"Alleluia. Send us help from the sanctuary; and strengthen us out of Sion, O Lord.^b P. When we call upon thee. Alleluia, Alleluia. V. We will rejoice in thy salvation, and triumph in the name of the Lord our God. P. And strengthen us out of Sion, O Lord. V. Glory and honour, &c. P. When we call upon thee."

LAUDACUS. [LAUDICEUS.]

LAUDANA or LAUDUNA. In Anastasius Vitae Pontiff. (s. v. Adrian, § 325, Migne), we read that pope Adrian made two "laudanas" of silver, weighing eight pounds each, which he placed over the RUGAE [probably doors or curtains] of the presbytery, where the silver arch is. Calepinus supposes these laudanae to have been rods or cornices of silver; but in fact their nature and use appear to be altogether matter of conjecture.

(Macri Hiero lex.; Ducange, Gloss. s. v.) [C.]

* The Mozarabic form of the Gloria Patri is "Gloria et Honor Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto in saecula saeculorum." The word Honor was added at the fourth council of Toledo, the addition being justified by the words of Ps. 28 [E. V. 29] v. 2, "Afferte Domino gloriam et honorem," &c., and by the ascription of praise in Apoc. v. 12, "Dignus est Agnus... accipere honorem et gloriam et benedictionem" (Brevis Missae Mozarabum Explicatio, A. Lorenzana).

^b This "P" is explained by Arevalus as Psalmus. It has also been taken to stand for Presbyter.

LAUDEMIO (also written Laudmum). The name which is given to the price which a farmer or a vassal paid to the owner or feudal lord of the and on being invested with the possession of a copyhold tenure [EMPHYTEUSIS], or on a renewal of the investiture; or for the right of alienating the fief to another. "Concessimus quod de feodis et retrofeodis in emphytheosin datis nulla financia debeatur, nisi seu fuerint castra, ville, seu loca alia quo a nobis in feudum vel homagium, seu ad servitium aliud teneantur, de quibus alienationem fieri nolumus sine nostro Laudemio, aut nostra gratia speciali." (Præcep. Lud.: x. Fr. Reg., quoted by Ducange.) The amount of the Laudemium varies. In Germany it is stated to be 2 per cent. of the estimated value of the property at the time of entering or renewal: and in Bavaria, and practically in a large part of Germany, to amount to 5 per cent. of that value. The law of emphyteusis was derived from the Roman law, and introduced into ecclesiastical law with but slight modification of the civil procedure. The object of emphyteusis was always real property, usually land, but it might be a building. The owner of the property was called dominus emphyteuseos; and the tenant, emphyteu icarius, or emphyteuta.

The word laudes is used in a similar sense for the price paid by a vassal to his feudal lord for the power of alienating his fief to another; and laudare in the sense of receiving such laudes. The words laudmum and laules both imply the consent and approbation which the feudal lord gives to the translation. (v. Ducange in loco, Pichler, Jus Can. lib. ii. lit. xvii. 24, &c.)

LAUDOMAR [v. LAUNOMARUS].

LAUDS (1), see HOURS; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.

(2) Under the Lower Empire when public honour was done to a great personage the acclamations of the people, which took a conventional shape, were called Laudes (Gr. πολυχρόνιον). The customary formula under the heathen emperors may be learnt from the cries of the Roman army on an occasion mentioned by Lampridius (Vita Diadum.): "Jupiter Optime Maxime, Macrino et Antonino vitam. Tu scis, Jupiter, Macrinus vinci non potest. Tu scis, Jupiter, Antoninus vinci non potest" (Lindenbr. in Ammian. Hist. xvii. 13). After a speech of Constantius to his soldiers (A.D. 358) the whole assemblage of them, "vocibus festis in laudes imperatoris assurgens, Deumque ex usu testata non posse Constantium vinci, tentoria laeta repetit" (Ammian. u. s.). Whether they gave a Christian turn to the laudes or retained the old cry does not appear. The historian uses the word Deum in the case of Julian (363), whose soldiers would certainly appeal to Jupiter: "Principem superari non posse Deum usitato more testati" (xxiv. 1); and it is worthy of note that the soldiers of Valens, when deserting to Procopius at Mygdos in 365, called Jupiter to witness: "Testati Jovem invictum Procopium fore" (ibid. xxvi. 6). The custom, however, at length assumed a Christian character, and was observed even in churches. When St. Augustine, in a synod held in the church of the Peace at Hippo, A.D. 426, proposed Eraclius as his coadjutor with right of succession, "a populo acclamatum est. Deo Gratias; Christo Laudes, dictum est vicies terties. Exaudi Christe, Augustino rit., dictum est sexies decies. Te patrem, te epis-opum, dictum est octies" (August. Epist. 213, § 1). A similar instance occurs in the history of a synod held under Symmachus, who became pope in 498: "Exaudi, Christe. Symmacho papae vita sit," was repeated twelve times (Gratian, ii. xvi. 57). About the year 520 we read of the legates of the bishop of Rome being met by Justin the emperor and Vitalian the consul, "cum gloria et laudibus" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. R. n. 53; comp. nn. 84, 105; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 11). The portraits of the usurper Ithocas and his wife were received with acclamations at Rome on April 25, 602, "in the basilic of Julius by all the clergy and senate," the cry being, "Exaudi, Christe. Phocae Augusto et Leontiae Augustae vita" (Relatio inter Epp. Greg. M. xi. 1; Labbe, Conc. v. 1509; comp. Vita Greg. auct. Joan. Diac. iv. 20). On one of Charlemagne's visits to Rome Hadrian, while "celebrating masses to Almighty God, caused lauds to be paid to the aforesaid Charles" (Anast. u. s. n. 97). When the same prince was crowned by Leo III. on St. Peter's Day, 800, the lauds were, "Carolo pissimo Augusto a Deo coronato, magno, pacifico imperatori" (ibid. 98). After anointing him the pope said mass, or more probably proceeded with it—the account being thus continued: "Et peracta missa . . . obtulit ipse," &c. From later authorities we learn that acclamations in a mass took place after the collect. See Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. iii. 13; Ordo Rom. xii. i. 2, xiii. 7, 10 (ante epistolam post orationem), xiv. 31; in Mus. Ital. ii. They were at length formed into litanies to Christ and the saints—e.g. the priest says thrice and the clerks respond, "Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat. Then the priest says, Exaudi Christe. The clerks answer, Nicolao summo Pontifici et universali papae vita. The litany follows. Salvator mundi, Tu illum adjuva. S. Petre, S. Paule, S. Andrea, &c. And the response to each is, Tu illum adjuva. Then follows, Exaudi Christe. Ludovico a Deo coronato, magno et pacifico regi vita et victoria. Redemptor mundi, Tu illum adjuva. S. Michael, S. Gabriel, S. Raphael, S. Joannes, &c., with the response to each, Tu illum adjuva;" and similarly for any number of persons, fresh saints being invoked for each (Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. v. 8, from Goldastus, Antiq. Alem. ii. 2). Compare a form in Martene u. s. from a Soissons MS. Durandus (Pontificale MS. cited by Sala on Bona u. s.) speaks of lauds which began like the foregoing (Christus vincit, etc), as said not after the collect, but "immediately after the Kyrie eleison." LAUDULF [v. LANDULF].

LAUNOMARUS, abbat, † at Dreux, Jan. 19 (6th or 7th century), Usuard (Wandelbert?), v. Acta SS., Jan. ii. 593. [E. B. B.]

LAURA. The small monastic communities in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, called Lauras, are a connecting link in the history of the rise and progress of monachism, between the solitary asceticism of the hermitage and the more organised, less self-dependent asceticism of the monastery. A laura was an aggregation of separate cells, under the not very strongly defined control of a superior, the inmates meeting together only on the first and last days, the old and new Sabbaths, of each week for their common meal in the refectory, and for their common worship in the chapel attached to each of these lauras. On the other days of the week they dwelt apart from one another, each in the silence and solitude of his cell, subsisting on bread and water, the ordinary fare of the primitive founders of monasticism. The cells, though separate, were in close proximity to one another, like the wigwams of an Indian encampment, and all clustering round the chapel of the community. (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. Menardi Comment. III. i.; Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s.v. Laura; Joan. Hierosol., Vit. Joan. Damasc. p. 693.) Usually each cell contained one inmate only; but under Pachomius, in Tabenna, three resided together in each cell (Sozom. H. E. iii. 14).

The origin of the word "Laura" is uncertain. By one account it is Ionic (Du Cange, Glossar. Gr. s.v.); by another, it is a contraction of the Greek for labyrinth (λαβύρινθος) and expressive of the narrow pathways winding in and out among the cells ("wynds"); more probably it is another form of "labra" (λάβρα), the popular term in Alexandria for an alley or small court. (Suicer, Thes. Eccles. s.v.; Epiphan. Hieres. xlix.) The worst explanation of the word is that which derives it from "οἱ λαοὶ βέουσι," as if it were a thoroughfare, along which a crowd streams.

One of the most celebrated lauras was one founded by Chariton, a hermit, at Pharan, near Jerusalem (Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Benoist, I. i.). Others are recorded to have been founded in the 5th century by Sabas, a celebrated desert-saint, Gerasimus, Euthymius and the empress Eudocia.

As the coenobitic life became more prevalent, young and inexperienced monks were discouraged generally from venturing on the solitary life without previous training with other monks, under the authority and supervision of an abbat. Thus Euthymius advised the youthful Sabas to quit his separate cell in the laura, and to join a coenobium for a time (Cyril. Scythopol. Vit. S. Sab.). Gerasimus is said to have established a coenobium in the midst of his laura (Cyril. Scythopol. Vit. S. Euthym.).

Obviously life in a laura incurred a twofold danger, being exposed at the same time to the temptations peculiar to solitude, and to those which are incidental to a number of persons living together under no strict rule, without much restraint of any kind, and without the necessity of constant occupation. The denizens of a laura are sometimes termed "lauretae" (Mosch. Prat. cc. 3, 4); they have been compared to the "inclusi" of Western monachism, but there are many points of difference. [See INCLUSI.] [I. G. S.]

his office of deacon. In the church of St. Laurence, in Agro Verano, at Rome, there is a mosaic of the 6th century, representing the martyr with an open book in his hand, on which may be read the words "dispersit, dedit pauperibus" (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. lxvi. 2), in allusion to his kindness to the poor.

St. Laurence. From Martigny.

Like other martyrs he bears a cross, frequently jewelled (Airinghi, ii. 354). In the basilica of Galla Placidia, at Ravenna, there is a mosaic shewing him standing before the heated gridiron, holding the cross and the Gospels (Vet. Mon. i. lxvii.). On the bottom of a glass cup, the sacred monogram, with A on one side and ω on the other, is placed behind the head of the saint (Bottari, tab. cxviii.). Sometimes we find him seated between St. Peter and St. Paul, as though the Apostles having introduced him into the heavenly city were giving him an honourable place therein (Buonarri. p. 104). Another glass cup has the figure of the saint, with the legend Victor Vivas, in nomine Lavreti (Buonarroti, xix. 2); this cup may very likely have been used at an AGAPE on the martyr's day, which was observed at Rome with much solemnity. Lupi (Dissert. e Lett. i. 192-197) describes two ancient representations of the martyrdom of St. Laurence; one, a cameo, shews the saint stretched upon a gridiron, while two executioners stir the fire beneath, and a third brings wood to replenish it; in the other, a leaden medallion, we see the martyr at the moment of death; his soul, personified by a female figure, ascending with clasped hands, receives a crown from the outstretched arm which symbolises the Almighty; the emperor, laurelled and sceptred, is seated in a curule chair, and seems by his attitude to be giving directions; a slave stands by his side. Arevallo (in Prudent. p. 936) gives a glass which represents the martyr face downwards on the gridiron, his name LAVRECIV being written above.

(Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.) [C.]

LAURENCE (Laurentius, Lorenzo, Laurent, Louwerijs), chief deacon of Rome, broiled to death Aug. 10, A.D. 258.

The fact is not mentioned by extant writers till the middle of the 4th century, and yet had an immediate and wide-spread influence (which it will be the object of this article to trace) on the life of the church.

It may be taken as a typical instance of martyrdom, so that under this head it will be possible to gather specimens of all the honours that were paid to martyrs.

I. As administrator of the charities of the metropolitan church, Laurence is celebrated in ancient liturgies almost as much as for his sufferings. "He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor," is quoted in the Greek cathisma, and is the introit in the Gregorian missal. The Mozarabic lessons, Ecclus. xxxi. 5-12; 2 Cor. ix. 7-13; Matt. vi. 19-34, apply rather to the deacon than to the martyr, and there is the same epistle in the Ambrosian liturgy (Patrol. lxxxv. 811). Nor did he only administer temporal relief, but the reading of the Gospel and the cup of the Lord. Hence the late legend of his connexion with the Holy Grail. However he had died, all the Christians and all the poor of Rome would have felt his loss.

II. When such a man was stretched naked (ἀπλωθεῖς, lit. 'simplified,' Menology of Basil) on an iron grating over a slow fire, and "his living limbs hissed over the coals" (the phrase is found alike in the Roman Sacramentaries of Leo and of Gelasius, in the Mozarabic and the Gothic), the grief, the horror, the admiration, and the awe, would make it an anniversary never to be forgotten. The death by torture of a Roman citizen was not a common thing. It was a deed intended to strike terror far and wide.

III. His anniversary is fixed to Aug. 10 by the Feriale of Liberius (A.D. 354), and the universal consent of Western and Byzantine calendars. Aug. 11, if ever found, is merely a slip. In the metrical martyrology of Bede, for 'bissenis,' read

"Bis bis victor superat Laurentius hostem."

The lectionary of Luxeuil and sacramentary of Bobbio are said to stand alone in the West in omitting Laurence (Patrol. lxxxv. 811). But as the same sacramentary commemorates Laurence daily in the ordinary mass, it is manifest that the omission only shews that Columban's monks had no special service for the day, not that they omitted the commemoration. He is found in the Feilire of Aengus the Culdee.

There does not seem to be the same general consent about any other festival of the church whatsoever.

IV. Prudentius, in his hymn for the day, declares that from that day forward the worship of the foul gods grew cold, that his death was the death of the temples (περὶ στεφάνων, iii. 497, 509). The canon in the Greek liturgy speaks of him (ode δ) as "finally plucking down the memorial of the impious conceit of the erring."

If this be so, it is important to fix the epoch of his death. Now this may be done with certainty, though from the close of the 5th century onwards there was a wide-spread error as to the date, which referred it to the persecution of Decius. We are, however, enabled to correct the error by the abundant evidence that Laurence suffered a few days after pope Xystus or Sixtus II. And we know, from the contemporary evidence of Cyprian, that Sixtus was executed on the 6th of August in the opening of the persecution of Valerian, A.D. 258 (Cypr. Ep. 82, ed. Migne). Cyprian himself suffered in the following month.

V. Now generally the Greek menologies, the Egyptian-Arabic menology (v. Acta SS. Aug. tom. ii. 125 B), the Spanish-Gothic calendar (Migne, Patrol. lxxxv. 1051), and the Mozarabic missal and breviary, transfer Xystus from the 6th to be subordinated to and celebrated along with Laurence on the 10th. This is the more remarkable, as Xystus is said to have been of Greek extraction, and as the Mozarabic lessons are concerned with the diaconate of Laurence. The fact that while Ambrose has separate hymns (72, 73) for Sixtus and Laurence, Prudentius has only one for both, seems to shew that these were the primitive arrangements in Spain. They are quite peculiar to that country in the West. The Synaxarion in the menology of Basil makes Xystus say to Laurence, "To-morrow we are delivered up." But Prudentius (like Ambrose, de Off. i. 41) makes him predict the martyrdom of the latter after an interval of three days, c. 28.

VI. The canon in the Greek liturgy is addressed to Laurence alone, and consists of eight odes, 32 troparia on the ACROSTIC [see I, 14].

Λαυρέτιον κράτιστον ὕμνῳ προφρόνως.

VII. In Ethiopia Laurence seems to be commemorated as Lavernius on Nahasse 15=Aug. 8 (v. Ludolf, Comm. Hist. Ethiop. p. 425). In the ancient Syrian martyrology, Sixtus is the only Roman martyr (see De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, ii. 376). Eusebius in his history seems ignorant of the martyrdom even of Sixtus. Cyprian does not mention Laurence. The calendar of Carthage, like the rest of the West, distinguishes the festivals of Xystus and Laurence.

VIII. There is another saint joined with Laurence in the Greek liturgy, his jailor and convert Hippolytus, whose name seems to have suggested that he should be dragged along the ground by wild horses till he died:

τὸν Ἰππόλυτον ἱπποδεδειμὸν λέγω ἐναντίον πασχόντα τῇ κλήσει πάθος.

His death is clearly mentioned as subsequent to those of Laurence and Xystus. The calendar of Polemeus Silvius at Rome in A.D. 448, including nine only of the most popular festivals, omits Xystus, but inserts both Laurence and Hippolytus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 676).

IX. These two festivals were the great harvest home of the Roman church. St. Laurence's day is still the signal for burning the stubble in the Campagna (Knight, Latium, 3). So the rustics would perhaps be better able to resort to the city for the second festival, which is graphically described by Prudentius.

X. The Sacramentary of Leo has only one mass distinctly for Hippolytus's festival, but seven for Sixtus, and fourteen for Laurence. The 1st, 10th, and 12th of these seem to be for his vigil, for they speak of 'preventing' his day. There is also a mass for the vigil in the Sacramentaries of Gelasius and Gregory.

XI. In the Sacramentary of Gregory, two masses are given on the day itself, an early and a public mass. The Capitulare given in Martene (Thes. v. 76), which is referred by De Rossi to the opening year of Benedict II., gives the gospel for the vigil Matt. xvi. 24-28; for the early mass Matt. x. 37-42; for the public mass John xii. 24-26. One of Augustine's sermons for the festival (Sermon 305) is on the last-named gospel. Sermon 304 refers to Prov. xxiii. 1, 2 as the Old Testament lesson. Sermons 302 and 303 seem to refer to Matt. v. 12 and Luke xxi. 19 as read in the gospel for the day, but the references may really be to Matt. x. 42 and Matt. xvi. 25, in which case the arrangements would be the same in Africa as at Rome, and Sermon 303, in which he complains of the small attendance and great heat, would be preached at the vigil. In the modern Roman missal the gospel is John xii. 24-26 still, and the epistle is abridged from that in the Mozarabic and Ambrosian liturgies. Chrysologus of Ravenna, in his 135th sermon, quotes Phil. i. 29 as part of the epistle for the day. This would be very applicable to the deacon in the absence of his bishop. To Maximus of Turin three homilies (74-76) and four sermons (70-73) on this feast are ascribed. The 3rd of these sermons (72) is word for word the same as is ascribed to Leo. Three times in the other sermons he quotes Luke xii. 49, which may have been one of the gospels read at the festival in Turin.

XII. The Sacramentary of Gelasius, though it does not give a second mass to the day, gives vesper collects such as this:—"May his blessing be with us in Thy glory whose confession in Thy virtue has to-day been made our plea." Cf. 2 Pet. i. 3.

XIII. The Sacramentary of Gregory does not give a special service for the octave. No more does the modern missal, though the day is still observed. This, and the octave of Peter and Paul, are the only two in Usuard. The permanence of his felicity is made in Leo and Gelasius the ground for a repeated memorial of it.

XIV. The Gothic missal has neither vigil nor octave. From the absence of a triple benediction the feast would seem to have been less important in France than those of Andrew, Stephen, John, the Holy Innocents, Cecilia and Clement. Neither Boniface nor Charlemagne prescribe it as a holiday (sabbatizandum), only Chrodogang names it among those on which there is to be full service (Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, t. 5, pt. 1, p. 299). In this missal Sixtus and Hippolytus are not associated with Laurence on his day, but he is commemorated in the proper prefaces on theirs as well as on his own. The Sacramentary of Leo says much of Sixtus leading the way for his deacons, but it commemorates two others of them along with him. The Gothic missal applies the same thus: "He was an example to others, for Laurence followed." And on the 13th it says: "Who when Hippolytus was yet occupied in the tyrant's service of a sudden madest him the fellow of Laurence." So the Mart. Hieron., which belongs to Auxerre, names both Laurence and Hippolytus on the 6th, as well as on their own days.

XV. In the Greek church the triple festival falls within the octave of the Transfiguration, which is therefore commemorated on it. Hence in one echos the martyrdoms are viewed as themselves a theophany.

XVI. In the litany used at compline throughout Lent, in the Greek church, Laurence is named next to the Apostles and Stephen. He is invoked in the Breton Litany (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, ii. 82). Also in the Coronation Litany (Muratori, Lit. Rom. ii. 463).

XVII. He is commemorated in the ordinary canon of the mass, in the Gelasian, Frankish and Gregorian missals, and in that of Bobbio. He is put next to the early popes and Cyprian.

(For the Western liturgies in the above article we have used Muratori Liturgia Romana, t. i. 389-401, 658-662; t. ii. 108-113, 625-629; also t. i. 696; ii. 3, 693, 777. For the Eastern, Arcudius, Anthologica.)

CHURCHES OF ST. LAURENCE.

A. Rome, Foris Murum.

I. The Basilica di San Lorenzo fuori is said to have been founded by Constantine (Anastasius, Vita Silvestri).

II. Of Sixtus III. we are told, "Moreover he made a basilica to the blest martyr Laurence, which Valentinianus Augustus (the 3rd) granted, where also he offered gifts" (Anast. Vit. xlv.). This was a new basilica beside the old. Rededication of it to Laurence, Sixtus and Hippolytus is mentioned in the Mart. Hieron., Nov. 2 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. ii. 36). Hilary made beside the church of Laurence, monasteries and a bath and a praetorium of St. Stephen (Anast. Vit. xlviii.). Then after the one year's popedom of Anastasius, Symmachus in the days of Theodoric, "constructed beside the church of St. Laurence," as well as of St. Paul and St. Peter, "habitations for the poor" (Anast. Vit. liii.). We read in the time of Belisarius (A.D. 537), that "the churches and bodies of the martyrs were exterminated by the Goths" (Anast. Vit. lx. § 99).

Anastasius tells us that Pelagius II. (A.D. 577-590), who was made pope at a time when the Lombards were devastating Italy, and when there were such rains as threatened a deluge (and would therefore endanger a church built on a hillside), "made over the body of the blest martyr Laurence a basilica constructed from the foundation, and adorned his sepulchre with tablets of silver" (Anast. Vit. lxx.). The mosaic inscription enables us to identify the presbytery or most ancient part of the present church as identical with this church of Pelagius. The old pavement, recently brought to light, dates from the 6th century.

For a discussion of this basilica De Rossi in the Bullettini for 1864 may be consulted.

B. Rome, within the Walls.

I. In Damaseo, parochia.—We are told by Anastasius that Pope "Damasus made two basilicas, one to St. Laurence near the theatre of Pompey, another outside the walls on the Aurelian Way, where he himself rests," †385.

II. In Fonte.—S. Lorenzo in Fonte is near the Forum of Trajan on the way to the Esquiline, and is said to contain the fountain that sprang up at his prayers to enable him to baptize Hippolytus. This church may also have been founded by Damasus: see an epigram in Migne (Patrol. xiii. 411 n.).

III. In Lucinae.—The church in Lucinae, which is on the site of the Horologium of Augustus, is said by Tillemont to be often mentioned in the time of Symmachus, A.D. 498-514 (Tillem. Mém. iv. 597).

IV. In Miranda, monasterium.—S. Lorenzo in Miranda is in the temple of Antoninus Pius, and Faustinae in the Forum, near the church of St.

Adriano, in the old temple of the Three Fates. There was a monastery that had long been in ruins and inhabited by seculars, that Adrian restored in the name of SS. Adriano and Lorenzo and richly endowed.

V. In regione tertia, parochia.—Simplicius (A.D. 468-483) constituted a hebdomada [OCTAVE] for the third region at St. Laurence, that presbyters should remain there for the sake of penitents and baptism. S. Lorenzo a' Monti may represent the parish, but not the site of the church.

VI. In Panis perna.—The church in Panis perna is said to be where Laurence was put to death in the baths of Olynpias. There have been many conjectures as to the name, but it is simply explained by the fact that there was a temple of Silvanus or Pan at this place (see Venuti, Antichità di Roma, c. vi. p. 101).

VII. Ad Taurellum.—The roof of a church of Laurence ad Taurellum, "dum nimis vetustissimum inerat," was repaired by Adrian. Of S. Lorenzo in piscibus, de' PP. delle scuole, close to St. Peter's, I find no trace unless it be this.

VIII. In Formosa.—The church in Formosa was close to the church of St. Cyriacus, probably therefore on the Pincian (Anastasius, Vita Adriani Patr. xevi. n. 95). This, and those in Lucina and in Damaseo, were the three important churches of Laurence in Rome in Charlemagne's time. Montfaucon (Diar. Ital. c. 14, p. 205) gives no reason for identifying it with Panis perna.

IX. In Palatinis, Monasterium.—There was a monastery of St. Laurence "on the Palatine in the deserts" that Adrian restored and joined with a monastery of Stephen, called Bajanda. It is often mentioned later, as a limit of floods. Mr. Burn (Rome, p. 177, see plan at p. 155) thinks he has identified the basilica of Jove, where Laurence was tried, as on the Palatine.

XI. Oratorium in the Lateran.—There was a chapel of Laurence in the Lateran where Toto was ordained, A.D. 768.

XII.—Stations in the Churches.—There were stations in the churches and basilica on LXX^{ma}. Sunday ad S. Laurentium; gospel, the labourers in the vineyard.

Foris Murum.

The Friday after the 1st Sunday in Lent.

The 3rd Sunday.

The Saturday before the 5th Sunday.

The Wednesday after Easter. John xxi.

In Lucinae; Friday after the 3rd Sunday in Lent.

In Damascum; Tuesday after the 4th Sunday.

Those in italics are still observed.

C. Elsewhere.

I. In Constantinople.—The relics of St. STEPHEN are said to have been brought by Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius II., to Constantinople in A.D. 439, and laid in the church of St. Laurence there, which her husband's sister Pulcheria had built near her own palace, in a place called Petron or Blachernae, on the left of the Ceratine Gulf, in front of a church of the Virgin. Marcellinus Comes (in De la Bigne, vi. 1, 365); Theodorus Lector (ib. 505); Procopius (de Aedit. Justin. i. 6, 17). The union of the relics of Stephen, Laurence, and Agnes in this church is said to be commemorated Sept. 29, but is not in the Menology of Basil (Tillem. iv. 598).

II. At Ravenna.—There was in the beginning of the 5th century a church of St. Laurence at Ravenna.

III. At Milan.—The basilica of St. Lorenzo at Milan was originally the cathedral. There is an epigram on it by Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (A.D. 505), poem lvi. (De la Bigne, Bibl. Vet. Patr. vi. 1, 301).

IV. At Tivoli and Porto.—There was also a church of Laurence at Tivoli, restored by Leo III. And at Porto he had both a church and a monastery on the island, with vineyards attached.

V. At Norcia there was a church destroyed by the Lombards, and rebuilt by Sanctulus, as we are told by Gregory the Great (Dial. 3, 36).

VI. In Switzerland.—At Brionum Castra (probably Brione, in the Val Verzasca) there was a church of St. Laurence burnt down by the Lombards, in the rebuilding of which a celebrated miracle occurred. See Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. i. 42).

VII. In Gaul.—The churches of St. Laurence traceable in Gaul are—a. At Vienne, built by St. Severus about A.D. 450, on a hill between four mountains above the town, with a treasure found on the spot (Acta SS. August. t. ii. p. 350).

b. To St. Laurence and St. Germain at Clermont, built by Eoricus, king of the Goths, where St. Gall was buried (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii.).

c. A monastery in Paris in the time of Clotaire, of which St. Domnolus was abbat before he was bishop of Le Mans. It is now a parish in the faubourgs (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 9, 25).

d. On Mont Lois, near Tours, built by Perpetuus, sixth bishop of that city (Ibid. x. 6).

VIII. In Africa.—Relics of Laurence were deposited under an altar at Setif, in Africa, in A.D. 452 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 220).

(2) An earlier martyr named Laurentius is mentioned by Cyprian (Ep. 34), commending Celerinus: "His grandmother, Celerina, was long ago crowned with martyrdom; also his uncle on the father's side, Laurence, and on the mother's side Egnatius. Sacrifices for them, as ye remember, we offer as often as we celebrate in common the passions and anniversary days of the martyrs." Yet the Calendar of Carthage knows no other Laurence but the saint of Aug. 10. The little Roman martyrology celebrates him along with Celerinus on Feb. 3, but it appears by the Mart. Hieron. that this day properly belongs to Celerina, and that the African Laurence belongs to Sept. 24 or 28.

(3) Another is mentioned April 12. (Mart. Hieron.)

(4) Laurentinus and Pergentinus, boys, brothers, martyred at Arezzo under Decius, June 3. (Mart. Rom.) The Mart. Hieron. mentions Laurentius only.

(5) The martyrdom of Laurence and Hippolytus under Decius at Fossombrone (Forum Sempronianum), Feb. 2 (Mart. Hieron.) is very suspicious. St. Apronianus is commemorated the same day. The cathedral of Fossombrone is sacred to this St. Laurence. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 286.)

(6) The illuminator, bishop of Spoleto, Feb. 3. Seemingly an apocryphal personage. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 362.)

LAURENCE (7) On May 10, the Byzantine distich is,— συναλλαγή τις πρὸς Θεὸν Λαυρεντίῳ πόντος ἔδεμ λαβόντι τὴν πορρωπότην.

(Acta SS. May, ii. 389.)

(8) Presbyter of Novari, and ecclesiastical writer of the 4th century. Martyred, with the boys he taught, by the Arians on April 30. (Acta SS. April, iii. 763.)

(9) Archbishop of Milan, † July 19, A.D. 512.

(10) Bishop of Siponto in Apulia, † Feb. 7, A.D. 550. (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 57.)

(11) Archbishop of Canterbury. † Feb. 2, A.D. 619. Into Laurencekirk in Scotland no woman might enter. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 289.)

(12) Bishop of Naples, † July 19, A.D. 717.

LAURENTINUS. [LAURENCE (4).]

LAURIANUS, of Seville, killed July 4 (6th century). (Mart. Hieron.) [E. B. B.]

LAURINUS, martyr of Terni, April 14. (Mart. Hieron.) [E. B. B.]

LAURUS (1) and Florus, twins, sculptors, thrown into a well in Illyricum by Licinius. Their relics were revealed to Constantine, and brought by him to their native Byzantium, August 18. (Menology of Basil.)

(2) Of St. Malo, 7th century, † Sept. 30. (Acta SS. Sept. viii. 692.) [E. B. B.]

LAUSTRANUS, died 640, commemorated Apr. 11 (Men. Scot.), as well as LASREN, Apr. 18. [E. B. B.]

LAUTO, bishop of Coutances, † Sept. 22, A.D. 568. [E. B. B.]

LAVABO. The description of the Eucharistic rite by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. v. 2, p. 325) begins with the deacon presenting water to the celebrant (τῷ ἱερεῖ), and the presbyters who encircle the altar, for the purpose of ablution. And this (Cyril continues) was not merely for the sake of personal cleanliness, it was a symbolic act, to which refer the words of David, "I will wash my hands in innocence, O Lord, and so will I go to thine altar" (Ps. xxv. [E. V. xxvi.] 6.) It does not appear from this whether the verse was actually chanted during the ablution, though its appositeness is recognised. (Compare Dionys. Areop. Hierarch. Eccl. c. 3.) According to some MSS. of the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 330), the priest and deacon after vesting for the liturgy wash their hands in the prothesis, saying, "Νίψομαι ἐν ἁθάοις," and the rest of the psalm. In the Roman rite, the washing of the hands occurs after the oblation of the unconsecrated elements, and thus precedes the preface and the more solemn part of the office. After the censuring of the altar and the priest, while the deacon is censuring the other ministers, the priest washes his hands, saying, "Lavabo inter innocentes manus meas et circumdabo altare tuum, Domine," and the rest of the psalm. As Amalarius of Metz († 837) does not mention this custom, it was probably introduced in the Roman office after he wrote his treatises de Ecclesiasticis Officiis and Eclogae de Officio Missae [C.]

LAVACRUM. [BAPTISM; FONT.]

LAVATORY [MONASTIC]. Monasticism has never been partial to frequent personal ablutions. On the contrary, it has from the first discouraged them, as a form of self-indulgence, and as inconsistent with bodily austerities. Probably this inherent antipathy to bathings and washings was in great measure a result of the reaction from the luxury and licentiousness of the Roman baths under the empire. Certainly the maxim which places cleanliness next to godliness has no place in the biographies of the saints and heroes of monasticism, even in climates where bathing would seem almost one of the necessities of life. Jerome warns ascetics against warm baths as morally enervating (Hieron. Ep. ad Lu. tit.); and in a letter to one of his female disciples denounces every sort of bathing for women (Id. Ep. ad Laet.). Augustine allows a bath* once a month only (Aug. Ep. 109). This aversion to bathing is one of the many indications of the tendency, which seems inseparable from monasticism, to the Manichean notion of matter being intrinsically evil.

The various monastic rules agree very closely in discouraging the use of baths. Even the tolerant rule of the great Benedict only permits them for those who are weak and delicate, forbidding them generally ("tardius concedatur") for the young and healthy (Bened. Reg. c. 36). Evidently he is speaking only of baths within the walls of a monastery; bathing in a river or lake, or in the sea, being of course out of the question (cf. Martene ad loc.). Hildemaricus interprets the expression "tardius" to mean only before the three great festivals—Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide. Other commentators restrict the phrase to Christmas and Easter only; others take it as a permission for the monks to bathe after doing any very dirty work, &c. (Martene ad loc.) Similarly, Isidorus Hispalensis orders baths to be used very sparingly, only as a remedy, never for gratification (Isidor. Reg. c. 20). The rule of Caesarius of Arles permits them only in cases where the doctor prescribes them, and without any regard to the inclination of the patient (Caesar. Reg. c. 39). The rule ascribed to Augustine is to the same effect (Reg. Aug. c. 29), and adds that no monk is to go alone to the baths, nor to choose his companions, but that two or three of the brethren are to be told off by the prior for this purpose. In the same way the council of Aachen in A.D. 817 enacts that the control and regulation of the baths is to belong to the prior (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 7). An anonymous rule, which has been ascribed to Columbanus, called Regula Cujusdam, orders delinquent monks, as a penance, to make the necessary preparations for the washing of their brethren's heads on Saturdays, and for their baths just before the great festivals, especially Christmas (Reg. Cuj. c. 12; cf. Columban. Poenitent.; ap. Menard, Comment. ad loc.). Radegundis is said to have built baths for the use of the nuns in the convent (of Ste. Croix) which she founded at Poitiers; before long some irregularities occurred, which the abbess was accused of conniving at, in regard to the use of these baths (Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. x. 16). See further Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus. [I. G. S.]

LAW.

SYLLABUS.

- I. "Law" and "Law of Nature," and early Christian authorities upon.
- II. Positive Law of the State. Attitude of the earlier Christians to.
 - Law of the State as directly affecting the Christian Church before Constantine, and legislation of Constantine.
 - Legislation between time of Constantine and of Justinian.
 - Justinian's legislation.
 - Legislation of the Barbarian, Frank, and English kings.
 - Legislation of Charlemagne.
- III. Internal legislation of the Church.

The word Law has this in common with the Latin jus, the French droit, and the German recht, that it is at once abstract and concrete. It means both the idea of rules of conduct proceeding from a competent authority and also the rules themselves. The word and the various meanings conveyed by it have been submitted to searching criticism of late years in this country, especially by Bentham and writers more or less distinctly influenced by him. The only part of the controversies thus originating which is relevant here is that which relates to the use of the word law, in such expressions as "Law of Nature," "Natural Law," "Law of God," "Moral Law." It is not very satisfactory nor historically true to conclude, with Mr. Austin (Lectures on Jurisprudence), that the original use of the term Law is a political one, and that the ethical and theological uses are wholly metaphorical and derived. Sir H. S. Maine's review of the history of the expression "Law of Nature" (Ancient Law, chap. iv.), rather supports the doctrine that the expression was borrowed from quite another region than the political one, and that it was in the task of correcting and amending this one that it found its most worthy uses. There is no doubt that Hooker's opposition of "humane law," "that which men probably gathering it to be expedient they make it a law," to that other law which, "as it is laid up in the bosom of God, they call eternal, receiveth according to the different kinds of things which are subject unto it different and sundry kinds of names," certainly expresses a logical distribution of law as old as the Christian Church itself, and somewhat older. The constant references in Cicero's writings to the distribution of jus into natura and lex (see particularly De Leg. i. 15, 16, and Orat. partit. 37), are especially interesting from the attention which Lactantius (vi. 8) calls to them, in the celebrated passage in which, citing Cicero's panegyric on the "vera lex recta ratio naturæ congruens constans sempiterna," he speaks of "dei lex illa sancta illa celestis quam Marcus Tullius in libro de Republica tertio poene divinâ voce depinxit." The expressions of St. Paul in reference to a law written in the hearts of the Gentiles (Rom. ii. 15) are quite in accordance with the doctrines of the leading Roman jurists a century after his time, when

* In his Confessions, where he describes his grief for the death of his mother, he speaks of bathing as recommended to him for his depression of spirits, and mentions an absurd derivation of the Greek word βαλανεῖον as meaning a relief to anxiety.

Roman law was at its climax; as for instance appears from the language of Paulus (47 Dig. iii. 1, § 3) about theft, "quod lege naturæ prohibitum est admittitur." The early Christian writers constantly allude to the law of nature, and often base elaborate arguments either on its existence or on its precepts. Thus Origen (c. Celsum, viii. 52) speaking of the persuasion he had of the salvation of the heathen whose lives had been good, and recalling noble practical maxims laid down even by the enemies of the faith, says, "you will find no men in whom the common notions of what is good and bad, just and unjust, have been wholly blotted out." So, again, Tertullian (adv. Jud. cap. v.) says he contended that "before the law of Moses was written on tables of stone, there was an unwritten law which was naturally understood and held in trust by the patriarchs." St. Ambrose (Epist. ad Rom. cap. v.) divides the "natural law" into three parts, one concerned with shewing honour to the Creator, another with leading a good life, and a third with making known God and the right way of life to others. St. Jerome (Epist. ad Galat. chap. iii.) says that by this "legem naturalem" Cain acknowledged his offence, and Pharaoh, before the law was given by Moses, confessed his misdeeds. St. Chrysostom builds an elaborate argument on the existence and import of a law of nature (Homil. xii. ad Pop. Ant.), and says that "at the beginning God made the knowledge of good and evil self-taught; for we stand in no need of learning that indulgence is evil and self-restraint good, but we know it from the first;" and "when He said 'thou shalt do no murder,' He did not add, 'for murder is doing wrong;' but He simply said, 'thou shalt do no murder,' thereby merely forbidding what was sinful without teaching why it was so." The general subject of the attitude of the earlier writers, Christian, Jewish, and Heathen, towards the law of nature, will be found discussed in such works as Selden, 'De Jure Naturæ et Gentium secundum disciplinam Hebræorum,' Puffendorf, 'Jus Gentium et Naturæ,' and the Prolegomena to Grotius, 'De Jure Belli et Pacis.' From the above extracts it will sufficiently appear from what sources a knowledge of the law of nature was to be extracted, and what was the import of the assertion of the later canonists that no dispensation from it was obtainable.

As contrasted with the "Law of Nature," what is sometimes called "Positive Law" may be considered under three heads:—I. Such part of the general laws of the state as happened to affect Christians because of conflicts of allegiance to which it casually gave rise. II. Such special laws of the state as were enacted in different countries and at successive epochs for the purpose of regulating the Christian society, and determining the organisation of the Church; and III. Such internal regulations as were made by the church itself, either in pursuance of what it held to be an inherent legislative authority, or in the character of a subordinate legislature, exercising permissive powers in dependence on the state.

I. The attitude of Christians towards the general law of the state in the territory of which they found themselves, was broadly defined for them at the very opening of Christian history, in the words so much quoted in after times, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's," and in the part of the twelfth chapter of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, in which the Apostle discusses the relation of the members of the Church to the "powers that be." It would seem that during the whole of the first century no questions of seriously conflicting allegiance presented themselves, the only aspect in which the early church found itself in opposition to the laws of the empire being that it was not formally incorporated among the recognised cults, that is, it was not, like Judaism, a "religio licita." Nevertheless Tertullian intimates that it had slipped in as such, and that Tiberius had even proposed, on receiving the report of Pontius Pilate, to give Christ a place among the gods (Apol. c. 5, and 26). Pliny's letter to Trajan (about A.D. 111) describes the Christians in Bithynia as a law-abiding people, "bound together by no unlawful sacrament, but only under mutual obligations not to commit theft, robbery, adultery, or fraud." It was, however, when he submitted them to the test of adoration before the statues of the gods and of the emperors, and the malediction of Christ, that they were recalcitrant. The amount of subservience to customs bearing the semblance of idolatry which was justifiable in a Christian became the subject of serious perplexity between the period at which the Christians had grown to be numerous and important enough to attract public attention, and that at which the church secured its political victory over paganism. The difficulty was encountered at two points; one, where, owing to general suspicion on other grounds, a Christian was subjected to the test of sacrificing or doing an overt act of worship to the emperor; the other, where the common functions of a civil or military life involved what seemed to be idolatrous usages. It is a matter of some doubt how far the Christians of the 2nd and 3rd centuries consented to serve in the imperial armies, though the expressions of Christian writers, and the arguments of Tertullian with respect to the extent to which Christians might go in receiving military rewards, leave no doubt as to the prevalent opinion that service was not sinful in itself, nor as to the actual practice (Tertull. de Coronâ Milit. cap. xi.; see Milman's History, bk. ii. cap. vii. and Neander). Some of the Christian writers bestow great pains in solving fine casuistical problems as to how far conformity might go. Thus Tertullian (de Idololatriâ, cap. xvii.) thinks a Christian might walk simply in a procession but must not sacrifice, nor give the word for another to sacrifice, nor place the victims, nor bind their temples, nor pronounce any solemn words, nor make any adjuration. Then, again, he discusses the question as to what slaves and faithful freemen should do when their masters or patrons are officially engaged in sacrificing. He intimates, in another place (Apol. c. 34), that it might be allowable to call the emperor lord but not god.

With respect to the general duty of obeying the law of the state, the Christian writers are unanimous in upholding it. Indeed they habitually base their defence against imputations from without on their loyalty. Thus Justin Martyr

(Apol. i. 17) says that "wherever we are we pay the taxes and tribute imposed by you, as we were instructed to do by Him," and "while we worship God alone in all other matters, we cheerfully submit ourselves to you, confessing you to be the kings and rulers of men." Irenaeus (v. 24), speaking even more strongly, and alluding to the perpetual "calumny of the devil" to the contrary, says, "we ought to obey powers and earthly authorities, inasmuch as they are constituted not by the devil but God;" and "that kings are the ministers of God, and are put in authority by the command of that same One to whose command men owe their very existence." Tertullian (Apol. c. 42) presents a vivid picture of the complete implication of the life of the Christians with that of the pagans, in a passage which leaves no doubt that it was the persuasion of the church that conformity was a general duty, and nonconformity only a particular exception from it. "Itaque non sine foro non sine macello non sine balneis tabernis officiis tabulis nudinis vestris coeterisque commerciis cohabitamus in hoc saeculo: navigamus et nos vobiscum et militamus et rusticamur et mercamur; proinde miscemus artes, opera nostra publicamus usui vestro."

Later Christian history, however, brought forward a wholly new class of problems arising out of the active interference of the secular government with the internal affairs of the church. This led to the question being mooted which has never been theoretically answered as to how far the church and its members are morally entitled to resist a law which indirectly affects, as they think perniciously, the interests of the church. The letter of Gregory the Great, addressed to the emperor Maurice (A.D. 582-602), who had interdicted all persons occupying civil functions from becoming clerks or entering a monastery, may be cited in order to shew what was probably a characteristic mode of solving such problems after the time that the church became an authority competing with the state. "As for me, submitting to thy order, I have sent this law to the various countries of the earth, and I have said to my serene lords in this paper whereon I have deposited my reflections, that this law goes against that of the all-powerful God. I have therefore fulfilled my duty upon each side; I have rendered obedience to Caesar, and I have not been silent as to what appeared to me to be against God." (Greg. M. Epist. lii. p. 65.)

II. The laws of the state specially affecting the Christian Church may affect it as a corporate society, or assemblage of corporate societies; or may affect its officers individually; or its members individually. And among the laws that affect the members of the church individually will properly be included all those which confer privileges or impose disabilities on any persons whatever on the ground of their not being members of the church. Thus the general purposes of the laws directly affecting the church may be arranged as those of (1) conferring privileges, or imposing disabilities on members of the church as such, or upon other persons not being such, as, e.g., Jews, pagans, heretics, and apostates; (2) prescribing and controlling the organisation of the church, personal and material; and, with this view conferring privileges or imposing disabilities on church officials of all classes; (3) regulating the property of the church, of its officers, and of its members; (4) determining questions of disputable jurisdiction in respect of ecclesiastical, civil, and criminal suits and offences; and (5) giving effect to the internal legislation of the church itself. It might be expected that at some periods of church history some of the classes of laws owing their origin to these different purposes would be found to be more prominent than the rest, and at other periods other classes of laws. Indeed, it is the case that for long periods together some of these classes of laws often seem to be wholly absent, either through the inactivity of the state, or from there being no materials recognisable by the state on which law could operate. For instance, in early days the whole of the civil law as affecting the church would be gathered up in the disabilities and penalties inflicted on its individual members. But between the time of Pliny's letter and the persecution at the beginning of the 4th century, under Galerius and Diocletian, the organisation of the church was becoming recognised, if not formally protected, and even the property of the church secured to it by law.

Thus it seems that about the time of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222), "Christian bishops were admitted at court in a recognised official character, and Christian churches began to rise in different parts of the empire, and to possess endowments in land" (Milman, ii. 231). "The Christians" (says Gibbon, writing of this period, c. xvi.) "were permitted to erect and consecrate convenient edifices for the purpose of religious worship; to purchase lands, even at Rome itself, for the use of the community; and to conduct the elections of their ecclesiastical ministers in so public, but at the same time in so exemplary, a manner, as to deserve the respectful attention of the Gentiles." But the history of a few years later shews upon what a frail foundation these privileges rested; and it was not till after Constantine's victory over Maxentius in A.D. 312 that the legal rights and duties of the Christian church, its officers, and its members, began to be ascertained with a constantly advancing precision. It is not necessary to distinguish here the successive steps by which Constantine first supported by his legislation paganism and Christianity impartially; then co-operated with the organisation of the church; and finally (as in his dealings with Arius) overbore that organisation by the weight of his personal authority. There are scarcely enough materials in existence to decide the question as to how far, at any time; Constantine went in suppressing the use of pagan rites by the general law. After reviewing all the authorities and the passages in Eusebius directly bearing on the point, Dean Milman is of opinion that Constantine only abolished two kinds of sacrifices, that is, private sacrifices connected with unlawful acts of theurgy or of magic; and the state sacrifices heretofore offered by the emperor himself, or by others in his name. The passage in the Theodosian Code (Cod. Th. xvi. 10, 2), from a law of Constans in which he cites an edict of his father, is distinctly in favour of an universal prohibition. "Cesset superstitio, sacrificiorum aboleatur insania. Nam quicumque contra legem divi Principis parentis nostri et hanc nostrae mansuetudinis jussionem census fuerit sacrificia celebrare competens in eum vindicta et praesens sententia exseratur." We have in the Theodosian Code very clear indications of the legal measures by which Constantine (1) fenced round the Christian community, by inflicting disabilities on those outside, as in the law (Cod. Th. v. 1) to the effect that all privileges given in respect of religion attached only to "Catholicae legis observatoribus; haereticos autem atque schismaticos non tantum ab his privilegiis alienos esse sed etiam diversis muneribus constringi et subici;" (2) recognised the organisation of the church by allowing slaves to be manumitted "in gremio Ecclesiae," provided it was done "sub aspectu antistitum" (Cod. Th. iv. 71), and supported its institutions by allowing no other business than emancipations and manumissions to be performed on Sunday (Cod. Th. iii. 12, 1, 2, 3). Constantine also exempted the clergy from the burdensome liability to serve on town councils (Cod. Th. xvi. 2; 1, 2, 3). A provision was, however, introduced which throws light on the notion of ordination prevailing at the time, to the effect that if any one should, subsequently to the making of the law, become ordained solely in order to evade his civil obligations, he must be restored to his civil character (restitui et civilibus obsequiis inservire). The whole of this law may be instructively contrasted with the legislation of Justinian (Con. i. 4, 26), by which he specially provides for bishops becoming an essentially constituent part of provincial town councils.

In the two hundred years which intervened between the time of Constantine and that of Justinian, legislation directly affecting the Christian church made rapid progress in all its departments. It was in the joint reign of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius (A.D. 380) that the formal law was passed which figures in the codes both of Theodosius and of Justinian, by which Christianity was constituted the exclusive religion of the Roman empire, both in the East and in the West. "We command all who read this law to embrace the name of Catholic Christians, deciding that all other idiots and madmen should bear the infamy attaching to their heretical opinions, and as they will first meet with the penalty of divine vengeance, so they will afterwards receive that condemnation at our hands which the Heavenly Judge has empowered us to administer." (Cod. Jus. i. i. 1.)

From this period laws begin to appear for determining questions of disputable jurisdiction, such as the law of Arcadius and Honorius A.D. 399 (Cod. Th. xvi. 11, 1), giving the bishops exclusive jurisdiction in "religious" matters, but in these only: "quotiens de religione agatur episcopos convenit judicare: coeteras vero causas quae ad ordinaris cognitores vel ad usum publici foris pertinent legibus oportet audiri." At the very end of the Theodosian Code appears what is called an "extravagant" law of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, "de episcopali iudicio," prescribing that bishops be not occupied in trying ordinary matters, but whenever a matter presented itself relating to Christian authority (quae pertineat ad Christianam facultatem), it should be decided by the highest priestly functionary in the district (see AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS, I. 152). The special penalties imposed on immoral clergy belong also to the part of the law which regulates and supports the organisation of the church. Such were those imposed by the law of Valens and Valentinian (A.D. 370, Cod. Th. xvi. 11, 20) on ecclesiastics, or "ex ecclesiasticis vel qui continentium se volent nomine nuncupari viduarum ac pupillarum domos adeant;" they were "publicis exterminari iudiciis," and were held incapable to take any benefit under a will of a woman to whom they had attached themselves under pretext of religion. The practice of requiring such laws as directly affect the church to be publicly read in the church, is an interesting token of the public recognition of these Christian buildings. The law just cited is said to have been read in the churches, "lecta in ecclesiis;" and Theodosius the younger had his law against the Nestorians, and Constantine his letter to the church of Alexandria, in absolution of Athanasius, read in the churches; and the practice was in use under the Visigoths at the close of the laws of which people we read, "Suprascriptas leges omnes lectas in ecclesiâ S. Mariae Toleti sub die xi. Kalend. Feb."

The laws affecting the Christians which were enacted between the time of Constantine and the publication of the Theodosian Code in A.D. 438, are mostly contained in the 16th book of that code, the code itself having been promulgated in the same year, both in the Eastern and Western empires. The next important legislative events occurred in the middle of the sixth century, in the reign of Justinian. The product of Justinian's legislative exertions in respect of the church appears in the first book of his code (the revised edition of which—the only one which has come down to us,—was published in A.D. 534), and his Novells which cover a period of legislation extending from A.D. 535 to A.D. 565. The first book of the code also contains the laws which had been passed by successive emperors since the publication of the Theodosian Code. Of this intermediate period between A.D. 438 and A.D. 534, there appear in Justinian's Code (Book 2) several important laws regulating the rights and liabilities of the clergy, confirming the claims of the church to have property transferred to it in life and on death (Cod. i. 2, 14), directing the clergy as to the administration of property left by will for the redemption of captives, and for the use of the poor (i. 3, 28), and determining the rights, duties, and general functions of those betaking themselves to a conventual and monastic life. The right of sanctuary as available in all parts of the empire is explicitly vindicated and defined by a law of Leo I. in A.D. 466. (Cod. i. 12, 6.)

The comprehensive legislation of Justinian, especially that which took place between A.D. 535 and A.D. 565, and is recorded in his Novells, extends to all the branches of law in which, according to the above classification, it is possible for the civil law directly to affect the Christian community. It will be convenient to review the general character of the laws passed in Justinian's reign in conformity with that classification.

(1.) Of laws conferring privileges or imposing disabilities on individual members of the church, or on other persons because they are not such members, the fifty-second constitution

(Novell. Auth.) is an instance, the effect of which was to exclude Jews, Samaritans, Montanists, and other heretics (aliter respondens homines quos nondum hæcenus recta et immaculata fides illucet sed et in tenebris sedent animis vera non sentientes sacramenta) from the beneficial exemptions enjoyed by the orthodox in respect of service on town councils, and to allow their testimony in courts of law only in cases in which the interest of an orthodox suitor, or that of the state seemed to call for it. Another instance is supplied by the limitation of the newly conceded rights of intestate succession in accordance with natural, instead of the older civil relationship to those who belonged to the "Catholic Faith." (Nov. Authen. 114.) Yet a further instance is the law forbidding marriages between god-parent and god-child (Cod. v. 4, 26) on the ground that "nothing else could so surely introduce an affectionate paternal relationship, and thereby justly forbid marriage, as a tie of this sort by which souls are bound together through the mediation of God."

(2.) With laws regulating and protecting the organisation of the church Justinian's legislation is replete, and the 134th Novell is a small code in itself. Bishops and monks were absolutely forbidden to act as guardians, and priests and deacons were allowed to act only on their formal request, and they were all forbidden to undertake any civil function. The bishops were forbidden to move from place to place without the permission of the metropolitan or the emperor. The bishops, patriarchs, and archbishops in each province were to assemble once or twice a year, and to examine into all causes and offences. By the 59th Novell it is forbidden to introduce the "sacred mysteries" into private houses, unless certain of the clergy were especially invited with the approval of the bishop. The limitation of the number of the clergy, and of the expenses attending on ordination, were carefully provided for (Nov. Auth. 3, 5, 16).

(3.) Of laws regulating the property of the church the seventh constitution is an important specimen. It lays down the general principle that no church or church officer is entitled to part with, by gift, sale, exchange, or perpetual lease, any immovable property of the church, or the sacred vessels of the church, save only (in this last case) for the redemption of prisoners, the right of the Government to force a sale at a fair price being reserved. A later law (Nov. Auth. 43) permits the alienation of immovables in the case of inability to pay state dues, and if the income of the immovables does not suffice; and a still later law (Nov. Auth. 67) provides that lands and other immovables left to the church by will for the redemption of captives, or for the support of the poor, may be sold for the purpose should it appear that no certain income from the property can be relied upon otherwise [ALIENATION, I. 50]. To the same class of topics belong the legal restrictions upon building churches, monasteries, and houses of prayer without first making a preliminary grant of the property to provide for the services (Nov. Auth. 69, 2).

(4.) Laws regulating jurisdiction, of course, became increasingly precise at this period, and the final Novell, already cited, contains numerous provisions on the subject. By the 80th Novell, persons having any cause of action against monks, ascetics, or nuns, must bring the case before the bishop; by the 129th Novell, the bishop might, in case a judge deferred giving sentence, either press the judge to proceed or himself investigate the case afresh, pronounce sentence, and report the neglect to the emperor. Provision was also made for parties trying their case before a friendly tribunal composed of the judge and the bishop, so as to avoid the necessity of referring the case to the tribunal at the capital. Bishops administering justice with partiality were to be punished. In the 134th Novell important provisions are contained, by which all causes of complaint against a member of the clerical body are to be laid, in the first instance, before the bishop, and the sentence, if accepted by both parties within ten days, is to be carried out by the civil judge; if the sentence is not accepted the civil judge is to examine the case afresh, and if he differs from the bishop an appeal is allowed (see APPEAL, I. 126). In criminal cases, if the bishop condemns, the convicted clerk is first to be shorn of his "honour and grade" according to ecclesiastical rules, and is then tried by the civil judge. If the civil judge is approached first, and the prisoner is found to be a clerk, the case must go before the bishop, who, if he finds the clerk guilty, is to deprive him of his office and hand him back for sentence to the civil judge. If the bishop does not find him guilty he is to defer the deprivation, while security is taken and the case referred to the emperor for his decision.

(5.) As to laws enforcing the internal legislation of the church, the 120th Novell is important, the first chapter of it solemnly giving the force of law to the sacred ecclesiastical rules expounded or established by the four Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. Subsequently to the time of Justinian, the Iconoclastic controversy in the East (commencing A.D. 726) is interesting, in reference to the present subject as exhibiting the firm legislative control that the Eastern emperors either retained or assumed to themselves over the ritual of the church. The conquests of Justinian in Italy led to his complete body of laws being applied en masse to the subjects of his reconquered provinces, for whose use the Novells, or such of them as originally appeared in the Greek language, were translated into Latin. But before the victories of Justinian in Italy the Theodosian Code had already been introduced in an almost complete shape into the code of the Visigoths issued in A.D. 506 by Alaric II. He was succeeded by Theodoric, his father-in-law, who united thereby the kingdoms of the Ostrogoths and the Visigoths. In this way it appears that in the early part of the sixth century the laws affecting the church, as they were embodied in the Theodosian Code and in the code and Novells of Justinian, were introduced into Italy almost simultaneously from the East and the West; and it may be conjectured that, in this way, the legislation of Justinian, as well as of his predecessors, became the basis of the legislation of the barbarian kings. There is reason, however, to suppose that the barbarian kings were less disposed to interfere with the internal order of the church than the Eastern emperors. They were mostly Arians, they were not gifted with the theological subtlety which seems to have distinguished some of the rulers in the East, and some of the most eminent of them are conspicuous either for toleration or for religious indifference (see Guizot's Civilisation in France, Lect. xii.). In an edict of Clothaire II. (A.D. 615) we have a distinct recognition of the principle that the clergy are, in the first instance, to be tried by an ecclesiastical and not by a civil court; and, for the case of suits between the clergy and other persons, a court is established composed of chiefs of the church sitting together with the ordinary secular judge. The law of the Riparian Franks (Lex Rip. xxxi. § 3, lviii. § 1) provides for the clergy being tried by the Roman law. The Salic law, in its oldest form, bears few marks of ecclesiastical legislation, and is almost exclusively occupied with defining the pecuniary penalties for civil and criminal offences. In its reformed shape it wears the impress of the mature ecclesiastical legislation of Charlemagne.

The laws of the Saxon kings in various English kingdoms afford instruction as to contemporaneous legislation in all the German kingdoms under the influence of the Roman church. The code of Ethelbert, who seems to have begun to reign about A.D. 561, contains a number of precise regulations on general matters, of which only the first touches the church, robbery from which is to be punished by a fine of twelve times the value stolen; robbery from the bishop, by a fine of eleven times the value; from a priest, or nine times; a deacon, of six times; and so on. In the code of Wilttraed, who seems to have begun to reign in A.D. 691, there is a fair amount of ecclesiastical legislation, including the principle that the church shall enjoy immunity from taxes, and sundry minute rules in respect of compensation for offences by and against the clergy. The celebrated laws of Ina, who came to the throne about A.D. 688, mark a distinct stage in social and political advance. While dealing largely with the common criminal offences, against which the previous codes were mainly directed, they also contain numerous specific laws directly affecting the church; as that, "the ministers of God shall observe their own proper laws"; that "children shall be brought to be baptized within thirty days, under a penalty of thirty solidi"; that "a slave doing work at his master's bidding on the Lord's day shall thereby become free"; and that "the right of sanctuary availed to save the life of a criminal, but he must make compensation" (Wilkins's Leges Anglo-Saxonicae Ecclesiasticae et Civiles). Some curious instances of the active co-operation of the church and the state in respect of punishing the offences of the clergy against the ordinary civil and criminal law in the earlier part of the seventh century in Britain appear in some very early works cited by Mr. Haddan and Professor Stubbs (Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 1869). The Liber Llandavensis (a compilation of the twelfth century) records the excommunication by Oudaeus, bishop of Llandaff, at the beginning of the seventh century, of Mensig and of Morgan, kings of Glamorgan, for murder, after swearing amity upon relics in the bishop's presence, in each case lands being given to the see of Llandaff by the culprit when reconciled. The same work records similar proceedings in the case of a fratricide committed by Gwoednerth, king of Gwent; and in other cases Eddius, in his life of Wilfrid (A.D. 709), mentions that the holy bishop, Wilfrid, on one occasion, standing before the altar, and turning to the people, "enumerated before the kings the lands which previous kings had granted and the sacred sites which the British clergy had deserted in flying before the enemy." This seems to imply a re-endowment by the Saxon kings with lands previously held by the British church.

The legislation of Charlemagne, which continued through his entire reign, that is, from A.D. 768 to A.D. 814, and which was reproduced over and over again in closely resembling forms in the different countries successively reduced under his rule, recalls that of Justinian by its comprehensiveness and its particularity. Nevertheless, the capitularies of Charlemagne not only mark the progress which the church had made during the past 200 years in internal organisation, but they also seem to bespeak the spontaneous energy of the church in legislating for itself, rather than the mere weight of imperial authority, to which so many of the earlier laws were due. Much of Charlemagne's legislation in respect of the church is identical with that of Justinian, and with that of the earlier Saxon codes, and this affords evidence that legislation of this sort was largely controlled by ecclesiastical usage and tradition, and by the direct influence exercised by the authorities of the church on the civil lawgiver.

It will be convenient to exemplify Charlemagne's legislation by reference to such of the main department of possible legislation in reference to the church as were above distinguished for the purpose of convenient arrangement, and are alone prominent at this date. They concern (1) the organisation and ritual of the church, (2) the property of the church, of its officials, and of its members, and (3) jurisdiction.

(1.) In respect of the organisation and ritual of the church, the laws of Charlemagne are extremely numerous and precise. Thus (Cap. A.D. 769) priests are to be subject to their bishops, and to give an exact account on the first day of Lent of their ministry, and of the rites they have performed; and to entertain the bishop on his visitations. No priest is to undertake the care of a church without the bishop's assent, nor to pass from one church to another. Priests are not to celebrate mass except in places dedicated to God, or, if upon a journey, in a tent and at a table consecrated by the bishop. The bishops and clergy were specially interdicted from engaging in battle or accompanying the armies, excepting a few bishops with their attending priests selected to perform sacred duties; also from hunting with dogs and keeping hawks and falcons. Every bishop was to visit his diocese (parochia) once a year, and put a stop to pagan rites and ceremonies (auguria, phylacteria, incantationes vel omnes spurcicias gentilium). Bishops were to have due authority over priests and other clerics within their diocese (Cap. A.D. 779), and to be themselves subject to the metropolitans. A bishop was not to receive a cleric attached to another diocese, nor to ordain him to a higher function. The faith and good life of candidates for ordination was to be investigated by the bishop, and fugitive clerics and strangers were not to be received or ordained without "literae commendaticiae" and the licence of their own bishop (Cap. A.D. 789). Bishops were precisely directed as to the subjects of their preaching, such as belief in the doctrines of the Trinity, of the Incarnation, and of the Resurrection, sins for which eternal punishment was due, love of God and one's neighbour, faith, hope, humility, patience, alms, confession, and the like. A number of general directions were given to the clergy as to conduct, such as in respect of swearing in the course of conversation (sed simpliciter cum puritate et veritate omnia decet), entering taverns, getting drunk, or making others so, and preaching the gospel to the people on festal and the Lord's days. Precise regulations are given as to the observance of the Lord's day. No servile work was to be done, or journeys undertaken, except for purposes of warfare, fetching food, and burying the dead. Everyone was to attend church, and the celebration of the mass, and praise God for all the good things He had done on that day. Official public meetings and the public administration of justice were not to take place on that day, except in circumstances of urgent necessity (Cap. A.D. 789, de partibus Saxoniae). The bodies of Christian Saxons were to be buried in the cemeteries of the church, and not in the "tumuli" of the pagans. Children were to be baptized within a year, or a fine was imposed on the person responsible for the neglect. The right of sanctuary was defined very much in the same language as in earlier laws. Homicides and other persons accused of committing crimes punishable with death would not be excused by taking refuge in a church, and no food must be given them there (Cap. A.D. 779). By a later capitulary of A.D. 789 none were to be violently expelled from a sanctuary, but they were to remain till a formal judicial inquiry could take place (dum placitum praesentetur); see also Cap. A.D. 803, 3. Breaking into a church was an offence punishable with death. A synod was to meet twice a year (Cap. A.D. 806). A province was never to be divided between two metropolitans. Lastly (Cap. A.D. 803), reading in church was to be distinct (lectiones in ecclesia distincte legantur).

(2.) As to the property of the church, a considerable part of Charlemagne's laws is concerned with regulating the right to tithes. The general principle of paying tithes is laid down in the capitulary of A.D. 789 ("De partibus Saxoniae"), that every one, noble as well as free born, should give the tenth part of his substance and his labour to the church and the priests." The principle is affirmed over and over again, and applied in detail to various kinds of property. The history of this part of Charlemagne's legislation is passed succinctly in review by Professor Brewer in an Appendix to his Endowment and Establishment of the Church of England, Part I., to which it is sufficient for the present purpose to refer. Bishops and abbats were cautioned as to bestowing a diligent custody on the treasures of the churches, lest by treachery or negligence any gems, vases, or other treasures be lost (Cap. A.D. 806, 3). It was specially provided (Cap. A.D. 804, 3) that if any one wishes to build a church on his own property, he must first have the bishop's assent and licence, and that the ancient tithes payable to the older churches must not be diverted to the new one.

(3.) With respect to jurisdiction no judge was to punish a priest, deacon, or cleric, "without the consenting knowledge of the pontifex," under pain of separation from the church till he confesses and amends. Bishops were to administer justice to the clergy in their dioceses; and if an "abbat, priest, deacon, sub-deacon, does not obey the bishop, the metropolitan must interpose, and if he cannot settle the matter, the parties must come to the king "cum literis metropolitani" (Cap. A.D. 794). Priests accused of crimes were to be tried at a synod in accordance with a capitulary of pope Innocent's; if they were convicted, they were to be removed from the sacerdotal office. By Cap. A.D. 812, if bishops and abbats could not settle their disputes they must come before the king himself. All other officials were warned against presuming to try such high matters without special authorisation from the king. The decrees of the councils of Nicaea, Chalcedon, Antioch, and Sardica were incorporated in the legislation. From the preface to some of the capitularies, it seems that the laws were in fact passed as much by the authority of the church as by that of the state. Thus the capitulary of A.D. 779 opens "Anno feliciter undecimo, &c. qualiter congregatis in una synodali concilio facto capitulare episcopis abbatibus virisque illustribus comitibus una cum Domino nostro se." &c. [See CAPITULARY.]

III. The laws made by the church itself, whether in pursuance of an inherent legislative faculty it holds itself to possess, or as a subordinate legislature dependent on the state, must be considered under the heads of (1) the modes by which the law has at different periods been made, and (2) the modes by which it has been enforced. (1.) It will have been seen from the preceding review to what an extent at different periods and from opposite causes, such as the complete preponderance of the state over the church at one period and the intimate implication of the state with the church at another, the same authority which enacted laws for the state also prescribed the most minute regulations for the internal order of the church, and often at the same moment and in the same document. So true is this, that in the case of some of the capitularies of Charlemagne, and of the legislative acts of the early Saxon kings in England, it is hard to say whether the law-making authority was a church synod or the king surrounded by his ordinary councillors. the bishops, abbats, and chief secular officials in the kingdom. Nevertheless, the church claimed from the earliest times the right of independent legislation, though the limits of this right became soon contested in practice through the interposition of the Eastern emperors, and in theory also as soon as the church of Rome assumed for itself the claim of being the chief, or even the exclusive organ of church legislation (see COUNCIL, I. 473; CANON LAW, I. 265; DECRETAL. I. 539), and thereby precipitated the inevitable controversy with the secular authority in different countries.

(2.) The modes by which the church has been enabled, or has attempted, to make her laws effective by applying suitable penalties for their infraction have always been in fact largely subject to the explicit or implicit control of the state, and the more so as the church and the state became co-extensive. Nevertheless, the church has also succeeded in herself punishing her own members and officers for breaches of her laws, and, in the times of her greatest strength, has done so even when the offender, as in the case of Theodosius the Great, was a crowned head. Apart from excommunication, partial or total, temporary or permanent, and public reproof or degradation of office, the most common forms that ecclesiastical penalties gradually took was the enforcement of some painful austerity or discipline [PENITENCE], subsequently commuted for, or admitting of, a regular substitute in a fine. [FINES, I. 671.] It is well-known by what gradual but certain steps this notion of accepting pecuniary compensation for some of the lighter offences gradually led to the principle of admitting for all but a very few "mortal" sins a like satisfaction; and then to the whole system of INDULGENCES [I. 834] by which ecclesiastical penalties were mitigated. An examination of the older Salic law and the Ripuarian law, already alluded to, will go far to explain how the notion of pecuniary compensation for sins so easily took root in the Western church. It was, in fact, the common form of all the civic legislation in the German kingdoms which was not directly borrowed from Rome. It has, however, been observed that Tertullian's education as a lawyer led him in his treatise De Poenitentia (c. 19), to regard the ecclesiastical fine exacted for "homicidium, idololatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia et fornicatio," rather as a "satisfactio" or temporary security for future good conduct than as a penalty for past transgressions. Probably both ideas coalesced in the late church law relative to penance.

The question naturally suggests itself how far, before the death of Charlemagne, the church was in a position to rely upon the co-operation of the state in enforcing her own laws and the procedure of her own courts; for instance, by imparting to a sentence of deprivation its appropriate civil consequences. The truth was that, from the times of the earlier Christian emperors, the jurisdiction of the bishops, in respect of certain matters and persons, was placed upon exactly the same level as the jurisdiction of a civil court (see especially the law of Honorius and Theodosius II., A.D. 408, giving the force of a civil judgment to the sentence of a bishop on a voluntary reference to his arbitration—a law often imputed to Constantine,—and Justinian's 134th Novell already cited). Again, under the municipal government of the empire, in all the later stages of its history, the bishop was intimately concerned in civic administration of the most secular kind in all the chief towns and especially at Rome (see 1 Cod. Jus. iv., and Guizot's Civilisation in Europe, Lect. ii. and Gibbon in reference to Gregory I. chap. xlv.). Lastly, Charlemagne, in constituting his itinerant magistracies, combined in one commission a Comes and a bishop, "ut uterque pleniter suum ministerium peragere possint" (Cap. A.D. 803, chap. iv.). It thus resulted that all the machinery was constantly at hand for enforcing the judgment of the bishop in strictly ecclesiastical matters in the same way as the judgment of a secular court.

But, furthermore, it is to be borne in mind that the canons by which ecclesiastical penalties were imposed were, up to the death of Charlemagne, scarcely distinguishable from the ordinary laws of the empire. The legislative body was, as often as not, constituted in exactly the same way whether engaged in secular or religious legislation, and frequently discharged both classes of business at the same sitting. Both Justinian and Charlemagne expressly incorporated among the published laws of the realm the canons of four general councils (not the same ones); an incessant control and supervision is exercised by the civil ruler over the sitting of councils, and provision is made for the time being fairly distributed between secular and religious business. Thus king Sigibert, in addressing Desiderius, the bishop of Cahors (A.D. 650), directs that no "synodale concilium" be held in his kingdom without his knowledge. The seventeenth council of Toledo in A.D. 694 decreed that in the first three days of every such assembly ecclesiastical affairs should be debated, and then—but not till then—the affairs of the state; and Charlemagne (Cap. A.D. 811, chap. iv.) directs that the abbats, bishops, and counts are to be distributed into different chambers with a view to laymen not interfering with ecclesiastical affairs. Again, while it is probable enough that during the period here concerned excommunication was felt to be a heavier punishment than any ordinary punishment known to the secular laws, and therefore needed no supplement from these, there are signal instances on record of specific legislation for the purpose of moderating or increasing the effect of an ecclesiastical sentence. Thus, in A.D. 595, Chilperic makes a decree against those who are excommunicated for murder, still continue obstinate. Pepin (Cap. A.D. 755) makes a similar decree: "Si aliqui ista omnia contemserit et episcopos emendare minime poterit regis iudicio exilio condemnentur;" and, lastly, Charlemagne, in redressing a curious abuse which followed from persons excommunicated for murder wandering about the country and presenting scandalous exhibitions of distress, decrees (A.D. 789) "nec isti nudi cum ferro sinantur vagari qui dicunt se data sibi poenitentia ire vagantes. Melius videtur ut si aliquid inconstitutum et capitale crimen commiserint in loco permanent laborantes et servientes et poenitentiam agentes secundum quod sibi canonice impositum est."

It may be said, generally, that up to the epoch at which the legal organisation of the church was distinct and complete enough to enable the pope to contend on equal terms with the emperor, either the necessities for secular aid in support of ecclesiastical discipline were too rare to attract general attention, or such general harmony of spirit and such a use of common judicial machinery prevailed, as to disguise the real character and amount of the secular interference, or the extreme ecclesiastical penalties were in practice more potent than any civil ones, and therefore stood in no need of support from these.

LAWSUITS. [LITIGATION.]

LAWYERS. The attitude of the church towards lawyers, as towards all persons holding anything like official positions, was, during the era of persecutions, that of suspicion and almost dislike. In some churches they could not be ordained; for we find in a letter of pope Innocent I. (A.D. 402-417) (Ep. 23, ad Conc. Tolet. c. 2) that he complained of the custom existing in the Spanish church of admitting such to ordination, and proposed "that no one should be admitted to the clerical order who had pleaded causes after he was baptized." That this represents the practice of the Roman church there can be little doubt, nor that the rule was soon extended over the French and Spanish churches. And he orders that for the future such persons, if ordained, should be deposed, together with those who ordained them: "ut quicumque tales ordinati fuerint, cum ordinatoribus suis deponantur." We find the council of Sardica (A.D. 347) enacting in its thirteenth canon that a lawyer (ῥητορικὸς ἀπὸ τῆς ἀγορᾶς) might proceed through the grades of reader, deacon, and priest, even to the episcopate, if he were a suitable man. But as Du Pin observes (Cent. iv. p. 261), the Sardican canons were never received by the whole church, nor embodied in the collection authorised by the council of Chalcedon.

We find that such legal assistance as was required by a church or diocese was in the East often, perhaps usually, rendered by a clergyman. The record of the council of Ephesus shews us Aspalhus, a presbyter of Antioch, managing the law business (τὰ πρᾶγματα τῆς αὐτῆς ἐκκλησίας) of that church. Similarly John, who appears in the account of the Constantinopolitan council held under Flavian A.D. 448), and ecclesiastical history affords many other instances.

And in the course of another hundred years, this state of things had so far developed that it was necessary for Justinian to prohibit (Novell. cxliii. c. 6) the clergy from practising in the courts, or discharging the official function of bail or surety: "Sed neque procuratorem litis, aut fidejussorem pro talibus causis episcopum, aut alium clericum, cujuslibet gradus, aut monachum proprio nomine, aut ecclesiæ, aut monasterii sinimus;" and the reason assigned is that they would be thereby hindered in their sacred ministry. In earlier times, the apostolic canons (can. 6) had briefly forbidden bishop, priest, or deacon, to undertake any secular cares, on pain of deposition. The Theodosian code has many provisions against the oppressions practised by those holding legal offices; excessive and illegal exactions, maintenance for themselves while on their circuits, and such like, which do not immediately concern us here.

The quotation given above from the Novellæ of Justinian shews that a need was actually experienced by churches and religious houses for the aid of men learned in the law in the management of their property and the defence of suits at law. The need grew with the growth of ecclesiastical possessions; and a tendency shewed itself among the clergy and monasteries even in the West, to find the men required out of the members of their own body, in spite of the canonical prohibitions, which seem to have been in a great degree arbitrary from the first, or which at best rested on a tradition descending from the period of the persecutions. Pope Gelasius (492-496) admitted these officers to the minor orders: "Continuo Lector, aut Notarius, aut certe Defensor effectus, post tres menses existat Acolythus." The formula with which the defensores were admitted is curious: "Si nulli conditioni vel corpori teneris obnoxius, nec fuisti clericus alterius civitatis, aut in nullo canonum obviant statuta, officium Ecclesiæ Defensorum accipias," &c. We may, perhaps, conclude from a letter of pope Gregory the Great (590-604) that the notaries of the church of Rome were usually subdeacons (lib. vii. Ep. 17).

But by the time we come to the latter part of the 7th century, we find that these legal offices were for the most part in the hands of laymen, at all events in Gaul. The second council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) had a canon forbidding lawyers to prosecute suits on the Lord's Day, under pain of being disbarred (can. 1). And we find among the Decreta of pope Eugenius II. (A.D. 824) one forbidding "advocati," evidently laymen, to usurp or seize by force any recompense beyond what they were entitled to by ancient right and custom. [S. J. E.]

LAY BAPTISM. [BAPTISM, § 80, I. 167; LAITY, § 3.]

LAY COMMUNION. Offences which in a layman were punished by ἀφορισμός, segregation or suspension of the right to communicate, were in the clergy punished by reduction to "lay communion." That is to say, they were reduced to the condition of laymen, deprived of office, and forbidden to exercise their clerical functions. When a clerk was said to be denied lay communion, it meant that he was excommunicated as well as deprived. As two erroneous opinions have been maintained respecting lay communion, one that it meant communion in one kind, the other that it was reception of the sacrament with the laity, i.e. without the bema or the chancel, it is desirable to illustrate the subject by an ample chain of testimony. The 15th Apostolical canon orders that any clergyman staying in another diocese against the will of his own bishop, shall not be allowed to celebrate, "but may nevertheless communicate there as a layman." By the 62nd, a clerk who had denied Christ, or his own office, in a time of persecution, was "after penance to be received as a layman." Cornelius of Rome writing to Fabius of Antioch, about 251, says of one of the bishops who had consecrated Novatian, but afterwards confessed his fault, "All the people present entreating for him, we communicated with him as a layman" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 43). When Rufinus translates this, about the year 490, he says, "He was received into lay communion," that phrase having sprung up in the interval. Cyprian, writing in 252, says of Trophimus, who is supposed to be the bishop mentioned by Cornelius, "He was so admitted that he communicates as a layman" (Epist. 55 ad Anton.). Two years later the same father says that Basilides, another offending bishop, on his repentance, "thought himself sufficiently happy, if it were granted him to communicate even as a layman" (Ep. 67 ad Felicem, &c.). Again, in a letter to Stephen of Rome, A.D. 256, St. Cyprian declares that it had been decided at Carthage "by consent and common authority" that presbyters and deacons, who had fallen into heresy or schism, should "on their return be received on this condition, that they should communicate as laymen" (Epist. 72 ad Steph.). There is extant an account of a council held in that city in the same year, at which a bishop delivered it as his opinion, that "all schismatics and heretics who had turned to the church should be rebaptized, but that those who seemed to have been ordained should also be received among the laity" (sent. 4). The council of Elvira, A.D. 305, orders that a deacon who had committed a great crime before ordination, and did not come forward as his own accuser, should be five years in penance, and then "receive lay communion" (can. 76). This is the earliest instance of the use of that expression. At the council convened at Cologne to consider the case of the Arian bishop of that city, one of the bishops present expressed himself thus: "Because Euphrates denies that Christ is God, I agree that he cannot be a bishop, who ought not to receive even lay communion" (Synod. Agripp. sent. 2). This council is assigned with some doubt to the year 346. We may observe that in the last two instances there is a probable reference to the Eucharist, the reception of which was the chief privilege and sign of communion in the other sense. In 347 the council of Sardica decreed that if two bishops whom it deposed "asked for lay communion, it should not be denied them" (can. 19). St. Athanasius, writing in 349 or the year following, says that it was "notorious, and a thing beyond doubt with every one, that Colluthus (who had affected the title and performed the acts of a bishop) had died a presbyter, and that every ordination by him had been annulled, and all ordained by him in the schism had been made laymen, and so came to synaxis" (Apol. contra Arianos). St. Basil A.D. 370: "Those clerks who sin a sin unto death are deposed from their order, but not kept from the communion of laymen. For thou shalt not punish the same offence twice" (ad Amphiloch. c. 32). Siricius of Rome, A.D. 385: "Let any clerk who shall have married either a widow, or at all events a second wife, be at once stripped of every privilege of ecclesiastical dignity, lay communion only being conceded to him" (Epist. ad Himer. c. 11). At a general African council assembled at Hippo in 393, it was decreed that the Donatist clergy should on their return to the church be "received into the number of the laity" (can. 41). The council of Toledo, A.D. 400 (can. 4) decreed that a subdeacon who married for the third time should, after suspension from communion for two years, "being reconciled by penance, communicate among laymen." A Roman council under Felix, A.D. 487, of bishops who had been rebaptized among heretics: "It will be proper that they lie under penance (should they repent) to the last day of their life; and that they be not on any account present at the prayers, not of the faithful only, but even of the catechumens, to whom lay communion only is to be restored at their death" (can. 2). The council of Agde, in France, A.D. 506, of clergymen guilty of crime: "Deposed from the honour of office let such an one be thrust into a monastery, and there let him receive lay communion only as long as he lives" (can. 50). The council of Lerida, in Spain, A.D. 524, of clergymen who, after professing repentance, had fallen again into gross sin: "Let them not only be deprived of the dignity of office, but not even receive the holy communion, except when dying" (can. 5). Here the sacrament is distinctly meant, by the reception of which they might have been consigned to "lay communion" in its true and proper sense. The council of Orleans, A.D. 538, orders that any clerk, from a subdeacon upwards, who shall cohabit with his wife, be "deposed from office according to the decrees of former canons, and be content with lay communion" (can. 2). By two other canons of this council, the offenders are to be reduced to lay communion, but that phrase is not employed. In one case, "deposed from office, communion being granted to him, he is to be thrust into a monastery for the whole period of his life" (can. 7); in the other, "communion being granted to him, he is to be degraded from his order" (can. 26). That "lay communion" was used as a punishment to the end of our period and later appears from the following chapter out of the 6th book of the Capitularies of the French Kings collected by Benedict the deacon, A.D. 845: "If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or subdeacon shall go to the war, and put on warlike arms for fighting, let him be deposed from every office, so that he have not even lay communion" (c. lxi. Comp. Canones, Isaac Episc. Lingon. tit. xi. c. x.).

From the foregoing extracts it will be inferred that the expression "lay communion" had generally no immediate reference to the reception of the Eucharist. It merely denoted the whole position of a layman in full communion with the church. But as that sacrament was only given to persons in full communion with the church, it came to the same thing whether a deposed clerk were said to be allowed lay communion, or to receive the sacrament of the holy communion. One who passed out of penance into lay communion would of course be formally absolved by the bishop, before he could receive the sacrament; but there is no reason to believe that any form of admission was generally employed, when a disqualified clerk passed, without performing penance, into the position of a lay communicant. There appears, however, to have been one exception in the church of Rome, if we may trust to an Epistle ascribed to Innocent I., about 404, but believed on good grounds to be spurious: "It is the law of our church to grant lay communion only to those who come over from the heretics (who however have been baptized among them) by the imposition of hands" (Ep. ad Epist. Maced. c. 4).

A criminal clerk fell into lay communion by the application of a principle laid down by many councils and writers; viz. that one who had been under public penance was incapable of orders. Thus St. Augustine: "It hath been most strictly decreed that after penance performed for crime liable to condemnation no one should be a clergyman" (Epist. 185, ad Bonif. c. x. § 45). [See PENITENCE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

Heretics returning to the church were always subjected to this discipline. St. Augustine represents the Donatists arguing thus: "If, say they, it behoves that we do penance for having been out of the church, and against the church, that we may be capable of salvation, how is it that we remain clerks or even bishops after that penance?" (Ibid. § 44). Replying to this, St. Augustine says in effect that their recognition was not good in itself for the church, but was permitted in order to end a worse evil, the continuance of the schism. When the Nicene council, A.D. 325, admitted the Novatian clergy to communion, it imposed no penance, and even allowed them to retain their rank and exercise their functions, if they live in places where there was room for it (can. 8). When Cornelius of Rome, 251, received the Novatian presbyter Maximus to communion, he also permitted him to continue in his office (Epist. 49, inter Epp. Cypr.).

II. There was another punishment for offending clerks, of which we read in a few canons under the name of communio peregrina, the communion of travellers, or, as it has been less properly rendered, of strangers. The 3rd canon of Riez, A.D. 439, directs that a schismatical bishop shall on his return to the church either be "encouraged by the title of chorepiscopus, as the 8th canon of Nicaea speaks, or by peregrine communion, as they say." The council of Agde orders that contumacious and neglectful clerks shall have "peregrine communion assigned to them, but so that when penance shall have corrected them, they may be again enrolled and reassume their order and dignity" (can. 2). Here we observe in passing that the penitential of which this canon speaks must be repentance or private penance; because, as we have seen, no one could exercise any clerical function who had ever been subject to public penance. The same council says: "If any clerk shall have stolen from a church, let peregrine communion be assigned to him" (can. 5). The 16th canon of Lerida directs that a clerk who, on the death of his bishop, had stolen anything from his house, or fraudulently concealed anything, shall be condemned with the longer anathema, as guilty of sacrilege, and that the communion of travellers be hardly granted to him." The 2nd and 5th canons of Agde appear in the code of Charlemagne and his successors compiled by Angersisus and Benedict in the 9th century (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 1075, 1094, 1225).

Peregrine communion has been supposed by several writers to be identical with lay communion. That they differed, and how, will appear from the following considerations. (1.) There would otherwise be no propriety in the name, travellers having no more to do with lay communion than residents. (2.) The council of Agde in one canon (50) imposes lay communion on clerks guilty of capital offences, forgery, and false witness: while others inflict peregrine communion on contumacy (c. 2) and theft from a church (c. 5). From this we infer that the latter penalty was something less severe than the former. (3.) Again, the 2nd canon of Agde shows that a clerk reduced to peregrine communion might be restored; whereas we have seen that lay communion was for life. (4.) The name suggests the nature of the punishment. It appears to intimate that the clerk on whom it was inflicted was placed in the position of a traveller who came to a strange church without bringing letters of communion. [See KOINONIKON.] Such a visitor was admissible to the less sacred offices of religion, but not permitted to receive the Eucharist until a letter, vouching for him, arrived from his own bishop. Hence we see that peregrine communion involved abstinence from the sacrament for a time, which lay communion did not. [W. E. S.]

LAZARUS (1). In Ethiopia his first death is commemorated March 13, his resurrection March 16, his second rest, in Cyprus, of which he was bishop, May 22. From Citium in Cyprus his relics were brought to Constantinople, Oct. 17, A.D. 890, by Leo the Wise (Tillem. ii. 36). Before that time he had no fixed day among the Greeks, unless he be meant by Lycarion, Feb. 8 (Menol. Basil.), but was celebrated on the vigil of Palm Sunday (Tillem. ii. 37). At Rome in the 7th century he was commemorated with Martha only, Dec. 17—a custom seemingly taken from their convent near Bethany (Mart. Rom.; Usuard).

LAZARUS (IN ART). The Resurrection of Lazarus is naturally a subject very frequently represented in Christian Art. We find it in catacombs, churches, and cemeteries, in paintings, sculptures, and mosaics, on simple slabs, and on sarcophagi (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. 97). In some cases, where no such painting, mosaic, and sculpture exists, either outside or inside the tomb we find small statues of Lazarus, in metal or ivory, affixed to the exterior. In early representations of this great event, Lazarus appears as a small mummy-like figure swathed in bandages, the head is bound with a napkin, which surrounds the face, leaving it uncovered (Buonarroti, l'etri, tab. vii. 1). The Lord stands before this figure, which is placed upright at the entrance to a small temple, and in most instances He touches it with a rod. Sometimes He extends His right hand, whilst in the left He holds a half-opened volume (Bottari, tab. xxviii.-xlii. etc.). In some examples the right hand is free, and raised in the act of benediction according to the Latin form (Airinghi, ii. 121), sometimes His hand is laid upon the head of Lazarus (id. ii. 183). An example in the cemetery of Callixtus (id. i. 565) shews us an exact representation of a chrysalis instead of the swathed figure; possibly allusion to the resurrection may be here intended. On some Gallican sarcophagi, Lazarus appears extended on the ground, no tomb being visible, as in an example in the "Musée Lapidaire" of Lyons (No. 764; Millin, Midi de la France, Atlas, pl. lxxv.). On glass cups, where the greater portion of the design is, as usual, in gold, the graveclothes are in silver (Buonarroti, vii. 2; Perret, iv. pl. xxxii. 97). Disregarding the sacred text, we find some artists giving folding-doors to the tomb of Lazarus (Buonarroti, vii.

3), though it was in fact closed with a stone. Sometimes it is hewn out of the natural rock, without any attempt at architecture (Airinghi, ii. 331), and shrubs are placed upon the two steps at the entrance.

Some artists, who probably had but a slight acquaintance with Jewish customs, have placed the body of Lazarus in a sarcophagus (Bottari, tab. lxxix.), adorned with lions' heads, and even supported by sphinxes, subjects of very rare occurrence in early Christian Art (ib. tab. cxci.iii.). The diminutive, even infantine, proportions of the body of Lazarus, as represented by ancient artists, cannot fail to excite attention. It may be that the beginning of a new life is thus symbolized; but more probably this is only an instance of a custom frequent in other representations of the Lord's miracles, of making the object of the miracle small in comparison with the Lord Himself [BLIND, HEALING OF, I. 241]. A curious fresco in the cemetery of Rennes (Airinghi, ii. 329), shews the swathed figure standing on the flat without any support, and without the usual temple. In paintings and on glass [GLASS, I. 730], the two essential figures—the Lord and Lazarus—are alone represented. A fragment of a mosaic given by Marchi (Monum. tab. xlvii.) furnishes perhaps the only exception to this rule. In this, a female figure, presumably one of the sisters of Lazarus, kneels at the feet of the Lord, and extends her hands towards him.

Lazarus. From Martigny.

This is of much more frequent occurrence in the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi. These are of more recent date, and always complete the scene with the figures of Martha and Mary (Airinghi, i. 335), or at least the latter, prostrate or kneeling, at the feet of the Saviour (ib. i. 323, etc.), or sometimes devoutly kissing his hand (ib. i. 423). A curious sepulchral stone, unfortunately broken, shews two hands behind the Lord, all that remains of a figure, probably that of Mary, which formerly stood there (Perret, iv. 13). Sometimes the scene is completed and enlarged by the figures of two or more disciples, towards whom the Lord turns as if to draw their attention to the miracle (Airinghi, i. 427).

The Christian artists of these early times frequently connect Old and New Testament subjects, between which any real or fancied analogy is traceable. Thus, in many instances, particularly on sarcophagi, we have Moses striking the rock, introduced as a pendant to the resurrection of Lazarus. We even find the two subjects united, as in the fresco of an arcosolium given by Airinghi (ii. 123). In another fresco in the cemetery of Rennes, the figures of the Lord and Moses are nearly identical in dress, in attitude, and even in countenance (ib. 329). Even on simple sepulchral slabs we find the two subjects associated in a similar manner (Perret, v. pl. lxiii. 29).

The tomb of Lazarus was guarded with religious care by the faithful, and visited by them with the other sacred and memorable places in Palestine (Jerome, Epist. ii.). We learn from Jerome also (De Loc. Heb. s. v. Bethania) that a church was built upon the site. This is also mentioned by Bede, but it seems certain that there was no church there in the time of Constantine, as the itinerary of Jerusalem made in that emperor's reign contains no allusion to it. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.)

LECTERN (lectorium, lectoria). A standing desk in a church, from which certain portions of service were read. It appears to have been of later introduction than the Ambo [AMBO], and to have differed from that by being placed in the centre of the choir instead of at the side. Lectoria are very frequently mentioned in the "liber pontificalis" of Anastasius among the gifts made by the popes to the basilicas. They are described as being of large size, often made of, or coated with, the precious metals, and richly moulded and embossed. They were usually provided with candelabra (cerostata) standing on either side, lighted on Sundays and festivals (Anastas. pp. 397, 419, 546). Leo III. (A.D. 795, 816) gave a lectorium "of purest silver of wondrous size" with candelabra to St. Peter's (Anastas. p. 399). Leo IV. (A.D. 847–855) also gave to the same basilica one of silver, chased, standing on four feet, surmounted by a lion's head, with four candelabra plated with silver (ib. 552). St. Eligius is stated to have plated a lectorium with gold (Audoenus, Vit. S. Elig. apud Ducange). Hariulphus (apud Ducange) speaks also of lectoria constructed of marble, silver and gold.

The cloth that covered a lectorium was termed lectorinus. (Ann. l. Mediolan. apud Muratori, tom. xvi. col. 810.) [E. V.]

LECTION (Lectio; ἁγύωσις; Leçon; Eng. Lesson). The words ἁγύωσις and Lectio may be taken in a wider sense to include all readings which formed part of Divine Service. [EPISTLE; GOSPEL; PROPHECY.] The word Lection is here however taken in a narrower sense, to denote the readings of selected passages during the ordinary daily office. Such readings were of three kinds.

1. Passages of Holy Scripture.

2. Passages from comments or homilies of the Fathers.

3. Acts of Martyrs or other saints.

The readings from Holy Scripture, of which Justin Martyr speaks, were connected with the administration of the Eucharist, and are therefore to be regarded rather as corresponding to the Epistle, Gospel, and Prophecy of later times, than to the lections with which we are now concerned. It is not until a later date that we find distinct indications of the mingling of lections with Psalmody, as in the Hour-Offices of the present day.

There are in the Eastern Daily Offices no lections from Scripture. The scheme of service given in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57-62) contains none, and even to this day the ordinary Greek offices are entirely devoid of them. In the morning office on Sundays and Festivals the Gospel is read. That lections from Scripture were in use in the province or district represented at the council of Laodicea, in the fourth century, we have distinct evidence in the canon quoted below, though ultimately another system prevailed in the East generally. This system was that of the intermixture of ODES with psalms; and Archdeacon Freeman regards these odes as the equivalents of the Western lections, which, with their long responsories, came to be in fact, "a long and elaborate piece of music interrupted at intervals by a very brief recitative out of Holy Scripture" (Divine Service, i. 70, 125, 345). We may perhaps regard this absence of lections from the Eastern offices as an indication of their connection with the synagogue, where Moses appears to have been read "every Sabbath day" only.

The council of Laodicea, about A.D. 360, enjoined (c. 17) that in the assemblies for worship (συνάξεις) the psalms should not be said in continuous series, but that between each psalm there should be a lection (ἁγύωσις); and this only from Canonical Scripture [CANONICAL BOOKS, I. 279]. At a somewhat later date, John Cassian tells us (De Coenob. Inst. ii. 4) that throughout all Egypt the custom was to divide the psalms into groups of twelve; after the saying of each twelve there followed two lections, of the Old and the New Testament. This very ancient custom is observed (he says) the more religiously in all the monasteries of that district, because it was reputed to be no invention of man, but to have been brought from heaven by an angel. The third council of Carthage (c. 47) forbade anything but canonical Scripture to be read in churches. St. Augustine also (Epist. 64, c. 3) speaks of the danger of reading in the church other writings than those contained in the canon received by the church. Isidore of Seville (Regula, c. 7) says that in the office the lections were taken generally from the Old and New Testament, but on Saturdays and Sundays from the New only.

The Rule of Caesarius ad Monachos (c. 20) prescribes that in vigils from the month of October to Easter there should be two Nocturns and three "Missae" [i.e. lections, whether from the Bible or from Passions]; also (c. 25) that on every Sabbath, every Lord's day, and every Festival, there should be twelve psalms, three antiphons, and three lections; one from the Prophets, one from the Apostle, and a third from the Gospel. The Rule of Aurelian (Migne, Patrol. vol. 68, p. 304) orders in the nocturns on ordinary days two lections of the Apostle or the Prophets, and Capitulum in Paschal nocturns three, from the Acts, the Apocalypse, and the Gospels. It also (c. 14) enjoins that the ordinary course of the lections be interrupted and proper lections substituted, on festivals.

St. Benedict's Rule (c. 9) prescribes that in the winter half of the year, when the long nights permitted prolonged nocturns, after the saying of six psalms and the abbat's benediction, while all sat on benches there should be read in turns by the brothers from the book on the lectern three lections, with a responsory at the end of each, the last responsory followed by a Gloria. These lections are to be not only from the Old and New Testament, but also from the expositions of Scripture by orthodox doctors and Catholic Fathers of the highest repute (nominatissimis). After these three lections come the remaining six psalms, with Alleluia; then the lection of the Apostle (i.e. the Capitulum) said by heart, the verse and the Kyrie Eleison. Who are to be reckoned "nominatissimi doctores" is matter of some doubt; some only reckon Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory to belong to this class; others add such writers as Basil, Hilary, John Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, and Bede. See the note on c. 9 in the Regula Commentata (Migne, Patrol. vol. 66, p. 272).

We learn from the Miracula S. Stephani (ii. 2; in Martene, iv. v. 2) that a letter of bishop Severus was read after the canonical lections. And it appears from a letter of Gregory the Great (Epist. x. 22) that in some cases at least comments of distinguished doctors were read in his time; for he disapproved the conduct of Marinius, bishop of Ravenna, who had ordered his (Gregory's) comments on the Book of Job to be read at vigils; "bid him," he writes to John the sub-deacon, "cause comments on the Psalms to be read at vigils, as being especially adapted to promote good dispositions among the seculars; for while I am yet in the flesh, I will not have anything which I may chance to have written published at once to all men." From which it appears that there was no objection to the reading of comments on Scripture in the offices—which, indeed, seems to have been a recognised practice—but only to reading comments of the then living pope.

In the life of St. Stephen the younger, A.D. 767 (Migne, Patrol. Ser. Græc. vol. 100, p. 410), we read that the saint while yet a boy, instead of sitting down, as was the custom during the reading of the lections, stood close to the chancel rails and listened to the reader, and so learned to repeat what was read, whether a martyrdom, or a life, or a sermon of some pious Father, especially St. John Chrysostom.

The council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 15, Hadan and Stubbs, iii. 367), forbids the clergy to sing or read in their offices anything not sanctioned by common usage; that is, they are to use only what is sanctioned by Holy Scripture and what the practice of the Roman church permits (tantum quod ex S. Scripturarum auctoritate descendit et quod Romanae Ecclesiae usus permisit). This canon shews that lections were taken not only from Holy Scripture, but from other books sanctioned by the Roman church.

In the lections used in the daily office, which were not wholly scriptural, many defects and errors had been introduced before the eighth century, especially in the Gallican lectionaries. This led Charlemagne, in a Constitutio de Emendatione Librorum et Officiorum Ecclesiasticorum of the year 788 (Baluze, Capitul. i. 203), to make the following provision for their amendment: "Whereas we have found many of the lections compiled, with however good intent, for use in the nocturnal office, unfit for their purpose, as having no name of an author appended and being full of innumerable blunders; we do not allow in our days inharmonious solecisms to be heard in divine lections in the sacred offices, and have given our mind to bring the same lections into a better way. And we laid the perfecting of that work upon Paul the deacon, one of our household, namely, that carefully going through the sayings of the Catholic Fathers, he might (as it were) gather certain flowers out of their exquisite meads, and weave those which are most profitable into one garland. Who, desiring to yield devoted obedience to our Highness, after reading through the tracts and sermons of divers of the Catholic Fathers and choosing the best, has presented to us in two volumes a series of lections, cleared of errors, suitable for each festival throughout the circle of the year. Of all which pondering the text with our sagacity, we sanction the same volumes with our authority, and deliver over to you, religious readers, to read in the churches of Christ."

That the practice of reading Acts of Martyrs on their festivals had begun before the time of St. Augustine is evident from a sermon of his on St. Stephen (Sermo 315, c. 1), in which he lays stress on the fact that the passion of the first martyr was contained in a canonical book, while acts of other martyrs to be recited at their commemorations could scarcely be found at all. And again he says (Sermo 273, c. 2), "You heard the questions of the persecutors and the answers of the confessors when the passion of the saints was read." Nor was this a custom peculiar to Africa. Various old monastic rules (e.g. Aurelian de Ordine Psallendi, Migne's Patrol. tom. 68, p. 396) prove that the reading of lives of the saints or acts of martyrs in the offices was also a custom of the Gallican church. A lectionary of Luxeuil, which Martene believed to be of the seventh or eighth century, contains lections from the acts of SS. Juliana and Basilica. Avitus of Vienne († 523) in a fragment of a homily (Fr. vi.; Migne, Patrol. 59, p. 297) mentions that the passion of the martyrs of Agaune was read "according to custom"; and Caesarius of Arles (Sermo 300 in Augustine's Works, v. v. p. 2319, Migne) speaks of the long readings from passions (passiones prolixae) in the church. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Martyrum, i. 86) states that the Passion of Polycarp was publicly read.

In the church of Lyons it seems that none but Scripture lessons were anciently read, even on the vigil of a saint. The bishops who were present at the Collatio Episcoporum before king Gundebald in the year 499 (D'Achery, Spicilegium, iii. 304 ff. Paris, 1723), unanimously determined to hold vigil at the tomb of St. Justus, whose festival happened to occur at that time. In this office we find that the lections were wholly from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament; no acts of St. Justus were read even in the vigil of his own festival. Nor was the church of Rome by any means ready to admit Acts of Martyrs into the public offices. The Decretal of Gelasius I. (Gratian Decret. Dist. xv. c. 3, § 17)^a states that such acts are, in accordance with ancient custom, not read in the Roman church, out of caution, for in many cases the names of the writers are unknown, and they are sometimes written by infidels or unskilful persons in a manner altogether unworthy of the subject. And even at a comparatively late date Acts of Martyrs seem to have been excluded from the offices in some districts, for Martene (iv. v. 4) states that in many MS. lectionaries of the Cistercian order in Maine, about five hundred years old in his time (i.e. so late as the twelfth century), no lections are found, but passages of Scripture and homilies of the Fathers.

And the same distrust of the numerous acts of martyrs which were current in the church, appears in the sixty-third canon of the Trullan Council, at the end of the seventh century. "We decree," runs the canon, "that Martyrologies falsely composed by enemies of the truth, with the view of dishonouring the martyrs of Christ, and bringing those who hear them into unbelief, should not be published in the churches, but delivered to the fire; and we anathematize those who receive them or give heed to them as true." In the same spirit pope Hadrian writes (Epist. ad Car. Magn.): "Lives of the Fathers not resting on authority (sine probabilibus auctoribus) are not read in the church. Those which bear the names of orthodox writers are both received and read. For the canons of the church sanction the reading of the Passions of the Martyrs in the church when their anniversaries are celebrated."

In the time of St. Augustine, if not earlier, the practice had established itself of assigning certain lections to certain days; these, says the saint in the opening of his exposition of the first epistle of St. John, were so fixed in their courses that no others could be read. To the same effect, the first [Mansi's second] council of Braga [circ. A.D. 563], decreed (c. 2) that in the vigils or "missae"^b of festivals, all [the clergy of the province] should read the same and not different lections.

^a The copies of this document vary greatly, and it is difficult to say how much is interpolated.

^b It must be borne in mind that this word was not limited to altar-offices. [MISSA.]

It does not appear however, even when certain lections were assigned to certain days, that their extent was limited in the same exact manner as in modern Breviaries; the reader continued to read the passage of Scripture, or of a Father, or the Passion, as the case might be, until the chief person in the choir signed to him to stop. A common practice in monastic churches was for the presiding brother to clap his hands; in the church of St. Martin, at Tours, he called out "fac finem," words which Martene (iv. v. 6) found written at the end of the lections in an old lectionary. Charles the Great, when he was present at the office, used to stop the reader by some kind of cough or grunt (sono gutturis); and in a church where the emperor was present it was useless to "get up" a portion beforehand; every one in the choir had to be prepared to read, if called upon, any portion of the lections of the day (De Eccl. Cura Car. Mag., quoted by Martene, iv. v. 6). In the Roman church it was an ancient custom for the deacons to sing the first words of Tu autem Domine at the end of lections (Ordines Rom. pp. 123 and 174). It was not uncommon for the end of the lections to be marked beforehand in the book with a piece of wax, such as Martene (u.s.) says that he has often seen in ancient lectionaries still adhering to the spot.

As to the extent of each lection it is ordered in the rule of Aurelian that three or four pages be read, according as the copy used was written in larger or smaller characters.

The practice of reading a certain series of passages in the offices having once grown up, it was natural that books should be formed containing the requisite extracts. This took place in fact at a comparatively early period. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. iv. 2) mentions among the good deeds of Claudian († 470), brother of Mamertus of Vienne, that he drew up a lectionary:

"Hic solemnibus annis paravit Quae quo tempore lecta continent."

Gennadius (De Scriptt. Eccl. c. 79) says of Musaeus, a Gallican writer contemporary with Claudian, that he extracted from Holy Scripture the lections for the festivals of the whole year, with responsories and capitula adapted to the lections and the season.

The Liber Pontificalis (c. 218, p. 1055, Migne) relates of pope Zacharias († 752) that he placed in charge of the armarius or librarian of St. Peter's church at Rome all the codices belonging to his own house, which are read throughout the year at matins (qui in circulo anni leguntur ad matutinum). It is, however, not quite clear in this case whether the books in question were lectionaries, or whether they were not rather the works from which lections were taken. The work described under INSTRUCTION (I. 862) was a lectionary, though of limited extent.

Lections were generally said not by persons in major orders, but by sub-deacons or persons in minor orders. Gregory the Great (Epist. iv. 44; App. n. 5, p. 1334, Migne) laid down on this point that the saying of Psalms and other lections was to be performed by sub-deacons, or, in case of necessity, by yet lower orders; a decree which seems to exclude mere laymen from this office altogether. To the same effect the second [third] council of Braga (c. 45) decreed that no one should act as singer or reader in the choir without regular ordination to such office (non liceat in pulpito psallere aut legere nisi qui a presbytero [al. episcopo] lectores sunt ordinati; compare Conc. Laod. c. 15). The second Council of Nicaea also (c. 14) censures the practice of young persons, who had received no imposition of hands from the bishop, reading on the ambo, whether in monastic or other churches. The first [second] Council of Braga (c. 11) ordered that readers should not perform their office in the church in their secular dress. [LAITY, II. 914.]

Silence was proclaimed before a lection. "What trouble is there," says St. Ambrose (Enarr. in Ps. i. (c. 9, p. 741), "to obtain silence in the church when lections are read!" And it was usual for the bishop or the principal person present in choir to give his benediction and sign to the reader to begin. The reader coming in with his book, says Gregory of Tours (De Mirac. S. Martini, i. 5), was not allowed to begin to read until the saint [Ambrose] gave him permission by a nod. This, however, relates to an altar-lection.

It is evident from several passages quoted above that the lections were read on the ambo or pulpitum, by which we are to understand in many cases not merely a pulpit or lectern, but the whole of the raised stage or foot-pace in a church on which the choir was stationed. The church of the monastery of Bec had, in Martene's time (IV. v. 11), at the top of the steps of the ambo a pulpit for lections.

For the congregation to sit during the reading of lections was regarded in early times as a concession to infirmity; "when long Passions or other lessons are read," says Caesarius of Arles (Serm. 300, u.s.), "let those who are unable to stand, humbly sit in silence, and with attentive ears listen to what is read." Sitting afterwards became the usual posture. St. Benedict in his rule (c. 9) expressly permitted the brothers to sit during lections; and at a later period (about 1060) Peter Damian (Opusc. 39) speaks of sitting during lections as a universal custom of his time.

With the reading of lections was connected from ancient times the use of RESPONSORIES (see the article).

LECTIONARY.—I. Proofs of early Use.—

Those who refer the use of a formal table of stated lessons taken from Holy Scripture to the Church of the 3rd century [Vol. I. p. 622] can plead in favour of their opinion that, before the close of the 4th century, such a practice was both universal and regarded as already ancient. Chrysostom devotes a whole homily to explain the reason why the Acts of the Apostles are publicly read throughout the festal season between Easter-day and Whitsun-day, and elsewhere states that the rule of the fathers (τῶν πατέρων ὁ νόμος) directs that book to be laid aside after Pentecost. Even such a purely arbitrary arrangement as the reading of the book of Genesis in Lent had become so inveterate in his time (ταῦτα γὰρ ἡμῖν ἀνεγνώσθη σήμερον), that after having gone through the first part of that book in his discourses at Constantinople in the Lent of A.D. 400, he defers the remainder until the season came round again the following year: the offering up of Isaac alone, as Augustine tells us, "ideo in ordine suo, diebus quadragesimae, non recitatur," as being reserved for the services of Holy Week. Chrysostom also advises his hearers to read at home during the week-days such Saturday and Sunday lessons as they knew would be expounded in course on the next Lord's day, and Bingham (Antiquities, book xiv. ch. iii. s.3) adds to these well-known passages others to the same purport gathered from Origen, Augustine, and Ambrose, vouching for the custom (de more) of reading Job and Jonah during the Holy Week. Cyril of Jerusalem also (A.D. 348), having to speak of the Ascension, remarks that on the previous day, being a Sunday (τῇ χθὲς ἡμέρᾳ κατὰ τὴν κυριακὴν), that event had formed the subject of the appointed lesson (ἐν τῇ συνάξει τῆς τῶν ἀναγνωσμάτων ἀκολουθίας). Since in all these scattered notices we meet with nothing to contradict, but everything to correspond with the established order of later times, Dean Burgon is fully justified in his conclusion that, "although there happens to be extant neither Synaxarium (i.e. Table of proper lessons of the Greek Church), nor Evangelistarium (i.e. Book containing the ecclesiastical lections in extenso), of higher antiquity than the 8th century,—yet that the scheme itself, as exhibited by those monuments—certainly in every essential particular—is older than any known Greek manuscript which contains it by at least four, in fact by full five hundred years" (Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark, p. 195). Yet even the oldest Greek manuscripts (for to the Greek calendar of lessons we are for the present confining ourselves) bear distinct traces of having been used for liturgical purposes. Without insisting upon more doubtful instances, it is thus that we can best explain the omission of the confessedly genuine verses (Luke xxii. 43, 44) from four of our chief uncial MSS. (A, B, R, T) of the 4th and 5th centuries; the sacred words not having been publicly read in their proper place, but after Matth. xxvi. 40, as a part of the service for the vigil of Good Friday, where they occur in every extant lectionary, and even in one cursive copy of the Gospels (Cod. 69), which, though itself as late as the 14th century, is known to follow a very ancient text. The double insertion of the noble doxology, Rom. xvi. 25–27, after ch. xiv., as well as in its proper place at the end of the epistle, by the Codex Alexandrinus of the 5th century, is best accounted for by its being so set in lectionaries as part of the proper lesson for the Saturday before Quinquagesima. Codex Bezae (D), again, of about the 5th century, prefixes to Luke xvi. 19 the formula εἶπεν δὲ καὶ ἑτέραν παραβολήν, which is the liturgical introduction to the Gospel for the 5th Sunday of St. Luke. Another of Cod. D's prefixes, καὶ εἶπεν τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, John xiv. 1, is almost identical with that in the English Prayer Book for St. Philip and St. James's Day. But the strongest case of all is perhaps Mark xiv. 41, where after ἀπέχει is read in Cod. D and a few of later date (e.g. Cod. 69), the senseless interpolation τὸ τέλος or τέλος, "the end," which manifestly came into the text from the margin of ver. 42, where it indicates in the usual manner the close of the Gospel for the third day of the carnival week. Since in this last case the patent transcriptural error is met with also in the Peshito Syriac, and in some forms of the Old Latin version, which together will probably carry us back to the 2nd century, it is hard to resist the inference "that the lessons of the Eastern church were settled at a period long anterior to the date of the oldest manuscript of the Gospels extant" (Burgon, p. 226).

II. Greek Liturgical Books.—The earliest known Synaxaria, or tables of ecclesiastical lessons throughout the year, are found in two copies of the Gospels now at Paris, Cod. Cyprius (K) and Campianus (M). These, together with fragments of Menologia, or tables of saints'-day lessons, annexed to them, were published by Scholz at the end of the first volume of his Greek Testament, in 1830. The margins of both these manuscripts, and of their contemporary, Cod. L, also at Paris, all three being of the 8th or 9th century, are covered with liturgical notes either by the original scribe or by a hand of the same period, which indicate, mostly in red ink, the beginnings and ends of the lessons (APXH, TEAOO), the days on which they are to be used, and often the initial words whereby they are to be introduced. After this date quite a majority of manuscripts of the Gospels proper are furnished with marginal notes of this kind, and very many with synaxaria and menologia, full of crabbéd abbreviations and sometimes added in a later age. Perhaps no known evangelistarium, or book containing the ecclesiastical lessons in full, like those English church lectionaries which have recently come into use, can be ascribed with confidence to an earlier period than the 9th century. A fragment at St. Petersburg, described by Tischendorf, contains some Arabic writing decidedly more modern, yet dated A.D. 1011. A noble and complete copy at Parham (No. 18), written at Ciscissa in Cappadocia, bears the date of A.D. 980, and Harl. 5598 in the British Museum is only fifteen years later. A few others, e.g. Cod. Numan. 171, in the Grand Ducal Library at Venice, and Arundel 547 in the British Museum, are probably anterior to the dated copies just mentioned, which, however, we are safest in taking as the groundwork of our conjectural estimates in regard to others which are not dated. Evangelistaria of the 10th and 11th centuries are almost always large folios, written (as was convenient for the purpose they were intended to serve) in bold characters of the uncial form, a fashion which in other books had almost entirely given place to the cursive or running hand. Their material is a coarse thick parchment, quite inferior to the fine vellum employed a few centuries before, though the leaves of a few, such as Parham 18, are still thin, white, and delicate. The lectionaries are almost always written with two columns on a page, and the headings and initial letters are often illuminated in gold and colours. Musical tones, in red ink, above and below the text, must have been designed to guide the reader's voice. Uncial codices of lessons from the Gospels number about seventy, those of the Acts and Epistles are less than ten; but indeed copies of the latter (commonly called the Apostolos or Præapostolos) of any age scarcely amount to eighty, while of those of the Gospels about three hundred survive in various libraries, public and private. Some of the cursive or more recent lectionaries are sumptuously bound, the covers being adorned with enamel and silver gilt ornaments, in rare cases forming single figures or groups, of much artistic merit. Tables of the Greek church lessons were printed at Venice in 1615-24 in two volumes which do not range together (Cambridge Univ. Library, ii. 288), and again, at the same place, in 1851. The following lists, however, are derived from manuscripts which in the menologia differ widely from each other. While the great church festivals are common to them all, different generations and provinces, and even dioceses, had their favourite worthies whose memory they specially cherished; so that the character of the menology (which sometimes formed a considerable, sometimes but a small, portion of a whole lectionary) will help to direct us to discover the district in which the volume itself was written. The lectionaries we have chiefly used for our present purpose, are, in the Gospels, Arundel 547, Parham 18, Harl. 5598 (all described above), Christ's College, Cambridge, F. 1, 8, of the 11th century; Burney 22, in the British Museum, presenting a very remarkable text, with a subscription dated A.D. 1319; Dean Gale's O. iv. 22, of the 12th century, now at Trinity College, Cambridge; but this last contains the full lessons from Easter to Pentecost, with those of the Saturdays and Sundays only (σαββατοκυριακαί) for the rest of the year. Wake 12, of the 11th century, at Christ Church, is not an evangelistarium, but replete with notes. For the Apostolos we have used but one copy, unfortunately imperfect, the week-day lessons of which are unusually full, viz. MS. No. iii. 24 (of about the 12th century) in the library of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. In some service-books will be found a few (in B-C. iii. 42 they are many) lessons taken from either division of the New Testament, which were read in connection with the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom.

III. The Greek Ecclesiastical Year.—The Greek church seasonably begins its ecclesiastical year with the highest of our festivals, being Easter Day (ἡ ἅγια καὶ μεγάλη κυριακὴ τοῦ πάσχα), reckoning the seven weeks onward from Easter week (ἡ διακνήσιμος) and Low Sunday (ἀντί-πασχα) to Whitsun-day (ἡ κυριακὴ τῆς πεντηκοστῆς). The Gospels from St. John (except a few proper lessons) and the Epistles from the Acts run on successively throughout these seven weeks, and evidently form one continuous scheme for every day in each week. Beyond this season, for the rest of the year, the Saturday and Sunday lessons stand apart from those of the five ordinary week days, which indeed seem to have been selected at a later period than the rest. On the morrow of the Pentecost (ἡ ἐπαύριον τῆς πεντηκοστῆς), St. John's Gospel having been exhausted, that of St. Matthew begins, and is read for eleven weeks without interruption, the Sunday after Whitsuntide not being kept as Trinity Sunday, as it has been in the Western church since the 12th century, but as the Greek All Saints' Day. The Greeks commemorate the Council of Nice on the Sunday before Pentecost. On the second day of the eleventh week after Whitsun-day St. Mark's Gospel is taken up, and read from the Monday to the Friday (παρασκευῇ) inclusive, for seven or at least for five weeks, the Saturday and Sunday lessons being still derived from St. Matthew. At this point comes in the difficulty, arising from the yearly variation of Easter Day in the calendar, which the Western church provides against by varying the number of its Sundays after Trinity. By the time that fifteen Sundays have elapsed after Pentecost, the Greek civil new year may have begun (Sept. 1) and with it the new indiction, when the Gospel of St. Luke was opened (ἀρχὴ τῆς ἰνδικτοῦ τοῦ νέου ἔτους, ἡγοῦν τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ Λουκᾶ, Arundel 547, Parham, 18). The ecclesiastical lessons from St. Matthew and St. Mark, however, from the 7th century downwards, would seem to have gone on until after the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, Sept. 14 (which is still used in England to fix our autumnal Ember week), by way of doing special honour to a festival recently instituted. (Δέον γινώσκειν ὅτι ἄρχεται ὁ Λουκᾶς ἀναγινώσκεισθαι ἀπὸ τῆς κυριακῆς μετὰ τὴν ὕψωσιν· τότε γὰρ καὶ ἡ ἰσημερία γίνεται ὁ καλεῖται νέον ἔτος. *H ὅτι ἀπὸ τῆς κγ' τοῦ σептемβρίου ὁ Λουκᾶς ἀναγινώσκειται, Burney 22, p. 191.) From whichever period the reading of St. Luke commenced, it proceeded without any break for eleven weeks, and, varied with the lessons from St. Mark for the five middle days of the week, for five or at least for three weeks more, when, if the Easter of the new year was early, the fast of Lent would be approaching. After reading as many of the lessons from St. Luke as were necessary, that for the seventeenth Sunday of St. Matthew (ch. xv. 21-28), called from its subject the Cana-nites, was always resumed (whether it had been read in its proper place or not), for the Sunday preceding that before the carnival (πρὸ τῆς ἀποκρέω), our Septuagesima, called by the Greeks the Pro-digal, from the subject of its Gospel (Luke xv. 11-32). Then follow the Sunday of the carnival (τῆς ἀποκρέω), our Sexagesima, and that of the Cheese-eater (τῆς τυροφάγου), corresponding to our Quinquagesima. Next come the vigil of the fast of Lent, its six Sundays (the last being τῶν βατῶν, Palm Sunday), and the very full services of the Holy Week, the ecclesiastical year ending of course on Easter Even. Since the whole number of Sundays thus enumerated (even when the Cana-nites is reckoned twice) would amount to but fifty-three, a number which might easily of itself be insufficient to fill up the interval between two consecutive Easter Days, we must bear in mind that the menology supplies lessons for the Sundays before and after Christmas and Sept. 14, and for a Sunday after Epiphany, which could either be added to or substituted for the ordinary Gospels, as occasion required. The system of lessons from the Acts and Epistles is much simpler than that of the Gospels. Except between Easter and Pentecost they are not found at all for common week days, except in a very few lectionaries. The book of Genesis, it will be remembered, was read on such week days during Lent.

N.B.—The Gospel for the Sunday preceding that which the Western church calls Septuagesima is always that of the Canaanites (Matth. xv. 21-28), which would sometimes displace one or two of those immediately preceding, as in the case of our Sunday next before Advent. Two weeks' lessons from the Epistles are also kept in reserve, to be used here if necessary. They are numbered from the weeks after Pentecost, as indeed are all the Epistles in the Greek lectionaries, viz.—

V. Syriac Lectionaries.—A valuable evangelistarium, written in a peculiar dialect of the Syriac language, called for the sake of distinction the Jerusalem Syriac, was first used by Adler in the Vatican (MS. Syr. 19), and has lately been published in full by Count F. Miniscalchi Erezzo (Verona, 1861-64). This book enables us to see that the ordinary lessons of the Syriac church at the period that it bears date (A.D. 1030), and probably long before, were identical with those of the Greek church as described above. In fact the Jerusalem Lectionary differs from the Greek for the portions which it contains little more than the various Greek copies do from each other. It does not supply the ordinary week-day lessons except from Easter to Pentecost and those of the Holy Week: the Menology also, as might have been expected (p. 51), is widely different in the two churches. Modern Syrian manuscripts and editions, however (such as that published by Professor Lee in 1816), are constructed on other principles; and agree with the Greek only on the occasion of such high festivals as hardly admitted a choice in their selection.

VI. The Coptic Lectionary.—For the Coptic, the other great branch of ancient Christianity in the East, we depend for the present mainly on a Coptic and Arabic manuscript, translated by Prebendary Malan in his Original Documents of the Coptic Church, No. IV. (1874), which he believes to agree very well with what is known elsewhere of Il-Cotmarus, the volume of lessons for the whole year. It contains only the Sunday and feast-day Gospels throughout the year, with the appropriate versicles and greetings annexed to each at full length; although we have the express testimony of Cassian (Institut. iii. 2) for the 5th century, that the Egyptians read both Epistle and Gospel every Saturday as well as every Sunday in their public services. The Sundays are arranged according to the months of the Coptic ecclesiastical year, which began August 29. The vigil or eve was always regarded as the commencement of each day. The manuscript being defective, the lessons for the first three Sundays, and some few others, cannot be given.

VII. The National Lectionaries of the Eastern Churches compared.—This Coptic table of Sunday Gospels throughout the year is far ruder and less satisfactory in every way than that of the Greek church, to which, at first sight, it bears a little resemblance. On closer inspection it may be observed that the Gospels for the early morning service, several of which recur three or four times over, are often identical with the Gospels of the Resurrection used periodically by the Greeks at the same hour (p. 57). The Copts also agree with the Greeks in reading St. John's Gospel almost exclusively between Easter and Pentecost, while the appointed Gospels for the Holy Week (including the preceding Saturday), as also for Ascension Day, accord to a degree which cannot be accidental. The same may be said in regard to the services of the great unmovable season of Christmas, which we here subjoin. The Jerusalem Syriac lessons are the same as the Greek. We infer, on the whole, from these partial resemblances in the midst of general diversity, that the lessons for the chief festivals, being in substance the same in all the lectionaries, were settled at an earlier date than those for ordinary occasions.

Thus the Coptic Christians agree with the Greeks in commemorating the Lord's baptism only on Jan. 6, and not the visit of the Magi, which was principally regarded in the Western church [EPIPHANY]. Yet the Gospels relating to the baptism (Matth. iii. 13-17, Luke iii. 23) appear in the old lectionary of the Gallican church, which had early and close communion with the East (p. 60); and Luke iii. 15-23 is still the English second lesson for the morning service.

A comparison of the lessons for the other festivals pertaining to our Lord suggests the same conclusions as those for the Christmas season.

In contrast with these resemblances it is well to note that in the services for the 7th century festival, that of the Elevation of the Cross, which has such influence on the later forms of the Greek lectionaries (p. 52), there is but a single passage in common between the two nations, and that one (John viii. 28-30) too obvious to be overlooked by either.

VIII. Lectionaries of the Western Church.—The tables of lessons we have hitherto examined have little in common with the Epistles and Gospels of the English church, and were evidently constructed on a different principle. The season of Advent, which is purely a Western institution, being regarded as a prelude to the high festival of Christmas, has appropriately opened the ecclesiastical year through western Christendom, at least from the 7th century downwards. The yearly changes rendered necessary by the variation of the Easter season were henceforward made by fixing the proper positions for Advent and Septuagesima Sundays, as in our Book of Common Prayer. The Western lectionaries, however, while they agree with each other in their general character and arrangements, present considerable differences in detail, which well deserve the student's attention. Although the Comes or Lectionary ascribed to St. Jerome by its editor Pamelius (Liturgica, Colon. 1571), and by others [EPISTLE], may not safely be regarded as a work of the 4th century, and is probably three or four centuries later, yet as regards the Epistles and Gospels it corresponds closely with the Roman service-book, whose selection, having been long familiar to Englishmen through the Use of Sarum (circa A.D. 1078), was wisely retained in all important particulars by those who compiled the two Prayer Books of Edward VIth's reign. Besides the Comes, and widely departing from it, exist lectionaries of the Gallican and Spanish churches, the former rendered accessible by the labours of Cardinal Bona (De rebus liturgicis, Paris, 1672), of Thomasius (Liber Sacramentorum, Rome, 1680), and of Mabillon (De liturgia Gallicana, Paris, 1685, &c.) [GOSPELS]. There can be little doubt that the peculiar features of the Gallican service-book were derived from that close intercourse which subsisted between the churches of Asia and of Southern Gaul, commencing with the mission of Pothinus in the middle of the 2nd century. Its variations from the Roman standard attracted the notice of our St. Augustine at the end of the 6th century (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. 27), and held their ground for nearly two centuries later, when Pepin and Charlemagne gradually brought in the Roman missal. The Spanish or Mozarabic liturgy seems originally to have been the same as the Gallican, but in course of time considerable divergences arose between them. It had not to yield to the Roman Use before the end of the 11th century, and its memory was long cherished by reason of the proud national feeling of the Spanish clergy and people (Palmer, Origines Liturgicæ, sect. x.) In this Mozarabic Use from Easter to Pentecost, in the Gallican during Easter week, and in the Comes on the octave of Pentecost, the Apocalypse, which we have not yet met with, is read as a kind of third lesson, and before the Epistle. Again, in Greek lectionaries, portions taken from the Old Testament are of rare occurrence, as in Christ's College Evangelistarium, where passages from the Septuagint version (Isa. iii. 9-13; lii. 13-liv. 1; Jer. xi. 18-xii. 15; Zech. xi. 10-14) are included in the services for the Holy Week. In the Latin books, however, they are found to a far greater extent, nor ought any argument for a more modern date be drawn from their presence in the Comes. St. Ambrose expressly testifies that in his time the book of Jonah was read in the Holy Week, and the first chapter of that prophet is found in the Gallican and the Spanish, as well as in the Comes, as part of the course for Easter Even. The book of Job, on the other hand, is not met with there, although the language of Jerome as well as of Ambrose might lead us to expect it (Bingham, Antiquities, book xiv. ch. iii. 3). Reserving for a separate article [PROPHETS] much further notice of the lessons from the Old Testament (which were chiefly taken from Genesis, the Proverbs, and Isaiah), we subjoin the table of Western Epistles and Gospels for the Sundays and greater feasts throughout the year, according to the three most ancient authorities.

Sunday next before Advent	..	Jer. xxiii. 5-8 (for the Epistle) John vi. 5-14

The Roman service-books do not contain the lessons for the 26th Sunday after Pentecost, though, like the Comes, they appoint Jer. xxiii. 5-8 and John vi. 5-14 for the Sunday next before Advent. The Sarum missal adopts the modern method of reckoning by Sundays after Trinity, and even in the Comes the extra lesson from the Apocalypse, and perhaps the Gospel also, bear upon the mystery now commemorated on the octave of Pentecost. Thus in the Roman use, as in our modern books, the Sundays of the year provided with Epistles and Gospels are fifty-four, in the Comes fifty-five, since the service for the octave of Epiphany could be taken for the first Sunday after Epiphany, if six Sundays should intervene between Jan. 6 and Septuagesima. It also deserves notice that in the Ambrosian liturgy, which has not yet been displaced by the Roman in the province of Milan, as also in the Mozarabic use, there are six Sundays in Advent, which commences on the first Sunday after St. Martin's day (Nov. 11), not on the Sunday nearest to St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30), as in the rest.

X. Menologies, or Calendars of Saints' Days, with their proper Lessons.—The several schemes for ordering the Epistles and Gospels throughout the year, as adopted by the ancient church in its various branches, bear so little resemblance to each other that it seemed advisable to keep the Greek Synaxaria separate from the corresponding tables of the Coptic and Western communions. The menologies, on the other hand, wherein the lesser festivals and saints' day services are arranged according to their respective places in the ecclesiastical year, may very well be comprised in a single table. We select from the mass of such days those which have been widely celebrated or are in any other way characteristic or remarkable. The italic letters, c, g, m, r, s, will suffice to indicate what belongs to the Coptic, Gallican, Mozarabic, Roman (Comes), or Jerusalem Syriac books respectively. The lessons to which no such letter is annexed are of Greek origin, and we commence with the beginning of the Eastern ecclesiastical year, being Aug. 29 with the Copts, Sept. 1 with the Greeks. The variations noted (e. g. Sept. 2 infra) are those of Greek manuscripts adapted to church reading.

XI. Relation of Lectionaries to the Chapter-divisions of the New Testament.—Since lectionaries exhibit the text of the New Testament piece-meal, and in an order peculiar to themselves, the usual divisions into larger chapters (κεφάλαια), and, in the Gospels, into the so-called Ammonian sections, have no place in them. At the end of certain ordinary manuscripts of the Gospels, however, we find stated the number of lections (ἀναγνώσματα) which each contains, not without some variation in the several amounts. Wake 25 at Christ Church, and [5] II. A. 5 at Modena agree in reckoning the ἀναγνώσματα in St. Matthew at 116, in St. Mark at 71, in St. Luke at 114, in St. John at 67. Euthalius, bishop of Sulci, in the latter part of the 5th century, divided the Acts into 16 ἀναγνώσεις or ἀναγνώσματα. St. Paul's Epistles into 31; but these must have been long paragraphs, and can have had no connection with the much shorter lessons in the Praxapostolos which we have enumerated above.

LECTOR. [READER.]

LEGACY. [PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH].

LEGATE. The words πρεσβυτής, legatus, legatarius (Bede, E. H. i. 29, etc.) are used in ecclesiastical documents for agents or emissaries of ecclesiastical authorities.

I. Various instances of the employment of legates or deputies.—Sometimes they were sent by councils. Two bishops, Epigonius and Vincentius, were sent by the 6th council of Carthage on an embassy to procure from the emperor the right of asylum for criminals in all churches. (Cod. Eccl. Afric. can. 56.) Legates were sent from the same council to the bishops of Rome and Milan (c. 56) and to the Donatists (c. 69). It is also probable that after the time of Constantine legates were sent from the great councils to announce their decisions to the emperor. (Vales. Annot. in Theodoret. H. E. iv. 8.) Legates were also sent to councils as the representatives of provinces. (Cod. Eccl. Afric., præfat. et cc. 90–96.) At the same council (c. 90) some of the bishops of Numidia explained that they were present as individuals, as a formal legation could not be sent on account of the troubles in the province [compare COUNCIL, I. 482]. Sometimes they were sent as representatives of individual bishops. Lucifer of Cagliari (for instance) sent his deacon to represent him (εἰς τὸν αὐτοῦ τόπον) at an Alexandrian synod, with power to accept its decrees on his behalf (Socrates, H. E. iii. 6). So at the council of Hertford, it is said that Wilfrid of Northumberland was present in the persons of his legates, “per proprios legatarios adfuit.” (Bede, H. E. iv. 5, p. 147; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 119.) They were also sent by bishops to transact their business with other sees. Such were the legates (πρεσβυτέραι) sent by Flavian, bishop of Antioch to Rome, A.D. 381 (Theodoret, H. E. v. 23). Bede (H. E. i. 33, p. 74) speaks of a certain abbat Peter, who being sent as a legate to Gaul, was drowned on his passage at Arnfleet, and also (H. E. ii. 20, p. 102) of a bishop of Rochester, who was sent by Archbishop Justus as his legate to Honorius, bishop of Rome, and drowned in the Mediterranean.

II. Legates of the Roman See.—In the Roman empire, the officials through whom the emperor governed his provinces were called Legati [DICT. OF GREEK AND ROM. ANTIQ. s.v.]. As the extent of the ecclesiastical dominion claimed by the Roman see was, from a comparatively early period, too wide to admit of the personal superintendence and administration of the pope, he appointed representatives (probably following the imperial precedent) to exercise some portion of his authority, in cases where he could neither be present himself, nor regulate the business in hand by letter. Such representatives, though we may include them all under the general term “Legates,” were known by various names, according to the office which they discharged. They were sometimes sent for a special occasion, as to represent the pope at a council. These were legati missi, sometimes said to be a latere. At the court of Constantinople, and sometimes elsewhere, the pope was always represented by a permanent official, called an Apocrisarius or Responsalis, corresponding nearly to the Nuncio of modern times. And again, when appeals to Rome became frequent, the pope constituted vicars apostolic in the most distant regions of his dominions; that is, he empowered a local prelate to decide such appeals in his name, reserving only the most important for the decision of the Roman see itself. Such a commission was at first given to a particular bishop personally; but when it had been conferred on several successive incumbents of the same see, it naturally came to be regarded as a privilege of that see. Legates of this kind were called in the Middle Ages Legati nati.

It is confessed that during the first three centuries of the church there are but faint traces of the exercise of papal authority through legates; though it is sometimes assumed that the three persons whom Clement sent to Corinth with his letter (Epist. ad Cor. c. 59), Claudius Ephebus, Valerius Bito, and Fortunatus, were not mere messengers, but plenipotentiaries of the apostolic see (Binterim, III. i. 166). With the accession of Constantine a new period begins in this respect for the church.

1. The term “de latere” is an ancient one, and seems to imply one from the household or familiar friends of the sender, with the implication that he carried with him, as it were, a portion of his principal's personality. So Leo I. (Epist. 67), speaking of his legate at Constantinople, asserts that the people of Constantinople possessed a certain portion of himself, "quandam mei portionem." The council of Sardica (c. 7) desired the bishop of Rome, in case of need, to send "presbyters from his own side" (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἰδίου πλειοῦ πρεσβυτέρους, de latere suo presbyteros) into the provinces in order to determine appeals from bishops who had been forced to abdicate by provincial councils [APPEAL, I. 127]. Legates of this kind were sent on various occasional missions. Thus Leo I. sent Julian of Cos to the emperor Marcian after the council of Chalcedon for the purpose of opposing the progress of the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies, and invested him for this particular duty with the full power of the papal see (Leo Mag. Epist. 113 [al. 56]), and in an epistle to Pulcheria states that he has constituted him his full representative that he might be a pledge and hostage of his own loyalty (Id. Epist. 112 [al. 58]). Sometimes the legates were to act in conjunction with the bishops of the province to which they were sent. So Leo I. sent Lucentius (a bishop) and Basilus (a priest) to Constantinople, joined in commission with Anatolius, then bishop, after the pseudo-synod of Ephesus, with power to receive into communion those who should repudiate their share in the council, the case of Dioscorus alone being reserved for the judgment of Rome (Leo I. Epist. 85 [al. 46]). Sometimes they were sent merely to inquire and report. So Leo I. sent Prudentius, a bishop, to Africa to ascertain the truth concerning certain alleged irregularities connected with the ordination of bishops. In this case he was to possess the authority of the papal see as far as inquiry went, but only to report to Rome the result of his inquiries (Leo I. Epist. 12 [al. 87]).

The great missionaries of early times, who have gone forth under the authority of the Roman see, are frequently spoken of as papal legates. Thus Augustine of Canterbury, who was sent by pope Gregory the Great, is sometimes spoken of as his legate, though it does not appear that when he became archbishop of the English greater powers were conferred on him than on other archbishops who received the pall from Rome (Thomassin, I. i. 31, 6). Of Boniface, the great apostle of Germany, Hincmar says (Epist. 30, c. 20. p. 201) that popes Gregory II. and Gregory III. constituted him "legatum Apostolicæ sedis," for the reformation of the Christian religion in the parts where he laboured. His commission, which was a peculiar one, empowered him to ordain presbyters and afterwards bishops, without assigning him any particular see. It was not until the year 751 that pope Zacharias, the successor of Gregory III., made him bishop of Mentz and metropolitan of Germany and part of Gaul (Thomassin, I. i. 31, 1-5).

THE COUNCILS of the church have from the first afforded a field from the claims of papal legates. At Nicaea the representatives of the Roman see were the two presbyters, Victor [or Vitus] and Vincentius, who would have accompanied the pope, if he had been able to make the long journey from Rome to Bithynia. Who were the presidents in this famous assembly has been matter of endless dispute. Eusebius (Vita Const. iii. 13) simply says that the emperor, after his opening speech, gave place to the presidents of the assembly (παρεδίδον τὸν λόγον τοῖς τῆς συνόδου προέδροις): but who were these? Athanasius (Apol. de Fuga, c. 5, quoted by Theodoret, E. H. ii. 15) speaks of the venerable Hosius as a man who, from his weight of character, of course took a leading part in any synod where he was present (ποίας γὰρ οὐχ ἡγήσατο συνόδου); but he gives no hint that he derived any precedence from papal delegation. There can, in fact, be little doubt that Hosius and Eusebius of Caesarea were the real presidents at Nicaea, and that mainly through the favour of the emperor. Gelasius of Cyzicus (Labbe, ii. 155), writing towards the end of the fifth century, is the first to assert that Hosius appeared at Nicaea as a delegate of Rome, and the same authority (ib. 267), in the confessedly imperfect list of subscriptions, makes Hosius sign first, followed by the Roman presbyters Victor (or Vito) and Vincentius. Perhaps Gelasius, who was evidently a wholly uncritical reporter, has transferred to Nicaea the practice of his own age. For by the fifth century it had become a common practice for the popes to send representatives to councils.

In what capacity Hosius presided at the Council of Sardica has been much discussed; it seems probable that he owed his pre-eminence rather to his personal merits and the favour of the emperor than to any appointment of the see of Rome.

The African bishops in council at Carthage, A.D. 419, protested against the presence of the legates from Rome, declaring that sanction for sending such legates could be found in none of the councils, and entreating him to withdraw them for the sake of peace (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 138; Bruns, Canones, i. 200). The legates, however, Faustinus, bishop of Potentia, and two presbyters named Philippus and Asellus, were received at the council, the place of Faustinus being second to Aurelius the president, in conjunction with Valentinus, bishop of Numidia (Cod. Eccl. Afric. Praefat., in Bruns, Canones, i. 156.)

In the council of Constantinople of the year 381, neither Damasus of Rome nor any other Western prelate took any share, either personally or by legate.

Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, was locumtenens or legate of Rome in the Nestorian controversy; "vicem nostram propter marina et terrena spatia ipsi sancto fratri meo Cyrillo delegavimus," says Celestinus in the document by which he professes to excommunicate Nestorius (Labbe, iii. 373). To the council of Ephesus the pope had sent two bishops, Arcadius and Projectus, and a presbyter, Philip, with instructions to regulate their conduct by the advice of Cyril, but in all things to uphold the authority of the see of Rome. They were not to press their attendance upon the assembly; when they were present, they were to take notes of what passed, without joining in the debates; at the close of the council, they were to report to the pope himself, and afterwards accompany Cyril to Constantinople, to lay the conclusions of the Fathers before the emperor (Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, i. 335). Great pains were taken on this occasion to make the vindication of orthodoxy at Ephesus appear the work of the pope, acting through Cyril and the legates; their instructions were read in the council, and recorded in its minutes; the legate Philip then declared its proceedings to have been in conformity with them, and in the name of the see of Rome pronounced the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius, "according to the formula which the holy pope Celestinus had committed to his care." Arcadius and Projectus signified their assent. Cyril then caused the papal ratification to be recorded in the terms in which it had been conveyed to them (Greenwood, p. 339 f.).

These may suffice as instances of the employment of legates to represent the Roman see in the great councils. One or two examples may be given of legates sent from Rome to England, as having a special interest of their own.

At the council of Hatfield (A.D. 680) John the Roman preceptor was present, having come from Rome under the guidance of the English Benedict Biscop, to introduce the Roman manner of saying the offices in his new monastery at Wearmouth. It is said of him that he joined with the rest in confirming the decrees of the Catholic faith (pariter Catholicae fidei decreta firmabat), i.e. in receiving the decrees of the first five general councils, and declaring the orthodoxy of the English church in respect of the Monothelites; but nothing is said of any precedence granted to him; the council was summoned by command of the English kings, and presided over by the English archbishop Theodore (Bede, H. E. iv. 17, 18; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141 ff.).

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (ad an. 785) relates that in that year there was a contentious synod at Calcyth [probably Chelsea], and also that in that year messengers were sent from Rome by pope Adrian to England, to renew the faith and the peace which St. Gregory had sent us by Augustine the bishop, and they were worshipfully received. The head of this legation was George, bishop of Ostia. These legates, in fact, were present at two councils, one in the north and one in the south of England, probably at Finchale and Chelsea respectively, but as to the extent of the authority they claimed we know nothing, except that they made application to the Mercian and Northumbrian kings respectively for the assembling of the councils. Their names do not appear among the subscriptions (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 443-461).

The bearers of the letters sent by pope John IV. (A.D. 640) to the Irish bishops and abbats about the Pelagian heresy were in some sort legates, as two of them at least—Hilary, the arch-presbyter, and John, the primicerius—are described as vicegerents of the apostolic see (servans locum sanctae sedis apostolicae). (Bede, H. E. ii. 19, p. 100.)

And it may be observed generally that in the earlier ages of the church papal legates in councils by no means took the position which a later age assigned to them, after Gregory VII.'s vigorous assertion of the privileges of his see. Thus the legate Faustinus, at the council of Carthage, took his place below the bishop of that see, Aurelius; Eusebius of Vercelli, legate as he was, yielded precedence at Alexandria to Athanasius. At CHALCEDON [I. 334] the lay dignitaries occupied the place of honour, and controlled the proceedings of the council throughout; on their left were the Roman legates, on their right Dioscorus of Alexandria and Juvenal of Jerusalem. Julianus, who was rather a legate to the emperor than to the council, took his place after the first twenty bishops. Cyril took the first place among the bishops in the third general council at Ephesus, but this precedence was probably due as much to his rank as patriarch of Alexandria, as to the fact that on this occasion he was vicegerent of the pope [EPHESUS, I. 615]. Moreover, legates did not (in the period with which we are concerned) attempt to set themselves above the sovereign power, but addressed themselves to kings and emperors respecting the summoning of councils and other ecclesiastical business. As the claims of papal legates simply represent the claims of the papacy, the further account of them must be referred to the article POPE.

2. The Apocrisarii or Responsales were so called, as being the persons through whom the Responsa or judgments of their principal were communicated to the court to which they were accredited. Hincmar says that Apocrisarii were instituted when Constantine removed the seat of empire from Rome to Byzantium, from which time agents (responsales) both of Rome and of other chief sees were maintained at the imperial court; a statement probable in itself, though the authority is late. Hosius, bishop of Cordova, certainly acted as a kind of ecclesiastical minister at the court of Constantine, but there is no evidence whatever that he represented the see of Rome there, or that he held any definite office under Constantine (Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 112, 3rd edition). Petrus de Marca (De Concord. Sacert. et Imp. v. 16) places the formal institution of Apocrisarii at a later date. Referring to the letter of Leo the Great to Julianus, bishop of Cos (Epist. 86), in which the pope gives him a general commission to act on behalf of the Roman see at the court of Constantinople in the repression of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, he says, "this gave occasion to the sending of agents or apocrisarii (responsales) of the apostolic see to the capital city, especially after the time of Justinian; . . . for at that time there were constantly in the court diconi responsales, who both took charge before the emperor of cases in which the Roman church was peculiarly interested, and kept watch over matters of faith and discipline. At the same time they were as it were hostages of the public faith, guaranteeing the obedience due to princes."

Several legates of the Roman see at the court of Constantinople are known to history. Thus Liberatus records (Breviarium, c. 22) that pope Agapetus made the deacon Pelagius his apocrisary at the imperial court; and Gregory the Great relates that he himself, when a deacon, acted as apocrisary of Pelagius II. with the emperor, using the expression, "tempore quo exhibendis responsis ad Principem ipse transmissus sum" (Dialogus, iii. 23). Justinian (Novel. 6, c. 2; 123, c. 25) desires bishops not to come in person to court, but to transact their business there by the agency of apocrisarii.

After the 6th Oecumenical Council we find Constantine Pogonatus writing to Leo II. to send him an apocrisary, who in all ecclesiastical matters should not only represent his person but actually possess his power, "in emergentibus sive dogmaticis sive canonicis et prorsus in omnibus ecclesiasticis negotiis vestrae sanctitatis ex-primat ac gerat personam." (Conc. vi. Act. 18, Labbe.) Leo in consequence sent the subdeacon Constantine, who had been one of his legates at the council, and requested the emperor to receive him as his minister, "ut ministerium digne suscipiat." Thomassin (Vet. et. Nor. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 108, §§ 27, 28) thinks that this was an evasion of the request to send a legate with full powers, lest he should be induced by the power of the emperor to commit himself to acts for which the papal see would be responsible.

3. The popes of Rome have frequently granted special privileges, such as may be called legatine or vicarial, to certain distinguished sees. The first of these was that of Thessalonica. In the year 379 the great preecture of Illyricum Orientale was assigned to the Eastern emperor. But the see of Rome had probably for a long time claimed patriarchal authority over this division of the empire, and Damasus, the then pope, was unwilling to allow a mere political severance to affect his spiritual authority, and therefore appointed Acholius, bishop of Thessalonica, metropolitan of that prefecture, his representative or vicar for the diocese of Illyricum Orientale (Greenwood, Cathed. Pet. i. 259). From the scantiness of our information as to this transaction we know little or nothing of the exact nature of the powers conferred on this legate. Leo the Great (Epist. ad Avitum Thess.) confirms to the archbishop of Thessalonica powers over Illyricum which (he says) had been conferred under his predecessors Damasus, Siricius, and Anastasius. See the Responsio Pii VI. ad Metropolitanos Mogunt. etc. super Nuntiaturis Apost. Romae 1790. Vicarial or legatine powers were also conferred on the see of Arles, the "Gallican Rome." Thus Zosimus (A.D. 418) made Patroclus, bishop of Arles, his vicegerent; Hilary gave the same office to Leontius; Gelasius I. to Aeonius; Symmachus to Caesarius; Vigilius to Auxonius; and at length, the same privilege having been continued to a series of bishops, it was definitely granted and assigned to the see of Arles (Gregorii Epist. iv. 50, 52, 54). See also Gregory's seventh response to Augustine of Canterbury, in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 22. And the same thing took place also with regard to other sees.

(Petrus de Marca, de Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, lib. v.; Böhrer, Ius Ecclesiasticum, lib. iii., tit. 37, c. 36; Van Espen, Ius Ecclesiasticum; Thomassin, Nova et Vet. Eccl. Discipl.; Walther, Kirchenrecht; Jacobson in Herzog, Real-Encyclop., s. v. Legaten.) [P. O. and C.]

LEGATION (Legatio, πρεσβεία). A body of legates entrusted with any commission, e.g. Soc. II. E. iv. 12; Soz. H. B. vi. 11. When the legates were not a mere deputation, but had full power to act on their own authority, it was called a free legation, "legatio libera" (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 94, 97; see Ducange, Gloss.). The commission given to the legates was called a letter of legation, "litterae legationis." At the 6th council of Carthage the various legates presented their credentials, which were read to the council, "offerentibus legationis literis et recitatis" (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 90). Sometimes it appears to have been used for the duty entrusted to a legate. Thus Leo I. (Epist. 26) speaks of a commission given to the empress Pulcheria to procure the summoning of a fresh council after the Pseudo-Synod of Ephesus as a legation, hac sibi specialiter a beatissimo Petro Apostolo legatione commissâ. But the word for the most part is convertible with LEGATE.

[P. O.]

LEGENDA. This word properly denotes whatever is appointed to be read to the congregation during public worship. It has however acquired the restricted sense of the records of the lives and acts of the saints and martyrs, which were appointed to be thus read. Collections of these records date from the 2nd century, and were known as Acta (i.e. the registers containing the official records), Sanctorum, or Acta Martyrum. They contained the most important sayings and deeds of the saints, both martyrs and confessors. The earliest reputed compiler of the acts of martyrs is St. Clement of Rome, who is said to have employed scribes "notarios," to collect the acts of martyrs throughout the different districts of the city. The practice appears to have spread into the African church. St. Cyprian (Ep. 37, ad Clerum) writes: "Denique et dies eorum quibus excedunt, annotate, ut commemorationes eorum inter memorias martyrum celebrare possimus."

Eusebius also (Hist. v. 4) speaks of such a collection, "Whoever cares to do so, may easily obtain the fullest information on this subject by reading the epistle itself," which, as I have already said, I have inserted in the collection of the Acts of Martyrs [τῇ τῶν μαρτυρίων συναγωγῇ]. He gives at length the account of the martyrdom of Polycarp and his companions (iv. 15. See also vii. 41-42).

Hence Eusebius has been often looked upon as the first to compile a martyrology. St. Jerome made a compendium of the acts as compiled by Eusebius.

Any further question as to the growth of martyrologies belongs more properly to another place [MARTYROLOGY]. It is sufficient here to point out their origin and antiquity.

In the persecution of Diocletian many authentic records of this nature perished, in consequence of a general edict to burn them (Gregor. Turon. de Gloria Martyr.). Gelasius (A.D. 492) rejected as spurious writings of this nature then in circulation, and forbade them to be read in churches.

The third council of Carthage (A.D. 397), Can. 47, after ruling that besides the canonical scriptures nothing should be read publicly in the church under the name of Holy Scripture, adds that the passions of the martyrs may be read on their anniversaries. "Licet etiam legi passionibus martyrum, quum anniversarii eorum dies celebrantur." And it appears from various sermons of St. Augustine (Ser. xlvii. de Sanctis, &c.) that the practice was general in his day. Cassiodorus, in the 6th century, writing to certain abbats says (Instit. din. Let. c. 32), "Passiones martyrum legite constanter."

The practice was to read the "acts" of those saints and martyrs who were to be commemorated in the liturgy on the day following, in order that the faithful might join in the commemoration with memories refreshed. When the daily services were reduced to order, the martyrology was appointed to be read in choir, at the end of Prime, after the Orison (Oratio) which is followed by the usual "Benedicamus Domino," R. Deo gratias; the lection which contains the memorials of the saints for the next day being read. The lection is followed by the Verse and Response. V. Pretiosa in conspectu Domini. R. Mors sanctorum ejus; and a few prayers.

• I.e. from the martyrs of Lyons to Eleutherus.

From a MS. appendix to the Roman Responsorial and Antiphonary, which is considered to be of the 9th century, it appears that the passion and acts of a saint were only read in the churches dedicated to that saint (ubi ipse titulus erat) until the time of pope Adrian I. A.D. 772.

This reading of the martyrology with the prayers which follow it is usually considered a distinct office from Prime, and known as officium capitulare. In many churches it was said in a different place. Thus in the old statutes of the church of Paris: "Thence (i.e. from the choir after Prime) they go into the chapter house, [or possibly another chapel in the church], where, after the reading of the acts of the saints, and the diptychs of the deceased, let prayers be made for their repose." [Inde in capitulum^b progrediuntur, ubi gestis sanctorum et diptychis defunctorum perfectis, fiant preces pro eorum requiem.] Again in the rite of Avranches: "Prime ended, let the brothers assemble in the chapter house, and let the lection of the Martyrology be read, lest any festival of a saint which should be celebrated on the morrow be omitted through inadvertence." [Primâ finitâ, in capitulum convenient fratres, Martyrologii lectio legatur; ne aliqua sancti festivitas in crastino celebranda negligenter omittatur.] So also the old ritual of St. Martin at Tours. Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, A.D. 742, introduced the practice into his chapter among his reforms. On the other hand the martyrology was often read in choir, not in chapter. This was directed by the old ordinarium of Senlis, which, after directions for the office of Prime, proceeds: "After the aforesaid orison the *calendar (calenda) is read by one of the boys, and terminates thus: and of all the many other holy martyrs and confessors and virgins. Then the anniversary which is contained in the Martyrology is announced." So also the ordinarium of the Cathedral of Tours. "Then follows the lection from the martyrology, read in choir with a sufficiently loud voice . . . A boy says 'Jube, Domine, benedicere.' The priest gives the benediction,^d and after the reading of the lection is to say "Pretiosa in conspectu," &c. After this a boy is to announce the anniversary which is to be celebrated on the following day. The reading of the Martyrology in chapter appears to have been limited to the more important monastic houses and colleges of canons, and usually in connexion with the reading of the rule of the house, which by the council of Aix la Chapelle (A.D. 817) was directed to be bound in one volume with the martyrology. The custom gradually died out (it had ceased at St. Martin's at Tours in the 15th century); and in the printed breviaries, monastic as well as secular, the officium capitulare is printed so as to form part of Prime without any break.

In a decree of the Congregation of Rites (10 Jun. 1690. Meratus in Ind. Decr. Brev. 163) we find the following ruling:—

"After what has been said, the hour of Prime is terminated when 'Benedicamus Domino' is said, and what follows is only a sort of appendix; whence it appears, that in the same manner as the church here inserts daily the reading of the Martyrology, and Prime of the Blessed Virgin, when this is to be said, so anything else may be inserted; though we do not recommend that this should be done, because what is now supplemented is considered to complete Prime as it were [Primam veluti integrare],^c or to be an additional part of it."

In addition to the readings at Prime, on festivals with three nocturns, the lessons of the second nocturn are as a rule taken from the acts of the saint of the day.

The custom of reading at nocturns such acts as were worthy of credit is thought to have grown up in the 8th century; that of reading them in the liturgy much earlier, as has been already stated. They were read before the epistle and briefly recapitulated in the preface. In the course of the liturgy, the bishop ascended the chair (cathedram conscendente) and gave an explanation of them, which was the origin of the sermons of the Fathers in honour of the martyrs (see, inter alia, S. August. Sermo 2, de S. Steph.). This custom was kept up in France till the 9th century, and in Spain till beyond the 10th; and the acts were inserted in the sacramentaries and missals of both countries.^f They were never inserted in the Roman, as appears from the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries and missals, which make but spare and cautious mention of the martyrs and their sufferings in the preface alone.

Among Latin martyrologies, those compiled by Bede, and by the Benedictine monk Usuardus, in the 9th century, may be mentioned.

The Greek equivalent to the martyrology is the menology (μηνολόγιον), so called because its contents are arranged according to months. The lection for the day is called the "synaxarion" (συναξάριον), and is inserted at full length in the menaea (which contains the variable parts of the office, and so in some measure correspond to the proprium Sanctorum of the Latin breviaries) after the sixth ode of the canon for the day said at Lauds. It is introduced by its proper stichos, nearly always two iambic lines, containing some allusion to the saint or play upon his name, followed by a hexameter line, of the nature of a "memoria technica" of the date.^s There is usually more than one synaxarion to a day, each in commemoration of a different saint; in which case, with few exceptions, each has its own iambic stichos; but the first alone the hexameter line. Other saints of the day are commemorated by the simple reciting of their names and death, stating usually its manner, followed by a stichos, but with no synaxarion. These readings and commemorations are concluded with the clause—"By their holy intercessions, O God, have mercy upon us. Amen" (ταῖς αὐτῶν ἁγίαις πρεσβείαις, ὁ θεός, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. Ἀμήν).^b There are great variations in different menologies. The emperor Basil the Macedonian directed one to be compiled, A.D. 886, which may be taken as a type of others.

LEGER, ST. [LEODEGARIUS.]

LENEY, COUNCIL OF (Leniense Concilium), held at Lenev in Ireland, A.D. 630, or thereabouts, respecting Easter, which was kept differently then in Scotland and Ireland from what it was in Rome. In other words, if the fourteenth day of the moon fell on a Sunday, it was kept on that Sunday, and not the following. St. Fintan here prevailed with his countrymen in favour of the old rule; but it was unfair of contemporaries to call them 'Quartodecimans' on that account. (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. c. 17; comp. Mansi, x. 611.)

[E. S. Ff.]

LENT (τεσσαρακοστή, Quadragesima). The English name is derived from the Anglo-Saxon Lencten, spring; with which may be compared the German Lenz, and the Dutch Lente. The titles for this season in languages of Latin derivation are merely corruptions of the name Quadragesima, as the French Carême, Italian Quaresima, etc. So also in the Celtic languages, as the Welsh Garwys, Maux Karwys, Breton Corawz, etc. In Teutonic and allied languages, the name for the season merely indicates the fast, as the German Fastzeit, Dutch Vastie, etc. So also in the Calendar of the Greek church it is ἡ νηστεία).

1. History of the observance.—We can trace up to very early times the existence of a preparatory fast to Easter, for it is mentioned definitely by Irenæus and Tertullian. While, however, the fast seems to have been one universally kept, there seems to have been very great latitude as to the duration of the fast. Thus Irenæus writing to Victor, bishop of Rome, and referring to the disputes as to the time of keeping Easter, adds that there is the same dispute as to the length of the preliminary fast. "For," he says, "some think they ought to fast for one day, others for two days, and others even for several, while others reckon forty hours both of day and night to their day" (οἱ δὲ τεσσαράκοντα ὥρας ἡμερίνας τε καὶ νυκτερινὰς συμμετροῦσι τὴν ἡμέραν αὐτῶν). Irenæus then goes on to say that this variety is not merely a thing of his own time, but of much older date (πολὺ πρότερον); an important statement, as carrying back the existence of the fast practically up to apostolic times (Irenæus, Ep. ad Vict.; apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24).

Before, however, we pass on to consider the references in Tertullian, it must be noted that much discussion has arisen as to the punctuation of the above passage; for the translation of Rufinus puts a full stop after τεσσαράκοντα, a plan which is adopted by some, as by Stieren and Harvey, the most recent editors of Irenæus. We must remark, however, that not only are the MSS. said to be unanimous in giving the first-mentioned reading, but as Valesius (not. in loc.) justly points out, the general run of the Greek is palpably in favour of the same way.^b (For a defence of the opposite theory, see Massuet, Diss. in Iren. ii. 23.)

We pass on next to consider the evidence furnished by Tertullian, who in one place speaks of the fast "die Paschæ," as "communis et quasi publica jejunii religio" (De Orat. c. 18). This, of course, would be a fast on Good Friday. That the fast, however, was not confined to this day only, we learn from another place, where writing as a Montanist he says of the Catholics that they considered that the only fasts which Christians should observe were those "in which the bridegroom was taken away from them" (De Jejuni. c. 2; cf. also c. 13, where he draws a distinction between the obligation of the fast of the above-mentioned days and other fasts, especially the Stations, so called). Here then we have a fast for the period during which our Saviour was under the power of death.

Thus far it would appear that there was in any case a fast, whether on the day of our Lord's death, or for the above longer period; but in some cases extra days were added, varying in different churches. At a later period the same kind of variation prevailed, as we find, e.g. from Socrates and Sozomen. Thus the former (Hist. Eccles. v. 22) speaks of those in Rome as fasting for three

^a For ἡμέραν, Valesius (not. in loc.) conjectured that νηστείαν should be read, on account of the difficulty of understanding the expression "day," as applied in any sense to a period of 40 hours. There is, however, no MS. authority for this, and it cuts the knot of the difficulty rather than solves it.

^b Thus a climax seems indicated in the καὶ οἱ διὰ καὶ πλείους, and we should look for some connecting particle with the ὥρας. The Latin of Rufinus is "nonnulli etiam quadraginta, ita ut horas diurnas . . .": the ita has a decidedly suspicious appearance after the termination of the preceding word. Moreover, the fact introduced by ita ut, as to the fast being observed during the hours both of day and night, is simply inexplicable when taken in connexion with the preceding "nonnulli etiam quadraginta."

^s The following, for St. Polycarp (Feb. 23), may serve as a specimen:

Stichoi. σοὶ Πολύκαρπος ὠλοκαντώθῃ Λόγε, καρπὸν πολλὸν δοὺς ἐκ πυρὸς ξενωτρόπως. εἰκάδι ἐν τριτάτῃ κατὰ φλόξ Πολύκαρπον ἔκανσεν.

^b This is the usual form of words and the invariable purport of the clause. Sometimes it runs "By the prayers of thy martyrs, O Lord Christ, have mercy upon us and save us. Amen" (ταῖς τῶν σάν μαρτύρων εὐχαῖς, Χριστὲ ὁ Θεός, ἐλέησον καὶ σῶσον. Ἀμήν).

weeks before Easter, except on Saturdays and Sundays.^c In Illyria, through all Greece, and in Alexandria [those of Illyria, the West (οἱ πρὸς δύσιν), throughout all Libya, in Egypt and Palestine (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii. 19)], a fast of six weeks' duration was observed. Others again continued it for seven weeks: these are spoken of vaguely by Socrates as ἄλλοι, and more specifically by Sozomen as those of Constantinople, and the countries round about as far as Phœnicia.^d Socrates, however, states that these, while beginning the fast seven weeks before Easter, only fasted for fifteen days by intervals (τρεῖς μὲνας πενθημέρους ἐκ διαλημμάτων); and Sozomen speaks of some who fasted three weeks by intervals (σποράδην) out of the six or seven weeks. Lastly, some fasted for two weeks, as the Monastists did.

Gregory the Great (Hom. in Evang. i. 16. 5; vol. i. 1494, ed. Bened.) speaks of the fast as of thirty-six days' duration, that is to say, of six weeks, not counting in the six Sundays. It will have been noticed above that Sozomen speaks of six weeks as the period observed by the Westerns, whereas it lasted through seven weeks in Constantinople and the East. Now in the East, Saturday as well as Sunday partook of a festal character,^e and thus the number of actual fasting days would be in either case thirty-six. Of course those Eastern churches which only took six weeks would have but thirty-one days' fast. [The Saturday which was Easter Eve was of course in all cases excepted from the general rule of Saturdays.] In any case thirty-six was the maximum number of days' fast^f (cf. Cassian, Collat. xxi. 24, 25; Patrol. xlix. 1200).

By whom the remaining four days were added, that is Ash-Wednesday and the three days following it, does not clearly appear. Gregory the Great (ob. A.D. 604) has often been credited with it (see e.g. the Micrologus, c. 49; Patrol. cli. 1013), but his remark which we have referred to above seems conclusive against this. The evidence also derivable from the Gregorian sacramentary, into which we must enter in detail when we come to speak of the liturgical part of our subject, points the same way. Thus the headings for these first four days never include the term Quadragesima, which occurs for the first time on the Sunday; and there seems ground for omitting the words caput jejunii in the heading to Ash-Wednesday. Martene (De Ant. Eccles. Rit. iii. 58, ed. Venice, 1783) shews that even after the time of Gregory the Great, the four additional days cannot for some time have been observed, at any rate at all universally, for the Regula Magistri, a writing apparently of the 7th century, orders that from Sexagesima the monks should fast till the evening on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, but that on other days up to Quadragesima they should take their meal at the ninth hour. Thus by the addition of these six days, the diminution caused in Lent by the taking out of the six Sundays was exactly counterbalanced (c. 28, Patrol. lxxxviii. 997). Clearly, therefore, this writer can in no way have viewed Lent as definitely beginning with Ash-Wednesday, and indeed the following day is not reckoned as part of the fast at all. On the other hand, the addition is certainly not to be fixed later than the time of Charlemagne, for (Martene, l. c.) the title "feria quarta in capite jejunii" occurs in MSS. of sacramentaries of and perhaps before his time. Similar evidence is furnished by the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, in the latter part of the 8th century (c. 30, Patrol. lxxxix. 1071), and apparently in the Penitential of Egbert, archbishop of York from A.D. 732 to 766 (l. i. 37, Patrol. lxxxix. 410).

Others have referred the addition to Gregory II. (ob. A.D. 731), but the matter seems quite doubtful.^g It may be remarked here in connexion with this latter prelate, that the Micrologus (c. 50, supra) states that it was he who first required the Thursdays throughout Lent to be kept as fasts, contrary to the ancient Roman usage. It is to Melchisedes that the appointment of Thursdays as exceptions to the law of fasting in Lent is referred. This, however, is very doubtful, when viewed in connexion with the words of Gregory the Great already quoted.

Considering the diversity which we have found to prevail as to the duration of Lent, it is curious to see how persistently the word τεσσαρακοστή is adhered to, a point which puzzled Socrates (l. c.) in the 5th century. Although the origin of this name is by no means clear, there are at any rate some reasonable grounds for connecting it with the period during which our Lord yielded to the power of death, which was estimated at forty hours [e.g. from noon on Friday till 4 A.M. on Sunday]; and we have seen that Tertullian twice refers to the fast as continuing for the days "in quibus ablatus est sponsus." We must also not lose sight of the forty days' fasts of Moses, Elijah, and our Lord, as being especially suggestive of the number of forty. It will have been noticed that when the duration of the fast was considerably lengthened, in the majority of cases the number of days of actual fasting was still approximately forty.

2. Object and purport of Lent.—We may inquire in the next place what was the primary idea in the institution of such a fast, and what other reasons were subserved in the maintenance of it.

(a) From a passage of Tertullian already cited (de Jejuniis, c. 13) it is clear that the fast primarily lasted for the time during which our Lord was under the power of death, to mark the mourning of the church when the bridegroom

^c There is some difficulty here in the remark as to the Roman fast not holding on the Saturday. See Valesius's not. in loc.

^d In illustration of the longer period of the fast observed in the East, we may refer to the case mentioned by Photius (Biblioth. 107; Patrol. Gr. clii. 377).

^e For an illustration of this, see e.g. Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in Gen. § 2; vol. iv. 101, ed. Gaume), who speaks of the relaxation afforded in Lent by the cessation of the fast on Saturday and Sunday. As regards the West an exception must be made in the case of Milan, where Saturday was viewed as in the East (see Ambrose, de Elia et jejuniis, infra), also for Gaul (see Aurelian, infra).

^f We may refer here to the notion that, since thirty-six days was one-tenth of the year, therefore in Lent was fulfilled the Mosaic precept of paying tithes (Cassian, l. c.).

^g It is clear that in some parts the additional four days cannot have been accepted for a long time, for Martene (p. 59) speaks of the end of the 11th century as the period when they were recognised in Scotland.

was taken away. Of this mourning then, Lent is the perpetual commemoration. It is interesting to note here that the Montanists who observed three Lents in the course of the year (Jerome, Epist. 41, ad Marcellam, § 3; vol. i. 189, ed. Vallarsi), and kept one of them after Pentecost (Jerome, Comm. in Matt. ix. 15; vol. vii. 51), still agreed with the Catholics in viewing it as the mourning for the absent bridegroom, in accordance with our Lord's declaration.

(β) This primary reason having been fixed, we need not dwell on that reason for its maintenance drawn from its use as a means of quickening zeal, and as an aid to devotion generally, since this is applicable to any fast and has no exclusive reference to Lent. This particular fast, however, served as a special preparation for several important events directly connected with Easter. Chief among these was the Easter communion, which, even in the earlier days of the church, when Christians ordinarily communicated every Sunday, must have had an exceptional prominence; much more in later times when this frequency of communion had greatly diminished, and we find for example canons of councils ordering that all Christians should communicate at least three times a year, of which Easter should be one. (See e.g. Concil. Agathense [A.D. 506], cann. 63, 64; Labbe, iv. 1393.) This idea is dwelt upon by Chrysostom (in eos qui primo pascha jejunant, § 4; vol. i. 746, ed. Gaume; also Hom. 1, § 4, vol. iv. 10), and by Jerome (Comm. in Jonam, iii. 4; vol. vi. 416).

(γ) Easter again was the special time for the administration of baptism, which was necessarily preceded by a solemn preparation and fasting. The importance of the Lent fast to those about to be baptized is dwelt upon by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. i. 5; p. 18, ed. Toutée). The names of those who sought baptism had to be given in some time before (ὀνομαστροφία, Pro-catech. c. 1, p. 2; cf. c. 4, p. 4). A council of Carthage ordains that this shall be done a long time (diu) before the baptism (Conc. Carth. iv. [A.D. 398] can. 85; Labbe, ii. 1206), but a canon of Siricius, bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 399) defines the time as not less than forty days (Ep. i. ad Himerium, c. 2; Labbe, ii. 1018).

(δ) Lent was also a special time of preparation for penitents who looked forward to readmission for the following Easter. (See Cyprian, Epist. 56, § 3; Ambrose, Epist. 20 ad Marcellinam sororem, c. 26; Patrol. xvi. 1044; Jerome, Comm. in Jonam, l.c.; Greg. Nyss. Epist. Canon. ad Letoium, Patrol. Gr. xlv. 222; Petr. Alexandr. can. 1, Labbe, i. 955; Concil. Anciranum [A.D. 314], can. 6, ib. 1457.)

3. Manner of observance of Lent.—The special characteristics of Lent consisted in various forms of abstinence from food, the cessation of various ordinary forms of rejoicings, the merciful interference with legal pains and penalties, and the like.

(α) First of all must be noted the actual fast, which was generally a total abstinence from all food till the evening, except on Sundays, and in some cases on Saturdays. (Ambrose, de Elia et Jejunio, c. 10; Patrol. xiv. 743; Serin. 8 in Psal. 118; Patrol. xv. 1383; Basil, Hom. i. de Jejunio, c. 10; Patrol. Gr. xxxi. 181; Chrysostom, Hom. iv. in Gen. c. 7, vol. iv. 36; Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 6, vol. iv. 58; Hom. viii. in Gen. c. 6, vol. iv. 76.)

As to the particular kinds of food made use of when the fast was broken for the day, there would appear to have been in early times the utmost latitude. This may be gathered, for example, from the passage of Socrates already quoted (Hist. Eccles. v. 22). "Now we may notice," he says, "that men differ not only with respect to the number of the days, but also in the character of the abstinence from food, which they practise. For some abstain altogether from animal food, while others partake of no animal food but fish only. Others again eat of birds as well as fishes, saying that according to Moses they also were produced from water. Others abstain also from fruits (ἀκροδέρμα) and eggs, while some partake only of dry bread, and others not even of that. Another sort fast till the ninth hour, and then have their meal of various sorts of food" (διαφορὰν ἔχουσι τὴν ἐστίασιν).^h He then goes on to argue that since no rule of Scripture can be produced for this observance, therefore the apostles left the decision of the matter to every man's judgment. It will thus be seen that though the fast was to be kept throughout the day, there was as yet an absence of any restriction as to the character of the food taken in the evening; it being, of course, assumed that great moderation was shewn, and that luxuries were avoided, in fact that the fast was not to be a technical matter of abstaining from this or that food, merely to enjoy a greater luxury of a different kind. The abstaining from flesh as any absolute and fundamental rule of the church was not yet insisted on, but still remained to some extent a matter of private judgment. An example, which illustrates a transitional state of things, is found in the incident related by Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. i. 11) of Spyridon, bishop of Trimythus in Cyprus. He, when once visited by a stranger at the beginning of Lent, offered him some swine's flesh, which was the only food he had in the house. The latter refused to partake of it, saying that he was a Christian. "All the more therefore," said the bishop, "should it not be refused, for that all things are pure to the pure is declared by the word of God." Bingham (Orig. xxi. 1. 17), who cites the above instance, has strangely omitted to add that before acting thus, the bishop besought the Divine indulgence (εὐξάμενος καὶ συγγνώμην αἰτήσας), as though he were straining a point in doing as he did, though, on the other hand, such straining had not yet become a violation of a universally recognised law. We find a somewhat parallel illustration in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v. 3), where a certain Christian prisoner named Alcibiades, who had lived on bread and water all his life, received a divine monition through Attalus, one of his fellow prisoners, that he did not well in thus refusing the good gifts of God.

On the other hand, we continually find protests being made against the conduct of those who, so long as the technical rules were observed, thought themselves at liberty to indulge in every luxury, instead of devoting the money saved by the fast to the relief of the poor.¹ (Augustine, Serm. 205, § 2, vol. v. 1337, ed. Gaume; Serm. 207, § 2, ib. 1341; Serm. 210, § 10, ib. 1353; Leo, Serm. 3, de Jejunio Pentecostes, vol. i. 319, ed. Ballerini.)

^h The Greek here seems rather curious. Valesius conjectured that we should read ἀδιαφορὰν, sine discrimine ciborum.

The same kind of reaction of feeling manifested itself in the indulging in special enjoyments in the days before the fast, and of this the carnival may serve as an illustration.*

It is not, however, to be supposed from all this, that there is an absence of positive enactments on the subject.¹ Thus one of the so-called apostolical canons orders that all clerics shall fast in Lent under penalty of deposition, unless they can plead bodily infirmity; a layman to be excommunicated (can. 69). The fourth council of Orleans (A.D. 541) also enjoins the observance of Lent, adding a rule that the Saturdays are to be included in the fast. (Concil. Aucl. iv. can. 2; Labbe, v. 382; cf. Concil. Toletanum viii. [A.D. 653], can. 9; Labbe, vi. 407.) It may be noted that Aurelian, bishop of Arles (app. A.D. 545) in laying down the rule for monks, orders that the fast shall be observed every day from Epiphany to Easter, save upon Saturdays and Sundays and greater festivals (Patrol. lxxviii. 396). It was evidently considered that there should be a stricter rule for such than for Christians generally. The last part of the order refers to an increased severity of the fast during the last week; see e. g. Epiphanius, Expos. Fidei c. 22; vol. i. 1105, ed. Petavius. On this part of the subject reference may be made to the special article. [HOLY WEEK.]

(B) A second point which characterised the season was the forbidding of all things which were of a festal character. Thus the Council of Laodicea (circa A.D. 365) ordered that the oblation of bread and wine in the Eucharist should be confined to Saturdays and Sundays during Lent (can. 49, Labbe, i. 1505). A later council, that in Trullo (A.D. 692) ordains that on days other than the above two and the day of the Annunciation, there may be a communion of the presanctified elements (can. 52; Labbe, vi. 1165). Again, the Council of Laodicea forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, except upon Saturdays and Sundays (can. 51); and the following canon forbids the celebration of marriages and of birthday festivals in Lent, without any reservation. This last, however, perhaps only gradually came to be observed, for in the collection of Eastern canons by Martin, bishop of Braga in Spain, he cites no other canon for this use but that of the Council of Laodicea. Cf. also as to this point Augustine, Serm. 205, § 2 (vol. v. 1336); Egbert, Penitential, i. 21 (Patrol. lxxxix. 406); Theodulfus of Orleans, Capitul. 43 (Patrol. cv. 205); Nicolaus I. Resp. ad consult. Bulg. c. 48; (Patrol. cxix. 1000).

A fortiori all public games, theatrical shows, and the like, were forbidden at this season.

Gregory of Nazianzum reproves one Celeusius, a judge, who had authorised spectacles during the fast (Epist. 112; vol. ii. 101, ed. Bened.). Chrysostom, in a homily delivered in Lent, asks his hearers what profit they have gained from his sermons, when through the instigations of the devil they all have "rushed off to that vain show (πομπή) of Satan, the horse-race" (Hom. vii. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 48); and again he speaks of the great injury men who follow such practices do to themselves, and the scandal they are to others^m (Hom. vii. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 59).

(γ) The severity of the laws was relaxed during Lent. Thus the Theodosian Code in a law promulgated in A.D. 380 prohibits all hearing of criminal cases during that season (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. 35, leg. 4; vol. iii. 252, ed. Gothofredus). Another law, published in A.D. 389, forbids the infliction of punishments of the body "sacris Quadragesimae diebus" (op. cit. 253). As a parallel case, probably referring to the Lent season, we may allude to what is said by Ambrose, in his funeral eulogy of the younger Valentinian, where he praises him in that when some noblemen were about to be tried in a criminal case, and the prefect pressed the matter, the emperor forbade a sentence of death during a holy season (de Obitu Valentin. Consolatio, c. 18, Patrol. xvi. 1424). See also Nicolaus I. (op. cit. c. 45, col. 998), Theodulfus of Orleans (op. cit. c. 42, col. 205).

A rarely occurring exception only serves to bring out more sharply the general observance of the rule, and thus it may be noted that the younger Theodosius orders (A.D. 408) that in the case of the Isaurian robbers, the examinations by torture should be held even in Lent or at Easter (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. 35, l. 7; p. 255, ed. cit.), on the ground that the suffering of the few was expedient for the benefit of the many.

Not only the criminal, but also the civil code was relaxed, for Ambrose speaks of the sacred season of the week before Easter when "solebant debitorum laxari vincula" (Epist. 20, c. 6; Patrol. xvi. 1038ⁿ).

(δ) Besides all these negative characteristics, we find also the endeavour to maintain a higher spirit of devotion, by an increased number of religious services. Thus in many cases, it would appear, sermons were delivered to the people daily throughout Lent, and Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis, to which we have already often referred, and those εἰς τοὺς ἀνδράντας were of this kind. (See esp. Hom. xi. in Gen. c. 3; vol. iv. 102).^o We may also cite here Theodulfus of

^m A curious extension of this idea is found in the Scavapeus of abbat Pirminius (ob. A.D. 758), who among other things deprecates the use of vehicles in Lent (Patrol. lxxxix. 1041). Again Nicolaus I. protests against the practice of hunting at that season (op. cit. c. 44, col. 997).

ⁿ We may note here that the council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) appoints Lent as one of the two periods in the year for the sitting of a synod of the bishops of the province to revise the sentence of excommunication inflicted by any of the number in the preceding season, as a check upon undue severity (can. 9, Labbe, ii. 32).

^o For another special manifestation of the same idea, see the rule laid down by the third council of Braga, that the three days at the beginning of Lent should be devoted to special forms of prayer, with litanies and psalms, by ⁱ Thus Augustine (Serm. 205, l.c.), "ut pretiosos cibos quaerat, quia carne non vescitur, et inusitatos liquores, quia vinum non bibit."

^k On this point, see J. C. Zeumer, Bacchanalia Christianorum, vulgo das Carneval, Jenae, 1699.

Orleans, in whose Cipitulae (c. 41, supra) it is ordained that all, save excommunicate persons, shall communicate on every Sunday in Lent. (Cf. also Augustine, Serm. 141 in Append. c. 5, vol. v. 2715.)

4. Liturgical Notices.—The earliest Roman sacramentary, the Leonine, is unfortunately defective in the part where Lent would occur, and we therefore first notice the references in the Gelasian sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1064 sqq.). This, in the form in which we now have it, has prefixed to the services for Lent an ordo agentibus publicam poenitentiam (c. 16), wherein it is ordained that the penitent be taken early on the morning of Ash Wednesday, clothed in sackcloth, and put in seclusion till Maundy Thursday, when he is reconciled. Then follow the forms for the week from Quinquagesima to the following Sunday, provision being made for the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, viewed as preliminary to, but as yet not forming part of, Lent. Thus in the Secreta of the first Sunday in Lent, we find "Sacrificium Domini, quinquagesimalis initii solemniter immolamus. . . ." Services are given for all the Sundays in Lent, and for all the week-days except Thursday [save only in the case of Maundy Thursday]. In the Micrologus (l. c.), Melchiades, bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 314) is credited with the order that the Thursdays in Lent should not be observed as fasting days. As we have above remarked, the same authority speaks of Gregory II. as having been the first to require the Thursdays to be observed like the other days of Lent.

After the forms for the first week is given that for the first sabbath of the first month "in xii. lect. mense primo," which is followed by forms for ordination. The mass for the third Sunday bears the heading, "Quae pro scrutiniis electorum (i.e. for baptism) celebratur." In the Canon mention is to be made of the names of those who are to act as sponsors for those about to be baptized, and afterwards the names of these latter themselves. The fourth Sunday is headed, "pro scrutinio secundo," with the recitations of names as before, as also on the fifth Sunday. After this are given the various forms requisite for baptism, and the attendant rites, ad faciendum catechumenum, benedictio salis, exorcism, etc., with the setting forth of the creed (Greek and Latin), and the Lord's Prayer. It may be noted finally that Palm Sunday bears the further heading De Passione Domini, a title which in the Gregorian sacramentary is given to the previous Sunday. For details as to the week from thence to Easter (the real Passion-week, though this name, by an imitation of Roman usage, is often, with infinitely less point, applied to the preceding week), reference may be made to the special article [HOLY WEEK].

In the Gregorian Sacramentary, after forms for Septuagesima, Sexagesima and Quinquagesima, comes the mass for Ash Wednesday (col. 35, ed. Ménard). It is headed Feria iv., Caput Jejuni, the latter words, however, are wanting in one of the best MSS., the Cd. leg. succ., a fact which has a bearing on the question as to Gregory the Great having been the first to add on the four days at the beginning of Lent, a view which we considered his own words already cited rendered very improbable. It may further be noted that while this sacramentary provides services for every day from Ash Wednesday to Easter, there is no trace of the word Quadragesima till the first Sunday, the previous Saturday, e. g., being Sabbatum intra Quinquagesimam.

In the Ambrosian Liturgy, the service for Quinquagesima is immediately followed by that for "Dominica in capite Quadragesimae" (Pamelius, Liturgg. l. i. 324). The services for the week days in this liturgy are the same as in the Gregorian. The Sundays after the first bear the following names, from the subjects of the Gospels, (2) Dominica de Samaritanis, (3) de Abraham, (4) de Caeco, (5) de Lazaro, [to the Saturday in this week is the heading in traditione Symboli, that is, for the approaching baptism], (6) in Ramis olivorum.

The ancient Gallican lectionary and missal, edited by Mabillon, make no mention of Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, or of Ash Wednesday. The former gives for the Prophetic Lection and Epistle for the "Initium Quadragesimae" (sic) i. e. the first Sunday in Lent, Isaiah lviii. 1-14, 2 Cor. vi. 2-15. (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 124.) The Gospel is unknown, as well as all the lections for the succeeding days till Palm Sunday, eight leaves of the MS. being wanting. The numbers, however, prefixed to the sets of lections shew that the missing ones correspond exactly with the number of Sundays in Lent, with nothing for any week day. For Palm Sunday the Prophetic Lection, Epistle and Gospel, are respectively Jeremiah xxxi. . . . 34 [the beginning is unknown, owing to the gap in the MS.], Heb. ii. 3-34, John xii. 1-24.

In the Gothico-Gallic missal are seven masses in all for the season of Lent, the first being headed "in initium Quadragesimae (op. cit. p. 228), followed by four headed "Missa jejuni," and these by one "Missa in Quad." The seventh is a "Missa in Symboli traditione" (cf. op. cit., infra, p. 338 sqq.). Probably the two last masses are both for Palm Sunday; and these are followed by one for Maundy Thursday. As regards the mass "in Symboli traditione" it will have been observed that the Ambrosian liturgy orders the creed to be communicated to the catechumens on the previous Saturday. Palm Sunday was the time ordinarily chosen in Spain and Gaul (cf. Isidore, de Eccles. Off. i. 37. 4; Patrol. lxxxiii. 772; also Concil. Agath. [A.D. 506], can. 13; Labbe, iv. 1385), where eight days is fixed as the period before baptism when the creed is to be imparted. Leslie (op. cit. 283) speaks of the above name as given to the fourth Sunday in Lent, but only cites a canon of the third council of Braga, which fixes the interval as twenty days (Concil. Brac. iii. [A.D. 572], can. 1; Labbe, v. 896). According to Isidore (l. c.), Palm Sunday was called capitilavium, because the children's heads were then washed with a view to the approaching Easter baptism.

In the Mozarabic liturgy, as we now have it, Sundays are reckoned up to the eighth after the octave of the Epiphany, followed by the "Dominica ante diem Cineris," and this by "feria iv. in Capite jejuni." It is clear, however, that in Spain, Lent originally began on the Sunday after Quinquagesima, which left thirty-six fasting days (cf. Isidore, l. c.: Concil. Tolet. viii. can. 9, supra), and thus there is no form for Ash Wednesday in the Hispano-Gothic use. The Mozarabic missal, therefore, has borrowed from the Toledo missal the office for the benediction of the ashes; the Gospel and prayers correspond with those for the first Sunday in Lent in the Hispano-Gothic use, and the Prophetic Lection and Epistle with those for the following Wednesday. Altogether the services in the Mozarabic liturgy are much out of order (Leslie, Not. in Liturg. Mozarab.; Patrol. lxxxv. 287). As a further consequence of the putting on of Ash Wednesday and three following days, whereas in the Hispano-Gothic use the title Dominica in (ante) carnes tollendas belongs to the first Sunday in Lent, in the Mozarabic it refers to Quinquagesima.

This latter has forms for Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays throughout Lent, and also for Maundy Thursday and Easter Eve. Under Ash Wednesday is given the form for the benediction of the ashes. In this rite (which, it may be remarked in passing, is one of those noted by Gillebert, bishop of Limerick [ob. after A.D. 1139], which may only be performed by a priest in the absence of the bishop, see BENEDICTIONS, p. 195), the priest or bishop (sacerdos), after blessing the ashes, sprinkles them with holy water, and they are then received from his hand by the clerics and laymen present. As each takes of them he is addressed in the words, "Memento, homo, quia cinis es, et in cinerem reverteris, age poenitentiam, et prima opera fac." The Prophetic Lection, Epistle and Gospel for this day are Wisdom i. 23-33; James i. 13-21; Matt. iv. 1-12.

A common name in Spain for the first Sunday in Lent was Dominica in Allevia, because of the markedly festal way in which the day was observed, and from the special singing of Aleluia on that day. We may take this opportunity of remarking that the ancient Spanish use was to close on this day the doors of the baptistery, which were sealed with the bishop's seal, till Maundy Thursday. The seventeenth Council of Toledo [A.D. 694] dwells on this rule (cap. 2; Labbe, vi. 1364; cf. Hildephonsus Toletanus [ob. A.D. 669] Adnot. de cognitione baptismi, c. 107; Patrol. xcvi. 156). A notice of the same custom as prevailing in the Alexandrian church is found in the ancient lectionary published by Zaccagnius (Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum, p. 718).

The following are the Old Testament Lections, Epistles and Gospels given in the Mozarabic liturgy for the Sundays in Lent; those for the Wednesdays and Fridays we have not thought it necessary to add. (i.) Isaiah lv. 2-13 (but formerly 1 [3] Kings xix. 3-14, Leslie, op. cit. 296); 2 Cor. v. 20-vi. 11; John iv. 3-43. (ii.) Prov. xiv. 33-xv. 8; Gen. xli. 1-46; James ii. 14-23; John ix. 1-36. "mediante die festo" [a name due not only to the fact that on this day was the middle point of Lent according to the Hispano-Gothic use, but also because of the occurrence of the words "Jam autem die festo mediante ascendit Jesus in templum" in the Gospel for the day: Leslie, op. cit. 353] Eccclus. xiv. 11-22;

1 Sam. i. 1-21; 2 Pet. i. 1-12; John vii. 1-15, (v.) Eccclus. xlvii. 24-30, 21-33; 1 Sam. xxvi. 1-25; 1 John i. 1-8; John x. 1-17. (vi.) In the Greek church there is a special service book, called the Triodion, for the period extending from what would be with us the last of the Sundays after the Epiphany (called with them the Sunday of the Pharisee and Publican, from the Gospel for the day) to Easter Eve. Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, are respectively the Sundays of the Prodigal (from the Gospel for the day), τῆς ἀποκρέως (because from Sexagesima onwards flesh was not eaten; cf. οὐ μὴ φάγω κρέα 1 Cor. viii. 13, which enters into the Epistle for the day), and τῆς τροφάγου (from the nature of the diet taken in the ensuing week). The Lent of the Greek church is begun on the day after Quinquagesima, no special regard being paid to Ash Wednesday. The Armenian church, however, begins on the Monday before Quinquagesima; the fast of this first week being known as the Artziurion, a word of very doubtful origin (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 742). The Epistles and Gospels used in the Greek church for the six Sundays of Lent are as follows: (i.) κυριακή τῆς ὀρθοδοξίας (in memory especially of the final overthrow of the Iconoclasts), Heb. xi. 24-26, 32-40; John i. 44-52. (ii.) Heb. i. 10-ii. 3; Mark ii. 1-12. (iii.) κυριακή σταυροπροσκύνησιμος, or simply σταυροπροσκύνησις [See CROSS, ADORATION OF, I. 501], Heb. iv. 14-v. 6; Mark viii. 34-ix. 1. (iv.) Heb. vi. 13-20; Mark ix. 17-31. (v.) Heb. ix. 11-14; Mark x. 32-45. (vi.) Phil. iv. 4-9, Gospel for Matins, Matt. xxi. 1-11, 15-17, for Liturgy, John xii. 1-18.

LEO I. (1) the Great, pope A.D. 440-461, is named first of all confessors in the Breton Litany (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82), second only to Silvester in that at the mass for an emperor in Sacr. Gregor. (Muratori, 463), Nov. 10, and commemorated that day (Mart. Hier. Raban), but April 11, (Bede, Raban, Notker), "Cujus temporibus synodus Chalcedonensis extitit" is added on that day first by Usuard. Commemorated in the Greek church, Feb. 18. April 11 is probably the day of his translation to a more conspicuous tomb in the basilica of St. Peter, by Sergius (A.D. 687-701). He had an oratory in the days of pope Paul below the basilica of St. Peter without the walls (Anast. 83-95).

LEO (2) Pope A.D. 683, June 28 (Anastasius, the Capitulary published by Fronto, Mart. Rom. Bede, Ado, Usuard). Sollerius would make out that this was originally a festival of Leo I. But it is not certain that all the celebrations in the sacramentary of Gregory really date from Gregory's time. (For the collects there given v. Muratori, p. 100, or Migne; v. Rossi, i. 127.)

LEODEGARIUS, LEUDEGARIUS, LAUDGARIUS (ST. LEGER), bishop of Autun, killed by Ebroin, mayor of the palace, A.D. 678, and commemorated Oct. 2, with a special service in the Gothic missal, as a martyr: "O beatum virum Laudegarium antistitem qui corpus nexibus absolutum, ora labii minuatum oculisque orbatum, exilium perpetratum, lubricitatis saeculi positum, diversis tormentis passum, exemplum episcopis reliquit, . . . coronam immarcescibilis floriis remuneratur unde multae post reliquiae in Gallis floruerunt." The grammar is not perfect, nor is it clear what is meant by the relics of his heavenly crown blooming in Gaul. He is not named in the metrical martyrology of Bede. The place of his martyrdom is still St. Leger's wood. He was buried at Sercin. Afterwards the bishops of Autun, Arras, and Poitiers, contended for the possession of his body. They drew lots, and it fell to the latter, and was translated to the monastery of Maxentius at Poitiers, March 16, where a church had been dedicated to him the 30th October preceding. (Acta SS. Oct. i. 427, 428.) Monasteries were dedicated to him at Morbach in Alsace, and δυνάμεις αὐταῖς ἡλίον Λεωνίδου.

He is perhaps intended by the mention of the name on April 16 in the Hieronymian Martyrology.

(2) Father of Origen, and martyr circa A.D. 204. On June 28, the name is joined with Potamiaena and the other disciples of Origen, and thus attached as a companion to Irenaeus the same day. (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. June vii. 321.) Supposed to be the one mentioned with Arator, Quiriacus, and Basilus, April 22 in the Mart. Hieron. and Acta SS. April, iii. 10.

LEPERS, LEPROSI. There are few notices of the treatment of lepers in the early church. It is probable the disease did not assume such dimensions as to call for special enactments. Ugolini, under the heading De Morbis Biblicis, has collected (Thesaurus, vol. xxx. 1544) several reasons why leprosy was less prevalent in the Christian than in the Jewish church. The council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) has a canon (c. 17) directed against τοὺς ἀλογευσαμένους καὶ λεπροὺς ὄντας ἤτοι λεπρώσαντας; which may refer either to actual lepers, or may signify that those who polluted themselves with unnatural crimes contracted a moral leprosy. The council orders that their station shall be among the χερμαζόμενοι, inter hyemantes [HIEMANTES]. In the Gallic church the bishops are directed by the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 549 (c. 21), to take care that no lepers within their diocese are left destitute, but that they are supplied with food and raiment from the church funds. The 3rd council of Lyons, A.D. 583 (c. 6), gives a similar injunction, with the addition that the lepers are to be prohibited from wandering from one diocese to another. In some instances they must have been in danger of being cut off from all church membership, for pope Gregory II., A.D. 715–731 (Ep. xiii. ad Bonifac.), gives a formal sanction to the Holy Communion being administered to them, although not in company with others free from disease. Some special directions are also given by pope Zacharias, A.D. 741–752 (Ep. xii.) de regio morbo laborantibus; the regius morbus in this instance has been held by some to signify leprosy. Martene (De Rit. Antiq. iii. 10) has printed from French rituals various specimens of the forms and services to be observed in the treatment of lepers, but they lie outside our period. [G. M.]

LEPTIS, COUNCIL OF (Leptense Concilium), held A.D. 386, or thereabouts, at Leptis, in Africa, when nine canons contained in a synodical letter of pope Siricius to the African bishops, were received. By the second of them it is ordained that no single bishop may ordain another. (Mansi, iii. 670, and Supplem. ad Colet. i. 252, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS.) [E. S. Ff.]

LERIDA, COUNCIL OF (Nerdense concilium), held A.D. 546—not 524, as was once thought—at Lerida in Catalonia, and passed sixteen canons on discipline, to which eight bishops subscribed, the bishop of Lerida subscribing last, and after him one presbyter representing a ninth. By canon 1, all who minister at the altar are commanded to abstain from shedding of blood under pain of being suspended for two years, and excluded from promotion ever afterwards. By canon 8, no clerk may lay hands upon any slave or pupil of his who has taken sanctuary. By canon 10, those who refuse to leave church, when ordered out for misbehaviour by the priest, are to be deemed contumacious and treated accordingly. By canon 14, the faithful may not communicate, nor so much as eat, with the rebaptized. Other canons are given to this council by Burchard: among them, one referring to the purgation of pope Leo III., which took place two and a half centuries afterwards (Mansi, viii. 609 sq.; comp. Catalan, Conc. Hisp. iii. 172). [E. S. Ff.]

LESSON. [LECTION; LECTIONARY.]

LESTINES, COUNCIL OF (Liptinense Concilium), said to have been held at Liptines, or Lestines, in Hainault, A.D. 743, or according to Mansi, 745; described as one of the five councils under St. Boniface, but beset with as many difficulties as the rest. 1. All the four canons assigned to it reappear among Carloman's capitularies, dated Liptines, A.D. 743 (Mansi, xi. Append. 105); indeed the first of them speaks of the counts and prefects, as well as bishops, who had met there to confirm what a former synod had passed. 2. The heading says it was celebrated under Carloman, and makes no mention of Boniface. 3. Hincmar and others, who are supposed to refer to it, affirm that a legate from Rome, named George, presided at it jointly with St. Boniface. But George was not sent into France by Zachariah, but by Stephen II.; nor before Feb. 755 (Cod. Carol. Ep. viii. ed. Migne), by when St. Boniface had been dead eight months. Hence some have supposed a second council of Liptines in that year. The question is rather, whether the first has been truly described as a council. (Mansi, xii. 370-5 and 589. Comp. Hartzheim's Conc. Germ. i. 50, et seq.)

LETTERS COMMENDATORY [COMMENDATORY LETTERS].

LETTERS DIMISSORY [DIMISSORY LETTERS].

LETTERS, FORMS OF [LIBER DIURNUS; SUPERScription].

LETTERS, PASCHAL [PASCHAL LETTERS].

LETTERS, PASTORAL [PASTORAL LETTERS].

LETTERS ON VESTMENTS. In the examples of early Christian art to be seen in the frescoes of the catacombs, and the mosaics of the basilicas, the dresses of the persons depicted are, in innumerable instances, marked by one or more letters or monograms on the border or outer fold. The letters thus employed are very various, and usually, if not always, belong to the Greek alphabet, and it must be acknowledged that hitherto no satisfactory explanation of their occurrence has been given. Those most frequently met with are I, H, X, T, Γ. The last letter, the capital gamma, was of such frequent use on the ecclesiastical robes of the Greek church, that it gave its name to a class of vestments [GAMMADIA]. Arbitrary symbols are also found, to which no meaning can be assigned, such as [J, J, J, Π, Ξ, □, I, Φ]. The earlier school of Christian archaeologists which was resolved to find a sacred meaning in every detail of the picture or bas-relief under consideration, had no difficulty in deciding that T and X represented the cross in different forms, while both I and H stood for Jesus, and Γ invariably denoted an apostle (Bosio, Rom. Sott. lib. iv. c. 3, p. 592; Aringhi, Rom. Subt. ii. lib. vi. c. 28; Mellini apud Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. i. c. xiii. p. 98). This supposed law, hastily deduced from insufficient evidence, has been entirely refuted by wider examination. Ciampini (l. c.) proves it to be quite baseless. The theory however propounded by him, and supported by Buonarroti (Petri, p. 89), that those letters and monograms on the dresses were the weavers' marks is equally destitute of a solid foundation, and is ridiculed by Ferrario (Costume antico e moderno: Europa, vol. iii. p. 149; Monumenti di Sant' Ambrogio in Milano, p. 176), since the same marks appear in mosaics most widely separated both by time and place. Other theories, e.g., that the letters indicate the name of the individual represented, or of the mosaic-workers, or even of the tailors who made the clothes, prove equally untenable, and the hopelessness of discovering any principle that would satisfactorily account at the same time for the variety and the identity of the marks has led some to assert that they were used capriciously (e.g., Suarez, bishop of Vaison, de Vestibus literatis, p. 7), without any fixed law simply in imitation of an already established custom. The existence of this custom of weaving, or embroidering letters in the fabric, or sewing them on to the stuff, is proved by classical authorities. Pliny speaks of the ostentation of Zeuxis the painter, in having his name woven in golden letters on the border of his pallium at Olympia (Hist. Nat. lib. xxxv. c. 36, § 2). Apuleius speaks of "lacinias auro literatas" (De Asin. aur. lib. 6, ad init.). Vopiscus describes Carinus as adopting the same custom (Vopisc. in Carin.). Suidas (s.v.) defines τριβωνόφορος as "one wearing a robe, having on it signs like small letters" (σημεία ὡς γραμματίαι). The purple clavi sewn on the senatorial robes, which gave its designation to the laticlavium, are considered by Rubenius to have been "letters, not mere stripes," "litteras lacinias palliorum insertas" (De Re vestiaria, lib. iii. c. 12). In the well-known vision of Boethius, the ascent from practical to theoretical wisdom is symbolised by the letter Π woven into the bottom of the border of the robe of Philosophy, and Θ at the top, the intervening space being occupied with letters arranged like the steps of a ladder (De Consolat. lib. i. pros. 1). Although it is impossible to believe that the selection of the letters in the Christian representations was entirely capricious, it must be confessed that no satisfactory explanation of them has yet been given, and that the subject requires further elucidation. LEUCIUS (1) Bishop of Brindisi, or LEONTIUS, or LAURENTIUS (Greg. Ep. vi. 62 (ix. 73), cf. De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 228), is commemorated Jan. 11. (Mart. Hieron.)

LEVITE. (Λευίτης, Λευεῖτης, Levita.) Professor Lightfoot has remarked (on Philippians, p. 187, 2nd ed.) that "the Levite, whose function it was to keep the beasts for slaughter, to cleanse away the blood and offal of the sacrifices, to serve as porter at the temple gates, and to swell the chorus of sacred psalmody, bears no strong resemblance to the Christian deacon, whose ministrations lay among the widows and orphans, and whose time was almost wholly spent in works of charity." Nevertheless, when the three orders of the Christian ministry came to be universally recognised, the analogy between the bishop with his attending presbyters and ministering deacons, and the high-priest with his attending priests and ministering Levites, was on the surface so strong, that the terms appropriate to the one soon came to be transferred to the other. Thus Origen (Hom. 12 in Jerem. 3, iii. p. 196, ed. Delarue), quoted by Lightfoot (ib. p. 256), regards the priests and Levites as corresponding to the presbyters and deacons respectively. From the third century onward Levite is a frequent designation of the Christian ministry. Thus the 2nd council of Carthage, A.D. 390, designates (c. 2) the three orders of the ministry as antis ites, sacerdotes, and Levitae (Codex Eccl. Afric. c. 3). Synesius (Epist. 58, p. 35, ed. Paris, 1640) speaks of the different grades of the ministry as Levites, presbyters, and bishops.

In the early portion of the Apostolical Constitutions, however, the bishops are regarded as succeeding to the Levitical privileges of the older dispensation. The bishops who serve the holy tabernacle, that is, the Holy Catholic Church, are the Levites in respect of the congregation (ii. 25. 5); the bishops inherited the Levitical privilege of receiving gifts for the benefit of the community (iv. 8. 1). On the other hand, in the later portion of the Constitutions (viii. 46. 3 ff.) the high-priest, priest, and Levite are regarded as analogous to bishop, presbyter, and deacon.

LEVITO (also Levitonarium, Lebito, Lebitonarium, Lebetes; Λεβιτών, Λεβητών, Λεβητωνάριον, Λευιτών, etc.). The name Levito, a word apparently of Coptic origin* (see Tattam's Lexicon Aegyptiaco-Latinum, in Append.), is used for a kind of sleeveless cloak, ordinarily worn by Egyptian monks—"Levitonarium est colobium sine manicis, quali monachi Aegyptii utuntur (Isidore, Etyim. xix. 22). The word occurs frequently in the Rule of Pachomius, of which we have Jerome's translation from Eusebius (Vita, c. 2; Regula, cc. 2, 67, 70, 81; in Jerome, vol. ii. 53 sqq. ed. Vallarsi). From this we learn that each monk was allowed two Levitonaria and a Psinthium, or mat, in his cell. The material, of which this dress was made, was doubtlessly linen. Ménard (Not. ad Concord. Regularum, Benedicti Anianensis, c. 2; Patrol. ciii. 1237) argues that in the passage of Isidore cited above, the word lineum has dropped out after colobium, for Papias, the grammarian, quoting apparently from Isidore, so reads it. Also, Rufinus (de Vitis Patrum, c. 7; Patrol. xxi. 411) speaks of it as "stupeum colobium." Cassian again (de Coenobiorum Institutis, i. 5; Patrol. xlix. 68, where see Gazet's note) speaks of the Egyptian monks as "colobiis lineis induti." Also the Rule of Pachomius speaks of it directly as "tunica lineae." We need not therefore attach weight to the definition given by Suidas, χιτών μοναχικὸς ἐκ τριχῶν συντεθειμένος. For further references, see Ephrem Syrus (de Humilitate, c. 88; vol. i. 326, ed. Assemani) and Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca, cc. 38, 52; Patrol. Gr. xxxiv. 1099, 1138); also Ducange, Glossaries, s. vv. [R. S.]

LIBEL (Libellus famosus). The frequent enactments, both in ecclesiastical and civil legislation, against the circulation of libels, that is, scandalous charges circulated in writing, prove the frequency of the practice. The Theodosian Code (lib. ix. tit. 34, de Famosis Libellis) has detailed and rigorous enactments. Even the reader or collector of such libels is to be liable to capital punishment. And that of Justinian has provisions substantially the same. This seems to have been because the person in possession of or circulating a libel, was presumed, in law, to have been the author of it and punished as such (sciat se quasi auctorem hujusmodi . . . subjugandum). And this presumption might probably be rebutted by suitable evidence. The Apostolical Canons (Nos. 54, 55, 83) deal only with the case of a clergyman maligning another cleric, or a bishop, or the emperor; in the latter case he was to be deposed. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 17) remarks on the proneness of the clergy to present to the emperor accusations (βιβλία) against each other before the first council of Nice, and relates that Constantine ordered all these libelli to be burnt unread.

In a collection of canons said to have been delivered by pope Adrian to Ingilram, bishop of Metz, we find one apparently founded on the rule of law mentioned above, and embodying similar provisions. And the Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305) anathematised in its 52nd canon those who should be found to have circulated libels, "famosos libellos," in the church.

In the 6th century denunciations of this offence become much rarer. From that period forwards we have only a very few canons, and those in general terms, against libel. The councils are mostly occupied with a different class of offences, such as would naturally arise in the ruder state of society which followed upon the irruption of the barbarians and the fall of the empire. [S. J. E.]

LIBELLATICI. [LIBELLI.]

LIBELLI. I. In the Decian persecution the constitution of the courts employed to enforce conformity, and the number of minor officials dealing with individuals, rendered evasion easy. The approved form of submission to the state ritual was (as under Trajan) to offer sacrifice or incense, but it was possible also to tender submission in writing. The name of one who "professed" in this way was subscribed to a renunciation of Christianity, or to a denial of the charge, or to a declaration of having recently or habitually attended sacrifices, or sometimes (unless Augustine has fallen into an unlikely mistake) to a mere profession of readiness to comply. This document was delivered to a magistrate, entered on the Acta, and finally published in the Forum.

* In the article COLOBIUM it is suggested that the word is derived from Levita, since the colobium was the special vestment of deacons. This view, though found in some mediaeval writers, is, I think, quite untenable, as the passages already cited point distinctly to a primarily monastic use, and connect the dress essentially with Egypt.

II. Certificates of exemption, like the "Parliamentary Certificates" of our own history, were offered by officials for money, and actually thrust on persons who believed themselves, after privately avowing their faith, to be only purchasing exemption from the obligation to conform. This would have been simply a species of confiscation, which has rarely given great offence (the church penance for it was of six months' duration, S. Pet. Alex., can. 5; but on the Montanist view of such acts see Tillemont sur la persécution de Déce, note iii). But it is evident from the efforts of Cyprian to awaken penitence in respect of them, that the purport of this kind of libellus was not less objectionable than the first. They cannot have sanctioned exemption without some grounds alleged, and those grounds can scarcely have been any other than that the certifying officer declared himself satisfied of the sound paganism of the recipient.

The difficulties found by authors on the subject of libelli have arisen from the assumption that they were all of one kind, or that there could be any regular formal procedure for the evasion of procedure. On the contrary, every conceivable means would be adopted. The accounts are not irreconcilable, but are about different things. Cyprian's language is precise to technicality in the use of professional terms.

I. (1), That libellus which the suspected Christian tendered is characterised in Cyprian de Lapsis, xvii. 22, "Professio est denegantis, contestatio christiani quod fuerat (cf. for this peculiar phrase, Cyp. c. Demetr. xiii. 11, id quod prius fueram) abnuentis." In Ep. 30, iii. 3, "Professio libellorum" is again the exhibition or putting in of such documents. Profteri is the proper term, as in the Acts of St. Agape (Ruinart, p. 424), Christi negationem scriptam profteri, and compare Aug. de Bap. c. Don. iv. 6. Again, contestatio means the plea, or statement of his own case, made by either party to a suit, answering to the δωμοσία of the Athenian courts. The Roman clergy in Cypr. Ep. 30, iii. 3, argue correctly that although a man may never have approached the altar, he is bound by the fact of having put in a legal affirmation (contestatus sit) that he had done it.

In the above passages the libellus is a document emanating from the recanting persons. Such are described in Peter of Alexandria (can. 5) as χειρογραφῶσιντες. The nature of its contents is indicated in the passage of the de Lapsis, "He has declared himself to have done whatever another in fact sinfully did" (faciendo commisit), although this passage implies further the appearance of a deputy, a slave or heathen friend to personate him in the sacrificial act, as was common in the persecution of Diocletian.

The offence of the bishop Martial (Ep. 67, vi.) who was "stained with the libellus of idolatry," is explained by this use of the word contestatus. In the public proceedings (actis publice habitis apud) before the Ducenary Procurator, he had appeared to put in a declaration that he had denied Christ and adopted a heathen cultus. He is not accused of having ever actually sacrificed, and according to Augustine (l.c.) libelli might contain only a declaration of readiness to do so.

(2) A second class are spoken of by Novatian and the Roman clergy, as having virtually "given acknowledgments, quittances, or discharges" (accepta fecissent, the best authenticated reading, is a common term (Dirksen, Manuale, s. v.), but "acta facere," which Neander adopts, makes good sense, namely, "to put in a plea in a process"), though not present in person, "cum ferent;" inasmuch as they had made a legal appearance (praesentiam suam fecissent) by commissioning a proxy to register their names (mandando ut sic scriberentur) on the lists of conformity. Novatian argues that, as one who orders a crime is responsible for its commission, so one who sanctions (consensu) the reading in public (public legitor) of an untrue declaration about himself is liable to be proceeded against as if it were true.

II. The other kind of libellus which emanated not from the renegade but from the magistrate, is described with equal precision. In the Epistle to Antonian (55, xi. 8), Cyprian says some of the Libellatici had received such. An opportunity for obtaining one presented itself unsought (occasio libelli oblata . . . ostensa); they went in person or by deputy (mandavi) to a magistrate, informed him of their religion, and paid a sum for exemption from sacrifice. Since no magistrate could issue an order simply staying the execution of an edict, his certificate undoubtedly contained a statement of the satisfactory paganism of its holder. Thus Cyprian tried to awaken their consciences, while they felt that they had avowed their religion, and that the form of the document was not their affair.

Again, in the Exhortation of Martyrdom, Christians are urged if a libellus is offered (libelli oblata sibi occasione) not to embrace the gift (decipitium malum munus), by the example of Eleazar, who refused the facilities offered him of eating lawful flesh as a make-believe for pork. The official connivance in each case would have enabled them to seem to do what they did not. The libellus is here something offered, and is a munus.

Thus nothing remains more clear than that the libellus of conformity is used for two kinds of documents. Maran thought the distinction was merely as to whether persons had been present or not at the registration of their names (vita Cypriani, vi.). Rigalt says that the libellatici only purchased a libellus of exemption. Tillemont alone has guessed that there might be two ways, "Peut-estre que l'on faisait et l'un et l'autre." Whether a document was issued also in cases of registration is not apparent; but all three sorts of persons are included under the name of libellatici.

III. Libellus is the proper name of a perfectly distinct kind of document issued by confessors or martyrs in prison, to those who had "fallen." When the reaction commenced among the lapsed, in their desire to recover their lost standing, some reappeared before the tribunals and suffered torture or death; others dedicated themselves to the service of confessors, others entered on penances of undefined duration (Cypr. Epp. 24, 21, 56). Many more relied on vicarious imputations of merit, by means of intercessions, always owned as availing for the individual before God (praerogativa eorum adjuvari apud Deum possunt, Ep. 18, cf. Ep. 19, ii.), but now first used in subversion of church order. At first a letter from a martyr to the bishop only prayed that the case of a lapsed friend might be enquired into on the cessation of persecution; a period of penitence and the imposition of hands being understood to be necessary just as for other sins; some, like Saturninus, declined to venture even on this; Mappalicus requested it only for his sister or mother (Cypr. Ep. 20). But the presbyters who composed at Carthage the faction hostile to Cyprian perceiving the effectiveness which might be given to the practice, anticipated not only the bishop's enquiry but even the death of martyrs, and "offered the names" of lapsed persons (see Aubespine, Oss. Ecc. L. i. § vii., prefixed to Priorius's Optatus, 1676, p. 40), and gave them communion as duly restored penitents (Ep. 34) upon receiving such letters from confessors without the bishop's sanction. These libelli sometimes specified only one of a group to whom they were granted, "Communicet ille cum suis" (Ep. 15). Then they were issued in the name of deceased confessors, and of confessors too illiterate to write themselves (Ep. 27), and this so copiously that some thousands were supposed to be circulating in Africa (Ep. 20). The chief authority in this issue, Lucianus, when remonstrated with by Cyprian, seems to have replied almost at once by promulgating in the name of "all the confessors" (compare the letter of ἅπας ἁγίους μαρτύρων from Nicomedia, end of cent. iii. Lucian ap. Routh, Relliquiae, vol. iv.) an indulgence to "all the lapsed," and requesting Cyprian himself to communicate it to the provincial bishops, the sole condition annexed being that their conduct since their fall should have been satisfactory. This extraordinary document is extant, as Cypr. Ep. 23. Cyprian himself was prepared to concede some weight to these libelli in cases not undeserving of restitution, but the influence of the martyrs was ignored in the council (Carth. Sub. Cyp. i.) which regulated the terms of readmission. [AFRICAN COUNCILS, I. 38.]

These seditious libelli of the martyrs seem to have had no existence at Rome. This was no doubt due to the influence in the exactly opposite direction of Novatian over the confessors, whom he commends for maintaining "Evangelica disciplina" (Ep. 30, iv. 4), and who at first adhered to him, and not to the milder Cornelius. The Roman presbyters sympathise with the African episcopate, and deplore the similar revolts in Sicily, and in "nearly all the world." They say of Rome, "We seem to have escaped so far the disorders of the times." The petition of Celerinus at Rome to the confessors of Carthage for "Peace" to be granted to his sisters, implies that libelli could not practically be obtained at Rome (Ep. 22); accordingly the Roman confessors who correspond with Cyprian, urge humility on the Carthaginians, and go beyond him in strictness (Epp. 27, 31, 32).

LIBER DIURNUS. The Liber Diurnus Pontificum Romanorum is a collection of formulae used in the correspondence and ordinary business, the "negotia diurna," of the Roman Curia.

Its date is determined within certain limits by internal evidence. In c. ii. tit. ix. p. 28, Constantine Pogonatus is referred to as departed. The formula which contains this reference therefore must have been drawn up or added to after the year 685. And Garnier argues that the book must have been compiled before the year 752, as it contains formulae of addresses to eparchs, which would, he thinks, not have been inserted after the date when eparchs were superseded. He considers the Liber Diurnus to have been drawn up in the time of Gregory II. (715-731), mainly on the ground, that in the second "professio fidei" of a newly-elected pope which it gives (p. 33 ff.), expressions and sentiments occur identical with some found in letters of that pope to the emperor Leo. Zaccaria, however, has shewn that at any rate the MS. which Garnier used was almost certainly not written earlier than the time of Gregory IV., as it contains an allusion (c. ii. tit. 2, p. 13) to the date of that pontiff's consecration (Nov. A.D. 827). And as it is very probable that many forms were left standing after they had ceased to be in actual use, no certain inference as to the date of the collection as a whole can be drawn from the fact, that forms are given for addresses to an exarch.

It was made use of by the early canonists, as Ivo of Chartres, Anselm, Deusdedit, and Gratian (Dist. xvi. c. 8); but as in the course of time forms of proceeding changed, it gradually fell out of use, and copies became rare.

Some time before the year 1650 the well-known Lucas Holstenius saw in the Cistercian monastery of S. Croce in Gerusalemme at Rome an ancient MS.* of the Liber Diurnus, and with some difficulty obtained from the abbat leave to have it transcribed—a task which is said to have been performed in a single night. While he was preparing to publish this, he heard of another MS. at Paris, in the possession of Sirmond, which was sent to him at Rome (Sirmondi Opera, iv. pp. 685 f. and 701). He does not appear however to have made any use of this MS., for what reason we do not know. His edition was printed, and a copy is found in the Vatican Library with the following title-page in Holstenius's own hand-writing: "Diurnus Pontificum, sive vetus Formularium, quo S. Rom. Ecclesia ante annos M utebatur. Lucas Holstenius edidit cum Notis. Romae typis Lud. Griniani, MDCL. 8vo." The notes are wanting, but Zaccaria, towards the end of the last century, saw Holstenius's preparations for them still preserved at Rome. The sheets were ready then in 1650, but not issued. The same book exactly, with the exception of some slight variations in the last sheet, is found with the printed title, "Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum ex antiquissimo codice ms. nunc primum in lucem editus Romae typis Josephi Vannucci, 1658." But the censors intervened, and the book was not published, though some sheets of it were sent to Petrus de Marca in 1660 (Baluze on de Marca, de Concordia, l. ix. 7). It is almost certain that this suppression of the book was due to its condemnation of pope Honorius (Professio Pontif. p. 41) as abetting heretics, a sentiment which seemed to Cardinal Bona, when the matter was submitted to him as president of the Congregation of the Index, a perilous one. In the pontificate, however, of Benedict XIII. (1724-1730) copies of the edition called of 1658 (really of 1650) were permitted to circulate.

Meantime Jean Garnier published an edition of the Liber Diurnus in quarto at Paris, in the year 1680. This seems to have been founded on the Paris MS. In 1685 Mabillon (Mus. Ital. i. 75) saw at Rome the original MS. which had been copied for Holstenius, and finding in it some formulæ not contained in Garnier's edition, inserted them in his Museum Italicum (i. pt. 2, pp. 32, 37), together with a selection of passages in which the reading of the MS. differed from that of Garnier's edition. These additions and various readings were used by Hoffmann in preparing the edition which he inserted in his Nova Collectio Scriptorum, vol. ii. pp. 1-268 (Leipzig, 1733). J. D. Schöpfung in his Commentationes Hist. et Crit. (Basil. 1741), pp. 502-524, having had access to a copy of the edition of Holstenius, noted almost all the places in which this differs from that of Garnier, and also added (pp. 525-530) those portions which are wanting in Garnier's edition, omitting four paragraphs, for what reason is not apparent. The edition of Riegger (Vienna, 1762) is a mere reprint of the original Paris edition. This is also reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. 105, with Mabillon's additions.

Garnier found the hundred and four formulæ in the codex without arrangement or division into parts or chapters. He arranged the matter and divided it into seven chapters. Of these the first contains the proper forms for papal letters to the emperor, the empress, the patrician, the exarch, a consul, a king, a patriarch, etc.; the second treats of the election and consecration of a pope, together with the proper forms of the letters to be written on such occasions to the emperor, the exarch, and other official personages; the third, of the consecration by the pope of the suburbicarian bishops; in the fourth are four formulæ for the bestowing of the Pallium; the fifth contains twenty-one formulæ for various transactions between the pope and the bishops of his own consecration; the sixth relates to the management of the estates of the Church; and the seventh to the granting of privileges to various ecclesiastical corporations, as monasteries and hospitals.

The book contains matter of great interest both in a dogmatic and an archaeological point of view. The "Professions" of a newly elected pope refer to such matters as ecclesiastical tradition, the respect due to the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, the heresies to be abjured and condemned, the claims of the Roman primate. The particulars of the order to be observed and the persons to be informed, on a vacancy of the papal see, are brought into clearer light by this document than by any other of so early a date. Much is learned as to the relation between the pope and the bishops of his own archdiocese, and also between the pope and the metropolitans who owned his jurisdiction, as to the conditions and the periods of ordination generally, to the residence of bishops, to the care and distribution of the property of the church; as to the different classes of churches—basilicas, tituli, oratories, and the like—their consecration, their endowment, and the offices to be performed in them; and as to the care of the sick and poor. In a word, a considerable portion of the ecclesiastical—especially the Roman ecclesiastical—life of the 8th century, or thereabouts, receives illustration from the Liber Diurnus.

(See Garnier's preface to the Liber Diurnus [Migne, Patrol. cv. pp. 11-22]; and Zaccaria's Dissert. de L. D., in his Biblioth. R. t. ii. sec. ii. pp. cccxix-cccxvi., Rome, 1781; and in Migne, cv. pp. 1361-1404. The most recent edition is that by Eug. de Rozière; Paris, 1869.) [C.]

LIBERA NOS. The amplification of the petition "Deliver us from evil," in the Lord's Prayer, found in almost all liturgies. For instance, that of the Gallican (which is variable), is on Christmas Day—"Libera nos, omnipotens Deus, ab omni malo et custodi nos in omni opere bono, perfecta veritas et vera libertas Deus, qui regnas in saecula saeculorum." That of St. James's Liturgy is given under EMBOLISMUS [l. 609]. Many liturgies contain supplications for the intercession of saints in the Libera nos. [INTERCESSION, l. 844.] [C.]

LIBRA. In the later Roman empire the pound of gold was divided into 72 aurei or solidi (Codex, x. tit. 70, s. 5; see DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s.v. "Aurum"). It was probably from this circumstance that a number of 72 witnesses was called Libra Occidna (Baronius ad an. 302, § 91 ff.). The same term is said to be applied to the suffragan bishops of the see of Rome, who were in number about 72 (Macri, Hierolex. s. v. Libra; BISHOP, I. 240). [C.]

LIBRARIES BELONGING TO CHURCHES AND MONASTERIES. The information that we are able to give on this subject is fragmentary, but not without interest.

I. The most ancient library of Christian books mentioned by any historian is that at Aelia (Jerusalem), collected by Alexander, the bishop of that city, A.D. 212. Eusebius of Caesarea, writing about 330, says that it contained the epistles, from one to another, of many learned ecclesiastics of the time of Origen (A.D. 230), and that he had himself made very great use of it in compiling his history (Hist. Eccl. vi. 20). There was a much larger and more famous library at Caesarea in Palestine, which appears to have been founded by Origen, with the munificent aid, we may suppose, of his friend Ambrosius, and to have been greatly enlarged by Pamphilus, the friend of Eusebius, A.D. 294. That it existed before the time of Pamphilus is clear from St. Jerome's account: "Having sought for them (books) over the world, but devoting himself especially to the books of Origen, he gave them to the library at Caesarea" (Expos. in Ps. 126, Ep. 34 ad Marcellam, § 1). The same author calls it the library of Origen and Pamphilus (De Vir. Illust. c. 113). In this library there was, as he informs us, the supposed Hebrew original of St. Matthew's Gospel (ibid. c. 3), which is probably the book (in the same collection) which he elsewhere describes as a Gospel in Syro-Chaldaic, used by the Nazarenes (Contra Pelag. iii. 2). In another work he says, "I have been somewhat diligent in searching for copies, and in the library of Eusebius at Caesarea I found six volumes of the Apology for Origen" (by Pamphilus) (C. Rufin. ii. 12). It contained copies of the greater part of the works of Origen, made by Pamphilus himself (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 75). The originals of the Hexapla were there, and Jerome corrected his copy from them (Comment. in Tit. iii. 9). Before the time of Jerome this library had fallen more or less into decay, but endeavours to restore it were made by two successors of Eusebius, viz. Acacius, 340, and Euzoius, 366 (Hieron. ad Marcell. u. s.). Of Euzoius, he says, on the authority of Thespesius Rhetor, that he "strove with great labour to refurnish with parchments the library of Origen and Pamphilus, which was already decayed" (De Vir. Illust. c. 113). Isidore of Seville, A.D. 636, asserts that the library of Pamphilus at Caesarea contained nearly 30,000 volumes (Orig. vi. 6).

There is extant the legal record of some proceedings that took place at Circa or Constantia, in Africa, during the persecution of 303-304. It relates that the officers "went to the church in which the Christians used to assemble, and spoiled it of chalices, lamps, &c., but when they came into the library (bibliothecam), the presses (armaria) there were found empty" (in Gesta apud Zenophilum, Optati Opp. App. ed. 1703; comp. August. c. Crescon. iii. 29). Constantine directs Eusebius the historian in a letter which the latter has preserved (De Vita Const. iv. 36) to cause to be written for the new churches in Constantinople, "by calligraphic artists, thoroughly skilled in the art, fifty volumes of the sacred writings, such as he knew to be most necessary for the supply and use of the church, on well-prepared parchments, legible and portable for use." Such a gift would, we may suppose, be in many cases the germ of a great church library. Julian the emperor, A.D. 362, orders Ecdicius the prefect of Egypt to send him the library of George, the Arian bishop of Alexandria: "See that all the books of George be sought out. For there were at his residence many philosophical, many rhetorical works, and many of the doctrine of the impious Galileans (Christians), which we could wish were all destroyed, but lest with these the more useful be made away with, let them also be carefully sought for. But let your guide in this search be the scribe [perhaps secretary] (vordapios) of George himself. . . . But I am myself acquainted with the books of George; for he lent me many, though not all, when I was in Cappadocia, for transcription, and had them back again" (Epist. Jul. 9). Julian was collecting books to enrich the library founded by Constantius in the portico of the imperial palace, and removed by himself to a more suitable edifice, which he had erected for the purpose. See Ducange, Constantinopolis Christiana, ii. 9. 3. Hence it appears that the books of which the church was robbed did not return to her. Georgius Syncellus tells us that he had brought to him from the library of Caesarea in Cappadocia an excellent copy of the book of Kings, "in which was an inscription to the effect that the great and holy Basil (bishop of that see from 370 to 378) had himself compared and corrected the copies from which it had been transcribed" (Chronogr. p. 382; ed. Dindorf). St. Jerome, after referring to a correspondent to several authorities, says, "Turn over the commentaries of all whom I have mentioned above; and make good use of the libraries of the churches; and thou wilt arrive more quickly at that which thou desirest and hast begun" (Epist. ad Iammach. 49, § 3; comp. Epist. 112, ad August. § 19). St. Augustine, writing at Hippo about the year 428, says, "I have heard that the holy Jerome wrote on heresies; but neither have we been able to find that little work of his in our own library, nor do we know from where it may be obtained" (De Haer. sub fin.). When Augustine was dying, "he directed that the library of the church and all the books should be carefully kept for posterity for ever." He also left libraries to the church, "containing books and treatises by himself or other holy persons" (Possid. Vita Aug. 31). Theodosius the younger, 408-450, "collected the sacred books and their interpreters so diligently, as not to come behind Ptolemy" (Niceph. Call. Hist. Eccl. xiv. 3). Whether his collection was for the imperial library or the Patriarchium, we are not told; but the fact is worth noting, because it shews the spirit of the age. The leading ecclesiastics would not be behind the emperor. Hilary of Rome, A.D. 461, according to the Liber Pontificalis, "made two libraries in the Lateran baptistery" (Anast. Vit. Pont. 47). From the same authority we learn that the works of Gelasius, A.D. 482, were "kept laid up in the library and archive of the church" down to the 9th century (n. 50). Gregory I. A.D. 598, replying to the request of Eulogius of Alexandria that he would send him the Acts of the Martyrs collected by Eusebius, says, "Besides those things which are contained in the books of Eusebius himself concerning the deeds of the holy martyrs, I know none in the archives of this our church, or in the libraries of the city of Rome, except a few collected in the roll of a single book" (Epist. vii. 29). A narrative assigned to the year 649 or thereabout, shews that there was at that time a library already attached to St. Peter's. It is said that when Taio, bishop of Saragossa, who had been sent from Spain by king Chindasuind to procure the latter part of the Moralia of Gregory, could not learn from the pope or anyone else where it was, the very press in which it lay was pointed out to him in a vision, as he watched and prayed by night in that church (De Visione, etc., Labb. Conc. v. 1844). Willibald, A.D. 760, in the life of St. Boniface, says that the four books of St. Gregory were to his day put into the "libraries of churches" (Pertz, Monum. Germ. Hist. ii. 334). At this period, and earlier, as we learn from an epistle of Taio, above mentioned, few books were composed or copied in the west, and all were in danger of destruction, from the constant wars which desolated the Latin world (Epist. ad Quiricum; Praefat. Saec. ii. O.S.B. § v. lv. 17). His evidence refers to Spain, but the evil was felt at Rome equally, as we learn from a statement of the Roman synod in 680, to the emperors who had convened the 3rd council of Constantinople. After describing themselves as "settled in the northern and western parts" of the empire, the Latin bishops say, "We do not think that any one can be found in our time who can boast of great knowledge, seeing that in our regions the fury of various nations is every day raging, now in fighting, now in overrunning and plundering; whence our whole life is full of care, surrounded as we are by a band of nations, and having to live by bodily toil, the ancient maintenance of the churches having by degrees fallen away and failed through divers calamities" (Labbe, vi. 681). Agatho, then bishop of Rome, made this an excuse for the ignorance of his legates, whom he sent to the council, as he said, "out of the obedience which he owed" to the emperors, "not from any confidence in their knowledge" (ibid. 634). Bede (De Temp. Rat. 66, followed by Hincmar, Opusc. 20 c. Hincm. Laud.) says that when they arrived at Constantinople they were "very kindly received by the most reverend defender of the Catholic faith Constantine (Pogonatus), and by him exhorted to lay aside philosophical [om. Hincm.] disputations, and to seek the truth in peaceable conference, all the books of the ancient fathers which they asked for being supplied them out of the library at Constantinople." The records of the council tell us that the same legates besought the emperor that the "original books of the patristic testimonies adduced might be brought from the Patriarchium" (Act. vi. Labb. vi. 719); and we find the bishop of Constantinople himself speaking of the "books of the holy and approved fathers which were laid up in his Patriarchium" (Act. viii. ibid. 730; comp. 751, 780). A large number of extracts from the fathers are said to have been compared with the originals in the "library of the Patriarchium" (Act. x. coll. 788, 790, 798, &c.). Several testimonies alleged are also said to have been compared with a "silver-bound parchment book belonging to the σκευοφυλάκιον of the most holy high church" in the same city (ibid. 813, 814, &c.). There was at Constantinople also a registry or repository of documents (χαρτοφυλάκιον, u.s. 963) under the charge of an officer called the χαρτοφύλαξ (ibid.). Whether this was a department of the library or distinct from it does not appear. The great esteem in which the church library at Constantinople was held by all parties is attested by the fact that the iconolater Theophanes refused to look at a copy of Isaiah, brought from the emperor's library, alleging that all his books were corrupted, but asked for one from the library of the Patriarchium instead (Continuatio, iii. 14).

For some centuries after this the Greeks possessed advantages for the acquisition of knowledge over the Latins; though there were many in the west, especially among the bishops, who employed themselves in collecting and multiplying good books. Thus Bede says of Acca, who succeeded Wilfrid at Hexham, A.D. 710, that he "gathered together the histories of the sufferings (of the martyrs, &c.), with other ecclesiastical books most diligently, and made there a very large and noble library" (Hist. Eccl. v. 20). Egbertus, bishop of York from 732-766, is another example in our own country. Alcuin, in 796, writing to Charlemagne from Tours, where he had opened a school, says, "I am partly in want of books of scholastic erudition, that are somewhat difficult to be procured, which I had in my own country, through the good and most devoted diligence of my master, or my own labour, such as it was." He therefore desired that some youths might be sent into Britain to bring back whatever was necessary, "that there might not only be 'a garden enclosed' at York, but that there may be at Tours also 'plants, an orchard with pleasant fruits'" (Cant. iv. 13), (Ep.st. 38). From William of Malmesbury (De Gest. Reg. Angl. i.) we learn that the master of whom Alcuin speaks is Egbert of York. Alcuin also celebrates in verse the library which Aelbert, another bishop of York, attached to his cathedral church, and gives the names of many of the fathers, poets, and grammarians, whose works were contained in it (Poema de Pont. Ebor. ll. 1525 et seq. tom. ii. p. 257). In 787 a great stimulus was given to the formation of libraries in cathedral churches within the dominions of Charlemagne, by an order issued by him for the establishment of schools in connexion with them (Labbe, Conc. v. 1779). Such schools, as we have seen, implied a good collection of books. A later edict of the same prince, after providing that there be "set up schools of reading boys," adds, "Let them learn the psalms, notes, chants, the art of determining the seasons (computum), and grammar [in its ancient sense], in every monastery and episcopal church (episcopium). Let them also have Catholic books, well corrected" (Capit. ann. 789, c. 70). These laws of Charlemagne would certainly lead to the foundation of cathedral libraries where they had not existed before. It is probable that the smaller libraries found in connexion with many other churches owe their origin in a great measure to a similar edict of Lewis in 816. By this, bishops were ordered to "see that the Presbyters had a missal and lectionary and other books necessary to them" (c. 28; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 569). What some at least of these "other books," supposed to be necessary, were, we may gather from the following list in an ancient polyptychon, preserved in the church of St. Remigius, at Rheims: "A book of the gospels, a psalter, an antiphony, a breviary [i.e. a table of the gospels for the year, in which they were indicated by their first and last words]. . . a computus, an order of baptism, a martyrology, a penitential, a pastoral, a volume of canons, forty homilies of St. Gregory" (ibid. ii. 1159). As soon as such a collection went beyond the requirements of the service, as in this case it did, the foundation of a church library was already laid.

II. We read of libraries attached to monasteries in the west at a somewhat early period. The rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530, speaks of the benefit to be derived from the reading of the Catholic fathers, their conferences, institutes, and lives (c. 73), in a manner which implies access to a considerable number of such works. Compare the rule of Ferreolus, A.D. 553 (c. 19). In Lent every monk under the rule of St. Benedict received a book "from the library" (bibliotheca), which he was to read through before he could have another (c. 48). The rule of Isidore, A.D. 595, enters into details: "Let the keeper of the sacarium (here=secretarium) have charge of all the books; from whom let all the brethren receive them one at a time, which they shall carefully read and handle, and always return after vespers. Let the books be asked for every day at the first hour; and let none be given to him who shall ask later" (c. 9). To shew the care with which the books were treated, we may mention that monks were allowed to have handkerchiefs in which to wrap them (Theodmar. Cassin. ad Car. Magna. in Capit. Reg. Franc. II. 1086), and that the council of Aix, 817, left it to the prior to determine, "when books had been received from the library," whether others should be given out or not (cap. 19). It would seem that, except in Lent, the ordinary monk did not have books out of the library for his private use; but the practice of reading aloud at meals implies a variety of suitable works. We hear of this even before the days of Benedict, viz. in the rule of Caesarius, A.D. 502: "While they eat at table, let no one speak, but let one read some book; that as the body is refreshed by food, so may the soul be refreshed by the word of God" (c. 9; comp. Reg. S. Ben. c. 38). Other times for reading were also appointed in some houses, as by the rule of Donatus for nuns, A.D. 640: "From the 2nd hour to the 3rd, if there be no need for them to work, let them employ themselves in reading . . . Let one of the elder read to the rest, as they work together" (c. 20).

Cassiodorus, who built, or entered, the monastery of Vivarium, about the year 562, collected books for it from the more distant parts of the world, and directed his monks that, if they met with any book that he wanted, they should make a copy of it, "that by the help of God and their labour, the library of the monastery might be benefited" (De Instit. Div. Litt. 8). In the preface to his work on Orthography, he gives a list of twelve books on the subject which he used in compiling his own. As he was then 93 years old, they were presumably all at hand in his own monastery. The fact suggests a good collection of works on general subjects, as well as on divinity. Among the Epistles of Gregory I. is one written (A.D. 599) to the Defensor of Naples representing that the books of the monastery of Macharis had in a time of trouble been carried into Sicily by a certain presbyter, who had died and left them there, and requiring that they should be restored (Epist. viii. 15). The monks of our own country were not behind others in collecting books. E.g. Benedict Biscop, abbat of Wearmouth, having visited Rome in 671, "brought home not a few books of all divine erudition, either bought with a set price or given to him by the kindness of friends, and when on his return he came to Vienne he received those which he had bought and intrusted to friends there" (Bede, Hist. Abbat. Wirem. § 4). In 678 he paid another visit to Rome, and then "brought home an innumerable quantity of books of every kind" (ibid. 5). "A great quantity of sacred volumes" was part of the result of a third visit in 686 (§ 8). In his last illness he gave directions that "the very noble and complete library, which he had brought from Rome, as necessary for the instruction of the church, should be anxiously preserved entire, and neither suffer injury through want of care nor be dispersed" (9). This collection, which was divided between the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, was "doubled" by the zeal of his successor, Coelfrid (12). It is to these libraries chiefly that we owe the learning of Bede. The order of Charlemagne in 787 already mentioned was addressed to abbats as well as bishops, and the only copy extant is that which was sent to the abbat of Fulda. It is interesting to know that less than 50 years after its promulgation, the famous Rabanus Maurus built a library there, which he amply stored with books (Vita per Rodolf. in Cave, Hist. Litt. nom. Raban). A beginning had been made, however, so far back as 754. When Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, was murdered by the Pagans at Dokem in east Frisia, they "broke open the repository of books . . . and scattered those which they found, some over the level fields, others in the reed-bed of the marshes, and flung and hid others away in all sorts of places." They were afterwards found and taken to Fulda, where three of them are still shewn, viz. a New Testament, a book of the Gospels, said to have been written by the martyr himself, and a volume stained with his blood, containing, with other tracts of St. Ambrose, de Spiritu Sancto and Bono Mortis (Willibaldi Vita S. Bonif. xi. 37, and Mabillon's note). In 799 Charlemagne founded an abbey at Charroux, which "he enriched with many relics and most munificent gifts brought to him from the east, and with a very rich library" (Gallia Christiana, ii. 1278). Many monastic libraries were destroyed by fire in the 9th and following centuries, in several of which books must have been accumulating during a lengthened period. For example, in 870, when the Danes destroyed the minster of Medhamsted (Peterborough), founded about 656, "a vast library of sacred books was burned with the charters of the monastery" (Ann. Bened. iii. 167, § 16, from Ingulf.). In 892 the monastery at Teano, near Monte Cassino, was burned down, "in which fire most of the deeds and instruments of the Cassinates were consumed, with the very autograph of the rule which the holy father Benedict had written with his own hand" (ibid. p. 283, § 67). About the year 900, the Hungarians destroyed the monastery of Nonantula by fire, and "burned many books" (ibid. 305, § 30).

We can give no certain information on the origin and condition of monastic libraries in the east during the period to which we are confined. We may, however, infer with great probability that monasteries began very early to collect books, from the fact that manuscripts of the highest antiquity are found in them at the present day. About 400 volumes of MSS. are now in the British Museum, which were brought in the years 1839, 1842, 1847 from a single Syrian monastery, viz. that of St. Mary Deipara, in the Desert of Nitria, or Valley of Scete. As a proof of the antiquity of some of these books, we may mention that the three volumes in which occur the several copies of the Epistles of St. Ignatius published by Mr. Cureton are, one earlier than 550, another some 50 or 60 years later, and the third "certainly not later than the 7th or 8th century" (Corpus Ignatianum, Intro. xxvii. or xxxiii.). In the second of these volumes is a notice curiously similar to one quoted above respecting an English abbat, to the effect that Moses of Nisibis, the superior of the monastery, "gave diligence and acquired that book together with many others, being 250, many of which he purchased, and others were given to him by some persons as a blessing [see EULOGIAE (5)], when he went to Bagdad" (xxxi.). This bears date A.D. 931. The MS. bible found by Tischendorf (1844, 1859) in the monastery of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai, is assigned to the 4th century (Nov. Test. Sinai. Tisch. Proleg. ix.). He obtained many other books from the same library, and many from monasteries in Palestine, at Berytus, Laodicea, Smyrna, in Patmos, and at Constantinople (Notitia Edit. Cod. Sinai. p. 7). In his collection, now at St. Petersburg, are various Greek fragments of the 5th and 6th centuries (ibid. p. 56); five of the New Testament of the 6th and 7th; and one of the 7th or 8th (p. 50): parts of some Homilies of St. Chrysostom (p. 55), and some liturgical remains of the 8th (p. 56); all in the same language; and a Syriac version of hymns and sermons by Gregory Nazianzen written in the 7th (p. 64). We do not multiply such facts, because, though very probable indications of the existence of monastic libraries in the East within our period, and of the nature of their contents, they do not amount to a direct and positive proof. [W. E. S.]

LIBRARIUS. The word librarius has two meanings—viz. either a 'book-seller' or a 'transcriber': we are concerned with it in the latter sense. Of course there must have been transcribers in abundance before Christian times, if, as is said, the libraries of the Ptolemies at Alexandria, and of the kings of Pergamus in Asia Minor contained between them a million volumes, and upwards in all languages (Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ants. art. 'Bibliotheca'). Transcribers were frequently slaves at first, or else worked for money, and were not well paid. Hence the endless complaints of their ignorance, carelessness, or dishonesty which occur in the Fathers as well as in classical authors (Wower, de Polymath. c. 18, ap. Gronov. Thes. x. 1079). But with Christian times the office of transcriber for libraries insensibly passed into better hands. It was not that he became, strictly speaking, a public functionary, but he copied far more frequently for ecclesiastical bodies than for private persons: and was, in most cases, a member of the body for which he worked. Thus he worked, not for money, but as a duty: and not on chance books, but on books carefully selected for their contents by his superiors. This altered the character of his performances materially, besides going far to ensure their preservation. It is a simple fact in history, that Christianity stands between us and the written records of all preceding ages, and is our sole guarantee for their trustworthiness in their present state.

Origen was one of the first Christians who is said to have employed transcribers regularly for literary purposes (Βιβλιογράφους, Euseb. E. H. vi. 23). Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, his friend and patron, was one of the first to form an episcopal library, which Eusebius found of great use in collecting facts for his history (ib. c. 20). Eusebius himself, by order of the emperor Constantine, had 50 choice copies of the scriptures made by experienced caligraphists on vellum, arranged in ternions and quaternions (Vit. Const. iv. 34-7, and Vales. ad l.). Pamphilus, the presbyter and martyr, with whom Eusebius was so intimate, enriched Caesarea with a large library, consisting of the works of Origen and other ecclesiastical writers, transcribed by himself (ib. c. 32, comp. St. Hier. de Vir. Illust. s. r.): and it was still in existence, and handy for readers, when St. Jerome wrote. [LIBRARIES.]

When parchment was scarce, one work was often effaced to make way for another. This may have been dictated here and there by religious prejudice: but in general what was least wanted at the time made way for what was most. The Scriptures themselves, or the works of the Areopagite—then regarded with almost equal reverence—were written over sometimes, as well as works like the Republic of Cicero—"Latent hodie," says Knittel (quoted by Mone, de Libr. Palimp. p. 2) in palimpsestis libris codices Novi Testamenti remotissimæ antiquitatis: hæc est prima ratio, cur magnæ sint utilitatis codices rescripti."

We must never forget, in estimating their practices or productions, that Christian transcribers were of all ranks and capacities. "The highest dignitaries of the church and princes even, says Mr. Taylor (Transmission of Ancient Books, c. ii. § 5), "thought themselves well employed in transcribing the Gospels and Epistles, the Psalter, or the Homilies and Meditations of the Fathers: nor were the classical authors... neglected by these gratuitous copyists." And again: "Every church and every convent and monastery had its library, its librarian and other officers employed in the conservation of books" (ib. c. 1, § 1). Then, further, as Mr. Taylor observes, "The property of each establishment—and the literary property of each establishment was always highly prized—passed down from age to age, as if under the hand of a proprietor: and was therefore subjected to fewer dispersions and destructions than the mutability of human affairs ordinarily permits" (c. i. § 1). And again: "The places in which the remains of ancient literature were preserved during the middle ages were too many, and too distant from each other, and too little connected by any kind of intercourse, to admit of a combination or conspiracy for any supposed purposes of interpolation or corruption. Possessing, therefore, as we do, copies of the same author, some of which were drawn from the monasteries of England, others from Spain, and others collected in Egypt, Palestine, or Asia Minor, if, on comparing them, we find that they accord except in variations of little moment, we have an incontestable proof of the care and integrity with which the business of transcription was generally conducted" (ib.)... Transcribers were frequently concealed under other names, from being attached to some special office, or else from their art having come to be divided into different branches. They were the notaries, chancellors, clerks, readers, amanuenses, of most convents, as Mabillon shews (Dipl. i. 13). St. Isidore tells us of another distinction which is still more to the point. "Librarii," he says, "idem et antiquarii vocantur: sed librarii sunt, qui et nova et vetera scribunt: antiquarii, qui tantummodo vetera, unde et nomen sumpserunt" (Etym. vi. 14). If this be true, and other authorities might be cited for it, there was a class of copyists whose labours were confined to re-transcribing old MSS.

Illuminators, again, formed another branch of the profession. They designed the initial letters, laid on the gold, or painted the miniatures. Under this last word, again, we have the record of another class: miniatores, who filled in the 'rubrics.' In general, the tran-scriber left blanks both for the rubrics and illuminations, as we see from many MSS. whose blank spaces have been but partially filled, or left altogether untouched. Sometimes it happened that there were transcribers who did all for themselves. Otherwise, we may occasionally find the dates of the handwriting and of the decorations separated by a wide interval. [MINIATURE.]

After a MS. had been transcribed, it passed through other hands to be corrected (Mabill. Suppl. c. xiii. 29): and the corrections in many cases not being erasures, we see what was judged erroneous, and what was judged right at the time. They are perhaps oftener corrections of spelling, or of words omitted, than of anything else: while numerous errors of grammar are left untouched.

Handwriting, of course, varied with the age, though two or more were almost always in full use at the same time. The handwriting of the 13th century, for instance, was always liable to be imitated by transcribers who lived much later, but it was unknown to transcribers who lived much earlier. Antiquaries could reproduce obsolete styles, but could not anticipate styles as yet unborn. Consequently, the rise of the different styles may be fixed with some accuracy; not so their duration after they had become current.

"The instruments," say the authors of the Now. Trait. Diplom. (p. ii. § i. c. 10), "with which antiquity required that the work-room of a transcriber should be provided, were the ruler, compass, lead, scissors, penknife, hone, sponge, style, brush, quill or reed, inkstand or inkhorn, writing table, desk, vial with liquid for thinning ink become too thick, vial with vermilion for writing titles of books or chapters, and a box of pounce. Each of these instruments had its own special use."

Their materials were more limited. "Parchment," says Mr. Taylor (c. ii. § 1), "so called, long after the time of its first use from Pergamus, a city of Mysia, where the manufacture was improved... is mentioned by Herodotus and Ctesias as a material that had been from time immemorial used for books." Almost all the early MSS. we possess are written on this. "In the east, leaves of the mallow or palm were used in remote times... and the inner bark of the linden or teel tree... called by the Romans 'liber,' and by the Greeks 'biblos,' was so generally used as a material for writing as to have given its name to a book in both languages... Tables of solid wood called codices, whence the term 'codex' for a MS. on any material... were also employed... leaves or tablets of lead or ivory are mentioned... and still oftener 'tablets covered with a thin coat of coloured wax,' removable 'by an iron needle called a style.' Paper made from the papyrus in Egypt was in considerable demand at one time, but it was found to be less durable than parchment. Cotton paper, 'charta bombacina,' which began to be used in the west about the 10th century, led to the introduction of paper from rags, as at present, about two centuries later.

"Transcribers frequently subscribed their names at the end of a MS., with the year in which it was written, accompanied by a pious wish that posterity might profit by its perusal, and other particulars; numerous instances might be cited. The celebrated 'codex Amiatinus,' used by Tischendorf in his latest edition of the Vulgate of the Old Testament, has an inscription at the end of the book of Exodus, from which he infers it was transcribed by one of the disciples of St. Benedict named 'Servandus,' about A.D. 541" (Proleg. p. viii. ix.). Mabillon, in his Diarium Italicum, mentions a MS. of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul, inscribed with the name of Theophylact, presbyter and doctor of law, and dated 6492 from the Creation, or A.D. 984 (c. 25). This was in Greek. Another, the Life of St. Gregory the Great, by John the deacon, in Latin, has the following: "Ego, Ugo, indignus sacerdos, inchoavi hunc librum 8 Cal. Sept. et explevi eum 14 Cal. Oct. feliciter concurrente sexto, indict. 15." Another, a work of Matthew Palmer the poet: "Antonius, Marii filius, Florentinus civis atque notarius, transcriptis Florentiae ab originali 11 Cal. Jan. MCCCCXLVIII. Valeas qui legas." . . . (Ib. and comp. c. 27.) "Qui legis, orate pro me," was another pious and favourite parting sentence.* Most of the oldest MSS., however unfortunately, supply no such clue to their authorship or date, and there are very few that have not had later additions appended to them, often in the same handwriting, which throw doubts upon their earlier parts. Often, again, the same work has not been copied all through by the same scribe; and sometimes the writing of contemporary scribes varies as much as the writing of one age from another. Dedictory pieces again, especially when in verse, are apt to mislead. Sometimes it is their complimentary vagueness, sometimes it is the affectation of a higher antiquity than really belongs to them, that has enhanced the value of a MS. unduly. When Waterland, for instance, speaks of the Vienna MS. as "a Gallican psalter, written in letters of gold, and presented by Charlemagne, while only king of France, to pope Adrian I., at his first entrance upon the pontificate, in the year 772" (Crit. Hist. p. 101), he draws his conclusion from the dedicatory verses in gold letters at its commencement. But these might have been written by any king Charles, on giving this psalter to any pope Adrian. And there was a combination of just such another king, and just such another pope in Charles the Bald and Adrian II.

LIGATURAE (Ligamenta, Ligamina, Alligaturae, Suballigaturae, δέσεις, καταδέσεις, καταδεσμοί, περιάμματα, περιπτα) were amulets or phylacteries bound (ligatae) to any part of the body of man or beast, in the hope of averting or driving away evil. The name was, however, often given to amulets attached to the person in any other way; as when suspended, in which case they were sometimes called by the Greeks ἐξαρτήματα. This is one among many gainful superstitions which St. Chrysostom charged "certain of the vagabond Jews" (Acts xix. 13) with practising, as their fathers had done before them. Thus he says to Christians to whom they promised health by such means: "If thou persevere for a short time, and spurn and with great contumely cast out of the house those who seek to sing some incantation over, or to bind some periapts to the body, thou hast at once received refreshment from thy conscience" (Adv. Jud. Hom. viii. § 7). The heathen were equally addicted to their use. Two or three examples out of many given by Pliny in his Natural History will suffice to shew this. Wool stolen from a shepherd, bound to the left arm, was supposed to cure fever (xxix. 4); the large-tined horns of the stag-beetle bound to infants "acquired the nature of amulets" (xxx. 15). A stone taken from the head of an ox bound to an infant relieved it in teething (ibid.). As the ox was believed to spit this stone out, if it saw death coming, its head must be cut off suddenly. These facts may serve to indicate the source of the superstition among Christians. Until the conversion of the emperors this practice was regarded by all as magic and unlawful. Thus Tertullian (A.D. 192) says of the wound caused by the bite of a scorpion, "Magic binds something round it; medicine meets it with steel and cup" (Scorpiac.). In the Apostolical Constitutions, probably compiled about the end of the 2nd century, bishops are forbidden to receive as catechumens those who "make ligaturae" (περιάμματα, viii. 32). The earliest intimation of their use by professed Christians occurs in the 36th canon of the Council of Laodicea, held probably about 365: "It is unlawful for those of the sacerdotal and clerical orders . . . to make phylacteries, which are the bonds of their souls. We have ordered those who wear them to be cast out of the church." It is implied here that these "phylacteries" were bound on, i.e. were ligaturae. When Martin of Braga (A.D. 560) made his collection of canons, he rendered the word "phylacteries" by "ligaturae" (can. 59; Labbe, v. 912). The words were, in fact, treated by many as synonyms, except when the Jewish practice mentioned in Scripture was intended. Of this we shall have further proof as we proceed. St. Epiphanius (A.D. 368) explains that the "phylacteries" of Matt. xxiii. 5 are not "periapts," as might be supposed "from the circumstance that some called periapts phylacteries" (Haer. 15, c. Scribas). When a distinction was made by Christian writers, the name of phylactery was restricted to those ligaturae which had writing in them. Thus Boniface at the council of Liptines, A.D. 743: "If any presbyter or clerk shall observe auguries . . . or phylacteries, id est scripturas, let him know that he is subject to the penalties of the canons" (Stat. 33). To proceed: St. Basil, in Cappadocia (A.D. 370) seems to imply an extensive recourse to such amulets by Christians: "Is thy child sick? Thou lookest about for a charmer, or one who puts vain characters about the neck of innocent infants, or at last goest to the physician and to medicines, without any thought of Him who is able to save" (in Psalm xlv. 2). Gaudentius, bishop of Brescia (A.D. 385) warns his neophytes against all such practices as among the "abominations of the Gentiles" and "by-ways of idolatry," "Deeds of witchcraft, incantations, suballigaturae, . . . are parts of idolatry" (Tract. iv. de Lect. Exodi). St. Augustine, in Africa, speaks of our subject in writings ranging from 397 to 426. Thus after mention of several "superstitious" practices, he says, "To this class belong also all ligaturae and remedies which even the science of the physicians condemns, whether in precantations or in certain marks which they call characters, or in any object to be suspended and bound on," &c. (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30). A reference to earrings in this passage is cleared up by another (Ep. ad Possid. 245, § 2), "The execrable superstition of ligatures, wherein even the earrings of men are made to serve as pendants at the tops of the ears on one side (De Doctr. Chr. in summo aurium singularum) is not practised to please men, but to serve devils." Here, it will be observed, objects that were merely suspended are called ligaturae. In a sermon to the people the same father says, "One of the faithful is lying bed-ridden, is tormented by pains; prays, is not heard; or rather is heard, but is proved, is exercised: the son is scourged that he may be received back. Then when he is tortured by pains, comes the temptation of the tongue. Some wretched woman or man, if he is to be called a man, comes to his bedside, and says, 'Make that ligature and thou wilt be well. Such and such persons (ask them) did it and were made well by it.' He does not yield, nor obey, nor incline his heart; yet he has a struggle. He has no strength, and conquers the devil. He becomes a martyr on his bed, crowned by Him, who for him hung on the tree" (Serm. 283, § 7). Compare a strictly parallel passage in Serm. 318, § 3. Elsewhere he says, that the "evil spirits devise for themselves certain shadows of honour, that so they may deceive the followers of Christ; and this so far . . . that even they who seduce by ligaturae, precantations, by machinations of the enemy, mix the name of Christ with their precantations" (Tract. vii. in Ev. Joan. § 6). Again, "When thy head aches, we praise thee, if thou hast put the gospel to thy head, and not had recourse to a ligatura. For the weakness of men has gone so far, and men who fly to ligaturae are so much to be bewailed, that we rejoice when we see that a bedridden man tossed with fever and pains has placed his hope in nothing but in the application of the gospel to his head; not because it was done to this end, but because the gospel has been preferred to ligaturae" (ibid. § 12). St. Chrysostom (†98) is witness to the prevalence of the superstition both in Syria and Greece, e.g. in a homily preached at Antioch, "What should one say of periapts, and bells hung from the hand and the scarlet thread, and the rest, full of great folly? while nothing ought to be put round the child, but the protection of the cross. But now He who hath converted the world . . . is despised, and woof and warp and such ligaturae (περιδμματα) are intrusted with the safety of the child" (Hom. xii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 7). "What should we say of those who use incantations and periapts, and bind brass coins of Alexander the Macedonian about their heads and feet?" (Ad Illum. Catech. ii. 5). He says of Job that he did not, when sick, "bind periapts about him" (Adv. Judae. Hom. viii. § 6); and of Lazarus that "he did not bind plates of metal (πέταλα) on himself" (ibid.). "Some," he says, "tied about them the names of rivers" (Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Col. § 5). It appears that some alleged the compatibility of such practices with a sound belief. Hence St. Chrysostom warns his hearers, that "though they who have to do with periapts offer numerous subtle excuses for them, as that 'we call on God and nothing more,' and that 'the old woman is a Christian and one of the faithful,' it is nevertheless idolatry" (ibid.). He bids them as Christians make the sign of the cross, and to know no other remedy out of medicine (ibid.). Like St. Augustine he encourages the sufferer to resist the temptation to use amulets by telling him that patience has the merit of martyrdom: "Thou hast fallen into a sore disease, and there are present many who would force thee to relieve the malady, some by incantations, others by ligaturae (περιδμματα), some by some other means? Through the fear of God thou hast borne up nobly and with constancy, and wouldst choose to suffer anything rather than endure to commit any act of idolatry? This wins the crown of martyrdom," &c. (Hom. iii. § 5, in Ep. i. ad Thess. Comp. Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Col. u.s.). In France Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502) denounces the use of "diabolical phylacteries hung" on the person (Serm. 66, § 5). Gregory of Tours (A.D. 573) speaks of a hariolus who "muttered charms, casts lots, hangs ligaturae from the neck" of a sick boy (Mirac. ii. 45). In another case which he relates, to expel "the noonday demon," they applied "ligamina of herbs," with incantations (De Mir. S. Mart. iv. 36). In a third, the parents of the patient, "as the custom is of country people, carried to him ligamenta and potions from the fortune-tellers and soothsayers" (ibid. i. 26). Isidore of Seville, in Gothic Spain, writing in 636, copies in his Et. moligicon (viii. 9) the passage cited above from St. Augustine, de Doctr. Christ. St. Eloy, bishop of Noyon, A.D. 640: "Let no Christian presume to hang ligamina on the necks of man or any animal whatsoever, even though it be done by clerks, and it be said that it is a holy thing and contains divine lections" (De Rect. Cuth. Convers. § 5). In 742, Boniface, writing to Zacharias of Rome on the difficulties put in his way by the report of scandals tolerated in that city, says that his informants declared that they saw there among other relics of paganism, "women with phylacteries and ligaturae, bound, in pagan fashion, on their arms and legs, and publicly offering them for sale to others" (Epist. 49). The pope, in reply, says that he has already endeavoured to suppress these superstitions (Epist. i. 9). Boniface himself, the next year at the council of Liptines, sanctioned a decree for the abolition of all pagan practices. A list of them was appended to it, and in this we find, "Phylacteries and Ligaturae" (n. 10). In the 6th book of the Carolingian Capitularies is the following law: "That phylacteries or false writings, or ligaturae, which the ignorant think good for fevers and other diseases, be on no account made by clerks or laymen, or by any Christian, for they are the insignia of magic art" (cap. 72). Instead of such means, prayer and the unction prescribed by St. James are to be used. By the 42nd canon of the council of Tours (813) priests are directed to admonish the people that "ligaturae of bones or herbs applied to any mortal thing (man or beast) are of no avail, but are snares and deceits of the old enemy" (Sim. Add. iii. Capit. Reg. Franc. cap. 93). When the Bulgarians, A.D. 866, asked Nicholas I. if they might retain their custom of "hanging a ligatura under the throat of the sick," he replied, "ligaturae of this kind are phylacteries invented by the craft of the devil, and are proved to be bonds for men's souls" (Epist. 97, § 79). Probably we shall not be wrong in inferring from the foregoing testimonies that the practice prevailed at one time or another in every part of Christendom. It is also probable that it suggested the manner of many attempts to cure by those who looked solely for divine aid. E.g. St. Cuthbert (A.D. 685) sent a linen belt to the abbess Elfed, who was sick. "She girded herself with it," and was healed. The same belt "bound round" the head of a nun cured her of headache (Baeda, Vita S. Cuthb. c. 23).

In the 8th century we find a name of profession applied to those who offered to cure by means of ligaturae: "We decree that none become calculatores and enchanters, nor storm-raisers, nor obligatores." (See Conc. Aquisgr. (A.D. 789), can. 63 (Labbe, 64); Capit. Car. M. et Lud. P. i. 62; vi. 374.) Similarly in a later law of Charlemagne (c. 40; Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 518).

LIGHTHOUSE (Pharos). The lighthouse, as a symbol of the happy termination of the voyage of life, is of frequent occurrence in the cemeteries of the early Christians. Sometimes a ship in full sail appears to be steering towards it (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 372, but it is often found without the ship, as in the monumental slab of FIRMIA VICTORIA (Fabretti, Inscript. Ant. p. 566), in which, appearing with the crown and palm branch, and in conjunction with the name Victoria, it plainly typifies the triumphant close of a Christian career.

A kind of tower in four stories, crowned with flame, bearing an exact resemblance to a funeral pyre, is found on some imperial medals, particularly on those of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, and Commodus (Mionnet, De la rareté et du prix des Médailles Romaines, t. i. pp. 218, 226, 241). This symbol, however, though it misled Fabretti, does not appear to have any Christian significance (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Phare). [C.]

LIGHTNING, PRAYER AGAINST.

Among the prayers for special occasions which follow the general form of office for a Lite in the Greek church, to be embodied in it as occasion shall serve [v. LITE], is one to be used in the time of danger from thunder and lightning. The prayer is too long to quote; it contains a confession of sin, an appeal to God's mercy, and an earnest supplication that he would assuage the fury of the elements.

In the Roman Ritual, under the head de Processionibus, we find "Preces ad repellendam tempestatem." The order is as follows:

The bells are rung, and those who are able to attend assemble in the church, and the ordinary litanies are said, in which the clause "a fulgure et tempestate, R. Libera nos Domine," is said twice: and after the litany and the Lord's prayer, Ps. 147 (147, v. 12, E. V. Lauda Jerusalem). Then follow some preces or versicles, said by the priest and people alternately, and the office concludes with five collects, and aspersion. Of the collects, the first is of an ordinary penitential character. The last four are these:

"A domo tua, quaesumus Domine spiritales nequitiae repellantur, et aeriarum discedat malignitas tempestatum."

"Omnipotens sempiterne Deus, parce metuentibus, propitiare supplicibus: ut post noxios ignes nubium, et vim procellarum, in misericordiam transeat laudis comminatio tempestatum."

"Domine Jesu, qui imperasti ventis et mari, et facta fuit tranquillitas magna, exaudi preces familiae tuae, ut hoc signo sanctae crucis + omnis discedat saevitia tempestatum."

"Omnipotens et misericors Deus, quo nos et castigando sanas, et ignoscendo conservas: praesta supplicibus tuis ut et tranquillitibus optatae^a consolationis laetetur, et dono tuae pietatis semper utamur. Per."

The Roman missal contains a mass "contra tempestates" in which the collect is the first of these four collects, and the post-communion the last.

In the Ambrosian ritual there is a "Benedictio contra aeris tempestatem," of the same type as that in the Roman.

The clergy and people kneel before the high altar, where the tabernacle of the sacrament is opened, and after Deus in adjutorium, &c., these Psalms are said: 1, 14 [E. V. 15]; 53 [E. V. 54]; 69 [E. V. 70]; 86 [E. V. 87]; 92 [E. V. 93].

Then follow the Litanies, Pater noster, some

^a This collect is quoted by Martene (ii. 302) from an old MS. of cir. A.D. 500.

^b hujus opt. In missal.

preces, and two prayers, each much longer than the corresponding Roman collects, but to the same effect, and the office ends with an aspersion with holy water at the door of the church.

LIGHTS, THE CEREMONIAL USE

OF. It may be safely affirmed that for more than 300 years there was no ceremonial use of lighted candles, torches, or lamps in the worship of the Christian church. This is evident from the language of early writers, when they have occasion to refer to the heathen practice of burning lights in honour of the gods. Tertullian, for example, A.D. 205, ridicules the custom of "exposing useless candles at noon-day" (Apol. xlv.), and "encroaching on the day with lamps" (ibid. xxxv.). "Let them," he says, "who have no light, kindle their lamps daily" (De Idolol. xv.). Lactantius, A.D. 303: "They burn lights as to one dwelling in darkness . . . Is he to be thought in his right mind who offers for a gift the light of candles and wax tapers for the author and giver of light? . . . But their gods, because they are of the earth, need light that they may not be in darkness; whose worshippers, because they have no sense of heaven, bring down to the earth even those superstitions to which they are enslaved" (Instit. vi. 2). Gregory Nazianzen, about 70 years later, says, "Let not our dwellings blaze with visible light; for this indeed is the custom of the Greek holy-moon; but let not us honour God with these things, and exalt the present season with unbecoming rites, but with purity of soul and cheerfulness of mind, and with lamps that enlighten the whole body of the church; that is to say, with divine contemplations and thoughts," &c. (Orat. v. § 35). The reader will observe that the objection is not to the use of lights in idolatrous worship only, but to all ceremonial use of them, even in the worship of the true God.

I. There was, however, already by the end of the 3rd century a partial use of lights in honour of martyrs, which would greatly facilitate their introduction as ritual accessories to worship at a later period. We learn this in the first instance from their prohibition by the council of Illiberis in Spain, probably about the year 305: "It is decreed that wax candles be not kindled in a cemetery during the day; for the spirits of the saints ought not to be disquieted" (can. 34). By the saints we must here understand the faithful who went to the martyrria for prayer. This is the explanation of Binus, Dupin, Mendoza, and others. They would certainly be more or less distracted by the presence of the lights, and they might fear to excite the attention of the heathen by them. Many, if we may infer from the language of the writers quoted above, would be offended at the rite itself. The practice, nevertheless, maintained its ground in Spain and elsewhere. For at the beginning of the next century, we find it attacked by Vigilantius, himself a Spaniard, of Barcelona. Jerome, who replied to him, does not deny that such a custom existed. His language even shews that he did not in his heart disapprove of it; but he pleads that it was due to the "ignorance and simplicity of laymen, or at least of superstitious (religiosarum) women," who "had a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Speaking for the church at large he says, "We do not, as you groundlessly slander us, burn wax tapers in clear light, but that we may by this means of relief moderate the darkness of the night, and watch till dawn." Yet he inconsistently defends the practice which Vigilantius condemned, comparing those who supplied the lights "in honour of the martyrs" to her who poured ointment on our Lord (Contra Vigilant. § 8).

II. In the time of St. Jerome we first hear of another practice, which would inevitably end in the ceremonial use of lights; viz. their employment as a decoration in churches on festivals. This is first mentioned by Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 407, who thus describes his own custom on the feast of St. Felix, to whom his church there was dedicated: "The bright altars are crowned with lamps thickly set. Lights are burnt odorous with waxed papyrus. They shine by night and day: thus night is radiant with the brightness of the day, and the day itself, bright in heavenly beauty, shines yet more with light doubled by countless lamps" (Poem. xiv. Nat. 3, l. 99; comp. P. xix. N. 11, ll. 405, &c.). This does not prove his common use of lights by day, but that is made probable by another poem, in which, describing apparently the ordinary appearance of his church, he says:—

"Tectoque superne
Pendentes Lychni spiras retinentur ahenis,
Et medio in vacuo laxis vaga lumina nutant
Funibus: undantes flammæ levius aura fatigat."

Poem. xxxvii. Nat. ix. l. 389.

If such a practice prevailed in any degree during the 4th century, it probably affords the explanation needed in the well-known story of Epiphanius, who once, when passing through a country place called Anablatha, "saw, as he went by, a lamp burning, and on inquiring what place that was, learnt that it was a church" (Epist. ad Joan. Hieros.).

III. The ritual use of lights for which such a custom prepared the way would probably have been only occasional for many ages, but for the conditions under which the worship of Christians was held during the first 300 years. Secrecy was necessary when persecution was active, and great privacy at all times. This led to their assembling after the daylight had failed, or before the sun rose. When the disciples at Troas "came together to break bread," it was evening, "and there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together" (Acts xx. 7, 8). Pliny the younger, some 50 years later, told the emperor that the Christians were in the habit of meeting for common worship "before it was light" (Epp. lib. x. n. 97). From Tertullian (De Coronâ, iii.) we learn that it was the custom of his day to "take the sacrament of the Eucharist in assemblies held before dawn." The fear of discovery which induced this precaution caused them also to avail themselves of the catacombs and other subterranean places in which, while they were more free to choose their time of meeting, the natural darkness of the place itself would make artificial light essential. St. Jerome, speaking of the catacombs at Rome at a time when they were no longer in use for Christian worship, says, "They are all so dark that to enter into them is, in the language of the psalmist, like going down into hell" (Comment. in Ezek. lib.

xii. c. xl.). Some of the first churches even were, for the reason that we have indicated, built under ground. There is one still to be seen at Lyons, containing the remains of St. Irenaeus, "fort profonde et fort obscure," which is believed to be "one of the first churches in which the first Christians of Lyons used to assemble" (De Moleon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 71). Now there is every reason to believe that the necessary lights of this period became the ceremonial lights of the next. We do not know when they ceased to be necessary. Even in the 7th and 8th centuries, the station before the celebration of the Eucharist on high festivals still began at daybreak (Ordo Rom. i. 4; ii. 1; iii. 3; Musae. Ital. tom. ii.). They could hardly be needed to give light at that time; but a mystic meaning, already attached to them, must have led to their retention. The following is a description of their use in a pontifical mass of that period. When the bishop left the secretarium, he was preceded by 7 acolytes, each bearing a lighted wax candle (Ordo R. i. 8; ii. 5; iii. 7). As they came near the altar, they divided, 4 going to the right, and 3 to the left, that he might pass through. When the deacon went to the ambo to read the Gospel two of the lights were carried before him in honour of the book which he bore in his hands (i. 11; ii. 8; iii. 10). Our earliest authority now quoted does not tell us whether the lights were extinguished at any part of the service; but according to the next in date they were "extinguished in their place after the reading of the Gospel" (ii. 9). This was clearly a reminiscence of their original use. From the first two we learn that after the Kyrie the acolytes set the candle-stands (ceroastata) on the floor (i. 26; ii. 5; comp. v. 6). The second further tells us that they were put "4 on the right and 3 on the left, or (as some will have it) in a row from south to north" (ii. 5). At a later period they were set "so as to form a cross" (vi. 5). After the Collect they were in the earlier age put "in one line from east to west, in the middle of the church" (ii. 6). In a later, we find them when extinguished set behind the altar (v. 7)—a practice which, in conjunction with the need of light at an early celebration, in due time paved the way for the introduction of altar-lights. The earliest document to which we have here referred is supposed by Ussher, Cave, and others to have been compiled about the year 730; but it evidently did not create all the rites which it prescribes. We therefore assume that those now described were practised at Rome at least during the latter part of the 7th century.

IV. To the same period we may, on the same grounds, refer the office of the TENEBRAE in its first stage. It was celebrated on the night before Good Friday. One-third of the lights in the church were extinguished after the first psalm of Nocturns; another third after the second, and the remainder, with the exception of seven lamps, after the third. These seven were extinguished at Matins; the first on the right side of the church, when the antiphon before the first psalm was heard; the second, on the left, at the end of the psalm, "and so on either side alternately down to the Gospel, i.e. the Benedictus; but at the Gospel the middle light is put out" (Ordo, i. 33; comp. App. § 2).

V. The Paschal Light (Paschal Post, Cereus Paschalis) is heard of at an earlier period. We have an almost certain reference to it in the Liber Pontificalis, where we are told (n. 42), that Zosimus, A.D. 417, "gave permission for the blessing of candles in the suburbicarian dioceses." Some copies (Concil. Surii, Annul. Baronii) even read cereum Paschalem here, and the passage can hardly refer to anything else. This was the tradition of Sigebert of Gemblours: "Zosimus the pope orders a wax candle to be blessed throughout the churches on the holy Sabbath of Easter" (ad ann. 417; Biblioth. PP. vii. 1358). Similarly Leo Ostiensis, Chron. Cassin. iii. 31). Two forms for the benediction of the Paschal Light were composed by Enodius, who became bishop of Ticino in 511. They are still extant (see his works by Sirmond, Opusc. 9, 10, p. 453). Gregory the Great, writing in 605 to a bishop who was sick, says, "Let the prayers which in the city of Ravenna are wont to be said over the wax candle, and the expositions of the gospel which are made by the bishops (sacerdotibus) at the Easter solemnity, be said by another" (Epist. xi. 28, al. 33).

From the first Ordo Romanus (about 730) we learn that on Maundy Thursday, at the 9th hour, a light was struck from flint in some place outside the basilic at the door; if there was no oratory, from which a candle was lighted and brought into the church in the presence of the congregation. A lamp lighted "from the same fire" was kept burning until Easter Eve, and from that was lighted the wax candle which was solemnly blessed on that day (Ordo Rom. i. 32). Zachary, who became pope in 741, in a letter to Boniface of Mentz, says that "three lamps of great size (so lighted) placed in some more secret part of the church, burned to the third day, i.e. Saturday." He adds that oil for them was collected from every candle in the church, and that "the fire for the baptism of the sacred font on Easter Eve was taken from those candles" (Ep. xii. Labbe, Conc. tom. vi. col. 1525). It will be observed that lampas and candela are here synonymous. From the fragment of a letter of Hadrian I. A.D. 772, to the monks of Corbie, we learn that the priests and clerks did not put on their stoles and planetae on Easter Eve "until the new light was brought in that the wax candle might be blessed" (Comment. Praev. in Ord. Rom. Mabill. Mus. It. tom. ii. p. cii.). The blessing was pronounced by the archdeacon (Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii. 38).

There are two forms of the Benedictio cerei in the Gregorian Sacramentary (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. ii. col. 143). The former of these is also found in the Missale Gothicum (Liturg. Gallic. p. 241), in the Missale Gallicanum (ibid. p. 357), and again in the Besançon Sacramentary discovered by Mabillon at Bobio (Mus. Ital. tom. i. p. 321). This may be thought to prove that the rite was derived to France from Rome.

In Gothic Spain and Languedoc, both the prayers and ceremonial differed from those of Rome. The clergy assembled, not on Maundy Thursday, but Easter Eve at the 9th hour in the processus, a chamber connected with the church, and in small churches identical with the sacarium. There the deacons received 12 wax candles from the bishop, who retained one for himself. They then entered the sacarium, where the bishop himself proceeded to strike the flint. A candle (candela) was first lighted with the fire thus obtained, and a lamp (lucerna) was then lighted from the candle. They then returned into the processus, where the bishop took his seat. He next lighted his own candle from the lamp which a deacon had brought from the sacarium, and the deacons then lighted theirs, also from the lamp. The deacon who held it then received a blessing from the bishop, for which no words were prescribed; and the bishop said an "Oratio ad benedicendam lucernam." They then entered the church in procession, the deacons with their lights preceding the lamp, the bishop and presbyters following it. As they entered the choir they sang an antiphon (Lumen verum, St. John i. 9) with versicle (populus qui sedebat, St. Matt. iv. 16) and gloria. The bishop or a priest next goes to the altar and says a prayer "ad benedicendum cereum." After this the deacons, who are themselves to bless the paschal lamp and candle, receive a benediction from the bishop, which is to fit them for that office. They then, while the bishop is in his chair behind the altar, and the presbyters are standing by him, solemnly pronounce a long form of blessing (benedictio lucernae) given in the sacramentary. A similar benedictio cerei followed, and the bishop then comes in front of the altar, and proceeds with the service of the day (Missale Mozarabicum, Leslie, pp. 174-178).

The benediction of the lamp appears to have been peculiar to this office, and the prayer is said by Elipandus, A.D. 792, to have been composed by Isidore of Seville (Epist. ad Alcuin, § xi. inter Opp. Alc.). He quotes a passage in it: "Induit carnem, sed non exiit majestatem," &c. by which we are enabled to identify it. See Miss. Moz. p. 176. It is certain that the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (can. 9), at which Isidore presided, recognised both the paschal lights:—"The lamp and the candle are not blessed in some churches on Easter Eve, and they inquire why they are blessed by us. We bless them solemnly because of the glorious sacrament of that night; that in the benediction of the hallowed light we may discern the mystery of the sacred resurrection of Christ, which took place on this votive night. And forasmuch as this rite is practised in churches in many lands, and districts of Spain, it is fit that for the unity of peace it be observed in the churches of Galicia."

At Rome there was a singular custom in connexion with the paschal candle which, so far as we have been able to discover, was not adopted elsewhere. The number of years from the crucifixion was inscribed on it. Bede (De Tempor. Rat. c. 45) records such an inscription, which had been copied at Rome by some pilgrims from England, viz.: "From the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ are 668 years."

The paschal candle played a considerable part in the baptisms which took place on Easter Eve. When the font was blessed, "at the invocation of the Holy Spirit, which the priest pronounces with a loud voice, i.e. with deep emotion of mind, the candle that has been blessed, or those that have been lighted from it, are put down into the water to shew the presence of the Holy Ghost"

(Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. Hittorp. col. 259). Only the lower part was immersed (ibid.), while the whole, when lighted, represented Christ the pillar of light; the part not yet burning, but ready to furnish the means of light, symbolised the Holy Ghost (Amal. Var. Lect. Hittorp. 1447). This was the baptism of the font mentioned above by Zachary. When the catechumens had been baptized, an unlighted candle was put into the hand of each. Litanies were then sung in the Roman ritual (probably only Kyrie's), and then the Agnus Dei, during which the precentor gave the word, "Light up," and the candles of the neophytes (Amalar. de Antiphon. c. 44; Pseudo-Alcuin, Hitt. col. 260), and all throughout the church (Ord. Rom. i. 45; Amal. ibid.), were at once lighted. Till that moment the lamps and candles of the church were not lighted for three nights, "to teach us," says the archdeacon of Rome to Amalaricus (u. s.), "to turn away from joyfulness to sadness," as "joy was quenched in the hearts of the disciples of Christ so long as he lay in the tomb" (Amal. ibid.). They were re-lighted at the Agnus to shew that every one ought to receive light through that "Lamb that taketh away the sins of the world" (Amal. de Eccles. Off. i. 30). The mass of the resurrection began after the lighting of the candles (Ord. Rom. i. 45, and Append. 10; Amal. de Antiph. c. 44; Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii. 38). For "the seven white days," i.e. until Low Sunday, the newly baptized were daily present at the celebration of the Eucharist in their white robes and with their candles in their hands (Alcuin, Ep. ad Car. Magn. in Hittorp. col. 300; Raban. u. s. cap. 39). The symbolism is thus explained: "The eight days of the neophytes represent the course of this present life. For as the Hebrew people, after passing the Red Sea, entered the land of promise, trampling over their foes, preceded by night throughout their journey by a pillar of fire, so our baptized, their past sins done away, are daily led to the church preceded by a lighted pillar of wax" (Pseudo-Alc. u. s. col. 262).

VI. We first hear of these baptismal lights in the 4th century.* Zeno of Verona, A.D. 360, speaks of the "salt, fire, and oil, and poor tunic" given to the newly baptized (Tract. i. xiv. 4). St. Ambrose, 374, addressing a lapsed virgin, says: "Hast thou forgotten the holy day of the Lord's resurrection in which thou didst offer thyself to the altar of God to be veiled? In so great and so solemn an assembly of the church of God, amid the blazing lights of the neophytes, among candidates for the kingdom of heaven, didst thou come forward as if to become the bride of the King" (De Laps. Virg. v. 19). Gregory Nazianzen, in a discourse delivered on Easter Day about 385: "Our white dresses and light-bearing yesterday, which we celebrated both privately and publicly, all conditions of men nearly,

* Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350, has been supposed to mention these lights: "The call to be soldiers of Christ, and the lamps that lead the bride home, and the desire of the kingdom of heaven, . . . have been yours" (Catech. Praef. i.); but he is speaking, not to the baptized, but to competentes, and by the bridal lamps he means those motions of the Holy Ghost and spiritual instructions which had lighted their way to Christ, and to the entrance of His kingdom.

and every high officer, illumining the night with abundant fire," &c. (In S. Pascha, xiv. § 2). About the year 500, a large number of Jews were converted at Auvergne, and we are told by Gregory of Tours, 573, that at their baptism "candles blazed, lamps shone, the whole city was bright with the white-robed flock" (Hist. Franc. v. 11). At the request of Gregory, Fortunatus wrote a poem on the event (Poem. v. 5), from which we may cite the following lines:—

"Undique rapta manu lux cerea provocat astra :
Credas ut stellæ ire trabendo comas.
Lact-us hinc vesti color est ; hinc lampade fulgor
Duci ur, et vario lumine picta dies."

We should infer from this that at baptisms of great interest others, beside the neophytes, carried lights. This is confirmed by the account which an eyewitness gives of the baptism of Theodosius the Younger, A.D. 401 : "All were in white, so that you might fancy the multitude covered with snow. Illustrious patricians went before, and every dignitary with the military orders all carrying wax lights, so that the stars might be supposed to be seen on earth" (Marcus Gaz. Epist. ad Arcad. apud Baron. ad ann. § 28). The symbolism of these lights is thus explained by Gregory Nazianzen to some candidates for baptism : "The lamps which thou wilt kindle are a mystical sign of that lamp-bearing from thenceforth, wherewith we, bright and virgin souls, will go forth to meet the Bridegroom" (Orat. xl. in Sanct. Bapt. § 46).

VII. The gospel lights, to which incidental reference has been made, are first heard of in the 4th century. St. Jerome, A.D. 378, tells us that, "through all the churches of the east, when the gospel is to be read, lights are kindled, though the sun is already shining ; not, indeed, to dispel darkness, but to exhibit a token of joy ; . . . and that under the figure of bodily light, that light may be set forth of which we read in the psalter, 'Thy word is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths'" (Cont. Vigilant. c. iii.). In the west the custom is first mentioned by Isidore of Seville, writing in 636, which makes it probable that it travelled to Rome through Spain, as several other rites appear to have done. He says (Etymol. vii. xii. 29), "Those who in Greek are called acolytes are, in Latin, called ceroferarii, from their carrying wax candles when the gospel is to be read, or the sacrifice to be offered ; for these lights are kindled by them, and carried by them, not to dispel darkness, for the sun is shining the while, but for a sign of joy, that under the form of bodily light may be represented that light of which we read in the gospel : 'He was the true light.'"

VIII. There is ample evidence of the use of lights, both stationary and processional, at funerals in every part of the Christian church. When the body of Constantine lay in state, "they lighted candles on golden stands around it, and afforded a wonderful spectacle to the beholders, such as was never seen on the earth under the sun since the world was made" (Euseb. Vita Constant. iv. 66). Gregory Nyssen, A.D. 370, speaking of his sister's funeral, says that "No small number of deacons and sub-deacons preceded the corpse on either side, escorting it from the house in orderly procession, all holding wax candles" (De Vit. S. Marince, in fin.). From Gregory^b Nazianzen, we learn that the rite was in frequent, if not general, use at this time ; for referring to the burial of Constantius, he says : "He is carried forth with the acclamations and escort of the people, and with these our solemn rites, viz. hymns by night, and torch-bearing, with which we Christians are wont to honour a religious departure" (in Julian. Invect. ii. Or. v. 16). St. Jerome, of the obsequies of Paula, A.D. 386 : "She was borne by the hands of bishops, who even put their shoulder to the bier, while other pontiffs carried lamps and candles before her (Ad Eustoch. Ep. cviii. § 29). St. Chrysostom : "Tell me what mean those shining lamps. Do we not conduct them (the dead) forth as athletes?" (in Epist. ad Hebr. c. 2 ; Hom. iv. § 5). When the remains of Chrysostom himself were removed from Comana to Constantinople in 438, "the assemblage of the faithful covered the mouth of the Bosphorus at the Propontis with their lamps" (Theodoret Hist. Eccl. iv. 36 ; comp. 34). At the funeral of St. Germanus of Auxerre, A.D. 447, "the multitude of lights beat back the rays of the sun, and maintained their brightness even through the day" (Constant. in Vita S. Germ. ii. 24 ; ap. Surium, Jul. 31). When Euthymius died in Palestine, A.D. 467, the patriarch of Jerusalem "went down to the laura himself, and transferred, with accompaniment of lamps and psalms, that holy body of the blessed one to the abode which he had himself built, trusting it to his own hands alone" (Euthymia Vita, c. 112 ; Eccl. Gr. Monum. ii. 296, Cotel.). Corippus, the grammarian, describing the ceremonial at the funeral of Justinian, A.D. 565, says that, "a thousand stands of gold and silver with candles set on them filled the halls," and that when the corpse was taken out for burial, "the whole populace went out in procession from the palace, the mournful bands burning funeral torches" (De Laud. Justin. Min. iii. 9, 38).

At Paris, in 585, king Guntram buried a murdered grandson "with the decoration of innumerable candles" (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vii. 10). When queen Radegund was buried at Poitiers in 587, "the freewomen, who carried candles (cereos) before her, all stood round the grave. Every one gave her name inscribed on her candle. They all, according to the order prescribed, gave the candles to one of the servants. A dispute arises among the people ; some said that the candles themselves ought to be put into her holy tomb ; others said not" (Vita St. Radeg. auct. Baudonivia, cap. v. ; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. 13). The question was settled by one of the candles leaping out of the hands of the servant who held them, and falling at the feet of the corpse.

IX. From this use of lights the transition was easy to leaving them in the sepulchre, or near the grave, when the nature of the place admitted of it. We accordingly often read of lights in the martyria or oratories erected over the remains of martyrs. We have already seen this forbidden in the daytime by the council of Illiberis, about 305, because it tended to distract those who resorted to them for prayer. St. Jerome, as we have also seen, owns and defends the practice, though ascribing it to weak and ignorant persons. We may cite an instance from the Dialogues of Gregory, A.D. 595. That author relates that St. Peter once appeared to the sacristan, not long deceased, of the church dedicated to him at Rome, and in which the saint's body lay, when he had risen at night "to trim the lights by the entrance" (lib. iii. c. 24). Gregory's suggested explanation is, that he did so in order to shew that he was always cognizant of, and always ready to reward "whatever was done out of reverence for him." Gregory of Tours tells us that two enigmures entering a monastery at Malliacum (Maille-Lallier), declared that it contained the tomb of St. Solemnis, and said: "When you have found it, cover it with hangings, and burn a light." Miracles followed the discovery, and we read that one person who had been cured of an ague, "having prayed and lighted candles, held them in his hands throughout the night, keeping vigil there" (De Glor. Conf. 21). A lamp gave perpetual light at the tomb of St. Marcellinus of Iverdun (ibid. c. 69), and of St. Marcellus of Die in Dauphiny (ibid. 70). The oil in both these instances was supposed to be endued with miraculous power. Franco, bishop of Aix, A.D. 566, having been plundered by a powerful neighbour, is said to have addressed St. Merre, before whose tomb he had prostrated himself, in these words: "Neither light shall be burnt here, nor psalmody sung, most glorious saint, unless thou first avenge thy servants of their enemies, and restore to holy church the things by force taken from thee" (ibid. 71).

^b Gregory (Orat. vii. 15) has been quoted as saying that his mother carried a lamp at the funeral of her son Caesarius, but the original has, not λαμπαδοφορία, but λαμπροφορία, and tells us that she wore a shining white dress. The error is due to the old Latin translation, which gives "cereorum gestatione" as the equivalent to λαμπροφορία. See edit. Morell. Or. x. tom. i. p. 169.

X. The next step, naturally, was to treat any supposed relic of the saint, however small, with similar tokens of veneration. In the 5th century, we read of a man who had been cured of lameness after praying in a church where relics of St. Stephen and other saints were thought to be preserved, "lighting candles and leaving his staff there" before he went home (Evodius, de Mirac. St. Steph. i. 4; App. vi. Opp. Aug.). Gregory of Tours having dedicated an oratory, removed thither from a church relics of St. Euphronius and others, "candles and crosses shining" as they went (De Glor. Conf. 20). In another oratory at Tours were alleged relics of John the Baptist, before which a lamp burnt, the oil of which bubbled miraculously. (Mirac. i. 15). The bishop of a certain sea-town in the east, hearing that some relics of St. Julian were in a ship that had just arrived, "moved the people to go in procession to the port with lighted torches" (ibid. ii. 33). During an epidemic at Rheims in 546, a relic of St. Remigius was carried through the city "with lighted candles on crosses, and with candlesticks" (De Glor. Confess. 89). Lights fixed on crosses were an invention of St. Chrysostom, who employed them in those nocturnal processions which he instituted at Constantinople to counteract a similar custom of the Arians (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 8).

XI. Lights before relics were naturally followed by lights before images, when the latter began to be unduly honoured. There are no instances, however, earlier than the 6th century. Some MSS. of Gregory of Tours relate a miraculous cure performed with oil from a lamp before the picture of St. Martin in a church at Ravenna (De Mirac. St. Mart. i. 15). This proves, at least, that the practice was known to the writer, while its novelty and partial distribution may be inferred from the fact that Paulus Warnefridi, telling the same story, says that "there was an altar in honour of St. Martin, with a window near it, in which a lamp was set to give light" (De Gest. Longob. ii. 13). In the east, John Moschus, A.D. 630, tells the story of a hermit who, when about to visit any holy place, used to set a candle before the picture of the blessed Virgin, trusting to her to keep it burning until he returned (Pratum Spirit. c. clv.). In 715, Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, writing to another bishop, says: "Let it not scandalize some that lights are before the sacred images and sweet perfumes. For such rites have been devised to their honour. . . . For the visible lights are a symbol of the gift of immaterial and divine light, and the burning of sweet spices of the pure and perfect inspiration and fulness of the Holy Ghost (Ep. ad Thomam, in Labbe, Conc. vii. 313). In 787, the second council of Nicaea gave its sanction to the practice already popular by a decree that "an offering of incense and lights should be made in honour" of the icons of Christ, of angels, of the blessed Virgin, and other saints (Labbe, u. s. 556). This was one of the practices which even the more moderate of the emperors opposed to image worship endeavoured to put down (Epist. Mich. Balb. ad Ludov. Pium in Decreta de Cultu Imag. Goldast. p. 619).

XII. During the last three centuries of our period, a custom prevailed of offering candles to God, and at length to the saints, with prayer for recovery from sickness, and other benefits. E.g. a girl who had been long ill made a candle of her own height, which she lighted and held burning, "by the help of which (God pitying her in the name of the holy woman St. Radegund), the cold was expelled before the candle was consumed" (Vita S. Radeg. § 32; Venant. Fortun. A.D. 587; compare the Life by Baudon. § 20). Gotselin, the monk who, in the 9th century, wrote a life of St. Augustine of Canterbury, when relating the cure of a cripple, says, that he had received from a charitable woman "a light to offer" to the saint (§ 2, Acta SS. O. B. tom. i.). By the council of Nantes, A.D. 660, all persons were forbidden "to make a vow or to carry a candle or any gift when going to pray for their health, except at the church to the Lord their God" (can. 20). The object, it must be explained, was to put down heathen superstitions, not to discourage saint-worship. In the life of St. Sabas, ascribed to Cyril of Scythopolis, A.D. 555, there is a story of a silversmith who, having been robbed, "went immediately to the martyrdom of St. Theodore, and for five days supplied (and probably tended, ἐποίησα) the lights of the nave, and remained there night and day weeping at the rails of the bema" (§ 78, Cotel. Mon. Græc. iii. 355).

XIII. Candles were also offered as a token of thankfulness for mercies received. For example, when Justin the Younger, on his accession, went with the empress to a public service of thanksgiving, they both offered frankincense and candles (Corippus, u. s. ii. 9, 71; comp. v. 317). A wax candle was offered at the tomb of St. Eucherius of Orleans, A.D. 738, by a woman whom he had converted (Vita S. Eucher. § 10; Acta SS. O. B. iii. 599).

XIV. The Liber Pontificalis (Anastat. Bibloth. n. 85) tells us that Sergius I. A.D. 687, ordered that on the feast "of St. Simeon, which the Greeks call hypapante, a litany (i.e. procession) should go forth from St. Adrian's, and the people meet it at St. Mary's." The Greeks had observed the feast for some time (with what ceremonies we cannot say); but this appears to be its introduction at Rome. Sergius was a Syrian of Antioch by birth, and was more likely to bring in an eastern custom than many of his predecessors. This feast (Feb. 2) was afterwards called the Purification of St. Mary, and was marked by so profuse an use of lights that it acquired the name of Missa Luminum (Candlemas). Lights are not mentioned in the above account, nor by the interpolator who in the 9th century or later adapted Gregory Nyssen's Sermon de Occursu Domini to the feast; but they were so common in processions at Rome, that they were probably carried in it from the first; especially as the words of Simeon (Luke ii. 32) suggested them as appropriate to the occasion. The earliest witness to their use however is Bede, 730, who says that the festival took the place of the old lustrations of February: "This custom of lustration the Christian religion did well to change, when in the same month, on the day of St. Mary, the whole people with the priests and ministers go in procession through the churches and suitable parts of the city with the singing of hymns, all carrying in their hands burning wax lights, given them by the pontiff" (De Temp. Rat. 10). The only other witness before the death of Charlemagne is Alcuin, in a sermon (in Hypapanti, § 2) before that prince: "The solemnity of this day, while it is unknown to some Christians, is held by many in greater honour than the other solemnities of the year; but above all in that place, where the Catholic Church has obtained the primacy in its chief pastor, it is held in so great reverence, that the whole populace of the city collected together, shining with huge lights of wax candles, celebrate the solemn rites of masses, and no one without a light held in his hand enters the approach to a public station;—as if, in sooth, being about to offer the Lord in the temple, yea, to receive also the light of faith, they are outwardly setting forth by the sacred symbolism (religione) of their offering that light wherewith they shine inwardly" (Baluz. Miscell. ed. Mansi, ii. 52). Martene and others have cited similar references to the lights of this festival, which, if genuine, would be earlier than Bede, from homilies ascribed to St. Eloy, bishop of Noyon, A.D. 640, and Ildefonsus, bishop of Toledo, 657; but those homilies are by careful critics assigned respectively to the 9th and 12th centuries. See Oudin in nn.

It will be observed that Bede speaks of the candles as "given" by the bishop of Rome. He does not say "blessed." Similarly, Pseudo-Alcuin (De Div. Off. Hittorp. 231): "They receive all a single wax candle from the hand of the pontiff." Amalarius, A.D. 827 (De Eccl. Off. iv. 33) and Rabanus, 847 (De Instit. Cleri. ii. 33), also mention the lights, but not any benediction. Nor can we find any form of blessing in any sacramentary written before the 9th century. There is one in a Tours missal of that age, but so inferior in composition that it can hardly be older than the missal itself. We give it here:—

"A Prayer at the Blessing of the Lights. O God, the true light (lumen), propagator and author of the light (lucis) everlasting, pour into the hearts of Thy faithful the brightness of perpetual light (luminis); and (grant) that whosoever in the holy temple of Thy glory are adorned with lamps of present lights, being purified from the contagions of all vices, may be able to be presented unto Thee, with the fruit of good works, in the temple of Thy heavenly habitation; for the," &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 15, 5). [W. E. S.]

LILIOSA, martyr; commemorated Aug. 27 (Usuard. Mart.); Bede as LIBIOSA same day.

LILY. Though this flower may be considered as a scriptural symbol from St. Matt. vi. 28, no particular meaning seems to have attached to it at any early date. The κρίνα of that passage may be the scarlet anemones which every traveller must have observed in the Holy Land during the spring, or rather, as the writer is inclined to fancy, the delicate and lovely cyclamens which flower in great plenty in both spring and autumn in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The early Christian decorators made little generic distinction in the wreaths of flowers they painted or carved on graves. The Italian use of the lily may probably date from Giotto and the early Florentine Renaissance, and would then refer to the red or white Giglio of the city arms. The subject of the Annunciation, so frequently treated from the earliest Byzantine or Lombard-Romanesque dates, would sooner or later bring the favourite flower of Florence and of France* in special pictorial relation to the blessed Virgin. In later days, it is considered as the lily of the tribe of Judah, and accordingly forms a symbolic essential to pictures of the Annunciation (Guénebault, Dictionnaire des Monuments, s. v.). But as a symbol, carved or painted, it is either ethnic or mediæval, though used to convey the idea of virginal beauty in Cant. ii. 2, 16, &c. Its connexion with the lotus, dwelt on by Auber (Symbolisme, iii. 546), is not made out, and appears to be simply architectural, and founded on the convex or concave form of the bells of capitals of columns (1 Kings vii. 19, 22). See Ruskin, Stones of Venice, ii. 128, 242, 137.

The following meanings are attached to the lily in the Clavis attributed to Melito of Sardes (Spicilegium Solesmense, iii. p. 475). It is fairest of flowers, and so resembles Him (Cant. ii. 1). It is golden on white, it has petals and six leaves, both perfect numbers, representing perfect deity and humanity. It possesses both beauty and medicinal virtue ("membris medetur adustis"), and so resembles the mother of God, who has pity on sinners.

* No earlier than Philip Augustus (Auber, vol. iii. p. 547).

Its green signifies humility; its whiteness, chastity; its golden hue, charity. It is the holy church; it is the glory of immortality; it is the Holy Scriptures, with reference to Cant. iv. 5; and a variety of impertinences of symbolism, which have been its weak side, and the bane of religious art, from a distressingly early date in the history of religion and art alike.

LION. It is difficult, as Ciampini admits (Vet. Mon. tab. 17), to attach specially Christian meaning to the form of an animal which has been an ethnic or universally human symbol of strength and courage from the earliest records of Egypt and Assyria. As part of a composite form, the shape of the lion is connected with the cherubic symbol. [See CHERUB in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.] The twelve lions of Solomon's throne (1 Kings x. 19, 20), to which Ciampini alludes, were intended of course as emblematic sentinels, after the fashion of Assyrian imagery; and he also notices that the eagle is used in the same manner, often in company with the lion, apparently for state and ornament alone. It is pretty certain, however, that the ideas of watchfulness and vigour, or authority in the faith, were connected with the leonine form, as it not unfrequently occurred in Christian churches, especially under Lombard rule. It is placed at the doors, very frequently as a solid base to small pillars in the porch, or tympanum; and also at the foot of ambons or pulpits; as a symbol no doubt of watchfulness, or even of wakefulness, according to the tradition of the lion's sleeping with open eyes. The lions of the gate of Mycenae may be an instance of ancient Greek use of the form in this sense. To this effect Martigny quotes Alciati's Emblema (Deliciae Ital. Poetarum, p. 20, Francof. 1558):

"Est leo, sed custos, oculis qui dormit apertis; Templorum idcirco ponitur ante fores."

It is natural, of course, that archaeologists of all dates should wish to attach a specially Christian symbolism to the lion-form. But, as Ciampini shews, the principal sculptures of the subject are of early pre-Christian date; he gives two, in particular, from ancient Egypt (Vet. Mon. i. tab. 17), and the same associations have attended the image of the king of beasts from the first records of ideas. By the early church, it was adopted, like the originally ethnic images of the shepherd, the vine, or the fish; though not sanctioned, like them, by the Lord's use of the image.

Lions are sometimes represented as grasping the "hystrix" or porcupine, or holding a small human figure in their claws, apparently with tenderness, in the latter case (see Ciampini). The hystrix will in this case represent the power of evil, the human form the race of mankind. The Veronese griffin, mentioned by Prof. Ruskin (Modern Painters, vol. iii. ch. viii. p. 106), holds a dragon in his claws to typify victory over evil by the angelic powers.

On a gem figured vol. i. p. 715, the lion and serpent are represented on each side of a dove, which is placed on a wheat-sheaf, bears the olive branch, and evidently represents the church. This Mr. King considers an illustration of the precept to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves; though it seems possible that the idea of contest with the lion and adder, the young lion and the dragon, may be connected with it. This subject, though rare, occurs in a Vatican ivory from the abbey of Lorch, part of the binding of its ancient Evangelary; and again in Gori (Thes. Diptychorum, vol. iii. iv.).

LIPSTADT, COUNCIL OF. [PADERBORN.]

LIPTINENSE CONCILIIUM. [LESTINES, COUNCIL OF.]

LITANY (Λιτανεία, Litania v. Letania). A litany is strictly any united prayer and supplication in the churches or assemblies of the faithful. "Litania, quae Latine Rogatio dicitur, inde et Rogationes." Ordo Romanus. By the word, however, is usually understood a form of alternative prayer, intercessory or deprecatory, and of a penitential character, containing invocations to the Holy Trinity and to the saints, in which the people respond to each clause of the priest by the repetition of a short and expressive formula.

Litanies date from the earliest times of settled forms of Christian worship. Originally they were confined to the liturgy, properly so called; but in course of time, as forms of public prayer developed themselves, they are more frequently found apart from the liturgy, and appropriated to occasions of more than ordinarily earnest and penitential supplication, and specially associated with processions, during which they were repeated. Hence the procession itself was often called litania.

The word is sometimes spelt "letania," and some have drawn a distinction between the two forms, and argued that letania means a day appointed for special rejoicing. "Laetum ac festivum diem significat."^a The words are, however, generally, and probably always, used as synonyms.^b

The earliest and simplest form of Litany is the Kyrie Eleison, repeated three,^c six,^d twelve,^e forty,^f or more times. Mabillon (Comm. in Ord. Rom. i. 2, p. 34) describes a procession in which the people chanted alternately three hundred times Kyrie Elei-on, Christe Eleison; and the Capitulary of Charlemagne (vi. c. 197) directs that during the funeral office, if the people do not know the Psalms, the men should repeat Kyrie Eleison and the women Christe Eleison while they were being chanted.

The expression has been thought by some to have been suggested by a sentence of Arrian (Comment. de Epicteti Disput. ii. c. 7), "Calling upon God we beg of Him κύριε ἐλέησον." It occurs however with slight variations in the Old Testament, and was in use in the Christian church before the date of the sentence just quoted. It has been used in the ecclesiastical offices of all nations, and from the earliest times. It is found in the liturgies of St. James, of St. Mark, and of the Greek Fathers, as well as in those of the Armenians, Syrians, and other Oriental Christians, whose rites are among the oldest extant, and who repeat it in the vernacular.

There is some uncertainty by whom it was introduced into the Latin Church. The chief writers on Ritual ^g attribute the introduction to Gregory the Great. But the custom appears to have been in use before his time, as the 5th canon ^h of the 2nd council of Vaison, in the time of Felix IV. (al. III.). A.D. 529, seems to shew, which speaks of the Kyrie Eleison as being then established in all the provinces of the East and of Italy, and directs it to be used in the churches of Gaul; and Gregory himself (lib. 7, Ep. 64), in answer to some who spoke of him as wishing to introduce the rites of the church of Constantinople into that of Rome, says: "We neither have hitherto said, nor do we now say, Kyrie Eleison, as it is said by the Greeks" [nos neque diximus, neque dicimus, &c.], and then he points out the double distinction: (1) that with the Greeks the whole congregation say it together, whereas with the Romans the clergy and people say it alternately; and (2) that the Roman use is to repeat Christe Eleison as often as Kyrie Eleison has been said, which the Greeks never do.ⁱ

The words were always said by the Latin church in Greek, for which practice different symbolical reasons have been given. St. August. (Ep. 178) compares it with the use of the Greek Homoeusion, and remarks that as by the word Homoeusion the unity of substance of the Trinity is confessed by all believers, so by that other, Kyrie Eleison, the nature of the One God is invoked by all Romans and barbarians. The words were said after the Introit, but originally the number of repetitions was not prescribed, but Kyrie Eleison was repeated by the choir until the presiding prelate directed it to be changed into Christe Eleison: "Schola vero, finita Antiphonia, ponit Kyrie Eleison, Prior vero scholae custodit ad Pontificem ut ei annuat si vult mutare^k numerum Letaniae!" (Ordo Rom. v. num. 6).

It appears that in the 9th century the number of repetitions was prescribed (v. Amalarius, de Div. Off. iii. cap. 6), and by the 12th century at latest was established at nine, i.e. Kyrie Eleison (thrice), Christe Eleison (thrice), Kyrie Eleison (thrice). At this number it has since remained. Various symbolical reasons have been assigned for this number, on which it is not necessary to dwell. In the Ambrosian rite Kyrie Eleison is said thrice after the Gloria in Excelsis, thrice after the Gospel, and thrice at the end of the mass.

It has been questioned to whom the invocation is to be considered as addressed. When the form Kyrie Eleison alone is used, the prevailing opinion appears to be that it is addressed to the second person in the blessed Trinity, and Anastasius Sinaiticus^m (Contemp. in Hexaemeron lib. vii. cont.), referring to Dionysius the Areopagite, "says that God the Word was properly called Lord (Dominus, κύριος), after and with reference to the Incarnation, and the dominion which He thereupon received. "He is called Lord [Dominus, nempe κύριος] because He has the Lordship [ex eo quod κυριεύει]. Rightly, therefore, and fittingly and suitably, when God the Word in His advent to man took flesh and was seen upon earth, was He also called Lord. For previously He was called God (θεός), as being the overseer (θεωρητής) of the world."

^a v. Pappenbrock, Acta Sancti. Jun. 28, in S. Leon. ii., where he gives his reasons.

^b Augusti (Chris. Arch. 10. 33) says, "Aber dieser willkürlich gemachte Unterschied scheint nur auf einem Wortspiele zu beruhen."

^c In the daily offices, passim.

^d As in the litanies after Terce on certain days, in the Ambrosian use.

^e As after the hymn at Lauds, and in Lent at the end of Vespers in the same use, and in Vespers of the Greek church.

^f As in the daily night and day hours of the Greek church.

^g e.g. Micrologus, Amalarius.

^h There is some confusion in the canons of the two councils of Vaison (Vasio, in Gallia Narbonensis); the first was in the time of Leo the Great, A.D. 442.

ⁱ In the Ambrosian rite the invocation Christe Eleison is very rarely found, and only in borrowed forms.

^k Otherwise called "mutare Litaniam."

^l i.e. in alteram formulam, sc. Christe Eleison.

^m Vid. Biblioth. Max. Patrum, vol. xiv.

ⁿ Ib. vol. ii.

When Christe Eleison is interposed, the invocation is usually considered to be addressed successively to each of the persons in the Trinity (see Amalarius, lib. iii. 6, and iv. 2; and S. Tho. Aquin. Summa, part iii. qu. 83, art. 4).

We have entered at some length into the use of Kyrie Eleison, as these words are the germ of all litanies. We will now proceed to their use and development.

I. As to the use of litanies in the Liturgy. In the Greek liturgies from the earliest times long intercessory prayers, broken into clauses, each with the same beginning, and responded to in the same words, have formed part of the introductory or proanaphoral part of the liturgy. In the Clementine liturgy, these prayers begin as follows. They are called "The Bidding of Prayer over the Faithful" (προσφώνησις ὑπὲρ τῶν πιστῶν).

"Let us pray for the peace and the stability of the world and of the holy churches, that the God of the universe may give us His perpetual peace which cannot be taken away; that He would keep us to the end of our lives in the fulness of piety and godliness. Let us pray for the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church throughout the world, that," &c., and so on; the successive petitions comprising prayers for the diocese, the bishop and clergy, the married, the single, relations, travellers, captives, slaves, enemies, those who are in error, infants, &c.

Here no response is given at the end of each clause, but each begins with the same form, Let us pray for (ὑπὲρ . . . δεηθῶμεν).

In the Liturgy of St. James these prayers occur in the same position as in the Clementine liturgy, shortly before the beginning of the Anaphora. They are of precisely the same nature, though differently worded. They are called the catholic and universal collecta or synapte (συναπτή); and, after a few opening words by the deacon, begin thus: "That God may send peace from heaven; that He may be gracious unto us, and preserve our souls,

"Let us beseech the Lord," and so on for twelve such clauses, each ending Let us beseech the Lord (τοῦ Κυρίου δεηθῶμεν), and the last followed by κύριε ἐλέησον (thrice).

In the liturgies of St. Basil and of St. Chrysostom these prayers are the same for each. They occur in both at the opening of the liturgy, before the prayer of the first antiphon.

The deacon says: "Let us beseech the Lord in peace.

"Deacon. For peace from above, and for the salvation of our souls, let us beseech the Lord.

"R. Kyrie Eleison,

"For the peace of the whole world, for the stability of God's holy churches, and the unity of them all, let us beseech the Lord.

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

and so on, the petitions making mention of all orders of men, for the king, his court and army, for success in battle, for fine weather, for the fruits of the earth, &c. These prayers are called in the rubrics, εἰρηνικά, because of the introduction, "Let us beseech the Lord in peace," the first petition in all of them, as will be seen in the examples given, being for peace. They are also known as διακονικά, because said by the deacon; as συναπτή [Collecta]^p, because they form, as it were, a concatenation of petitions fitted together into one; or as Ectene (ἐκτενή), because they are ordinarily long. They were recited by the deacon from the Ambos.

In the Armenian liturgy a litany of the same character, except that the response is not always the same, is said by the deacon and the choir alternately, immediately after the Trisagion,^q and before the lections from Scripture, and the Creed.

In the West, missal litanies were also common. It was usual to say them immediately after the Kyrie on those days on which Gloria in Excelsis was not said, and this custom continued until the 9th century. They contained prayers for all estates of men, and were of the same character as the Greek.

An old form contained in a MS. at Fulda, and called a missal litany, begins thus:

"Let us all say with our whole heart and mind,

"O Lord hear and have mercy [Domini exaudi et miserere].

"Thou who beholdest the earth and makest it tremble,

"We beseech Thee, O Lord, hear and have mercy.

"For profoundest peace and tranquillity of our times,

"We beseech Thee," &c.

"For the holy Catholic Church, which is from the borders of the world unto the ends thereof,

"We beseech Thee," &c.,

and so on for 15 clauses.

In the Ambrosian liturgy, the missal litany is still said on the Sundays in Lent, immediately before the Oratio super populum, which corresponds with the Roman collect for the day. There are two litanies, of which one is used on the first, third, and fifth Sundays in Lent, the other on the alternate Sundays. They are framed entirely on the Greek model; often in almost the same words. They are said by the deacon, the choir responding. The first runs thus:

"Imploring the gifts of divine peace and indulgence with our whole heart and soul, we beseech Thee,

"Lord, have mercy.

"For the holy Catholic Church, which is here, and is dispersed throughout the whole world, we beseech Thee

"Lord, have mercy," &c., &c.

The original of this litany, which is a good specimen of missal litanies, is as follows:

"Divinae pacis et indulgentiae munera supplicantes ex toto corde et ex tota mente precamur te,

"Domine miserere" (repeated at the end of each clause).

"Pro Ecclesia sancta Catholica, quae hic et per universum orbem diffusa est, precamur Te." [These two words repeated at the end of each clause.]

"Pro Papa nostro III. et Pontifice nostro III. et omni clero eorum, omnibusque Sacerdotibus ac Ministris, precamur Te.

"Pro famulis Tuis III. Imperatore, et III. Rege, Duce nostro, et omni exercitu eorum.

"Pro pace Ecclesiarum, vocatione gentium, et quiete populorum,

"Pro civitate hac et conservatione ejus, omnibusque habitantibus in ea,

"Pro aeris temperie ac fructu et fecunditate terrarum,

^p The English word collect conveys quite a different notion.

^q This must be distinguished from the Sanctus of the liturgy.

^r Sc. Illo.

"Pro virginibus, viduis, orphanis, captivis, ac poenitentibus,

"Pro navigantibus, iter agentibus, in carceribus, in vinculis, in metallis,* in exiliis constitutis,

"Pro iis qui diversis infirmitatibus detinentur, quique spiritibus vexantur immundi-

"Pro iis qui in Sancta Ecclesia Tua fructus misericordiae largiuntur, "Exaudi nos Deus in omni oratione atque deprecatione nostra,

"Dicamus omnes, Domine miserere."

The other litany is of precisely the same nature, but worded differently.

In the Mozarabic liturgy, missal litanies, called preces, are said on the first five Sundays in Lent, after the psalendo, which follows the prophecy, or Old Testament lection, and before the epistle. There is no essential difference of character in them from those hitherto mentioned, though prayers for mercy for the particular congregation occupy a larger space, and there is a much greater number and variety in them. They also have a distinctly rhythmical and stanzaic character, and an approximately accentual scansion, which a few corrections of the text, often corrupt, would probably restore throughout. Those for the first, second, and third Sundays are addressed to the Saviour; those for the fourth and fifth are put into His mouth. Their rhythmical character is clearly seen in the following opening of that for the second Sunday in Lent, which is in accentual iambic lines:[†]

"Preces. Miserere et parce clementissime Domine populo tuo: Quia peccavimus Tibi.

Prostrati omnes lacrymas producimus,

Pandentes Tibi occulta quae admisimus

A Te Deus veniam deprecimur.

R. Quia peccavimus Tibi.

"Orationem sacerdotum accipe,

Et quaeque postulant [?] poscunt] affluenter tribue,

Ac Tuae plebi miserere Domine.

Quia peccavimus Tibi."

And so on for nine such stanzas.

Or in that for the third Sunday:

"Rogamus Te, Rex Saeculorum, Deus Sancte,

Jam miserere, peccavimus Tibi.

Audi clamantem, Pater altissime,

Et quae precamur, clemens attribue,

Exaudi nos Domine. Jam miserere, &c.

Bone Redemptor, supplices quae sumus,

De toto corde fientes, requirimus

Adsisce propitius. Jam miserere, &c."

And so on for seven stanzas.

That for the fourth Sunday begins thus:

"Vide Domine humilitatem meam, quia erectus est inimicus

"R. Miserere Pater Juste et omnibus indulgentiam dona."

"A Patre missus veni

Perditos requirere,

Et hostes captivos

Sanguine redimere,

Plebs dira abjicere me.

R. Miserere, &c.

"Praedictus a Prophetis

Natus sum ex Virgine,

Assumpsi formam servi

Dispersos colligere,

Venantes ceperunt me.

R. Miserere, &c."

And so on for nine stanzas, recounting the incidents of the Passion.

In the Roman liturgy these litanies did not establish themselves permanently. None appear in the sacramentary printed by Thomas (vol. vi.), which cannot be later than the end of the 6th century."

* A very frequent petition in these litanies.

† In the office books they are printed without distinction of lines.

The interpolated or forced kyries, said at the mass instead of the simple kyrie on certain days, hardly come within our limits of time; but a reference to them, in connexion with the subject before us, may be allowed. They were common in the Middle Ages, and probably were intended to assist the devotion and bring out the mystical signification of the words. A few are printed in an edition of the Roman missal of Paul III., with the heading "Sequuntur quaedam devota verba super Kyrie Eleison, Sanctus, et Agnus Dei, ibi ob paschendam nonnullorum Sacerdotum devotionem posita, quae licet non sint de ordinario Rom. Ecc., tamen in certis missis ibidem annotatis licite dicenda."[‡] These interpolated kyries were called "tropes."

The following is appointed for festivals, other than those of the highest class:

Kyrie, Rex genitor ingenite, vera essentia, Eleison.

Kyrie luminis fons, rerumque conditor, Eleison.

Kyrie, qui nos tuae imaginis signasti specie, Eleison.

Christe Deus formae humanae particeps, Eleison.

Christe lux oriens per quem sunt omnia, Eleison.

Christe qui perfectus es sapientia, Eleison.

Kyrie, Spiritus vivifice, vitae vis, Eleison.

Kyrie, Utinamque vapor in quo cuncta, Eleison.

Kyrie expurgator scelerum et largitor gratiae, quae sumus propter nostras offensas noli nos relinquere, consolator dolentis animae, Eleison.

II. In other of the daily offices of the church, litanies of the same description as those in the liturgy often occur. For instance, in the Greek church a litany, whether called "synapte" or by any other name, is said in the daily office of nocturns, and at great vespers of a vigil at the office of lighting of lamps. They also form part of many of the offices of the church contained in the euchology.

In the Ambrosian office, litanies are said (among other days) after terce on Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent ("litaniae post tertiam"). These consist mainly of a series of penitential antiphons, divided into two parts by invocations to saints and two collects, and other forms.

The Mozarabic daily offices abound in short litanies, of the same nature as those in the mass. They are placed at the end of most of the offices in Lent and on days of penitence. They are in most cases evidently rhythmical, and are addressed to the Saviour.

The following is from terce on Tuesday in the fourth week in Lent, and is a fair specimen:

‡ Among other reasons, (1) because Filioque does not appear in the Creed; (2) because there are no masses for Thursday in Lent, which (on the authority of Anastasius) Gregory II. instituted early in the 8th century; and (3) because masses for some festivals are wanting which were instituted early in the 7th century.

‡ They were in common use in England, and are said by some to have been introduced by Bede, and twenty-nine are given from the various missals. The Sarum missal directs that on all double feasts throughout the year one of the following Kyries (which are there given), with its verses (cum suis versiculis), shall be sung at the choice, within certain limits, of the precentor. It is said they were in use in Sicily in the middle of the last century. The one given in the text is found in the Sarum and Hereford missals.

R. Miserere nobis.

V. Tu Redemptor, Jesu Christe, salva mundum Tua morte.

Cujus latus perfoditur, et humilitas ardetur.

Miserere nobis.

The "miserationes" said at compline on week days in Lent are of the same nature. There is a different form for each day in the week.

III. The typical form of litany differs from those already noticed. It was, moreover, appropriated to other occasions of prayer, and used at other times than the ordinary liturgy or daily offices, and specially in connexion with processions.

The original and simplest form was, as we have seen, Kyrie Eleison and its repetitions. The smallest and most usual number of these repetitions was three, in the place of the second of which the Roman church, at an early period, substituted the form Christe Eleison. To this introduction was added an invocation to each Person of the Blessed Trinity severally and to all collectively, with miserere nobis at the end of each clause. Then followed invocations to the Blessed Virgin, angels and saints, each with ora pro nobis. Then "deprecations" from various evils, spiritual and temporal, each followed by Libera nos Domine; supplications for the church and all estates of men, each followed by Te rogamus, audi nos; the whole series concluding with the Agnus Dei thrice repeated, with the three successive responses—Parce nobis Domine; Exaudi nos Domine; miserere nobis. Then Christe audi nos; Christe exaudi nos; Kyrie, &c.; Pater noster, a few "preces" (said alternately), a psalm, or disconnected verses of psalms said consecutively, and sometimes called "capitula," and the whole concluded with prayers or collects (orations), mainly for forgiveness and protection.

This is the outline of a Roman litany in its full development. The names of the saints invoked varied with the place, or the occasion, or the service, as in the Ambrosian litanies in Lent, already referred to, in which they vary with each litany. The list was always headed by the Virgin and the heavenly host. The Agnus Dei was added in the 9th or 10th century.* According to some authorities the essential parts of a litany, without which no form of prayer is properly entitled to the name, are the invocation of saints, and the Christe audi nos, &c., at the end of the supplications.

The following litany is found, under the title Litania Romana, in an old MS. sacramentary of Gregory the Great. It was doubtless adopted in some church or churches of Gaul, as appears from the introduction of the names of some saints who were not specially venerated at Rome (S. Maurice, † A.D. 286, S. Germanus, † A.D. 448, &c.), and from the petition for the Emperor of the Franks.

Later forms of litanies are fuller, but in character do not differ from the earlier.

In the early Latin church various kinds of litanies were distinguished by different names. The principal of these were—

1. The greater litany (litania major), called also the sevenfold litany (litania septiformis).

This is said to have been instituted by Gregory the Great, A.D. 590, to be observed on St. Mark's day (April 25), for the purpose of averting the Divine wrath on the occasion of a pestilence then ravaging the city. In a sermon preached the day before, he urged the people to come at daybreak the next day with contrite heart and amendment of life to the sevenfold litany, for which he then proceeds to give directions. It was so called from its being divided into seven litanies or processions, each of which started from a different church, and singing litanies on their road, all met in the church of St. Mary the Great. "Let the litany" (i.e. the procession), he continues, "of the clergy proceed from the church of St. John the Baptist; the litany of men from the church of St. Marcellus the Martyr; the litany of monks from the church of SS. John and Paul; the litany of the handmaidens of God from the church of the Blessed Martyrs Cosmas and Damian; the litany of married women from the church of the Blessed Stephen the Protomartyr; the litany of widows from the church of the Blessed Martyr Vitalis; the litany of the poor and infants from the church of the Blessed Martyr Cecilia" (S. Greg. Ep. lib. ii. 2). In another passage Gregory speaks of litanies as already in existence, and their observance as familiar to the people:—"The return of this annual devotional celebration reminds us, beloved brethren, that we ought, by the help of God, to celebrate with earnest and devout hearts the litany which is called by all the greater (major)."

* The number of these invocations was sometimes much larger. A litany of the church of Tours, assigned to a date not later than A.D. 800, has more than 300.

But there is an uncertainty. It may well be that Gregory found some litanies on a smaller scale in existence, and developed them. These litanies on St. Mark's day are still observed in the Ambrosian rite.

2. There were the litanies on the three Rogation days. These are said to have been instituted by St. Mamertus, archbishop of Vienne, A.D. 477. St. Avitus, his disciple, Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. i. 7, &c.), and Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. lib. ii. c. 34), relate the circumstances. The latter says there had been a great and destructive earthquake in the city of Vienne, which also suffered from war and wild beasts, and that as Mamertus was celebrating mass on Easter Eve, the royal palace in the city was struck with fire from heaven (divino igne) and destroyed. Upon this, he ordered litanies, with fasting, for the three days previous to Ascension Day. The rite was adopted in other French churches, and enjoined by the council of Orleans, A.D. 511. These litanies were not introduced into the church of Rome till the pontificate of Leo III. (A.D. 795-816). In Spain they were received still later. According to Ambrosian use, they are not observed on the original days of their institution, as is supposed on account of our Lord's words, "Can the children of the bridechamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them," &c. (St. Mark, ii. 19), but a week later, i.e. on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in the octave of the Ascension. The litanies are said after terce as on the days in Lent, and are of the same description, but somewhat longer. In the Mozarabic breviary the four days next before Pentecost are appointed as days of fasting—"ad exorandum Dⁿⁱ nostrum J. C. pro peccatis nostris, ac pacem impetrandam vel pro sacris lectionibus audiendis; et ut veniat Spiritus Paraclitus, et munda nostra reperiat habitacula Ecclesiam Dⁿⁱ. frequentemus" (Rub. in Brev. Moz.). The ordinary service is modified by the addition of short preces at the end of terce, sext, and none.

There is some variation in the name by which the litany of the Rogation days is known. At first it seems to have been called, in Rome at least, letania "minor," partly to distinguish it from the litany on St. Mark's day, which was always called "major," and to which the epithet was appropriated, and partly, possibly, as suggested by Durandus—"quæ minorem nacta sit auctorem; non Romanum Pontificem, sed Mamertum Viennæ Allobrogum Episcopum." These litanies, however, were soon called "major," as in the council of Mentz, can. 33, A.D. 813—"Placuit nobis ut Litania major observanda sit a cunctis Christianis diebus tribus," &c. Menardus also says (in Litania majore): "Hæc Litania major est Rogationum, quæ in triduo ante Dominicam Ascensionem celebranda," &c. It was also sometimes called Gallicana, from the country in which it was instituted, while the Litany on St. Mark's day was called Romana.

The directions for the order of the Litany and procession on the Rogation days are given very fully from a MS. ceremonial of the Church of Vienne by Martene, iii. 126, and also the Litanies themselves for each day from a MS. ordinary of the church of Lyons. They present no peculiar features, but are interesting as pointing out clearly where the Stations occur, and at what churches. They are always said after Terce. After the ordinary litany, in which no psalm is said (Nulla dicas capitula sed orationem tantum), Sext is said, the processional office continuing with more invocations and antiphons, and at the last station of the day None is said, and then Mass. Afterwards the procession returns, saying alternately certain preces, and the whole terminates with the "Litany for any trouble" [Litania de quacunque tribulatione].

Litanies of the same character were said in some churches at other times. Thus the Mozarabic breviary prescribes Litanies and days of fasting on the Sejmiun calendarum Januarii, i.e. the three days next before the Epiphany, for three days before the festival of St. Cyprian [Sept. 13], and for three days before that of St. Martin [Nov. 11], called Sejmiun calendarum Novembris, as well as on certain other week days.

The Ambrosian rite also appoints Litanies for the week days of the last week in Advent, called Feriae de Exceptato.

3. Certain Litanies were also called septenary, quinary, ternary (septena, quina, triu). They were thus said at the font on Easter Eve:

The first subdeacon begins Kyrie Eleison, then the second repeats Kyrie Eleison, and so on till the seventh.

Then the first begins Christe Eleison, and so on till the seventh.

Then the first begins Christe audi nos, and so on till the seventh.

And the whole Litany is gone through in the same manner, each clause being repeated seven times, once by each of seven subdeacons. In the Invocations of the saints, seven names are recited out of each order of saints (dicuntur de quolibet choro septem sancti), seven from the apostles, seven from the martyrs, seven from the confessors, and seven from the virgins.

Then follows the quinary litany, said in the same manner by five subdeacons, the names of five saints being recited from each order, and then the ternary, said in the same manner by three.

Litanies were also used at baptisms, at administering extreme unction, and on other occasions, which it is not necessary to specify.

In a MS. Pontifical of Salzburg, the following metrical litany occurs:—

Rex sanctorum Angelorum, totum mundum adjuva,
Ora primum tu pro nobis, Virgo mater Germanis
Et ministri Patris summi, ordines Angeli,

Rez Sanctorum.

Supplicate Christo regi, cunctis Apostolici,
Supplicateque permagnorum sanguis fusus Martyrum.

Rez Sanctorum.

* This sevenfold order is said to have been kept up at Tours as late as the 17th century, the clergy of the seven churches in the city starting each from their own church and meeting in the abbey church of St. Martin.

Implorate Confessores, consonate Virgines,
Quo donetur magnae nobis dies indulgentiae,

Rex Sanctorum.

(and so on through all the orders of saints, ending thus):

Praesta Patris, atque Nati compar Sancte Spiritus,
Ut te solum semper omni diligamus tempore,

Rex Sanctorum.

The following is "ex pervetusto codice seu ordine Romano Wirtinensis, in dioecesi Monasteriensi:—

"Litania" (for the first day of Rogation).

Humili prece ad Te clamantes semper exaudi nos.

Summus et Omnipotens Genitor qui cuncta creasti,

Aeternus Christus Filius atque Deus;

Necnon sanctificans Dominator Spiritus almus,

Unica majestas trinaque sola Dei,

Ad Te clamantes.

Ipsa Dei Genetrix, reparatrix inelyta mundi,

Quae Dominum casto corpore concipiens,

Perpetua semper radians cum virginitate

Indignos famulos Virgo Maria tuos,

Humili.

Angelici proceres, coelorum exercitus omnis,

Aeterno semper lumine conspicuus.

Aamine ter trino supere per sidera regno

Laudibus aeternum concelebrans Dominum,

Petrus cum Paulo, Thomas cum Bartholomeo,

Et Jacob sanctus nos relevent precibus,

Andreas, Matthaeus, Barnabas atque Johannes,

Matthias, Lucas, Marcus et alisonus,

(and so on for 78 Elegiac verses, embodying the usual invocations of saints, and supplications of a litany).

These curious litanies are given by Martene, vol. iii. [See also LITE, PROCESSION.]

[H. J. H.]

LITE (λιτή). This word is explained as the united supplication of many. In the Greek church it has acquired the technical meaning of a religious procession accompanied with prayer; or of prayer for a special object made during such procession. Hence λιτή and περιπατος are used by Codinus^a as synonyms, and both as equivalents of the Latin processio, ἔτι ψαλλομένου τοῦ ὕμνου γίνεται ὁ περιπατος, καὶ ἔστιν ἀνάγκη γενέσθαι ὡς ἔθος λιτήν, ἐν δὲ τῇ λιτῇ περιπατήσασιν τὸν βασιλέα. "Matutinis decantatis, processio fit, et necesse est supplicationem in procedendo fieri, et in supplicatione Imperatorem procedere." (Codinus De off. aul. Const. c. ii.) Again λιτή and λιτανεία are used by Cedrenus^b as synonymous, αὐχοῦ γενομένου λιτανείαν ἐποίησαντο οἱ τοῦ βασιλέως ἀδελφοί . . . ἐποίησε δὲ καὶ ἑτέραν λιτήν ὁ πατριάρχης σὺν τῷ κλήρῳ. So λιτανεύειν is used in the sense of "to walk in such a procession" (Typicum Sabae, c. 42).

Litae were used on various occasions of public calamity and intercession. The Greek euchology contains a general "office for different Litae, and vigils with supplications" [ἀκολουθία εἰς διαφόρους λιτάς καὶ ἀγρυπνίας παρακλήσεων], the framework of which is common to all Litae, and is adapted to the special occasion by the introduction of proper prayers, epistle, gospel, and canon. These and some other minor varying portions are given for the following emergencies: in time of Inrougt; in peril of Earthquake; in time of Pestilence; in storms on Land and at Sea; on occasion of Inroads of Barbarians; in anticipation of War. There are also special prayers for occasions of intercession, such as, in any public calamity; for the Christian people; for the Emperor and his Army; in times of famine; in danger of thunder and lightning.

The outline of the service is as follows:

The customary opening formulas (Ter sanctus—τρισάγιον. Most Holy Trinity—παναγία τριάς). The Lord's prayer. Kyrie eleison twelve times.

Psalm 142 [143, E. V. Domine exaudi].

The great Synapte.^d

A few Troparia of the usual character.

Psalm 6.

"Then the first of the priests says a prayer proper to the Lite, and the deacon the little Synapte" (εἶτα λέγει ὁ πρῶτος τῶν ἱερέων μίαν εὐχήν, κατὰ τὴν λιτήν, ὁ δὲ διάκονος συναπτὴν μικράν).

Then begins the second station:—

[καὶ ἀρχόμεθα τῆς δευτέρας στάσεως.]

Psalm 101 [102, E. V. Domine exaudi].

A few Troparia.

The second of the priests says another prayer.

The little Synapte.

Psalm 78 [79. Deus venerunt].

A few Troparia and the gradual psalms.

The proper gospel and canon. Dismissal.

[εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ τὴν λιτήν, καὶ ὁ κανὼν παρομοίας.]

The special prayers in these offices are long; several occupying a closely printed folio column and a half, or more, and one (in time of pestilence) almost five such columns.

A Lite of a somewhat different nature from the foregoing occurs in the course of Great Vespers of a Vigil.

After the prayer of Inclination of the head [εὐχή τῆς κεφαλολοκίστας] the rubric proceeds: "Then we sing in this manner the idiomela proper to the saint of the day, making procession in the Narthex (λιτανεύοντες ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι) the priest and the deacon going first with lights and censer. Glory. Stichos of the saint. And now, Theotokion,^f and after this the deacon, if he is present, or if not, the priest, says this prayer."

Then follows a prayer for protection through the intercessions of the saints, and prayers for all conditions of men, framed as an ordinary Ectene, but with Kyrie eleison repeated not after each clause, but three times after a group of several in the course of the prayer, and forty times at the conclusion.

The priest then says a short prayer, bids Peace to all, and after the injunction by the deacon to bow the head to the Lord, says a prayer for protection identical in substance with that immediately preceding the Ectene.

^a Codinus held the office of Europalate at the court of the last emperors of Constantinople, and wrote (among other works) de Officiis Eccl. et aulae Constantin. Graec. et Lat.

^b A Greek monk of the 11th century, who wrote Compendium Historiarum from the beginning of the world to A.D. 1057.

^c There are corresponding offices for nearly all these occasions in the rituals of the Western church.

^d The same, with the omission of the clauses for the king, &c., as that said in the office of the LUCERNARIUM.

^e i.e. certain antiphons, or stichs, i.e. verses.

^f i.e. an antiphon to the B. V. M.

Then the Aposticha (ἀπόστιχα)⁸ are begun, and while they are being sung, the procession returns into the nave, preceded by lights, and singing both the Aposticha and the Stichi belonging to them (ἐπαδόντες καὶ τοὺς τυχόντας στίχους αὐτῶν).

The office then finishes with the benediction of the loaves [see Article].

[This is extracted from the office for vespers (ἀκολουθία τοῦ ἑσπερινοῦ) given in the euchology. The "order of the sacred ministry" (διάταξις τῆς ἱεροδιακονίας), in the same book, gives fuller and more complicated rubrics, but the office is the same.]

Symeon, Archbishop of Thessalonica^b, speaking of this office (op. cont. Hæres.) says, "This (λίτη) is celebrated out of doors (ἐξῴθεν) in the Narthex of the church, on Saturdays and chief festivals." He assigns also as the reason why the Lite is celebrated in the Narthex, that as the Saviour descended to our lower regions, so we implore His mercy, standing at the doors of the church as though at the doors of heaven.

Other occasional and extraordinary Litæ take place, he says, when any plague or public calamity threatens. [See also LITANY and PROCESSION.] [H. J. H.]

LITIGATION (lites). Lawsuits of any kind, especially before secular courts, were discouraged as far as possible. The 3rd Council of Carthage (c. 9) provides that any of the clergy who might appeal to a secular court in a civil matter, should in case of success forfeit what they had gained, if they desired to retain their offices. The 4th council of Carthage goes still farther. A bishop is altogether forbidden to undertake any lawsuit about a temporal matter (Statut. Eccl. Antiq. c. 19; Bruns, Canones, i. 143). The disputes of the clergy among themselves were to be settled by the bishop, either by persuasion or authority, those refusing to obey him were to be condemned by the synod (c. 59). Any catholic, lay or clerical, who referred any cause, just or unjust, to the decision of a non-catholic (alterius fidei) judge was to be excommunicated (c. 87). The council of Chalcedon (c. 9) provides a series of appeals to ecclesiastical courts, ending with the tribunal of the emperor at Constantinople (cf. Udex Eccl. Afric. c. 125). The council of Vannes however (c. 9) permits the clergy to appeal to the secular courts by permission of their bishops, but an appeal from the decision of a bishop, or a suit against a bishop, must be made to other bishops, and on no account, on peril of excommunication, be referred to a secular court. The council of Agde (c. 31, 32; Bruns, Can. ii. 152) provides that those who refuse to cease from litigation at the bidding of the bishop shall be excommunicated, and forbids any of the clergy to carry a cause into a secular court without permission of the bishop, but permits them to plead in a cause that has already been taken there. The evidence of those who were prone to litigation was to be regarded with suspicion and not received without very careful inquiry into its truth (Statut. Eccl. Antiq. c. 58). In all lawsuits the faith and moral character of both parties were to be taken into consideration (ibid. c. 96). [P. O.]

LITTEUS (LITEUS), bishop and confessor in Africa; commemorated Sept. 10 (Mart. Usuard. Ado; Acta SS. Sept. iii. 483). [C. H.]

LITURGICAL BOOKS. The present article relates not merely to such books as are necessary for the performance of the Liturgy proper, or Mass; but to all that are used in the performance of the offices of the church.

I. Before enumerating these, it will be convenient to attempt some answer to the question, "When were liturgies or other formularies committed to writing for use in the church?"

It is sometimes alleged that the great variety and length of the prayers, &c. in the liturgies and offices of the church preclude the supposition that these can ever have been said without book. And this is no doubt true; but it only throws us back on the further enquiry, when it was that liturgies and services became so lengthy and complicated as absolutely to require written manuals for their due performance—a question to which no definite answer can be given.

We cannot, in fact, inquire when liturgies were first written, without first inquiring when they were first celebrated in set forms; forms must have been adopted before they were written down, though it by no means follows that they were at once written; some forms may have been long handed down by tradition before they were committed to writing.

As it is certain that the Jews used forms of devotion in the Temple and in the Synagogue before the Incarnation, and as the services of the church were unquestionably influenced by those of the Synagogue, it seems to be a fair presumption that Christians also adopted set forms in their public devotions from an early period.* To this it is objected that Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 67) describes the president of a Christian assembly as sending up prayers "according to his ability"—an expression which (it is thought) must imply that the prayers were wholly dependent upon the powers of him who uttered them. But in fact it is probable that the words ὡς δύναμις αὐτῷ simply mean "with all his strength," referring to the vehemence with which the prayer was uttered, and not to the matter of it; and Valesius has noted (on Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 36), that ἀναπέμψεν is used specially of uttering with a loud voice. Indeed, when Justin describes (l. c.) the Christians as standing up together in a body, and uttering prayers (εὐχὰς πέμπομεν), we can hardly avoid the conclusion that the harmonious utterances of a multitude must have taken some well-known form, perhaps rather of the nature of short "preces" than more lengthened "orations." And when he says (Apol. i. c. 13) that Christians thought it right to send "pumps and hymns"^b to the Creator by means of language, rather than as the heathen did, his words suit better the majestic style of Eastern prayers and odes, such as we have them, than the unpremeditated effusions of a presiding brother.

⁸ Goar (in loco) calls these τὰ ἀπὸ στίχου στίχῃρα. They are sticheva appended to stichi, or fragmentary verses from the psalms, and are explained as "versus e Davidicis versibus compositi."

^b Bibl. Maz. Pat. xxii.

* In saying this, the writer does not contend that forms of prayer were adopted to the exclusion of ex tempore prayer.

Another objection is found in Tertullian's assertion (Apol. c. 30), that Christians prayed without a prompter (sine monitore) because they prayed from the heart. We know too little of the functions of the heathen "monitor" to be able to say with certainty what kind of contrast is intended. If the monitor dictated the words of the prayer, the passage seems to imply that Christians needed no such aid, but prayed in such words as the heart prompted; if the monitor, like the deacon in Christian assemblies at a somewhat later date, simply proclaimed the object for which prayer was to be made from time to time, no such inference can be drawn. And, as Bingham has remarked (xiii. v. 5), in public prayer the presiding brother or presbyter must, in any case, have dictated words to the rest, whether with the help of a set form or not, or there could have been no common worship. On the whole, we conclude that Tertullian, in the passage before us, simply means that Christians needed no urging to pray, as some of the heathen did; they needed no prompting but that of their own hearts.

Again, it is contended (e.g. by Le Brun, tom. ii. Diss. i. p. 11 ff.) that certain expressions of St. Basil prove conclusively that liturgies were not committed to writing in his time. The passage in question is the following: τὰ τῆς ἐπικλήσεως ῥήματα ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναδείξει τοῦ ἁγίου τῆς εὐχαριστίας καὶ τοῦ ποτηρίου τῆς εὐλογίας τίς τῶν ἁγίων ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν καταλέλοιπεν; (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27, § 66); that is, "which of the saints left behind for us in writing the words of the invocation at the displaying (or dedicating) of the bread of thanksgiving and the cup of blessing?" On this passage we have to remark, that St. Basil is here defending apostolic tradition; if, he says, we were to reject everything which has not direct written [i.e. scriptural] authority as being of no great importance, we should very much endanger the church; for many well-known practices rest only on tradition; as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, the turning towards the East, the use of the words of invocation [EPICLEISIS]. That he is referring to the want of scriptural authority for certain parts of the church service, not to the absence of written copies, is evident from the words which follow the passage quoted above: "for we do not by any means content ourselves with those words which are recorded in the Epistles or the Gospels, but we prefix and suffix others, as being of great efficacy in respect of the mystery, receiving them from the unwritten discipline (ἐκ τῆς ἀγράφου διδασκαλίας παραλαβόντες)." Clearly when St. Basil says that the words of the Epiclesis were not received in a written form from any of the saints, he means that they were not contained in scripture, but formed a part of that mass of non-scriptural tradition which included so many well-known church observances. On the question, whether these formularies were committed to writing in his own time, his words determine nothing; what he says is virtually, that they were not contained in any writing of the apostolic age. In any case, St. Basil's expressions relate only to the Epiclesis in the liturgy, the exact words of which may perhaps not have been committed to writing until a comparatively late period, from the dread of profanation by the heathen.

In another of Le Brun's arguments (tom. ii. Diss. i., art. 5, p. 29-32), that the fathers expressly forbade the Lord's Prayer or the Creed to be written down on paper or parchment, he seems to have forgotten both that the Lord's Prayer and the Creed were regarded as much more secret and sacred than most other portions of divine service, and that these cautions were addressed to catechumens.

On the other hand, it has been supposed that some at least of St. Paul's quotations, which are not found in canonical scripture, are taken from Christian liturgies. As, for instance, in 1 Cor. ii. 9, the quotation, "eye hath not seen nor ear heard . . ." which is introduced with the words "καθὼς γέγραπται," is by no means exactly taken from Isaiah lxiv. 4, and may (it is contended) have been taken from a liturgy. The expression does in fact occur in the liturgy of St. James (Daniel, Codex, iv. 113), which however is, as a whole, unquestionably of much later date than the apostolic age. With greater probability it has been thought that the expression "faithful is the word" (πιστὸς ὁ λόγος), several times occurring in the pastoral epistles (1 Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Tit. iii. 8) implies the quotation of a saying or γνώμη familiar to the Christians in their assemblies, perhaps one which they were accustomed to repeat "with one voice;" the passage 2 Tim. ii. 11 in particular has very much the rhythm of an "ode" intended for chanting.

Whether we should reckon the books or rolls found in ancient Christian pictures [I. 877] as liturgical books is very doubtful. But we come upon the traces of at least some forms committed to writing in the 2nd century. Celsus (Origen c. Cels. vi. 40, p. 302 Spencer) says that he saw in the possession of Christian priests certain "barbaric books, full of names of demons and portentous expressions." These were in all probability forms of EXORCISM [I. 651], though Daniel (Codex, iv. 28 ff.) considers them to have been DIPTYCHS. They were at any rate some kind of formula used by Christians. And the way in which Origen replies to Celsus, that Christians who duly worship God in the set prayers (προσταχθείσας εὐχαῖς) are free from the assault of demons, seems at any rate to indicate the existence of forms. Eusebius declares (H. E. v. 28, § 5) that written odes (γραφεῖσθαι) testified from the very beginning to the efficacy of Christ the word of God; a passage which reminds us of the well-known phrase of Pliny (Epist. x. 96 [al. 97]), "carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere." In the account of the martyrdom of Felix († 250) of Tubyya in Africa (Baluz. Miscell. ii. 77), the emperor is said to have put forth an edict, that the books—meaning apparently those which were the property of the church—should be taken from the bishops and priests by violence if necessary; and in the same narrative, the priest Januarius and the readers Fortunatus and Septimianus declare that the bishop had the custody of the books. In the 4th century, the evidence of the existence of liturgical books becomes more clear and definite. Pseudo-Athanasius, for instance, speaking of the rage of the Arians against the orthodox (Epist. Adv. et Episc. ad Marcum, in Migne, vol. 28, p. 1445), says that, among other things, they burned the church books. It is not improbable that the book which Hilary of Poitiers is said to have compiled (Jerome de Scripturibus Eccl. c. 100), called Liber Hymnorum et Mysteriorum, was a collection of forms for the celebration of the sacraments. Gennadius (De Viris Ill. c. 48) describes certain books which Paulinus of Nola compiled as Sacramentarium and Hymnarium. Victor Vitensis (Pe. s. c. Vandal. i. 12) tells how Geiseric compelled the priests to give up the sacred vessels or all their books (ministeria divina vel libros cunctos).

The existence of something of the nature of a "mass-book" in the 5th century is testified by Gregory of Tours in the following circumstance (Hist. Franc. ii. 22). Sidonius Apollinaris († ca. 488), when the book from which he was accustomed to read the sacred office (per quem sancta sollempnia agere consueverat) had been mischievously taken away, was able to go through the whole service of the holy day "a tempore," to the admiration of all. This is mentioned as an instance of his readiness and command of expression, not of his memory; but even if we suppose that the saint extemporised the office, the passage equally proves that a "libellus" was in common use. Gregory also (Vita Patr. c. 16, § 2, p. 1229) relates of Venantius, that coming one day to the church he said, "my eyes are dim and I cannot see the service book (libellum)," and requested a presbyter to say the office, which was (as the subsequent narrative shews) the altar service.

II. List of Liturgical Books.—The rule of Chrodegang (c. 79, in Conc. G. rm. i. 119) lays down that every priest ought to have in his church the books which are necessary to enable him to read masses, epistles, gospels, baptismal and penitential offices, the series of offices for the year (circulos anni) or the nocturnal lectures, without further defining the books. The English Aelfric at a somewhat later date required that every presbyter should possess before ordination a psalter, a book of the Epistles, a book of the Gospels, a mass-book (librum missalem), books of the Canticles, a manual or encheiridion, a "gerim," a penitential, and a lectionary (Harduin's Conc. vi. 982). Instead of the word "gerim," Mansi gives (Suppl. Conc. i. 1168) "Numerale," which is thought to mean a calendar or martyrology. [LIBRARIES, II. 986.]

We proceed now to give a list of liturgical books actually existing, and used (in most cases) from ancient times.

a. Of the Western Church.—For the saying of the several offices at the altar or in the choir there would evidently be required—

1. Some kind of directory as to the order and manner of performing the services and ceremonies appropriate to the several days. Such a book, which would contain what in modern times we call the Rubrics, the Latins called ORDO.

2. The actual matter of the prayers, thanksgivings, prefaces, &c., which were to be used in the offices. The SACRAMENTARY or MISSAL contained the prayers, &c., used in the altar offices on the several festivals throughout the year.

The plenary MISSALS, which contain all that is necessary for the performance of the altar-services, do not fall within our chronological limits. The Collectarium contained the COLLECTS [I. 403], and CAPITULA [I. 289], to be said in the Hour-offices.

3. The PSALTER contained the Psalms arranged for saying in the daily offices, together with the CANTICLES [I. 284], and the Psalm Q uicunque Vult.

4. Provision was of course made for the reading the Scripture-portions appointed in the offices, whether at the altar or in choir. This was done either by marking in a copy of the Gospels, Epistles, or other books of Scripture, the passages to be read in the several offices; or by extracting the several passages and arranging them in a separate book [EPISTLE, I. 621; GOSPEL, I. 740; LECTIONARY, II. 953].

5. The ANTIPHONARY [I. 100] contained the Antiphons, Responds, and Invitatories used in divine service.

6. The Hymnarium contained the metrical hymns used in the offices.

7. It was sometimes found convenient to place the Benedictions in a separate volume called a BENEDICTIONAL [I. 199].

8. The MANUAL contained those offices (other than the Mass and the Hour-offices), which a presbyter could administer; and

9. The PONTIFICAL, those which only a bishop could perform.

10. The Penitential (Poenitentiale) contained not only the form of administering penance, but also the penances required for various forms of sin. [PENITENTIAL BOOKS.]

11. The Passional (Passionale, or Liv'er Passionarius) contained the acts of the martyrs who were commemorated on certain days of the year. [LEGENDA. MARTYROLOGY.]

β. The Greek Liturgical books in the list given below are probably, in several cases, of later origin than the eighth century; but as there is great difficulty in determining their exact date it seemed best to give the whole list according to the modern arrangement.

1. The Directory for saying the offices was called by the Greeks ΤΥΠΙΚΟΝ (τυπικόν).

2. The LITURGY proper (Λειτουργία) contains the fixed portions of the office of the altar. If to this the offices for the administration of the other sacraments, benedictions, etc. are added, the whole volume is called EUCHOLOGION.

3. The ΜΕΝΑΙΑ contains the portions of the choir-services and altar-offices which are proper for the several Saints'-days or other festivals.

* Or "understand," if "intelligi" be the right reading rather than "legere."

4. The HOROLOGION [I. 784] contains the daily offices for the hours of prayer.

5. The Greeks, like the Latins, have a book of the Gospels (εὐαγγέλιον); of Epistles (ἀπόστολος, or πραξαπόστολος); and of Lessons from the Old Testament (ἀναγνώσεων βιβλος). Also

6. The PSALTER (ψαλτήριον), containing the Psalms, arranged for recitation, and several other offices or portions of offices.

7. The TRIODION contains the CANONS of odes to be used in Lent; and a similar book, the PENTECOSTARION, contains the proper odes, &c. for the period from Easter to the octave of Pentecost.

8. The PARACLETICON, or Paracletice, contains the Troparia for the ferial offices.

9. The OCTOECHUS contains the ferial Stichera and Troparia from the vespers of the Saturday till the end of the liturgy on Sunday.

10. The MENOLOGION is equivalent to the MARTYROLOGY of the Western Church.

The ANTHOLOGION [I. 91] and Synopsis ought, perhaps, scarcely to be reckoned among liturgical books, as they are mere compilations for the use of ordinary worshippers, from the Paracletice, Menaæa, and Horologion, of such portions as are most commonly in use.

The Hirmologion is a collection of HIRMOI (I. 773).

The Synaxaria are "the abbreviated lections from the Menologion, extracted from the Menaæa, and published, for convenience sake, by themselves" (Neale's Eastern Ch. Int. 890).

The PANEGYRICON is a collection of sermons, by approved authors, for various festivals.

III. Among liturgical books, the first place, both for its importance and the splendour with which it was written, illuminated, and decorated [see below], is to be given to the Εὐαγγeliary, or book of the Gospels. Εὐαγγελistaria, or books containing only those passages of the Gospels which were read in the altar-office, are rare within our period, while many ancient MSS. of the Gospels bear marginal words or marks which shew that they have been used for liturgical purposes [LECTIONARY].

The book of the Gospels was an object of veneration in many ways. When the church was able to celebrate its services and arrange its churches without fear of persecution, and the sacred books were no longer concealed from the prying eyes of informers; then it came to be usual to lay the book of the Gospels in some conspicuous place in the church, or even on the altar itself [ALTAR, I. 66], (Augustine, de Civ. Dei, x. 29; see the representations figured by Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxxvii.). Compare ENTRANCE, GOSPEL. In councils it was not unusual for the Codex of the Gospels to be enthroned with great solemnity at the beginning of the assembly as was done in the councils of Chalcedon, in the third and fourth of Constantinople, the second of Nicaea, and in the Roman synods of the years 642, 745, and 969. In the Christianised Empire, Justinian ordered the book of the Gospels to be deposited in the courts of justice (Binterim, iv. i. 225). From Chrysostom (Hom. 72 [al. 73] in Matt., p. 669, Migne), and Jerome (Comm. on Matt. xxiii. 6, p. 186), we learn that in their time it was not unusual for Christians to have a copy of the Gospels hung from their necks, which was also a practice of pious ladies in the fifth century, according to the testimony of Isidore of Pelusium.

The oath in the Gospels was from ancient times regarded as one of the most solemn adjurations. [OATH.]

On the use of the book of the Gospels in ordination, see BISHOP, I. 221, and ORDINATION.

The Fathers of the Eighth General Council (Constantinople, A.D. 869, c. 7) approved the veneration paid to the book of the Gospels by the faithful.

The Εὐαγγeliary, to protect it from injury, was commonly placed in a clasped or sealed CAPSA when not actually in use; an example may be seen in a mosaic of the Liberian church in Rome, said to have been completed under Sixtus III. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 16). [C.]

IV. LITURGICAL BOOKS IN ART.—Dom Guéranger (Institt. Liturg. iii. 223 ff.) dwells on the devoted care with which the sacred books were transcribed, edited, and corrected, in early days. There was required of them, he says, accuracy and fidelity enough to set all men free from the least fear of alteration in the text; personal morality, well suited to the sanctity of divine mysteries; and a degree of dignity, if possible of splendour, in execution such as might impress the eye and the mind with religious respect. The MSS., when completed in the scriptoria, were corrected under the care of bishops and abbats, who either entrusted that duty to confidential hands, or, in many cases, executed it themselves. The copyists would have thought it sacrilege to depart in any degree from the words given them to reproduce.

Guéranger (iii. 225) quotes the prologue found in Alcuin's sacramentary, as a specimen of the spirit in which church-books were compiled and copied.

"But since there are some other forms which the holy church necessarily makes use of, and which the said father saw had been set forth by others, and so himself had passed them by, on this account we thought it worth the while to gather these up like blossoming flowers of the field, and collect them in one, and set them apart in the body of this MS. . . . and for the sake of this distinction we have set this prologue in the midst, so as to be the end of the first part of the book and the beginning of the second. . . . We pray you therefore, whoever shall have taken in hand this roll to read or transcribe it, that ye pour out your prayers to the Lord for me, for that we have been diligent to collect and correct these things for the profit of as many as may be. And we pray you to copy it again so diligently, as to its text, that it comfort the ears of the learned, and allow not any of the simpler sort to go astray. For it will be no avail, as saith blessed St. Jerome, to have made correction in a book, unless the corrected reading be preserved by the diligent care of the book-keepers."

Some of the personal prayers or benedictions of actual scribes are of great beauty, but few appear to have been preserved before the 11th century. One or two may be repeated here. Guéranger has extracted the first from a Greek εὐαγγeliary of that period. Their mournful piety is certainly different from the quiet greeting of St. Paul's secretary, "I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you."

"This book has been written by the hand of a sinner. May the most holy mother of God, and Saint Eutychius, vouchsafe to accept its homage, and may the Lord God, by intercession of the most holy mother of God and Saint Eutychius, grant us eternal life in heaven. Amen."

The two illustrious (and ominously named) caligraphs of the 9th-century evangeliary of St. Emmeran of Ratisbon speak to this purpose on its last page, in Latin elegiacs:—

"Bis quadringenti volitant et septuaginta
Anni, quo Deus est virgine natus Homo;
Ter denis annis Karolus regnabat et uno,
Cum codex actus illius imperio.
Hactenus undosum calamo descripsimus aequor,
Littoris ad finem nostra carina manet,
Sanguine nos uno patris matriusque creati,
Atque sacerdotis servit uterque gradum,
En Berengerius, Luthardus nomine dicti,
Quos fuerat sudor difficilisque nimis.
Hic tibi met, lector, succedant verba precantis,
Ut dicas, capiant regna beata poli."

Mabillon, Iter Germanicum, p. 53.

"Twice four hundred years are fled and seventy, since the God-Man was born of a virgin: thrice ten years and one Charles had reigned when by his command this book was begun. Thus far we have traced our course over a troubled sea with our pen; our bark is staid on the shore at last: we two were born of the blood of one father and one mother, and each of us serves the office of priest, even we, called by name Berengarius and Luthard, to whom has been toil much and hard. Here, O reader, mayest thou thyself take up words of prayer, and say, May they reach the blessed kingdom of heaven."

Charlemagne exerted himself, amidst all the cares of his vast empire, to multiply exact copies^d of evangeliaries, psalters, and sacramentaries, often destined as presents to his bishops for the use of their dioceses. There can be no doubt of the important effect produced on deep and imaginative minds, not greatly aided nor encumbered by book-study, by the lovely ornament, and sometimes energetic and powerful realizations of actual events, which are found in the great MSS. of early ages. There is no reason to doubt the story that king Alfred received help in the pursuit of knowledge, if he was not induced to learn to read, by the ornamental letters of a MS. (Asser, pp. 7, 8, ed. Walsingham). Charlemagne's devotion to the subject induced him to attempt the art of caligraphy and illumination with his own hand (Eginhard, Vita B. Caroli Magni, cap. vii.), "sed parum prosperè successit labor prae posterus et sero inchoatus."

Mabillon and Montfaucon both describe a MS. which is said to have been copied by the hand of Eusebius of Vercelli in the 4th century. (See Iter Italicum, xxv. p. 9, ed. 1687; Diarium Italicum, p. 445, 1702.) It contains the gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, as Mabillon says; and it may here be observed, in passing, that the early grandeur of uncial characters, majuscular or minuscular, often made it necessary, for want of space, to divide the evangeliaries into parts; or even prevented their completion. The Eusebian evangeliary is in uncial writing, chiefly minuscular, says Guéranger (Institutiones Liturgiques, iii. 312), and Montfaucon gives its alphabet. But both he and Mabillon speak of it as in a most lamentable state of fragility and decay, caused more by damp and former accidents, than by its age. "Membrana situ fere corrupta est, characteres paene fugientes et semideletis tantisper a Romana scriptura degenerant," says the latter; and Montfaucon seems to have regretted its probable destruction somewhat the less because he found it as a version, "a vulgata nostra toto coelo discrepantem." It has been published by Bianchini. Rome, 1749,* and is said to be still preserved in the treasury of its ancient convent.

In the 5th century the principal authentic specimens of evangeliaries yet remaining are the Vatican MS. above mentioned (1209), the Gothic evangeliary of Ulfilas, kept at Upsal,^f the Latin evangeliary of St. Germain des Prés, and those at Cambridge, with perhaps the most important of all, the Syriac gospels, transcribed by the monk Rabula in 586,^g now in the Laurentian Library at Florence. The Leonian sacramentary, the psalter of St. Germain des Prés,^h and that of Zurich,ⁱ complete Guéranger's selection of liturgical MSS. of this century. Without giving his full list (iii. 289–292) of the works and caligraphers of the 7th, 8th, and 9th centuries, we may mention the evangeliaries of Monza,^k of Notre Dame de Paris, and that which bears the name of Colbert, both in the Bibliothèque National at Paris;^l the Anglo-Saxon Cottonian MS. in the British Museum, and St. Kilian's at Würzburg, in the cathedral treasury, with the Cottonian psalter of St. Augustine. Of the 8th century, the Sacramentary of Gellone will be found admirably illustrated by Count Bastard, vol. i.; and the great Greek evangeliary of Vienna, with the Missale Francorum, Missale Gothicum, the Cottonian MSS., and others, in Silvestre's Paléographie Universelle.

Before proceeding farther, it may be well to call the reader's attention to the accurate meanings of a few terms, and one or two necessary explanations. The first has reference to the real function of the caligrapher, as distinguished from that of the illuminator or miniature-artist of later times. The illuminators, as Guéranger observes, begin their reign at the end of the 12th, and enter on decided pre-eminence in the 13th century. They have little to do with our period, and their work marks the commencement of a new period when the study of natural beauty had begun, and the vegetable kingdom in particular began to be illustrated for ornamental purposes in the service books of the church. A distinction will be found, under article MINIATURES, between truly caligraphic and artistic ornament. (See Westwood, Palaographia Sacra.) Much of what we have to say on the subject of artistic ornamentation belongs to article MINIATURES: for the present the distinction must always be observed between the beauty, elegance, or splendour of the letters as writing, which is caligraphy, and the power of colour, form, and imagination displayed in pictures attached to the writing, which is fine art. It is difficult, if not impossible, to assign proper limits between these phases of decoration: and it is enough to say that they are combined in most liturgical MSS. of the earliest date which still remain to us; and, further, that in most of the most valuable the caligraphic art has its full share of importance, and that the decoration is subordinate to the writing, and dependent on the text, not only as to meaning and import, but also in appearance. The effect of the whole page, as to form and colour, has evidently been the chief object of the caligraphic artists as such, apart from the genuine piety of aim which really seems to have influenced them as their main motive. The text and its pictures form a whole, united, generally speaking, by the effect of grandly ornamented capital letters; unless, of course, the MS. be on purple vellum, when the ground colour gives the main effect, and determines all the rest of the ornament. Perhaps only one modern artist has revived this idea of the old caligraphists in a perfectly original way, but with exact analogy. The illustrations and ornamented writing of Blake's various poems, copied and executed by his own hand, renew and illustrate that excellent moderation of judgment of the old copyists, which made their pictorial ornament, however beautiful and ingenious, still always subsidiary to their caligraphy. The pictures were beautiful, they thought, the text was sacred; but even because the latter was chief and the one thing needful, too much attention could not possibly be given to the former.

The capital letters in liturgical MS. are generally of the kind called rustic, especially when several lines consist of smaller capital letters. But they are frequently executed in the best Roman style, as in the evangeliaries of Soissons and of Gellone, and in the sacramentary of Drogon. (Count Bastard, vol. i. ii.; Silvestre, Palaographie Universelle, 3^{me} partie, § 2.) The uncial characters, or rounded capitals, with their particular beauties of size, clearness, and order, appear and reappear in all the richer MSS. down to the 11th century, when writing begins to be altogether Gothicised or made cursive, and the ornament is concentrated on the initial letters, and their accompanying miniatures. The artistic use of varied colour may be said to be based on the minium or red lead, from which the word miniature is derived. Green and yellow follow almost immediately in the Visigothic and Merovingian work; but while the richest MSS. were executed on purple or azure grounds, the use of varied hues was of course out of the question, and writing and ornament were alike executed in gold or silver. A very grand specimen of the earlier chrysographs, as they are called, in uncial capitals of gold and silver, is the celebrated psalter of St. Germain (Bastard, i. 1). But the use of purple vellum for books destined for the use of imperial students goes back to comparatively early days of the empire, on the eve of the triumph of the Christian faith; Maximin the younger received a purple vellum MS. of Homer as a present from his mother (Jul. Capitolin; Vita Maxim.). Sacred books, and in particular the evangeliaries, would naturally have been the first objects of Christian splendour, when such a thing became possible. The gospels of Ulphilas, the psalter of St. Germain above mentioned, with that of Zurich, and the evangeliary of Brescia, are on purple, and the evangeliary of Brescia on azure-blue vellum; but that of St. Germain has one side of each page dyed purple, the other in azure.

St. Wilfrid of York gave a purple evangeliary to his cathedral in the 7th century: the 8th produced those now at Vienna and Monza. Charlemagne presented one to his church at Aix-la-Chapelle, and another of his evangeliaries, entirely on purple vellum, is still, says Guéranger, the principal ornament of the library of Abbeville.^m The splendid MS. preserved in the library of the Remonstrants at Prague, appears to the writer to be of about the same date. The great emperor's attachment to the art of caligraphy has been mentioned, and the splendour of the early empire was revived by him in this use of purple or azure books, necessarily written in either gold or silver. They reappear during the Carolingian age, and go out of use almost entirely in the 10th century, though the Bodleian Library at Oxford possesses a purple evangeliary, with whole-page pictures, dating from the 11th.

Silver-ink MSS. are much rarer than chrysographs, strictly so-called, but both metals are frequently used together, as in the evangeliary of Ulphilas and the psalters of St. Germain and of Zurich. The evangeliaries of Verona and Brescia are written almost entirely in letters of silver.ⁿ In the others the text is silver, with golden headings and initials, gold being used also for the sacred names.

Purple vellum begins to be economised in or before the 9th century, as in Charlemagne's psalter, presented to Adrian VIII. about the end of the 8th. This is now in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and has a limited number of purple pages. The antiphony of Monza, of nearly the same date, is entirely purple.

In the sacramentaries of the 9th century, the canon of the mass is frequently on purple, or the frontispiece and first pages of the books; or texts to which special attention is to be drawn, are thus distinguished. Gradually the purple is arranged with other hues on a white ground, and begins to be used, artistically speaking, as a colour.

Golden writing was not, or was not long, confined to the purple, violet, or azure MSS.^o Many which have but few coloured pages are chrysographs throughout; as the evangeliaries of Charlemagne (or of St. Martin des Champs), of St. Martin and St. Médard of Soissons (in Count Bastard's second volume). The expense of purple vellum seems to have been very great; so much so, that as early as the 4th century the bishop Theonas enjoins on Lucianus, the emperor's chamberlain, not to have the MSS. of the imperial library entirely in colour, unless by special order (D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. xii.). Charlemagne seems to have reserved this magnificence especially for evangeliaries, the Vienna psalter being only gold in part. For chrysographs on white, in the 9th century, they are too numerous to allow of more than brief mention of a few, besides those of St. Médard and St. Martin already named. The evangeliaries of St. Emmerand at Munich, of Lothaire in the National Library of France, with his psalter; those of the abbey of Hautvillers (Bastard, ii.) and Lorch (the latter now at the Vatican, with fine uncial writing on alternate bands of purple and azure), and the antiphony of Goubert, monk of St. Bertin, are named by Dom Guéranger. Those of Charlemagne, or St. Martin des Champs (Gothic writing), and of St. Médard, and another very grand one, written for Charlemagne, in fine uncial, with large whole-page illustrations [see MINIATURES], the sacramentary of Drogo (golden uncial, rustic capitals, and cursive Gothic, with splendid Roman initials), the evangeliaries of Lothaire and Louis le Débonnaire, are all magnificently illustrated by Count Bastard, vol. ii., with that of Hautvillers. He also gives pictures from two magnificent bibles, written for Louis le Débonnaire and Charles the Bold; and one presented to the latter monarch by Count Vivien, abbat commendatory of Tours, which shews great progress in miniature painting, and attains something like a climax of splendour in ornamental caligraphy. The ceremony of its presentation to Charles the Bald is illustrated on its title-page with considerable skill, and perhaps with some attempts at portraiture. Its writing is a perfect example of what is called the Caroline uncial and demiuncial.

Guéranger goes back to the 7th century for the first employment of artistic design by the liturgical scribes of the Western church. They began naturally with their initial letters, making the illustration a part of the page considered as a whole, and keeping their art in equal alliance with their caligraphy. In the Eastern church the Rabula MS. shews how much could be done even in the 6th century, but its miniatures are inserted in rectangular spaces, and independent of the writing. (See Professor Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra, Introduction; also CRUCIFIX and MINIATURE.)

The canons of Eusebius of Caesarea were very early added to the sacred text: they are found in the MS. of Rabula, in the 6th century, accompanied with a free and luxuriant ornament: and in the western world the evangeliary of Ulflas, of the same period, possesses them. The idea of architectural decoration of pages struck the caligraphers at once, as was natural. To consider a row of parallel columns as an arcade, separated by pillars, and to lavish wreath-, scroll-, and flower-work, or even birds, on their traceries, was an obvious and pleasing system of decoration. The Colbert evangeliary (Bastard, i.), 7th century, has its columns drawn firmly and beautifully with the pen: and it is most interesting to the artist, in an age of mechanical copying, to observe the extraordinary power and freedom of manual execution in many of these MSS., which in the opinion of the present writer, fully raise the ancient caligraphy to the level of a fine art. The O of Giotto was doubtless a fair test of his great executive power; but it is excelled in difficulty and interest by the pen-drawn birds and grotesques of the MSS. See GROTESQUE, I. 751 f; LION, II. 999, for instances of true pen-drawing. It is singular that the last relics of the vanished art should be the swans or birds of the modern writing-master's flourish.

• The names of these colours are somewhat vague and must necessarily convey rather different ideas to different persons. The greater number of purple MSS. are at present of what would be called a puce colour, mostly dark and rich, but occasionally lightened by time, or deadened almost into black.

The 8th and 9th century MSS. are richest in their decoration of the canons, and those of St. Martin des Champs, St. Médard, of the Church of Mans, of Hautvillers, and that written for Lothaire, are models of gorgeous grotesque. Sometimes there are twenty or twenty-five pages of them, worked out with inexhaustible variations and fancies. Gold and silver are lavished everywhere; the horizontal lines end in nondescript heads, the leaf-work is rich but chaste, and wreaths about the pillars like "the gadding vine;" and a first faint sign of naturalistic imitation appears in the very skilful use of gold to imitate the wavy cloudings and changing lines of polished marble pillars. Animals and small figures present themselves apparently just where they like, though always in places well adapted to balance of pattern and ordered arrangement. They are in some cases emblematic, as the evangelical symbols present themselves constantly, and there are endless nondescripts. A list is appended, taken from the above-mentioned MSS., which differ from the wild grotesques of the Gellone sacramentary of 7th century, by being often drawn with careful attention to natural character.^p

A decided falling off in colour-power, with some carelessness of drawing, will be observed in the Hautvillers MS.: the bibles of Charles the Bald are either Franco-Saxon or Gallo-French, showing the serpentine spirals and endless interlacings of the Northern-Gothic work. Count Vivien's MS. shews equal splendour and higher aim in the artist: the great zodiac illumination is given by Count Bastard (vol. ii.).

In the Visigothic work of the Sacramentary of Gellone, 8th century, there is a crucifixion, with angels; much blood is used, and the drawing is very rude. There is a miniature of the crucifix in the canon of the mass, the cross forming the T in the words "Te igitur." In the same MS. the Mass of the Invention of the Cross has in its initial letter the figure of a man squaring a tree-trunk, as if to form the upright stem. The "Leofric" sacramentary, in the Bodleian, 9th century, has highly-ornamented initials in the canon of the mass, but is without figures. Our Lord sits in the initial of the word Quoniam, at the beginning of St. Luke's Gospel, in the MS. of St. Médard. The grand whole-page St. Matthew of the Charlemagne evangeliary, with its mystic fountain and symbolic building of the Church, is an interesting example of the decoration of manuscripts. As Guéranger remarks, the ideas of the heavenly city or palace, and possibly the pillars and polished corners of the Hebrew Temple, may have been in the minds of the artists (Ps. cxliv., 12). We cannot agree with him (Inst. Lit. p. 366) as to their admirable knowledge of perspective; but ingenuity of invention, splendour of material, harmony of colour, and minute accuracy of hand, can go no further than in most of their works. Information about Byzantine architecture is certainly to be gathered from the illustrations of the Menologium or Calendar of the emperor Basil the Younger, and other works; as, for instance, Charlemagne's evangeliary. They remind the student of the architectural backgrounds of Giunto of Pisa, in the lower church of Assisi and elsewhere.

The ease with which cheap copies of the holy scriptures and other books are to be obtained in our own day, may prevent us from understanding the real and practical value of the sacred MSS. of the earlier ages, and still more from understanding the single-hearted devotion, and happy self-concentration, with which the copyists seem to have carried on their labours. It is probable that in most cases the best educated monks, or men of more natural refinement than others, must have been employed in the scriptoria of the great houses; at least in every monastery which professed the life of labour and prayer with sincerity, some sensible division of labour, according to various capacities, must have taken place, and the fine hands of the calligraphist or painter would hardly be set to hew wood or draw water, unless for temporary discipline.

It is singular that Martene, who records forms of benediction in use for all other objects, from emperors and empresses down to pilgrims' staves and scrips, says nothing in his chapter "De Benedictionibus," of forms for dedication of sacred books, though he gives the full order for blessing a writing-desk (scrinium) or book-case (capsa), (De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, lib. iii. cap. 1). This is quoted from an English pontifical MS., and a second from a MS. of St. Victor, said to have been 500 years old, in his own time. The first, however, seems to apply to an arca or credence, and neither are within the limits of our period.

A specimen of malediction on any person guilty of stealing a 13th-century MS. is not to be omitted (Colbert, Bibliothèque Nationale). "This sacred gospel has been copied by the hand of George, priest of Rhodes, by the exertions and care of Athanasius, cloistered monk and by the labour of Christonymus Chartinos, for their souls' health. If any man dares to carry it off, either secretly or publicly, let him incur the malediction of the twelve apostles. and let him also receive the heavier curse of all monks. Amen." The first day of the month of September, year 6743, of Jesus Christ 1215."

The missal of St. Maur des Fossés speaks to the same purpose. "This book belongs to St. Mary and St. Peter, of the monastery of the Treuches. He who shall have stolen or sold it, or in any manner withdrawn it from this place; or he who shall have been its buyer, may he be for ever in the company of Judas, Pilate, and Caiaphas. Amen, amen. Fiat, fiat. Brother Robert Gualensis (of Wales?), being yet young and a Levite, hath devoutly written it for his soul's health, in the time of Louis (le Gros), king of the French, and of Ascelin, abbat of this place. Richard, prior and monk, caused this book to be copied, in order to deserve the heavenly and blessed country. Thou, O priest, who ministerest before the Lord, be mindful of him. Pater noster."

The bindings and outer cases (capsae) of the more important liturgical books are in themselves a subject of no small interest. That of the Eusebian evangeliary of Vercelli is thus described by Mabillon (Iter Ital. p. 9, April 1685). "Codicis operculum ex argento, a Berengario imperatore ab annis fere octingentis instauratum, ex una parte Salvatoris effigiem, ex alio sanctum Eusebium exhibet; ad cujus caput hi versus adscripti leguntur:

Præsul hic Eusebius scripsit, solvitque vetustas;
Rex Berengarius sed reparavit idem.

In infima vero parte ad pedes Eusebii

Argentum [o 2] postquam fulvo decompsit et auro, Ecclesiae Praesul obtulit ipse suae."

He also mentions (p. 213, Jan. 1686) the ivory covers of St. Gregory's purple antiphonary, at Monza, one of which has a medallion of David, the other of the donor. The great MS. of Theodolinda (supra) has a golden cover, with the cross on each side. These ancient relics may be classed according to their material and ornaments, whether of carved ivory, of chased metal, or of metal with jewelled ornaments. A special interest attaches to the ivory covers, not only from their intrinsic value, but from the use of ancient consular diptychs [DIPTYCH]. There is no doubt that many of these ancient ivories have been employed by later ages in the bindings of liturgical books, sometimes with slight changes and adaptations, as in the antiphonary of Monza. This is, perhaps, the typical example of a consular diptych, converted to ecclesiastical use. Two ivory panels or plaques bear each its figure, perfectly recognisable as a consul of the 5th century, by the dress and the mappa of the games. But one of them has been converted into St. Gregory the Great, by the addition of a tonsure, and the addition of a cross to his staff of office.⁴ The other has had his wand lengthened and curved into a shepherd's staff, and passes for David. The consular ivory of

⁴ This Professor Westwood denies, Early Christian Sculptures, p. 34

Flavius Taurus Clementinus, now at Nuremberg, had an ecclesiastical diptych-list engraven on the ivory itself, and the Diptychon Leodiense, in memory of the consul Flavius Astyrius, forms one of the sides of an evangeliary in St. Martin's, of Liège, and is also engraven on the inside. (See Donati, De Dittici degli Antichi profumi e sacri, Lucca, 1753-4; Gori, Thesaurus veterum Diptychum, Flor. 1751, fol.; and Maskell, Ivories, 1876.)

There is a passage in Cassiodorus in which he speaks of having designed and published, or set forth in a collected volume, a number of examples of carvings, or designs of some kind, for the external bindings of sacred books. "We have moreover designed skillful artifices in the coverings of our MSS.; so that there might be a covering of outer ornament over the beauty of the sacred text, herein perhaps in some sort imitating that example of the Lord's figuring. Who clothed in marriage garments those whom He thought worthy of invitation to His supper. Among which we have set forth many examples of designs (facturarum) represented in one volume, that any studious person may choose for himself any form of covering he shall prefer." (De Institutione divin. Scripturarum, cap. xxx.) These would probably be executed in ivory for the most part. The ivory of Murano (described by Costadoni in the collection of Calogera, tom. xx.) is of the greatest interest, as it is covered with reliefs of the ancient cubicula of the catacombs and of the earlier sarcophagi, and it may be considered earlier than the 8th century. The nail-holes intended to fix the ivory panel on the cover of the book to which it belonged still remain, as is the case with many ivories, which have been used for reliquaries and shrines, as in the case of the diptychs of Symmachus and Nicomachus (Gori, Thesaurus, tom. i. p. 207). For 9th-century ivories as bindings of church books, those of the evangeliary of Lorch in the Vatican, and of the sacramentary of Droyon and evangeliary, No. 99 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, may be referred to. The collection, or catalogue, of Professor Westwood, is the best reference in this country for all the more ancient documents on ivory.

The Gothic evangeliary of Ulilas is called Codex Argenteus, on account of its rich binding of that metal; and the evangeliaries of St. Médard and St. Emmeran possess covers of enamel and gold respectively, the latter with embossed portraits. Plates of vermilion-enamel occur in the Eusebian gospels, and one of the covers of the Lorch evangeliary is of this material. This use of different metals was practised by Victor III., while at Monte Casino, under the name of Didier; who ornamented an epistolary for his abbey, with gold plate on one side and silver on the other; this binding was called dimidius (D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 402). Precious stones, and even reliefs, have been enclosed in these bindings, as by Didier of Monte Cassino, in the MS. of St. Emmerand, in the splendid ones of the Sainte-Chapelle,* and in many instances, and with great magnificence, in the Eastern church.*

The subjects represented in ivory or metal on covers of sacred books are of course, in most cases, simple in choice and in execution during our period. Guéranger mentions in particular the grand ivory cover of the Lorch evangeliary in the Vatican, which bears some resemblance in its carving to the work of the later sarcophagi, and which he vindicates on Gori's authority (Thes. vet. Diptych. tom. iii. tab. iv.) from the imputation of being a pagan ivory, altered and adapted to Christian use.¹ Our Lord is represented as holding the Gospel and treading down the Lion and the Dragon, attended by two angels bearing sceptres and rolls; above are two flying angels with a clipeate cross, and below, two subjects of the Magi before Herod, and also making their offerings to the Holy Child and His Mother.

On the great MS. 99 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, are Lazarus, the Samaritan woman, and the Entry into Jerusalem, treated much as in the sarcophagi. See Trésor de Numismatique, Bas-reliefs et Ornaments, X. Série, II. Classe, 2 partie, pl. ix. x. xi. The sacramentary of Drogon has liturgical rites chased or embossed on its cover in eighteen compartments.

The embossed figure of our Lord on the Vercelli Gospels is probably one of the earliest in such a place, and dates from about 888. Representations of the crucifixion also begin in that age.

The folio work of Prof. Westwood, published 1869, contains an appendix note on the magnificent book-covers, "auro argento gemmisque ornata, which are repeatedly mentioned in connexion with fine early copies of the Gospels. They have, for the most part, long ago disappeared; but there still exist a number of metal cases which have served to hold some of the smaller Irish MSS., which generally exhibit restorations at various periods." They are also generally ornamented with crystals or other gems, and are known under the name of cumhdachs. See article on the Book of Armagh, p. 80; and the Psalter of S. Columba, p. 82; the Book of Diurna, pp. 83, 84; and the Gospels of S. Miling, p. 93. Plate 51, fig. 9, represents a party of ecclesiastics from the cumhdach of the Stow missal, p. 88. The front of that of St. Molaise or Molasch is at fig. 6, pl. 53. "It is 5½ inches by 4½ inches, and 3½ inches deep; of bronze, bound with silver, overlaid with openwork, riveted, on white metal, silvered . . . a cruciform or wheel-cross design, with the emblems of the Four Evangelists at the angles, barbarously designed. Portions of gold filigree and interlaced ornaments, with some jewels, occupy some of the remaining compartments of the openwork, one ruby still remaining in its setting."

The capsae or cases in which the books thus gorgeously ornamented were deposited for safety were generally made of, or adorned with, plates of gold, silver, &c. They are mentioned repeatedly in mediaeval documents beyond our period; but Gregory of Tours says that Childebert obtained, in the plunder won from Amalaric, about twenty of these cases for evangelaries, all covered with pure gold and precious stones" (Hist. Francor. cap. lxi. p. 114; Migne, 71, 250). St. Wilfrid of York's evangelary had a case of this kind (Acta SS. O.S.B. Saec. IV. part ii. 'Vita S. Wilfredi').

The study of this subject must necessarily lead, as has been said, to a full understanding of the reverence paid to the text of the Gospels, in particular, during the dark ages, and at a period when that text, like the oral prophecies of the Lord in Samuel's early days, was rare and precious in the eyes of those who were its keepers. Yet, in looking at the few and splendid relics of the magnificence of Byzantine or Carolingian ritual, it is impossible to help thinking of the vast mass of perished MSS. of far earlier days, written on humbler materials and for humbler hands; and on the important question, how far the skill, enterprise, and numbers of the regular book-transcribing and selling trades of Rome and the larger cities of the empire may have multiplied cheap copies of the Holy Scriptures in the first three centuries. This is for other hands; an article on the learning of the early Church by the Rev. Prof. Milligan (Cont. Rev. vol. x. April 1869) is well worthy of reference as bearing on the subject; but the important and strictly correct remark of the Commendatore de Rossi, that the early cycle of Christian ornament in the Catacombs is merely a cielo biblico, or scriptural repertory of Christian symbolism and history, bears also on this observation. It is impossible not to see that in the earliest centuries the Holy Scriptures were held to be the exclusive repertory of subjects for Christian art, and that the true and exclusive use of Christian popular art was general instruction in Scripture.

It seems possible that evangelaries or forms of sacramental ministration may have been multiplied on papyrus, like other books, in large numbers by means of dictation—possibly to educated slaves or freedmen. If so, they have perished with other books in the wrecks of ancient civilisation.

The following inscription from the first folio of the Gospels of Treves may be taken (as prefixed to the facsimiles of Anglo-Saxon and Irish miniatures) to represent the commendatory inscriptions of the Greek MSS.

"Scriptori vita aeterna; Legenti pax perpetua; Videnti felicitas perennis; Habenti possessio cū salute. Amen Dō gracias: Ora pro me: D's tecum." [R. St. J. T.]

LITURGICAL LANGUAGE. It would seem natural that prayer and praise in the congregation should be made in the vernacular tongue of the people; and in the early days of Christianity there can be no doubt that it was so. St. Paul's depreciation of "speaking with tongues," in comparison with "prophesying" (1 Cor. xiv. 1-17), has not indeed a direct bearing on the question of liturgical language, for the "tongues" of which he speaks do not appear to have been foreign languages, but utterances which only persons specially gifted could interpret; but his reasoning on the necessity of so giving thanks and so speaking that the congregation may be edified, and may not merely hear sounds which convey no definite impression, applies in full force to services celebrated in languages "not understood of the people." Even Guéranger (Instit. Lit. iii. 86, 88; compare Bona, de Reb. Lit. i. 5), eagerly as he defends the modern Roman usage, "has no difficulty in conceding that originally the church must have employed the vulgar tongue at the altar. . . . As for the apostles themselves, there is no doubt that they celebrated the liturgy in the language of the people whom they instructed." In truth, we may safely conclude, on the testimony of Origen (c. Celsum, viii. c. 37, p. 402, Spencer), that in the third century "each man prayed to God in his own common speech (κατὰ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ διάλεκτον), and sang hymns to Him as he could."

Over a large portion of the East there can be no doubt that Greek—in which were written the great liturgies which bear the names of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark—was the language of public devotion; for, from the beginning of the fourth century, Greek was the official language of the Eastern empire, and Constantinople the seat of a patriarchate. Numerous liturgies are also found in Syriac, whether translations of Greek originals or of independent origin. The Armenian, the Ethiopic, and the native Egyptian churches had also vernacular services. Of the early use of the latter we have an instance in the circumstance which Athanasius (Vita Antonii, c. 2, p. 633) relates of St. Anthony, that he was induced to sell all that he had by hearing the parable of the rich young man read in church. As we are expressly told that the saint knew none but his native language, this lesson must have been in Coptic. Where a vernacular version, from whatever cause, was not used in the services, an interpreter explained what was read. Thus Procopius held three offices in the church at Scythopolis; first, that of reading; second, that of interpreting Syriac (in Syri interpretatione sermonis); third, that of exorcist.

It is probable that even in the West the first missionaries of Christianity spoke mainly Greek, the "lingua franca" of the educated class throughout Europe, and of the scattered communities of Jews and Jewish proselytes in Gentile cities. The church in Rome to which St. Paul wrote was a Greek-speaking community, and so it continued to be for several generations. Polycarp came to Rome to confer with Anicetus on the observance of Easter in the year 170. Eusebius tells us (H. E. v. 24) that on this occasion the pope—himself almost certainly a Greek—ceded to the stranger the privilege of consecrating the eucharist. It is in the highest degree improbable that Polycarp celebrated in any other language than Greek. At the beginning of the third century Hippolytus wrote in Greek, and evidently contemplated the church in Rome as a Greek-speaking society. The inscriptions on the tombs of popes Fabian (A.D. 251), Lucius (A.D.

"The same author tells a story of a goldsmith who fraudulently combined with the saint's messenger to substitute silver for gold in the binding of an evangelary. Both were swallowed up by the earth, "viventis et vociferantes." (De Gloria Confess. cap. lxiii. p. 946.)

252), and Eutychianus (A.D. 275) are in Greek; a fact which, as De Rossi (Roma Sott. Christ. i. p. 126) points out, evidences the official use of the Greek tongue by the Roman church in its solemn acts. And at an even later date, pope Sylvester (†335) wrote against the Jews in the Greek tongue; unless indeed the treatise which we possess is a Greek translation of a Latin original. From this time all trace of Greek as the language of the church of Rome vanishes; it probably migrated to Byzantium with the emperor and the court. Pope Leo (440-461) seems to have been ignorant of Greek; he was certainly unable to write it, for he speaks of the necessity of having an accurate Greek translation made of his letter to Flavian (Epist. 131 ad Julian.); and the words of Proterius (Leon. Epist. 133), apologising for the omission of a Latin translation of his letter, the responsibility of which (as it seems) he wished to leave to the pope, seem to imply that he could not read it in Greek. Survivals of the days when Greek was the liturgical language of the church of Rome are found in the Kyrie Eleison so frequent in her services; in the use of the Greek Trisagion—Agios o Theos, agios ischiro, agios athanatos, eleison imas—in the Holy Week; in the recitation of the Creed in Greek on behalf of a child to be baptised [CREED, I. 492]; in the reading of certain lectures in Greek as well as in Latin [INSTRUCTION, I. 862]; and in the singing of the angelic hymn in Greek in the Christmas mass (Martene, Rit. Ant. i. iii. 2, § 6).

In the half-Greek districts of Southern Italy, Greek rites naturally lingered long; but the Greek element received a large accession when Leo the Isaurian, in the eighth century, placed a considerable part of Southern Italy under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople, who not only founded new sees, but made vigorous efforts to introduce Greek rites. And these efforts of the pope's adversaries were seconded by the pope's adherents; for many Basilian monks who, like the pope, defended images, took refuge in the same region, where they naturally maintained their own services in their monasteries, which were numerous (P. P. Rodota, Dell' Origine, Progresso, e stato presente del Rito Greco in Italia osservato dai Greci Monaci Basiliani e Albanesi, Roma, 1758). There is a strong indication of the mixture of the two languages in the following circumstance. The author of the life of Athanasius of Naples (†877), commonly supposed to be Peter the Deacon, speaks of "laity and clergy not ceasing in common prayer in Greek and Latin." Even the purely Western Benedictine Order was not insensible to the influence of the Greek colonies in its neighbourhood. Thus we read that the monks of Monte Cassino on Easter Tuesday, going from their monastery to the church of St. Peter, sang mass with a bilingual chant (Greek and Latin) to the end of the gospel (Codex Cassin. in Martene, Monach. Rit. III. xvii. n. 14).

In Southern Gaul we find another region which had received its civilisation mainly from Greece. There, says Dean Milman, "Latin had not entirely dispossessed the Greek even in the fifth century;" and Jourdain (Traductions d'Aristote, p. 44) refers to a MS. of Limoges in the National Library at Paris (No. 4458), which gives the Gloria, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the mass of Pentecost, in Greek. Doublet (Antiq. de S. Denis, c. 48, p. 366) tells us that on the festival of St. Denis the monks of the abbey of St. Denis, near Paris, chanted the whole mass in Greek, in honour of the Greek apostle of France, with Epistle and Gospel in Latin as well as in Greek.

The MS. Sacramentary, No. 2290, of the Paris National Library, which is of the ninth century, contains at the beginning the Gloria in Excelsis, the Nicene Creed, the Sanctus, and the Agnus Dei, in Greek, but in Latin characters. In the so-called "Athelstane's Psalter" (British Museum, Galba, A. xviii.), in a portion of the MS. which belongs to the early part of the ninth century, we find a short Litany, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the Sanctus, in Greek, in Anglo-Saxon characters. And in a Psalter in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, called "Pope Gregory's Psalter," is a Creed in Greek.

At the time when Christianity was first preached, Latin was rapidly becoming the common tongue of a large part of Western Europe; the conquests of Rome, as St. Augustine remarks (De Civ. Dei, xix. 7), imposed the Latin language on the subject races. Latin was commonly spoken in the Roman colony of Africa, and in Africa we find the most considerable Latin writers of the early ages—Tertullian and Cyprian. St. Augustine tells us of himself (Conf. i. 14) that he learned Latin in the nursery, and contrasts the perfect ease with which he acquired this with the difficulty which he afterwards experienced in learning Greek. In preaching at Hippo he assumes that his congregation all spoke Latin, while some at least did not understand the native Punic; for, quoting a Punic proverb, he thinks it necessary to translate it into Latin: "quia Punice non omnes nostis" (Serm. 167, on Eph. v. 15, 16). The earliest distinct mention of a liturgical form in Latin appears to be Cyprian's citation of the Sursum Corda (De Orat. Dom. c. 31). Gaul from the time of its subjugation adopted the Roman customs and idiom with remarkable readiness; and in later times the civilised Gauls imposed their tongue on their Frankish and Norman conquerors. An incident related by Sulpicius Severus (Vita S. Mart. c. 9) may serve to shew that Latin was what we may fairly call the vernacular of at least a portion of Gaul in the fourth century. Martin was taken by force from his beloved monastery by a crowd of the neighbouring villagers to be made bishop. In the church to which he was taken some one in the crowd, opening a Psalter at random, read aloud from the eighth psalm the verse, "Ex ore infantium et lactentium perfecisti laudem propter inimicos tuos, ut destruas inimicum et defensorem."^a There was instantly a shout raised, for the people looked upon the passage as of ill omen to Defensor, a neighbouring bishop who had opposed Martin's election. In Spain also, after its subjugation by the Romans, the Latin language came into common use. It seems also to have been spoken in Dalmatia. Jerome at least, who was born there, clearly regarded it as his native language, and complains that he never heard of it in its purity while he was living in the East (Epist. 7 [al. 43] ad Chrom. p. 18). Even in Britain after the time of Agricola the upper classes adopted to some extent the Roman language and customs (Tacit. Agric. c. 21).

When Latin was so generally diffused, it could not fail soon to become the vehicle of public worship. When public prayer was first offered in Latin in Rome itself we cannot tell, but it is an obvious conjecture that when the "old Italic" version of the New Testament came into use in Rome, prayers and thanksgivings were also said in the Latin tongue. That at an early date Latin became the liturgical language of (at least) much the greater part of Italy, of Gaul, and of Spain, admits of no doubt whatever. The "clerks" and officials everywhere spoke Latin throughout the Western empire. And even when Christianity was introduced into regions where little or no Latin was spoken, as Britain and Ireland, there is no evidence of vernacular services; the early evangelists of Britain, St. Patrick and his followers in Ireland, the Roman missionaries to the Angles and Saxons, alike seem to have retained the Roman language in the offices which they introduced. Probably it would have seemed a kind of profanation to translate sacred phrases into the "gibberish" of barbarian tribes. Indeed it came to be maintained that a certain sacredness attaches to the three languages, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, of the inscription on the Lord's cross (Hilary of Poitiers, Prolog. in lib. Pss. c. 15; Honorius of Autun, Gemma Animæ, i. 92), and that these tongues alone—Syriac being taken to represent the ancient Hebrew—are fit vehicles for the public prayers of Christians. Hilary further elevates Latin to a dominant position among the three tongues, as the language of Rome, "specialiter evangelica doctrina in Romani imperii, sub quo Hebraei et Graeci continentur, sede consistit." Ulfilas did indeed give the Goths a vernacular version of the Bible, but even here there is no trace remaining of Gothic offices.

That the Latin of the service-books was often, even among the so-called "Latin" races, a tongue "not understood of the people" seems scarcely doubtful. In Italy, for instance, where even at this day the peasantry speak several dialects neither mutually intelligible nor intelligible to those who only understand the literary Italian, we cannot suppose that the language of Leo and Gregory was everywhere understood. The same may be said of Spain and Gaul, and still more of Britain and Ireland. Provision was no doubt made for instructing the several races in their own tongues wherein they were born, and there is no reason to doubt that the nature of the several offices was explained to the faithful; but the offices themselves seem to have been invariably said in Latin. Whatever may be the case with the Syriac or other Eastern offices, in the districts where Greek and Latin were the ecclesiastical languages the gulf between the tongue of the church and the tongue of the people was always widening; the dialect of the streets came to differ widely from the unchanging idiom of the church, even while it retained the same name. In the eighth century this divergency became so marked that it was recognised by authority. A council at Frankfort in the year 794 (c. 52, Conc. Germ. i. 328; Baluze, Capit.

Reg. Fr. i. 270) expressly repudiated the theory of the three sacred languages, on the ground that God heareth prayer in every tongue; and Charles the Great, insisting (Capit. v. 161, in Baluze, i. 855) that all men should learn the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, makes provision for the case of those who know none but their mother tongue: "qui aliter non potuerit vel in sua lingua hoc discat." The same monarch further directs (Capit. vi. 185; Bal. i. 954) that every presbyter should teach men publicly in his church, in the tongue which his hearers understand, truly to believe the faith of Almighty God in Unity and Trinity, and also those things which are to be said to all generally; as of avoiding evil and doing good, and of the judgment to come in the Resurrection. He who cannot do this of himself is to get a proper form of words written out by some more learned person, which he may read; and he who cannot even do this must exhort the people in the words, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Herard (Capit. 55, Bal. i. 1289) ordered that no man should be admitted to be a godfather who did not understand the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in his own tongue, and the nature of the covenant made with God. A council at Rheims, A.D. 813 (c. 15), enjoined bishops to preach in the dialects of their several dioceses, and in the same year a council at Tours (c. 17) ordered bishops to translate their homilies into the rustic-Roman or the Teutonic tongue. So the council of Mayence (c. 2) in the year 847. At a still earlier date the council of Lestines, A.D. 743 (Conc. Germ. i. 51; Swainson, The Nicene and Apostles' Creeds, p. 22) had ordered the Renunciations and Professions in baptism to be made in the vernacular—which is given in the canon—of the Teutonic converts. These instances shew that, while care was taken to instruct the faithful in the cardinal truths of Christianity, the offices in general were in the ecclesiastical tongue, Latin.

When the Slavonic races were converted in the 9th century, pope John VIII. (A.D. 880) not only permitted but recommended that the divine offices and liturgy should be said in their vernacular. It is interesting to notice that he expressly repudiates the theory of three sacred languages and no more, saying that Scripture calls upon all nations and all peoples to praise the Lord, and that the apostles spoke in all tongues the wonderful works of God (Epist. 293, ad Swentopulc. Migne, 126, p. 906). Nor is it (he continues) in any way contrary to sound faith and doctrine to say masses in the Slavonic tongue; or to read the gospel, or lessons of the Old or New Testament, well translated or interpreted; or to sing other hour-offices in it; for He who made the three chief tongues (linguas principales), Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, also made the others to His honour and glory. The pope however makes this reservation, that the gospel, to give it the more honour, should always be read first in Latin, and afterwards translated into Slavonic. Swentopulk and his judges may, if they please, hear mass in Latin. The Russian church retains to this day its vernacular services.

The following are instances of provision being made for the wants of a district where several languages were spoken. Theodosius the archimandrite built within the circuit of his monastery four churches; one for the brothers of the house, in which the offices were said in Greek; one in which they were said in the vernacular of the Bessae, a barbarous tribe of the neighbourhood; one in which they were said in Armenian; and a fourth in which the brothers who were vexed with devils, and those who had charge of them, had their special service. The ordinary daily offices were thus said severally; but when the eucharist was celebrated, the office was said in the several churches and tongues to the end of the gospel, and then the several congregations (except the demoniacs) assembled in the Greek—the proper monastic—church for the remaining portion of the celebration (Simeon Metaphr.

Vita Theod. c. 24, in Surius, Jan. 11). It is not quite clear whether the restriction of the more solemn part of the mysteries to one church and one tongue arose simply from a desire to symbolise more emphatically the oneness of the community, or from a reluctance to recite the anaphora in any other than one of the recognised “sacred” languages; and the same ambiguity attaches to the following somewhat similar instance. St. Sabas is said (Cyril Scythop. Vita Sab. cc. 20, 32, in Cotelierus, Mon. Eccl. Graec. iii. 247, 264) to have provided the Armenians with an oratory, and afterwards with a church, where they might say the psalmody, the megalion, and other portions of the divine office separately in their own tongue, but at the time of oblation join the Hellenists and communicate with them. The same event is narrated in Surius (Dec. 5) in the following form. Sabas transferred the Armenian congregation to the church which he had built, on condition that the glorification and reading of the gospels should take place in their own tongue, while they should partake of the divine mysteries with the rest. And the writer adds, that when some adopted an addition made by Peter the Fuller to the angelic hymn [SANCTUS], Sabas desired them to chant that hymn in Greek, that he might know whether they adopted the correct version; he apparently did not understand Armenian.

LITURGY. (1.) The Greek words λειτουργία, λειτουργός, λειτουργεῖν, in their early usage are applied to the work or the agent in any public service. Etymologically we may compare δημιουργός. Λειτουργεῖν thus means to perform some service for the public. In Athens, it came to be used technically for the duty which wealthy men were especially called upon to render to the state, and the λειτουργία was the service which they rendered. [See “Leiturgia.” IN DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.]

(2.) Except in a passage of Plutarch where the limitation is effected by the context, we do not find in classical Greek any sacred application of the word LITURGY other than is contained in the above. But in the Septuagint it is generally, though not exclusively, used in this behalf. Thus we have the word and its derivatives applied to the service at the altar; or to the service in or to the tabernacle; and in Daniel vii. 10, “Thousand thousands ministered unto Him.”

(3.) In the New Testament the usage of the words is less restricted. Thus, kings are ministers to God, in attending on the duties of their high office (Rom. xiii. 6). Hence we pass on to the parabolic use of the word λειτουργός, in Rom. xv. 16. “So that I should be a minister to Jesus Christ (λειτουργῶν Ἰ. Χ.) for the Gentiles, in administering in sacerdotal or sacred fashion (ἰεουργοῦντα) the gospel of God, in order that the offering up of the Gentiles might become accepted, being sanctified in the Holy Ghost.” Another instance of this parabolic use is to be found in Phil. ii. 17. “But even if I am poured out as a libation over the sacrifice and ministry (λειτουργία) of your faith, I rejoice and congratulate you all.” Thus the special meaning of the word and its cognates in any particular passage must be determined (if at all) by the context. There can be no doubt of the meaning in Luke i. 23, “when the days of his ministration were accomplished.” Some doubt is felt as to Acts xiii. 2, “As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted.” Chrysostom explains the word by κηρυγμάτων (preaching); it would rather seem to refer to some public ministration to the Lord, such as was accompanied with a fast. Of the Saviour it is recorded (Heb. viii. 3), that He has obtained a more excellent ministry than the ministry of Aaron: the explanation being given in vv. 1, 2. “He is seated on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle.” Thus the angels are ministering spirits, sent forth for service (εἰς διακονίαν), for the sake of those who are to inherit salvation.

(4.) In early Christian literature the word λειτουργεῖν was soon adopted in reference to sacred functions. Thus Clemens Romanus (I. c. 8) speaks of the old prophets as the ministers of the grace of God, speaking through the Holy Spirit. And in c. 44 he speaks of the office of the apostles as being their Liturgy or Ministry. In the process of time the word liturgy came, in practice, to be regarded as the appropriate designation of the Eucharistic office, but it is not quite clear when this limitation was generally accepted. At the council of Ancyra, (A.D. 314), a presbyter who had offered to an idol, was forbidden (c. i.) “either to offer or to address the congregation, or to minister any part whatever of the hieratic ministrations,” ἢ ὅλας λειτουργεῖν τὰ τῶν ἱερατικῶν λειτουργιῶν. Canon 2 enforced a similar rule on deacons who had lapsed. Athanasius speaks of the Arians stopping the bread (τῶν λειτουργῶν καὶ τῶν παρθένων) of the ministers and the virgins. In the acts of the council of Ephesus mention is made of the evening and morning liturgies, and Theodoret (iii. 114) is also quoted as speaking of the evening liturgy, i.e. the evening service. The same writer (iii. 1065) speaks of the liturgy of the Holy Baptism:

and Ep. cxlvi. p. 1032, he says that in almost all the churches the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 13) forms the introduction to the mystical liturgy. The additional mystical of course limits the term Liturgy, and, in fact, we shall find that this benediction stands at the commencement of the anaphora in most of the liturgies that will come under our review. It is not found in that of St. Mark, nor the Coptic St. Basil, nor in the Mozarabic. I may mention also here that it is not found in either the Roman or the Ambrosian or the Gallican Canon. Theodoret therefore refers to the liturgies of the Oriental churches proper.*

(5.) Turning now to the services for the administration of the Eucharist, which are specifically called LITURGIES, we may note in passing that the newly discovered complement to the first letter of Clemens Romanus contains liturgical phrases which we find also in the liturgy of the church of Alexandria, of which below. Apart from this, the earliest records of such service are contained in the letter of Pliny to Trajan, and the Apology of Justin Martyr. From the former, we know that the Christians used to meet on a stated day before it was light, and repeat alternately a hymn to Christ as God, and bind themselves sacramento that they would commit no crime; then they separated, and came together again a second time to partake of food, ordinary and innocent. The use of the word sacramentum here certainly seems to point to the reception of the Eucharist, for it is, of course, inconceivable that an oath to this effect should be repeated on every occasion:—it may, however, point to the Baptismal promise. But the accounts in Justin Martyr give us more information. He describes the service as it was performed after the administration of Baptism, and again on an ordinary Sunday. Combining the two accounts together we learn that during the service the records of the apostles or the writings of the prophets were read by a special reader, and, when he had ceased, the President instructed the congregation, urging them to imitate the noble things of which they had heard. United or common prayer was offered for those who were assembled, for those who had been baptized, and for all believers everywhere, that now that they had learned the truth they might by their good works be enabled to keep God's commandments so that they might attain to eternal salvation. The prayers were said standing, and apparently by all: and these being concluded they saluted each other with the kiss of peace. Then bread was brought to the president and a cup of wine and water; and now he, alone, with all his energy, sent up his prayers and thanksgivings, and the people assented with the word "Amen," and the deacons gave to each of those who were present a portion of the bread and wine and water over which the thanksgiving had been offered, and portions were also sent by their hands to those who were absent, and, Justin adds, the wealthy and willing give freely, each according as he wishes, and the collection is deposited with the president, and he assists the orphans and widows, those who are impoverished by sickness or other cause, those that are in prison, and strangers who may happen to be sojourning amongst them: and Justin twice announces that this is done on the day called Sunday. In his dialogue with Trypho we have frequent references to the Eucharist. From one of them we learn that at the time when the Christians offered their sacrifice to God, mention was made of the sufferings which the Son of God underwent (Dialogue, § 117).

(6.) A question has arisen whether this account refers to the service in Palestine—for Justin was a native of Samaria—or to the service near Rome, the seat of the emperors to whom his apology was addressed. The question seems to be settled by the following considerations:—The kiss of peace is given in the Roman church in the solemn mass after consecration: here it is before it. Again, it is one of the points which are noted as differing the Roman from the other missae, that in the Roman order there was generally no lesson from the prophets. Here there was such lesson every Sunday.

Thus we have apparently sufficient warrant for the conclusion of Palmer (Origines Liturgicae, vol. i. p. 42) that Justin Martyr's account is of the liturgy of the patriarchate of Antioch. And it is interesting to note that later narratives agree with his description as far as it goes. All the points he introduces are found in the later liturgy of Jerusalem.

(7.) Liturgy of Jerusalem.—Passing over for the time the liturgy contained in the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions, we proceed from Justin Martyr, who must have written about A.D. 150, to the lectures of Cyril, who was bishop of Jerusalem from the year 351 to 386. Cyril has left us seventeen lectures, delivered, apparently about the year 347, to the catechumens in the course of Lent, and five to the recently baptized, delivered shortly after Easter. In these five he gives descriptions and explanations of the sacramental offices, and, in the last of all, an account of the Communion Service. His hearers had been present at it, but they had not been taught the meaning of its several parts.

(8.) There can be no doubt that every marked feature of the office, as it then existed, is noted here by St. Cyril. He commences, however, after the dismissal of the uninitiated; at a point (that is) corresponding to the close of the sermon in the account of Justin Martyr. He describes the ablutions, possibly with LAVABO [I. 938], followed by the KISS of peace, and then proceeds to the Sursum Corda, Preface, Sanctus, Consecration, Intercession, Lord's Prayer [CANON, I. 269], Sancta Sanctis, Gustate, and COMMUNION [I. 413].

(9.) It is interesting to compare with this the liturgy of St. James,—the liturgy, that is, of the church of Palestine.

We have it in two forms: the one form from two Greek manuscripts (with a fragment of a third), of which the first was written during the 12th century at Antioch; the second MS. appears to have been transcribed at Mount Sinai during the 10th (Palmer, i. 21, 22). The second form, published by Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 29, is found in Syriac, and is still retained amongst the Monophysites or Jacobites in the East (Palmer,

* The use of Αετρουπία as embracing the evening service continued even to the end of the 6th century (see Eustratius; Migne, 86, p. 3380 n).

i. 16). The points of similarity are sufficient to prove that they had a common origin, and undoubtedly what is common to the two must have been in use in the united church at the beginning of the 5th century, i.e. before the schism of A.D. 451.

(10.) We see, therefore, here, on the one hand, how the service of Cyril's time was even in a hundred years augmented by many additions, and we find on the other that nearly everything which Cyril mentions remains untouched, both in the Greek and Syriac liturgies. We have the "Sursum Corda" in both,—the "Vere dignum," the "Sanctus sanctus"; the precise words that the Holy Spirit may make this bread the Body of Christ, and this cup the Blood of Christ, the prayers for the living, the commemoration of, and the petitions for, the dead. The very words used by Cyril are found in the Greek. And thus we take a step forward in our history; and it is interesting further to notice that Jerome in his controversy with the Pelagians (book ii. sect. 23; Migne, vol. xxiii. p. 587), mentions that the voices of the priests daily sing that "Christ is the only sinless One." We find the expression both in the Syriac and in the Greek liturgies before us: "He is the only sinless one that has appeared upon the earth." Again, in the same dialogue, book iii., sect. 15, p. 612, Jerome says that our Lord taught His apostles that "daily at the sacrifice or sacrament of His body (the manuscripts read sacramento) believers should dare to say—Our Father which art in heaven." He refers, no doubt, as before, to the liturgy of Jerusalem, for his work seems to have been written in the neighbourhood of the Holy City shortly after the opinions of Pelagius had received encouragement from the bishop Johannes. Once more in his commentary on Isaiah, book ii. chap. vi. v. 20 (vol. xxiv. 88 of Migne), Jerome says, "Quotidie caelesti pane saturati dicimus; Gustate et videte quam suavis est Dominus,"—words which occur (I believe) only in the liturgy of St. James. The whole psalm is recited in the Syriac St. James.

(11.) Further illustrations have been drawn from the Homiletic writings of St. Chrysostom, of which several were written when he was a presbyter of the church of Antioch (see Palmer, i. 80, and Bingham, Antiquities, book XIII. vi.). It will be unnecessary to carry out this comparison at length, but we may note that Chrysostom speaks of the whole congregation joining in common prayer for those who were afflicted by evil spirits and those who were in a state of penance; and then he reminds his hearers how, when only the initiated remain, they prostrate themselves on the pavement, rise together, and the priest alone offers up the prayers, and the people respond. He mentions the benediction, "The Grace of our Lord," and the address, "Up with our mind and hearts." He speaks of the reasonable service, the bloodless sacrifice; he speaks of the cherubim and seraphim, of the invocation of the Holy Spirit to be present and touch the gifts lying upon the holy table; he speaks of the commemoration of the living and the dead, of the Lord's Prayer, of the holy things for holy persons, of the breaking of the bread of the Communion. All these but one (of which below) are found both in the Syriac and in the Greek, and so far our position is strengthened—that much that is common to the two belongs at least to the 4th or 5th century.

(12.) Two points remain to be noticed.

i. After the words of institution the oblation in the Greek is this: "remembering then His life-giving sufferings, His saving cross, His death and resurrection from the dead, and His ascension into heaven; His session at the right hand of Thee, O God and Father, we offer to Thee this fearful and bloodless sacrifice."

The words in the Syriac liturgy correspond almost exactly to these, except that the oblation is made to Christ: "We remember Thy death and resurrection, Thy ascension into heaven, Thy sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and we offer to Thee this fearful and bloodless sacrifice." The difference is momentous, and the question at once arises which of the two is the more ancient form.

The Syriac is, as we have seen, in use at the present day. The Greek is, as we shall see, affected by later additions from foreign sources; but this fact alone would not, of course, decide the question as to the original form of this momentous formula.

(13.) ii. Our second point is this: Palmer draws attention (Origines, i. 24, 25) to several indications that the Greek liturgy of St. James has been affected by late interpolations. These we need not repeat here. I would add that the introduction of a Creed in the proanaphora is a further indication that the liturgy was altered after the date which I have specified. Another indication of change is this: that the prayer for the king, mentioned by St. Cyril and retained by the Syriac (p. 35), is omitted in the Greek, probably because the state rulers of Palestine favoured the Jacobites more than the orthodox. The appeal χαίρε κεχαριτωμένη, which is introduced, is entirely out of place, and ungrammatical; it must, therefore, be a late addition: and it is not in the Syriac. There is no prayer in the Greek for the energument, nor for the penitents, nor for the catechumens, and no notice of their exclusion. This fact also shows that the text of the manuscripts which we possess had been altered at a period when the custom of excluding the two former classes had ceased to be observed.

(14.) The paucity of the Greek manuscripts of course indicates that the rite of St. James has long ceased to be of general observance; in fact, it was first interpolated out of the liturgy of Constantinople, and then gave way before it. Yet it is said to be still used in islands of the Archipelago and elsewhere on St. James's day, but no manuscripts of the modern form have been brought to the west. The conclusion is that the Greek use was generally discontinued before the 13th century. Charles the Bald stated that the rite was celebrated before him; and we learn from Theodore Balsamon and his contemporary Marcus, orthodox bishop of Alexandria, that it, or a rite which went by this name, was still used in the 12th century on great feast-days in the churches of Jerusalem and the rest of Palestine. It was at that time unknown at Antioch.

(15.) Liturgies of the Churches of Egypt.—It will be best now to turn to the liturgies of the churches of Alexandria, with which I would connect the liturgy of the Coptic version of the Apostolic Constitutions. We have three notices of the celebration in this version; two of them analogous to that in the eighth book of the Greek version, which is called the Clementine liturgy, and is really an account of a service after the consecration of a bishop. There are several points of deep interest connected with the Coptic constitutions, not the least that the Copts had introduced into their language the Greek terms for presbyter, deacon, bishop, Spirit, Eucharist, offering, salutation; indeed we may say every technical term connected with the celebration. We read (Tattam, Apostolical Constitutions in Coptic, with Translation; Orient. Trans. Fund, 1848; bk. ii. p. 32), "After the salutation and the kiss of peace, the deacons present the offering to the newly-made bishop; he puts his hand upon it with the presbyters, and says the eucharistia." It begins with the prayer, "The Lord be with you all," and the people say, "And with thy spirit." The bishop says, "Lift up your hearts;" they reply, "We lift them up unto the Lord." He says again, "Let us give thanks unto our Lord;" the people say, "It is right and just;" and then he is directed to say the prayers which follow according "to the form or custom of the holy offering." It is quite clear that the service was in Greek throughout when this version of the "canons of the apostles" was made. But Archdeacon Tattam, to whom we owe our edition of the book, unfortunately missed some of the points in his translation; and thus, to the mere English reader, his words can scarcely be said to represent adequately the character of the original. Thus εὐχόμεν, he translates "Let us pray." It was really a mistake for ἔχομεν.

(16.) We have a further account in the same second book (Tattam, p. 62). This may be compared with the last lecture of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, for it is the account of the Communion as administered to the newly baptized. We have again the instruction that the deacon should bring the offering to the bishop, and that the latter should give thanks over the bread and over the cup of wine, because of the similitude of the one to the flesh of Christ, and of the other to the blood of Christ. Mention is made of an offering of milk and honey in remembrance of the promise made to the fathers: "I will give you a land flowing with milk and honey." Then the bishop divides the bread, and gives a portion to each. "This is the bread of heaven, the Body of Christ Jesus" (the last clause in Greek). The presbyter or deacon takes the cup, and gives them the blood of Jesus Christ our Lord, and the milk and the honey, saying, "This is the Blood of Christ Jesus," and he who receives says, "Amen."

The account concludes: These things have been delivered to you briefly concerning the holy Baptisma and the holy Offering.

(17.) There is yet a third account in the fourth book (§ lxx. p. 116). This is a second representation of the service after the ordination of a bishop; it is somewhat longer than the other, supplying additional details. Thus we have the direction of the deacon: "Let no unbeliever remain in this place;" the words bidding them salute one another with a holy kiss; the exclusion of the catechumens and the "hearers," and of all who were not partakers of the holy mysteries. The deacons bring the gifts to the bishop to the holy altar (θυσιαστήριον), the presbyters standing on his right hand and on his left, and the "high priest" prays over the offering that the Holy Spirit may descend upon it and make the bread the body of Christ, and the cup the blood of Christ. Then all partake; first the clergy, then all the people, and then all the women; a psalm was sung during the distribution, and when all was over the deacons called out, "We have all partaken of the blessed Body and Blood of Christ; let us give thanks to Him;" the bishop gives them the blessing, and they are told to depart in peace.

(18.) There can be no doubt that the rubrics of these second and fourth books represent the service at slightly different epochs; thus the word ἀρχιερεύς, which is limited to the Jewish high priest on p. 108, is given to the bishop on p. 122. The word θυσιαστήριον occurs, however, twice in the first book (p. 20). But the whole account will serve us as an introduction to the later liturgies of the church of Alexandria as we find them in the Greek and Coptic versions.

(19.) Of the Alexandrine Fathers, Clemens speaks (Stromat. i. 19) of those who use bread and water in the offering not in accordance with the canons of the church; and Origen of our offering sacrifices to the Father through Christ (on Isa. vi. 6; Homil. i. near the end; tom. xiii. Lommatzsch). Of the liturgies that have come down to us as connected with various branches or offshoots of the church of the patriarchate of Alexandria, Renaudot gives several, but they may be reduced to three distinct works:—

- (1) The Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic of St. Cyril.
- (2) A Coptic, Arabic, and Greek liturgy, entitled the liturgy of St. Basil. This must be carefully distinguished, as we shall see hereafter, from the liturgy of the church of Caesarea.
- (3) A Coptic, Arabic, and Greek liturgy, entitled the liturgy of St. Gregory the Theologian, i.e. Gregory Nazianzen.

To these we must add what is called 'The Universal Canon of the Aethiopic Church.'

(20.) The Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic liturgy of St. Cyril are related to each other, as are the Greek and Syriac liturgies of St. James; they have much in common; but the liturgy of St. Cyril has been used even to the present day by the Monophysites, who have formed the mass of the Egyptian Christians, whilst that of St. Mark was in use only for a limited time by the Melchites or orthodox. For the latter body being small in numbers, and weak in influence, have, for many ages, been drawn within the circle of the church of Constantinople, and have used the liturgy of that church. And thus it is that apparently only one copy of the Greek liturgy of St. Mark has survived. This was found in a monastery of the order of St. Basil, at Rossano, in Calabria. Renaudot saw it at Rome in the house of the religious of the same order. The MS. is of the 10th or 11th century. By comparing the two together, we are able to infer what was the common property of the whole patriarchate before the schism of A.D. 451, and thus also to discover what each body added at later periods.

The liturgies of St. Basil and St. Gregory are also used by the Monophysites (Renaudot, i. 154); the former on fast days, the latter on feast days, except in Lent and the month "Cohiac," during which the liturgy of St. Cyril is used.

(21.) We will turn first to the Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic of St. Cyril. We have already mentioned that words recently discovered in the Epistle of Clemens Romanus are found here. These words are (Bryennius, p. 105), "Raise those that are fallen; bring back those who are wandering; feed those who are hungry; deliver those of us who are in bonds; comfort the feeble-minded." They are all found both in the Coptic (Renaudot, vol. i. p. 65), and in the Greek (Neale, Greek Liturgies, ed. 1868, p. 21). The Coptic has also: "Save those of us who are in trouble," which are also Clementine. This fact is interesting in more ways than one, as we shall see. I may mention now that it is a renewed proof of the connexion between the churches of Alexandria and Rome, to which Dr. Neale speaks in his 'General Introduction' (vol. i. p. 120). In the Greek St. Mark, we have the introductory or proanaphoral portion, which is quite distinct from anything in the Coptic. In point of fact, the liturgy of St. Cyril begins with the kiss of peace immediately preceding the Sursum Corda (Renaudot, i. 38). We are informed that the "Preparation" which is given in the Coptic St. Basil (Renaudot, i. 1-82) is always used, whatever the liturgy proper may be. Passing on to the canon, I would observe that the intercessory prayers, which are offered by the priest after the giving of thanks in the "dignum et justum est," are addressed in the Greek liturgy to the Father, in the Coptic to our Lord. In both, the Virgin is commemorated, whilst the "Hail thou that art highly favoured," occurring in the Greek, is not found in the Coptic. This, therefore, is apparently of late introduction. In the Coptic the prayer is addressed to Christ to receive "the sacrifices and oblations of those who offer on His spiritual heavenly altar;" in the Greek a similar prayer is addressed to God. The petitions which I have mentioned just now as occurring in Clemens Romanus occur at this part of the service. The words of St. Paul with reference to Christ (Eph. i. 21) are found in both, and thus it is with reference to Christ that the words follow, "Thousand thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand of holy angels and archangels stand before Thee!" Then the words of institution follow. In both versions the appeal is made to God the Father that we are setting forth the death of His Son, and confessing His resurrection, and waiting for His second coming to judge the world; and with this before our mind "we have set before Thee Thine own of Thine own gifts." The epiclesis or invocation follows, the same in both, bearing, however, internal marks that it was composed after the council of Nicaea, a prayer for sanctification, and the Lord's Prayer. Here the Coptic of St. Cyril lapses into the Coptic St. Basil. The Greek, however, proceeds to the end. The "Sancta sanctis," on p. 28, and the "unus Pater sanctus," etc., on the same page; the benediction and the dismissal, p. 30.

(22.) By comparing the Coptic St. Basil with the Greek and Arabic versions of the same liturgy, we are again able, in some degree, to note the history of liturgic change. It would appear that many of the Greek phrases were continued in use in the Coptic church, as we have already noticed them in the Coptic version of the Apostolic Constitutions (Renaudot, i. 13). Here, after the "Sanctus," the liturgy reverts to the history of our fall, our being placed in paradise, our transgression. It thus passes onwards with great beauty through the warnings given by the prophets to the birth of the Saviour, His love for us, His death, His resurrection, His ascension. Then it records how He left to us this great mystery of piety (the words of 1 Tim. iii. 16) and instituted the Eucharist, giving the words of the institution. Then it proceeds, as in the Greek St. Mark, only where that had "we have offered to Thee of Thine own gifts," here we read, "we do offer Thee." The Epiclesis follows, in the Coptic the appeal being to Christ, in the Greek and Arabic to God.

Then come the intercessory prayers (not before the words of institution, as in St. Mark and St. Cyril), and these are addressed to God. Commemoration is made also of the Virgin and other saints, including, in the Coptic St. Basil, several of a late date, and the diptychs are read and the Lord's Prayer follows; then an interesting absolution of a precatory character and the "Sancta sanctis." The fraction takes place and a confession (which we also find in the Gregorian liturgy), "that this is the flesh of Christ which He received from the Virgin, and made one with His divinity and delivered for us all on the cross." Further intercessions—in some respect like those of Clemens Romanus, but with the addition, "give rest to those who have fallen asleep before us"—follow in the Arabic, but are not in the Coptic. The dismissal of the people takes place, and then that of the deacons. This does not occur in the Coptic. The communion of the people is mentioned in the Coptic (p. 24), but not in the Greek or Arabic.

(23.) The liturgy of St. Gregory will not detain us long; it begins in the Greek and Arabic with a prayer which is also found in the Greek St. James (Neale, G. L. p. 54), with a few words interpolated that the "sacrifice may be for the rest and refreshment of our fathers who have fallen asleep before us, and for the strengthening of Thy people." Moreover, in the Greek "St. James" it is addressed to God, in the Egyptian "St. Gregory" to Christ. This liturgy resembles the Egyptian St. Basil rather than that of St. Cyril; after the "vere dignum," however, there is a hymn of thanksgiving which we do not find there, but, in some respects like the other, it passes on to a touching appeal to God. "No language can measure the ocean of Thy love: Thou madest me a man, not Thyself being in need of my service; . . . it is Thou who, in the bread and the wine, hast delivered to me the mystic participation of Thy flesh."

The account of the Institution follows in the form of a narrative addressed to the Saviour, and the priest continues: "Remembering Thy coming upon earth, Thy Death, Thy Resurrection, Ascension and coming Advent, we offer to Thee of Thine own gifts"; and he beseeches Christ to come and complete the mystic service, to send His Spirit and sanctify and change the gifts into the Body and Blood of our redemption.

Intercessory prayers now follow, and the commemoration of the saints departed: the diptychs are read, and another appeal to Jesus Christ. The Lord's Prayer follows, and after a while the thanksgiving after Communion; but here both the Coptic and the Arabic fail us, so that the prayers in the Greek which follow appear to be late.

(24.) It remains only to speak of the Ethiopic canon, which commences (Renaudot, vol. i. 472) with some beautiful passages from Holy Scripture. From p. 476 we have much in common with the Coptic St. Basil. The canon proper begins on p. 486, but it is strange that we have nothing corresponding to the "Lift up your hearts" of almost all the other liturgies. The intercessory prayers precede the words of institution, and then follows the appeal, "We are setting forth Thy death, O Lord. We believe Thy resurrection, ascension, and second advent, and keeping the memorial of Thy death and resurrection we offer to Thee this bread and this cup." The epiclesis follows: the prayer for pardon for the living, the prayer for rest for the dead. The Sancta sanctis with the confession as we found it in St. Basil, the Communion of the people, the thanksgiving after Communion and the Lord's Prayer—the only instance that yet we have met with of such position. We need not discuss the other Ethiopic forms; they are seven in number, but five have never been published (Neale, i. 325).

(25.) Some question has arisen as to the relative claims of these liturgies of St. Basil and St. Mark to be the primitive liturgy of the Egyptian church. Renaudot gives the place to "St. Basil," Palmer to "St. Mark." The latter founds his judgment in part on the comparison of both with the Universal Canon of the Ethiopians, which he considers to "agree exactly in order and substance with the liturgies of Cyril and Mark, and no others" (i. p. 90). An entirely independent collation leads the writer to reject this statement, and to regard the Alexandrine St. Basil, and the Ethiopic Canon as intimately connected with each other. A comparison of the liturgies with quotations by any of the Alexandrine Fathers, may facilitate our judgment.

(26.) We shall receive but little assistance from the general tone of Origen's treatise on prayer, except by noting that when he expresses (as he seems to do) his wish that prayer should be addressed mainly to the Father through the Son, his language would seem to intimate that in his time the general custom of his church was to address their prayers to Christ. His reference to the thousand thousands and myriads of myriads (against Celsus, viii. 34) may be paralleled out of all the liturgies. Cyril of Alexandria (we take these references from Palmer, i. 102-3) refers to the Seraphin (not Cherubin as Palmer has it) veiling their faces; this is not mentioned in "Basil," but it is mentioned in the others. The same father says (Epist. ad Johan. Anti ch.), "We are taught also to say in our prayers, 'O Lord our God, give us peace: for Thou hast given us all things,'"—words to which we find the nearest resemblance in the Busilian Coptic and Greek. St. Mark has only "O king of peace, give thy peace to us in harmony and love." Origen on Jeremiah (xiv. § 14) remarks, "We often say in our prayers, Give me a portion with the prophets, give me a portion with the apostles." A petition resembling this is found both in the Coptic St. Basil and St. Cyril, and the Greek St. Mark. It would be scarcely fair to draw from this the conclusion that what is called St. Basil's Liturgy was used at Alexandria in the time of Cyril, rather than that which we call St. Mark's; but it would seem that when St. Cyril wrote the words I have quoted, the liturgy which bears his name had not been amended. Other references have been noticed in Dionysius of Alexandria, Isidore of Pelusium, and Athanasius, but they do not throw any light on the point before us. It is worthy however of remark that Isidore states distinctly that the sacerdos or bishop uttered the words "Peace be with you," from the extremity or highest point of the church, "imitating the Lord assuming His chair when He gave His peace to His disciples."

(27.) Liturgy of Caesarea.—There can be no doubt that St. Basil, who was bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia during the years 370-379, committed to writing, and delivered to the order of monks which he established, a liturgy. And when we look at the well-known words which have been often quoted from his treatise on the Holy Spirit [CANON, I. 269], we can scarcely doubt that this liturgy preserved (at least in its chief features) that form and order which had been traditionally used within the diocese or (possibly) the patriarchate of Caesarea. Our difficulty is to recover the service as it came from the hands of Basil. We have the form which passes by his name and now in the East shares with the so-called liturgy of St. Chrysostom the reverence of the churches. It is used, we are told, on all Sundays in Lent but Palm Sunday, on Maundy Thursday and Easter Eve, on the festival of St. Basil himself, and on the vigils of Christmas and of the Epiphany. Dr. Neale and Dr. Littledale (Greek Liturgies) have printed this from two recent editions, published the one at Venice, the other at Constantinople; whilst Daniel has given it in a form presenting considerable variations from both.

The Alexandrine liturgy assigned to Basil we have already noticed. With the exceptions mentioned below (§ 29), it differs entirely from the Greek St. Basil. Besides this there is a Syriac liturgy which goes by the name of Basil, a Latin translation of which Renaudot gives from Masius in his second volume. But most important for our purposes is the Greek copy, found in a manuscript of the end of the 9th century which belonged once to the library of St. Mark at Florence (introduced probably at the time of the council), but is now in the Barberini collection at Rome. This was printed for the first time in Bunsen's Hippolytus and his Aje (vol. iv.), and again in his Analecta Antea-Nicaena (vol. iii. pp. 201-236), and it is strange that it has not attracted the attention it deserves.

(28.) This liturgy commences with the prayer which the priest offered in the sacristy, when he placed the bread upon the disc: this is followed by the prayers of the three antiphons. These are all found in the liturgy as published by Daniel, but we must exclude here, as throughout, almost all the rubrical directions relating to the action and language of the deacon. The prayer of Introit is given next, then the prayer of the Trisagion, and the prayer said by the bishop when he took his throne. This is now omitted, in consequence, no doubt, of the change of ritual. Prayers for the catechumens, for the faithful, for the bishop himself (the last connected with the cherubic hymn) follow, and then the prayer of oblation, which is distinctly stated to be a prayer of the holy Basil. The kiss of peace here follows, and the order to the deacons to look "to the doors;" and the people say the creed. Then come the apostolic benediction and the 'Sursum Corda.' The "dignum et justum est" is entirely eucharistic, and this is succeeded by an eucharistic introduction to the words of institution. But here, unhappily, a sheet (four leaves) of the manuscript is missing, and we are unable to say what was the exact form of the prayer of invocation, or of that of intercession until we come to the petition for the clergy, in the middle of which the next sheet commences. The words with which the Lord's Prayer is introduced are interesting. It is followed by a petition that Christ our God would attend to us from His holy habitation, and come to sanctify us, seated above with the Father, and invisibly present with us. Then the "sancta sanctis," and the "unus sanctus:" and the priest is directed to take portions from the holy Body, and place them in the holy cup. Then "after all have partaken," whilst the deacon is saying τὴν εὐχὴν, the priest ἐπύχεται. This is a prayer of thanksgiving for the reception. Collects follow: one to be uttered outside the sanctuary, the other when the priest retires to the sacristy, and so the liturgy concludes. If we may supply from the more modern liturgy the parts lost in the missing sheet, availing ourselves of the analogy which the collations of the rest of the work suggest, we must conclude that the words of institution were embodied in an address to God the Father, and pleaded that "remembering the sufferings of His Son, His cross, His death, His resurrection, ascension, and second coming, and offering to God His own of His own—in all things, and because of all things—we bless Him, we glorify Him, we give thanks to Him." In the prayer of invocation the priest pleads that being admitted to minister at God's holy altar, not because of his own righteousness but because of God's mercy and pity, he draws nigh to it: and that having offered the antitypes of the holy Body and Blood of His Christ, he beseeches God that His Spirit should come on the congregation and the gifts and (ἀναδείξαι) exhibit the bread and cup as the precious Body and Blood of our Lord. There is a prayer that all who partake of the one bread and the cup may find mercy with all the saints (the Virgin and St. John the Baptist are especially mentioned), and then after a while the prayer passes on to petitions for the living.

(29.) Reverting now for a moment to the Alexandrine liturgy of St. Basil, we must notice that the three prayers, which in the Greek and Arabic are distinctly ascribed to the great bishop, i.e. the prayer of the Kiss of Peace (Renaudot, i. 60), the prayer at the breaking of the bread (p. 72), and the doxology (now in the Lord's Prayer) and prayer of bending the head (p. 76) are all of them found in the Barberini copy, and are all of them contained in the modern liturgy. Not one of them however is in the Coptic St. Basil; these facts may possibly allow us to infer that the Alexandrine Greek received its title from the prayers of St. Basil which it incorporated, but that the Coptic version was made before they were admitted. If so, we have some little light thrown upon the relative dates of the various documents, and it would appear that the Coptic is older than the Greek Alexandrine in its present form. We have already mentioned that in no other respect can we trace any similarity between the Alexandrine Basil and those which bear the great Bishop's name in the Barberini manuscript and in the modern Oriental Church.

(30.) Daniel has noted the portions which are common to the modern Basil, and the so-called liturgy of St. James. A comparison with the Barberini manuscript will help us to judge how far these portions are modern. For example, in both we have the apostrophe, "Let all human flesh be silent and stand with trembling, for the King of kings and Lord of rulers comes forward to be sacrificed, and to be given for the food of the faithful." In the liturgy of St. James this is found near the commencement of the service, when the priest is bringing in the holy gifts: in that of St. Basil, it is placed after the invocation, before the communion of the priest. It seems scarcely appropriate in either place. The fact is that it is not to be found either in the Syriac St. James, or in any of the liturgies that bear the name of St. Basil.

Daniel is silent on the comparison between the Greek and Syriac liturgies of St. Basil (see Renaudot, vol. ii. 543). On comparing the latter with the Barberini copy (supplemented where it fails from the modern service), it will be found that from the apostolic benediction to the words speaking of the memorial of Christ's death and resurrection, the language is nearly identical (Renaudot, ii. 545-548; Bunsen, 214-223). This identity stops suddenly where the latter has, "We offer to Thee Thine own, of Thine own," the former passing on to an appeal for mercy and pardon. The invocation is nearly identical, but the Syriac immediately afterwards gives indications of being interpolated; it has a superabundance of epithetic additions. This is followed by prolonged intercessory prayers, one of which connects the liturgy with the church of St. Peter and St. James; but the collect introducing "Our Father" is, as we have said, the same. The prayer beginning "Father of mercies, God of all comfort," has received modifications. The distinguishing feature of the Syriac liturgy is, that the verbal oblation of the venerated and bloodless sacrifice is made after the invocation.

(31.) Liturgy of Constantinople.—The patriarchate of Constantinople dates from the year 381, and the churches subject to this metropolis have used for many years a liturgy which bears the name of St. Chrysostom. Lebrun contends that there was no liturgy ascribed to this great father for 300 years after his death; and it seems not improbable that the work which now bears his name received that name as being used in the city of which he was the most famous bishop in its earlier years. The modern liturgy of St. Chrysostom is used most extensively in the east; Dr. Neale says, through the four patriarchates and Russia, except on the days when the liturgy of St. Basil is used. To us this is a disadvantage, because, if this were the only evidence we possessed, it would be the more difficult to discover what parts of it are truly ancient. Dr. Neale gives the service as he found it in a work printed at Venice in 1840, corrected by a later edition from Constantinople; Daniel (vol. iv. 327-372) "ad normam ecclesiae Graecorum hodie acceptam et probatam." Dr. Neale's book was originally published in the year 1850, two years before Baron Bunsen printed in the fourth volume of his work Hippolytus and his Age, a transcript of this liturgy from the Barberini manuscript. It seems to be inexcusable, however, that Daniel, whose fourth volume came out in 1853, should have been content with the meagre collations with this MS. given by Goar in his Euchologion, and have neglected the transcript of Bunsen.

(32.) With the aid of this manuscript we may put upon one side as of uncertain date the thirteen paragraphs which occupy pages 337 to 339 in Daniel's book, and besides this we must reject the eight succeeding pages, with the exception of one brief prayer. Almost all the rubrical directions (as in St. Basil) disappear; they belong to a period since the time of Charlemagne. Once more, the prayers which the deacon is requested to repeat outside, whilst the priest within the veil is praying μυστικῶς, must be rejected also as of later introduction; and the division of the consecrated bread into the four parts, each part containing two letters of ΙΧΘΥΝΙΚΑ [see ELEMENTS, I. 603; FRACTION, I. 687], is also proved to be later.

The rubric directing the elevation of the bread (Daniel, p. 365; Neale's G. L. p. 140) is also shewn to be modern; so too the introduction of the boiling water. And one thing more attracts attention. As in the rite of St. Basil so here, it was assumed that all would partake. This is altered now. Lastly, in the modern Greek ritual there is an appeal at the very close to St. John Chrysostom that, "having used his liturgy, we may have his intercession that our souls may be saved;" this is also proved now to be of later date than the year 900. Indeed, the liturgy itself is sine titulo (Bunsen, iii. 197). The very ascription of the Liturgy, therefore, to St. Chrysostom may be of a date subsequent to the time when this MS. was transcribed.

(33.) It only remains for us to note that in this the early edition of St. Chrysostom, the Kiss of Peace precedes the Creed, and the Creed precedes the Apostolic Benediction. The "dignum et justum est" is truly eucharistic, and the "Sanctus, sanctus" is speedily followed by the words of institution. The text with reference to the bread resembles that accepted now in the Epistle to the Corinthians, τοῦτ' ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμα μου τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν. The liturgy proceeds: "Remembering His saving command and all things done by Him, and offering Thine own of Thine own, we praise Thee." The priest proceeds: "We offer to Thee, moreover, this reasonable and bloodless service, and we beseech Thee, send down Thy Holy Spirit on us and on these gifts that lie here before Thee, and make this bread the Body of Thy Christ . . ." The offering is represented as made on behalf of all who have gone to rest in the faith, "Fathers, patriarchs, prophets, especially the Holy Virgin." Then intercessions follow on behalf of the living;—amongst them, "for those in mountains, caves, and holes in the earth." (This is now omitted.) "For faithful Kings, and our Queen, lover of Christ." (This possibly points to a precise date when the original of this manuscript was prepared.) Then there is a prayer of commendation to God of ourselves, our lives, and our hopes, followed by the Lord's Prayer. Christ is entreated to come to sanctify us. At last we have the "Sancta sanctis," the "Unus sanctus," and the thanksgiving after the Communion.

(34.) Liturgy of the Nestorians or Chaldean Christians.—Notwithstanding the fearful massacres to which even during the last forty years they have been subjected, there still remain among the cities of Mesopotamia Christians who trace their origin to the influx of Nestorians after the council of Ephesus. They possess three liturgies, or rather three anaphoræ, ascribed respectively to the Apostles (i. e. SS. Adaeus or Thaddæus and Mari), to Theodore of Mopsuestia, and to Nestorius himself. These are used at specified times of the year, but the pro-anaphoral and post-Communion portions of the liturgy of the "Apostles" are never omitted. Latin translations of the three from Syriac manuscripts brought into Europe by emissaries of the Roman church are given by Renaudot in his collection (vol. ii.).

An English translation of the services now in use has been recently published by Dr. Badger. Any effort to point out what portions of these are really ancient, apart from the instruction we have received from our previous investigations, must rest on hypothesis only; but the distinguishing features of the liturgy of the Apostles are (1) that in it our Lord's words of institution are not introduced at all, and (2) that the prayers of intercession both for the living and the dead are connected with the oblation which is made before the epiclesis. In the liturgies of Theodore and of Nestorius, the words of institution are found. It would certainly seem from this that, so far, the 'Liturgy of the Apostles' must be very ancient, as it is inconceivable that the words of our Lord, if at any time brought into the service, could at any subsequent period have been omitted (see § 59 below).

There are some points of difference between the liturgy as given by Renaudot and that given by Dr. Badger, indicating probably that even during the last few hundred years additions have been made to that which had been in use; but as these additions must fall into a period far below the 9th century, it is unnecessary to discuss them further here. We should mention, however, that the canon begins with the apostolic benediction, and we have, as everywhere else, the "sursum corda." The words are introduced simply in the liturgy of the Apostles; but in the liturgies of Theodore and Nestorius, as given by Dr. Badger, they are embodied in a highly rhetorical appeal. Some passages of a Nestorian tendency are discoverable in the last-named liturgy. The other two have no such traces.

(35.) Liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions.—It remains now only that we should briefly discuss the liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions, commonly called, "The Liturgy of St Clement." [APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS, I. pp. 119-126.] We have already given (§§ 15, 17) a brief account of the Eucharistic services as we find them in the Coptic edition of these constitutions. Ludolf, in his Commentarius ad Historiam Aethiopicam (pp. 324-327), gives a Latin translation of the corresponding passage in the Ethiopic version of the constitutions. This has been reproduced by Baron Bunsen in his Analecta Ante-Nicæna (vol. iii. pp. 106-126). It commences with "The Lord be with you, and with thy spirit. Up with your hearts," etc.; then an Eucharistic address to God for the gift and work of His Son, passing at once to the words of institution, which are given in the simplest form. The prayer proceeds, "calling to mind, therefore, His death and His resurrection," etc., "we offer to Thee this bread and cup, rendering Thee thanks that Thou hast made us worthy to stand before Thee, and to perform the functions of Thy priesthood." The Holy Spirit is invoked upon the oblations, but there is no prayer that He will make them the Body and Blood of Christ. The prayer is, "that those who partake of the gifts may be fulfilled with that Spirit." We have the "Sancta sanctis," and the "Unus Pater sanctus," etc., and the "Hymn of Praise;" the latter, possibly, consisting of the 148th Psalm. The people enter to receive the "medicine of their souls," and the thanksgiving follows with a collect. The service concludes, "Depart in peace," and so the Eucharist is accomplished." It will be noticed that the Lord's prayer is not introduced.

(36.) Neither is the Lord's Prayer introduced in the so-called liturgy of St. Clement. This liturgy is found in some MSS. of the eighth book of the Greek Apostolical Constitutions, but in the valuable Oxford manuscript (Codex Bezae Cantabrigie) it is entirely omitted. There are other marks that it is an interpolation of late date. In the manuscripts where it occurs, it follows on the service for the consecration of a bishop, as it does in the Coptic and Ethiopic constitutions. The Greek liturgy begins with the apostolic benediction, and the unbelievers, the hearers, the catechumens, etc., are then dismissed in order. Then comes a long intercessory prayer, the "kiss of peace" is given, and the apostolic benediction is repeated in a slightly different form; we have the "sursum corda" and the "dignum et iustum." This is Eucharistic, detailing the blessings of the creation and the history of God's dispensations to mankind. When we reach the victories of Joshua, the ascription of glory by the Cherubim and Seraphim, "Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus," is introduced, and the Thanksgiving passes on to record the mercies of the incarnation, death, burial, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord; then the bishop introduces the words of institution, and recites how, "Remembering His sufferings, His resurrection, His ascension, and second coming, we offer to Thee, our King and God, according to His appointment, this bread and this cup, giving thanks to Thee by Him;" then follow the epiclesis and the great intercessory prayer, the various clauses of which are introduced by the words, "We pray Thee," or "we entreat Thee," or "we offer to Thee," or "we beg Thee." After this come the "Sancta sanctis" and the "Glory to God in the highest." All the people receive in order; first, presbyters, then deacons, sub-deacons, etc. The psalm, "I will always give thanks to thee," (which includes the words, "O taste and see,") is sung during the Communion. The post-Communion service begins with a prayer of thanksgiving, the benediction from the bishop follows, the deacon says, "Depart in peace."

(37.) Considerable doubts are felt as to whether the liturgy was ever celebrated after this fashion. At all events we have here the advantage of examining a rite, as it was proposed at some time not later than the 4th century. It can scarcely have been altered or interpolated since that time. It is worthy of mention that the liturgical expressions, which have been noted in the recently recovered pages of the genuine Epistle of Clemens Romanus, are not found here as they are found in the Alexandrine service books; this would be an additional proof, if proof were wanting, that the ascription of the liturgy to St. Clement is purely fictitious.

(38.) Liturgy of the Churches of Carthage, etc.—In passing from Alexandria along the coast of Africa to Carthage we pass from an order of things of which the characteristics were Greek to another whose characteristics were Latin. The early writers of the Carthaginian churches are so important and so voluminous that from their works which have come down to us we can supply many details of the Carthaginian services—our sources of information being perhaps more trustworthy than any "liturgy" would be which professed to have been prepared by St. Augustine. Thus we know from Tertullian (Apology, xxxix.) that in the gatherings of the faithful, "the most approved seniors presided." The same chapter in the Apology mentions that at their gatherings the Christians in one body sued God by their prayers. They prayed for the emperors and for their ministers, for the state of the world, for the quiet of all things, "for the delay of the end." The sacred writings were called to remembrance, selections being made apparently with a view to the emergencies of the times,—and an exhortation followed. Then we infer that all were directed to leave the church who were under censure. A collection of money was made on one day of the month, the money collected being used for the relief of the poor, and for the succour of those who were suffering for conscience sake. No doubt Tertullian is describing features of the ordinary Sunday Eucharist. The section passes on to speak of the Agapæ. Elsewhere we learn that the passages from Scripture were taken from the Prophets, from the Epistles or Acts of the Apostles, and from the Gospel (Apology, xxii.), and that psalms or (Ad Uxor. ii. 9) hymns intervened between these sections. Tertullian frequently insists that these rites had been "handed down to us." In praying they turned to the east (Apology, xvi.), lifting up their hands to God the Father (Idolat. vii. 7). We have two ascriptions of glory, one (Ad Uxor. i. 1) "To whom be honour, glory, majesty, dignity, and power, for ever and ever." The other (De Oratione, iii.), "To whom be honour and power for all ages."

With regard to the second part of the eucharistic office, to which he apparently gives the title "Officium sacrificii," we have additional evidence. The prayers for the emperor seem to have been repeated here; the words Sursun suscipientes (Apology, xxx) probably refer to the Sursun corda, which we know was used at Carthage in the time of Cyprian. The Lord's Prayer formed part of the prayers; after it the faithful drew near and gave to each other the kiss of charity (de Oratone, xiv.). The communion followed. This part of the service was undoubtedly kept as a mystery from unbelievers. At some time during the service apparently, special mention was made of individuals by whom or on whose behalf the oblations were offered. With reference to the living, this seems to have been done on the day, monthly or otherwise, when they made their gifts; on behalf of the dead, on the anniversary of their removal.

(39.) Cyprian, who died in 258, gives us information which indicates the progress of ritual even in the few years which had elapsed since the writing of these works of Tertullian's. The offerer is the bishop (sacerdos) or the presbyter, "they offer the sacrifices to God" (Epistles iv. and lxviii.). The sacrifice was celebrated daily (Ep. liv.). The lessons were read from a pulpitum. The Sursun corda and Habemus ad Dominum are spoken of explicitly in the treatise on the Lord's Prayer. The mixed cup was used, signifying, as Cyprian stated, "the union of Christ with His people." The sacrament was given into the hands of the people; and frequently, if not generally, they took a portion of it home, reserving it in a small box, and partaking of it from day to day. The bread and wine used for the sacrament were taken out of that which had been offered, and Cyprian complains of the rich as at times consuming a part of the sacrifice which the poor had offered.—Towards the end of the 4th century (A.D. 398) the well-known laws were enacted, forming part of the canons of the African church, by which the offerings at the sacrament were restricted to bread and wine mixed with water, and the sacrament was always to be received fasting, except on Maundy Thursday, and at the altar prayer was always to be addressed to the Father. These are frequently spoken of as if they were canons of the universal church. As a body they seem, however, in the first instance, to have been observed only in the country where they were enacted, and we have had numerous instances already which shew that the last canon was never accepted in the churches of the East.

(40.) We come now to St. Augustine, from whose voluminous writings we may learn much on the subject before us. None (Latinsche und Griechische Messen) has collected from Augustine's sermons the chief passages there found bearing upon the liturgy, and to him I am indebted for much contained in this and the preceding paragraphs. The exclusion of all save the initiated and those in full communion with the church from being present at the Eucharist, was still most rigidly maintained in the province of Carthage. The three lessons from the Prophet, Epistle and Gospel were now taken apparently according to a fixed rule; between the Epistle and the Gospel a psalm was sung (Sermon clxv. 1); and this was the daily use of the church. The second part of the service (Sermon 311) commenced with the Sursun corda, in which the answer of the people was Habemus ad Dominum; the priest responded, "Let us give thanks to our Lord God" (68, 5). The people attested, "It is meet and right so to do" (227). In the canon the martyrs were mentioned, but prayer no longer was made on their behalf. The prayer of consecration is called the Sanctificatio, and Augustine reserves to the priests, as distinct from the laity, the function of offering the sacrifice. After the consecration followed the Lord's Prayer, apparently said by the clergy alone. The Pax vobiscum followed, and the kiss of peace (Sermon 227). Then the communion, then the dismissal. Apparently there was at some period a confession of sins, beginning with the word confiteor (Sermon 67), at which, as well as at the petition Forgive us our debts, the people smote their breasts. Augustine's sermons give us of course ample illustrations of the addresses which were made to the people on these occasions, no doubt at the early part of the service, as in the time of Tertullian; and the great bishop tells us (Sermon 49), that post sermonem fit missa catechumenis: manebunt fideles.

It will be noticed that we have had no intimation here of the apostolic benediction, with which the Greek liturgies generally commence, nor a word informing us of the character of the prayer of consecration. There is no intimation of any epiclesis or invocation; no hint given as to the sanctus. Of course we must remember that the Communion office proper was essentially a mystery, and we have no right to expect a priori that the sermons would give us as much information regarding it as in fact they do. We might surmise that Augustine's private letters would prove a more fertile field of information than his sermons.^b To these, therefore, let us now turn.

(41.) I would mention, therefore, first, that we read in Letter cxxxiv., addressed to Apringius, the pro-consul, that Augustine "invoked Christ on his behalf in the holy mysteries." Thus we have an instance here of a prayer addressed to Christ. A reference to the feasts held in the churches, and deemed by the ignorant people to be "solatia mortuorum," will be found in No. xxii. Infants communicated, indeed their communion was deemed to be necessary for their salvation (Epist. clxxxii. § 5, and clxxxvi. § 29). The offering was considered to be of the Body and Blood of the Lord; and Augustine mentions that, on one certain day of the year (of course Maundy Thursday), it was received in the evening. His sermons have not spoken of any benediction, but Letter clxxix. (§ 4) shews that there was one, and tells us what the form of the benediction was. The bread used at the Communion appears to have been brought to the church in the form of one loaf. At all events, Augustine says (Epist. clxxxv. § 50, p. 994 of Gaume) that the one bread is the sacrament of unity. Letter ccxvii. (Gaume, p. 1212) speaks of the priest at the altar exhorting the people to pray for unbelievers, that God would convert them to the faith; for the catechumens, that He would inspire in them a desire for regeneration; and for the faithful, that b

^b The sermons ad infantes de Sacramento (227, 272) contain, however, much information to our purpose.

His gift they may persevere in that which they have begun—a prayer analogous to what we have seen in the liturgy of St. Clement. The Domine Deus Subaoth, and the Holy, Holy, Holy, are introduced in his interesting letter to Januarius (lv.), in which mention is also made of the Alleluia, and of the custom of praying standing between Easter and Pentecost.

In the Oriental liturgies mention was made of the church dispersed throughout the world; the words are found in Letter lxxxvii. The custom of adoring is referred to in more than one place. But the classical passage is in his famous letter to Paulinus (No. cxlix.), in which he tries to explain the meaning of the different words in 1 Tim. ii. 1, prayers, orations, supplications, etc. If we take the words as they are found consecutively in our version, he would say that the supplications embrace all that is done in the celebration of the sacrament before that which is on the table of the Lord begins to be blessed,—the prayers, when it is being blessed and sanctified and broken for distribution, the part “which ends in almost every church with the Lord’s Prayer,”—the intercessions, when the people is being blessed by the imposition of hands and commended to God’s great mercy,—the giving of thanks, concluding all.

(42.) We thus have the following clearly laid down as contained in the African Liturgy in the time of St. Augustine. The preliminary part included lessons from Scripture, hymns, sermons, and the prayers for the unbelievers, catechumens, and believers which we have described above.

Then, all being excluded except the initiated, the oblations of the people appear to have been made, and the opening words, “Sursum corda,” with the “Vere dignum et justum est,” with this we connect of course the “Sanctus.” Then came what Augustine would call the “sanctification of the sacrifice,” concluding with the fraction, and probably a prayer of fraction, such as we found in the Alexandrian liturgies; the Lord’s Prayer ensued. Then came the kiss of peace, this being followed by the benediction of the people, “whom the priest offers up to God;” then the participation of the sacrament and the giving of thanks,—the last part of the service before the dismissal. The three petitions mentioned by Augustine (Letter cxlix.) are also mentioned by Fulgentius of Ruspe in his letter to Bitellus (No. cvii.); two of them are alluded to in a treatise of the same bishop, De bonæ perseverantiae. It is probable that no great change was introduced into the liturgy for many years after the death of the great bishop Augustine.

(43.) Spanish Liturgies, of the time of Isidore.—The liturgy of the Spanish Church in its earlier years has a singular interest in several respects. It is quite clear that it was framed in the first instance independently of the Roman Church, although in the time of Innocent the First great efforts were made to render it similar to that of the church of the prince of the Apostles. But time was required for these efforts to succeed. Thus Guéranger (vol. i. p. 133) refers to a council of Gironne, held in the year 517 (Labbe, vol. i. p. 568), the first canon of which directed that throughout the province of Tarra-gona the use of the metropolitan church was to be observed. The council of Braga, in the year

565, passed an enactment of the same character for the province of which it was the metropolis, which would be nearly contemporaneous with Gallicia. The same lessons were to be read at mass through all the churches; all the bishops or presbyters and the people were to retain the salutation, “The Lord be with you,” “And with thy spirit,” “in the manner that all the East observed it from apostolic tradition,” but at the same time directions were given that the masses were to be celebrated in the order which their late bishop, Profuturus, had received in writing from the authority of the apostolic see. In 633 a uniformity was established, not in each province severally, but throughout the whole extent of the peninsula or, as it is called, through all Spain and Gaul (that is Gallia Narbonensis); and amongst other things it is mentioned about the same time that the Kyrie Eleison was repeated, and the “Sicut erat in principio” was added to the “Gloria Patri,” to meet the heresy of the Priscillianists, “as it had been done not only at the apostolic see, but also throughout all the East, Africa, and Italy.”

(44.) Isidore, the famous archbishop of Seville, who presided in one or more councils at Toledo, has left us two books on the ecclesiastical offices, which are supposed to have been written about the year 633. (He succeeded Leander as bishop in the year 595, and died in the year 636.) In the thirteenth and three following chapters of the first book, he gives us information as to the liturgy of his day. He mentions that, “In Africa the Alleluia was sung only on Sundays, and on the fifty days after Easter; but with us, according to the ancient tradition of the Spains, it is sung at all times, except the days of Lent and other fast days.” It would appear also, that what was called the offertorium was sung. With reference to the order of the mass, or “the prayers with which the sacrifices offered to God are consecrated,” he claims that St. Peter was the author of the service which was celebrated throughout the whole world. He speaks of there being seven prayers or orations, the first being one of exhortation to the people, inciting them to earnest prayer to God; the second is a prayer to God, that He will mercifully receive the prayers and oblations of the faithful; the third is poured forth either for those who offer, or for the faithful who have departed this life, that by the same sacrifice they may obtain pardon; fourthly, comes, connected with the kiss of peace, a prayer that all, being mutually reconciled to each other, may partake worthily of the sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, because the indivisible Body of Christ admits not of dissension. Then follows, fifthly, the illatio, which answers to the PREFACE in the Roman Missal. It is described by Isidore as connected with the sanctification of the oblation in which “the whole universe of terrestrial creatures and heavenly powers are urged to join in the praise of God,” and the “Hosanna in the Highest” is sung. Then succeeds, sixthly, that which in some manuscripts is described as the “confirmatio” of the sacrament, in others, the “conformatio,” that “the oblation which is now offered to God, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, may be conformed to the Body and Blood of Christ.” Seventhly, the Lord’s Prayer fol lows, in which he notices likewise seven petitions—the first three for things eternal, the last four for things temporal. In chapter xvi, Isidore speaks of the Nicene Creed as proclaimed to the people at the time of the sacrifice, and in the next, of the priestly benedictions. In chapter xviii, he teaches on the nature of the sacrifice. [Compare ELEMENTS, I. 602.]

(45.) Isidore does not mention the part of the service at which the Nicene Creed, as he calls it, was recited; but we know that at the third council of Toledo, in 589, king Reccared had ordered that the creed of the hundred and fifty should be recited "in the liturgy before the Lord's Prayer throughout all the churches of Spain and Gaul, according to the form of the Oriental churches." [CREED, I. 491.] This position of the creed is not that which was adopted by the Roman church, but it is that which the creed of the hundred and fifty occupies in the liturgy which we must proceed now to discuss, namely—

(46.) The Spanish or Mozarabic Liturgy.—The Mozarabic Liturgy was first printed under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes, in the year 1500. The manuscript which he used must have been of a comparatively late date; for as Lorenzani, subsequently archbishop and cardinal, noticed in the preface to his edition (which was dedicated to Benedict XIV. and has been reprinted in Migne's series, vol. lxxxv.) the book makes mention of St. Francis, St. Dominic, St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Anthony of Padua, all belonging to the 13th century, to which I would add, that in the first part, amongst the greater festivals, there is a mass for the feast of Corpus Christi, which we know was not introduced until the same century. It would be extremely difficult, therefore, to say what parts of the services are ancient, and what portions fall below the chronological limit by which we are bound; and it must be understood that much that follows is stated under reservation.

(47.) On comparing, however, the account given by St. Isidore, with the masses which we find in the Mozarabic Liturgy (as given by Lorenzani, Migne, p. 109; compare Daniel, i. p. 65, etc.), we have every point mentioned by Isidore reproduced in the liturgy. The exhortation to the people is found almost everywhere, under the heading Missa. We have the Alleluia at the beginning, apparently, of every mass, except those to be used in Lent (Daniel, pp. 55–57). We have the prayer that God would receive the oblation (ibid. p. 67). We have the prayer for the offerers (ibid. p. 69). The prayer for the Holy Spirit must have been displaced, for in the modern form it follows here. We have the "Dominus vobiscum" and "Et cum Spiritu tuo" (p. 71). That connected with the kiss of peace, which is the fourth prayer mentioned by Isidore, follows on p. 77. Then the "Illatio" follows, p. 79. It is, as Daniel describes it, a somewhat long ascription of glory, beginning with the "Dignum et justum est," varying almost every Sunday of the year, but always ending with the "Sanctus, sanctus" and the "Hosanna in the Highest." The "Confirmatio," or "Conformatio," consists of the narrative of the institution. The choir recite the creed whilst the priest elevates the consecrated elements; the Lord's Prayer follows, and the benediction before the communion. Thus, with the one exception of the invocation of the Holy Spirit, the position of each prayer mentioned by Isidore is found here to be the same as that to which he assigned it.

(48.) There are some points which have not yet been mentioned which establish still more closely the connexion of this liturgy with those of the Oriental churches. We have three Lessons at least—four in Lent. The first, or first two, from the Old Testament; the next from the Acts of the Apostles or the Epistles; the last from the Gospel. The offering was distinctly made before the consecration, the choir retained the use of the Greek words, "Agyos, Agyos, Agyos." The Apostolic Benediction is found as in the Greek liturgies. After the Kiss of Peace we have the "Sursum corda" and the "Habemus ad Dominum." In the other Latin liturgies the words of institution are always introduced thus: "Qui pridie quam pateretur." In the Greek liturgies it always was, "Who, in the night in which He was betrayed." The Mozarabic follows the Oriental form, and this serves as an indication that, at all events, in some points the Spanish has never been altered, for the prayer which follows is (I believe) throughout the volume entitled Post pridie: oratio, i. e. the modern rubric assumes that the prayer of consecration had run in the Roman form. [CANON, I. 272.] Once more, we have the Sancta sanctis here, and the choir sings, Gustate et videte quoniam suavis est Dominus. I think I might add that we have the words, "Give redemption to the captives, health to the infirm," as we had them in the liturgy of St. Mark, and "Rest to the departed," as we found the addition made in another of the Oriental liturgies.

(49.) But most curious of all is the rite which is peculiar to the Mozarabic Liturgy, of dividing the bread. [FRACTION, I. 688.]

(50.) One point more remains to be noticed: That the prayer "Post nomina" is very frequently addressed to Christ, and in many of the petitions so addressed our Lord is entreated to "accept the offering now made to Him;" the same may be noted in the petitions Post pridie, in which our Lord is entreated to sanctify the sacrifices. (See for examples, Migne, pp. 129, 138, 175, 195, 202, 204, etc.) Thus it is apparent that the canon of the church of Carthage, to which attention has been drawn, was not observed in Spain at the time when these services were framed.

(51.) Gallican Liturgies.—We know from the correspondence which passed between Gregory the Great and the missionary Augustine that the customs of the churches in Gaul and at Rome were different, even in the Mass or Eucharist. (Greg. Ep. xi. 64; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 19.) The difference continued during the seventh and the greater part of the eighth centuries; but the introduction of the Roman chant into Gaul in the time of Pepin was followed up by a command of Charlemagne that every presbyter should celebrate the Mass according to the Roman order (Capitul. v. cap. 219–371), and for this purpose Charles obtained a copy of what professed to be the Gregorian Sacramentary from his friend Pope Hadrian. This order was not carried out without some heartburnings, for we find in the next century the abbat Hilduin remarking to Louis the Pious that the older rites had been observed in Gaul from the very earliest times, and, as a proof, he referred to "the missal books, which were most ancient and were almost eaten up by age." (Hilduin, Vita Dionys. Areop., in Surius, Oct. 9; Palmer, i. 145.)

(52.) We must, of course, conclude that these "missal books" were not reproduced in the schools founded by Charlemagne and watched over by Alcuin and others. Indeed, they became so rare before the accession of Charles the Bald, that that monarch mentioned in his famous letter to the clergy of Ravenna (quoted by Mabillon, Lit. Gall. p. 20) that he was indebted to the clergy of the church of Toledo for his knowledge, that "up to the time of his grandfather, the Gallican churches had celebrated the divine offices in a manner different from those adopted in the churches of Rome and Milan." We cannot be surprised, therefore, at finding that the liturgical remains of the early Gallican church are very scanty, and we shall welcome with the greater thankfulness the discoveries of Thomasius, Martene, Mabillon, and Mone.

(53.) If we remember the early connexion of the churches of Lyons and Vienne with the East, we shall of course expect that the ritual of these churches must exhibit some points of resemblance with the ritual of the church of Ephesus. From the undoubted writings of Irenaeus (I abstain from using the so-called Pfaßian fragment), we learn but little of the eucharistic office of his day, but we do learn that it contained the words εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, that the service included an offering or sacrifice to God through Christ Jesus of the first fruits of His creatures, that there was an invocation (ἐκκλησις or ἐπίκλησις) on the bread and the temperamentum offered (i. 3. 1; iv. 17. 5; 18. 4, 5). These points remind us of the Oriental rites. Later allusions to the Gallican service, found in the writings of Gregory of Tours and others, have been collected by Mabillon in his learned work, de Liturgia Gallicana, published in 1685; and additional light is thrown upon the subject by the discovery in the library of St. Martin's, at Autun, of two letters, ascribed in the MS. to Germanus, the famous bishop of Paris, who died in the year 576. The discovery was made by Martene, who published the document verbatim et lit-ratim in his Thesaur. Anecd. tom. v. They are reproduced in Migne's series (vol. lxxii. pp. 83-98), and Migne has given as an appendix to them Mabillon's work de Liturgia Gallicana (pp. 101-447), and also the same writer's further work, entitled Sacramentarium Gallicanum (pp. 448-576).

(54.) We have altogether in these reprints:—
a. The letters of St. Germanus, of which I have spoken. They seem to be somewhat fragmentary, and I am disposed to regard the former as giving an account specifically of the service on Easter Eve and Easter Day. (Migne, ut sup. pp. 89-98.)

b. A Lectiary of the Gallican church, which Mabillon found at Luxeuil, and which he assigned to the end of the seventh century. (Migne, pp. 171-216.)

c. A Missal, entitled in the manuscript, though in a later hand, Missale Gothicum. This is considered by the learned as representing the ritual of the south of France about the beginning of the eighth century. (It contains a service for the martyrdom of St. Leodgar, who was killed in 678.) The volume is very interesting, exhibiting indisputable marks that the services it contains were framed not merely at different times, but on different principles. Several holy days are noted by Mabillon as having been introduced at a period subsequent to the Lectionary, which he described as above. (Migne, pp. 225-318.)

d. Then follows a missal entitled Missale Francorum, in consequence of petitions that it contains for the king and kingdom and rulers of the Franks. This missal concludes (at least in its present form) with a fragment of the Roman canon as it exists in the Gregorian Sacramentary; the earlier part is occupied with very interesting ordination offices. Morinus considered the MS. to be of the sixth century, but Mabillon puts it later. It evidently belongs to an epoch at which the Roman services were ousting those of the Gallican church. (Migne, pp. 318-340.)

The MSS. (c) and (d) are now in the Vatican. The former is numbered Vat. Reg. 626, or Alex. Vat. 317 (the accounts differ); the number of the other is apparently Alex. Vat. 257. They must have come from the Library of Fleury, which was dispersed by the Huguenots.

e. The Missale Gallicanum which follows in Mabillon (Migne, pp. 340-382) is also at the Vatican (Vat. Pal. 493); it came from the library at Heidelberg. It contains interesting expositions of the Creed and Lord's Prayer, and, almost unutilated, the services for Easter Day. It is believed to represent the use of Mid-France in the eighth century.

f. To these must be added the Sacramentarium Gallicanum, above referred to. It was found by Mabillon at Bobio, and was regarded by him, as by others, as indicating the services of the neighbourhood of Besançon. It commences with the Gregorian Canon under the title Missa Romanensis cottidiana (Migne, pp. 451-580).

g. And M. Mone, the librarian at Carlsruhe, discovered in the library under his care palimpsests from which he was enabled to decipher several old masses. The volumes came from the famous Benedictine convent of Reichenau, the island near Constance. Baron Bunsen has thrown additional light upon them in the third volume of the Analecta Ante-Nicaena.

(55.) A comparison of these manuscripts shews that if the suppositions regarding their origin are correct, there must have been a great variety in the details of the Eucharistic services in the various dioceses or provinces of France. Taking, however, the liturgy of St. Germanus as our guide, we learn that in his time, on the day or days of which he describes the services, when the priest came from the sacristy the clerk sang a kind of introit, and then the deacon proclaimed silence. The salutation followed, Dominus sit semper vobiscum, with the usual response. Lections were read from a Prophet, an Apostle, and a Gospel. The "Aius," or Ἄγιος, in Greek and then in Latin, preceded the "prophet," and the Song of Zacharias followed it. The Benedicite followed the Apostle, the "Aius" being again sung before the Gospel. The book was carried to the pulpit, preceded by seven candles, signifying the seven gifts of the Spirit. [Compare GOSPEL, I. 743.] A homily followed upon the Gospel, and a prayer by the deacon. Then, Germanus says, intimation was given that the catechumens must leave the church; but his words seem to shew that though the form was kept up, the occasion had ceased. The oblations were now brought in (they are designated as being the Body and Blood of Christ, which seems to me to indicate that we have here the service of Easter Eve) amidst the singing of the choir; the Lauds or Alleluia followed, "as in the Revelation" (iv. 8-11), and the Angelic Hymn; and the names of the departed saints were recited, "as if heaven were opening at the second coming of Christ." The Kiss of Peace was given, and then the Sursum corda, the "confractio et commixtio corporis Christi" (the breaking being connected with a strange legend), whilst the prostrate clerks were singing an anthem (apparently the Sanctus, Sanctus). On this followed the Lord's Prayer, the benediction of the people ("Pax fides et communicatio corporis et sanguinis Domini sit semper vobiscum"), and the communion. Then, what Germanus called the Treacanum, which he describes as containing "the mystery of the Trinity," in such words as seem to me to suit only the εἰς ἄγιος κ. τ. λ. of the Oriental liturgies; and with this Germanus's account of the form of the service terminates. It will be noticed that he omits to inform us of the moment when the consecration took place, although we find in an earlier part of the letter that "pridie quam pateretur Dominus," our Saviour said, "Hic est calix sanguinis mei mysterium fidei qui pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum;" which are the words of the Gregorian Canon. This omission and other reasons prevent me from accepting this account as a description of the ordinary liturgy of the Gallican church at the time of Germanus. The account seems rather to be that of one of the services at the season of Easter.

(56.) With this we may compare the results of Mone's discoveries amongst the palimpsests at Carlsruhe. We should not be justified in regarding the originals of these as all of one date, but we may supplement the account of Germanus by what we find here. It would appear that there was occasionally or generally a prayer post prophetiam, and, after the catechumens were dismissed, a praefatio, which was an address to the congregation, explaining the service which followed, and calling upon them to join heartily in it. This was followed by a collect. The oblations were then made, and the names both of living and departed members of Christ's body were read, prayers being offered both ante nomina and post nomina. Then came the kiss of peace and the prayer ad pacem, and the service proceeded with the Sursum corda, etc. (though this is not mentioned) and the contestatio, which answered to the modern preface. Of these contestations there was evidently a great variety. This of course led up to the Sanctus, and we have various collects entitled post sanctus; the words of institution (we have not them at length) were introduced "qui pridie," and part of them seem to have been uttered secreto, for, after them, comes in one missa a "post secreta." (We have three instances here of an invocation.) Then came the Lord's Prayer with variable introductions, all entirely different from the Gregorian, and a variable EMBOLISMUS. Then must have followed the Communion, for the next prayer is entitled generally postcommunio, once only post mysterium; then came the collect and the final benediction.

(57.) The first sacramentary published by Mabillon entirely upholds the correctness of our inferences drawn from these palimpsests, and at the same time exhibits marks of progress towards later modes of thought. In these missals, which were prepared for the Sundays and older established festivals, we have the praefatio, still the title for an address to the congregation: the collectio post nomina frequently shews that the names recited had been names of the living who had made their offerings or sacrifices, at the same time that it included at times a prayer for the dead. The Vere dignum et iustum est is entitled (generally in the older services) immolatio missae, sometimes contestatio. The form of the mysterium or secreta always begins Qui pridie. The words of consecration are not given. The post secreta is either a prayer or an expression of belief. There seems to have been two benedictiones populi, one a prayer before communion, the other a blessing before dismissal. The general character of the Missale Gallicanum (Migne, pp. 339, etc.) is the same. We still find the titles immolatio and contestatio prefixed to the Vere dignum et iustum est, but there are a few indications that a change of service was being introduced when the manuscript was prepared, such as immolatio nunc missae or contestatio nunc, and in a very few instances the post communionem is altered to post eucharistiam. The character of the collects post nomina is the same as in the Gothic missal.

(58.) The other two sacramentaries i.e. the Missale Francorum, and the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (which Mabillon found at Bobio) contain, either in whole or in part (the former manuscript being mutilated), the Gregorian canon. We must therefore assign them to the ninth century (or the later years of the eighth) at the earliest. In the former the title super oblat, has replaced the words post nomina, and the offerings have become the oblations of God's people. The names of the offerers are no longer recited: and the Memento etiam appears in the canon, after the consecration. We have still benedictions "ad plebem," pp. 336, 337.

From the letter of the Monks of Mount Olivet to pope Leo III., we know that the creed of Constantinople was used in the chapel of Charlemagne. [CREED, § 15, I. 492.] We find no notice of it in any of the manuscripts.^c

(59.) Roman Liturgy.—We must now turn to one of the most difficult subjects,—the history and characteristics of the liturgy in use in Rome. We have seen evidences that it differed materially from the Liturgy of Gaul in the middle of the 8th century, and we know, with considerable accuracy, the form which it assumed before the end of the 9th century; but

^c A prayer in the earlier MS. (p. 227), "Give deliverance to the captive, sight to the blind," may remind us of a similar petition in the Alexandrine liturgies. The prayers post nomina, ad pacem, post secreta, are also frequently addressed to our Lord. There is a distinct invocation of the Holy Spirit on pages 246, 257, and on page 266 (the Thursday in Holy Week) I notice the "Agnus Dei."

the evidence is very limited as to its previous growth. In the accounts of the 9th century we meet with statements that Alexander (A.D. 100 to 106) combined the history of the Passion of our Lord with the prayer of the priest, when the masses were celebrated (see § 34); that Xystus (107-116) directed that during the service the people should sing the hymn Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, etc.; that Telesphorus (117-127) ordered that at the commencement of the sacrifice the angelic hymn Gloria in excelsis Deo should be sung on the night of the Nativity alone. These and similar statements, found in the works of Walafrid Strabo and others, indicate a belief that the portions referred to were of great antiquity. Greater credence may perhaps be given to details such as these which follow. Caelestinus (422) is said to have directed that Psalms of David should be sung before the sacrifice, in addition to the reciting of parts of St. Paul's Epistles and the Holy Gospel. Of Leo the Great (440-462), it is distinctly stated that he added the words "sanctum sacrificium et caetera;" and of Gelasius (about 495), that he framed with great caution prefaces for the sacraments. The letter of Vigilius to Profuturus, Bishop of Braga, has been already referred to: he sent to the Spanish bishop the text of the "canonical prayer," "which by God's mercy we have received (he said) from apostolic tradition." The letter is preserved, the enclosure unhappily is lost. But in the letter he gives the important information that "in the celebration of masses, at no time and on no festival was the order of the prayer different. They always consecrated in the same form the gifts offered to God." Then we come to the work of Gregory the Great, of whom it is stated by the Deacon John that he made additions to the ritual of the church, that he ordered the ALLELUIA [I. 56] to be said at other times beside Pentecost, the Kyrie eleison to be sung, and the Lord's Prayer to be recited immediately after the canon over the sacrifice. (The Canon here would seem to be the list of saints commemorated in the Nobis quoque peccatoribus. For an example of this limited meaning, see Muratori de Lit. Rom. i. 555.) Gregory is also declared by his biographer to have reduced into one volume the Gelasian codex of the solemnities of the mass, by removing many things, altering a few, and adding others "pro exponendis Evangelicis lectionibus." His letter to John the bishop of Syracuse (Epist. ix. 12) seems to shew that the Deacon John was correct in his account of the alterations which Gregory had introduced, and several writers agree in narrating that Gregory added the words "diesque nostros in tua pace disponas." They are found in the prayer Hanc igitur. With these brief hints we shall be better able to examine the documents which have come down to us.

(60.) The first, and undoubtedly the oldest, is a sacramentary discovered in the library at Verona, and published by Blanchini in the year 1735. He gave to it the title Sacramentarium Leonianum, and attributed it (without any documentary evidence) to pope Leo the Great. An examination of the contents of the work has induced almost all the great ritualists to differ herein from Blanchini; and it seems now to be generally agreed that the manuscript was prepared by some ecclesiastic for his own, either private or public, use. It is mutilated at the commencement, and does not give the canon of the Mass. It contains, however, a collection of prayers such as were used at the eucharistic services, one or two collects for the day, a prayer of oblation, a Vere dignum, a prayer after communion, and a benediction. Of these there is an immense variety; thus there are eight "sets" of prayers for the festival of St. John and St. Paul, and twenty-eight for that of St. Peter and St. Paul (Migne, lv. pp. 47, 49, etc.). Titles to the prayers occur very rarely; we have, however, preces for the collects on p. 110; super oblata on pp. 106, 110; and on the same pages, postcommunio and super populum. We are thus severed from the post nomina of the Gothic sacramentary, and brought more into connexion with the Missale Francorum and the Bobio manuscript. The Ballerini have remarked that in a mass for Pentecost the prayer Hanc igitur is represented as preceding the Communicantes (p. 40). On p. 70 there is an embolismus (the only one I have discovered), and on p. 75, "Quod ore sumpsimus, Domine, quaesumus, mente capiamus," etc., and a distinct invocation of the Holy Spirit on pp. 79, 147 (compare p. 139). On p. 117 we find two prayers, still more resembling the Gregorian Hanc igitur and Quam oblationem; the former has the words "diesque meos clementissima gubernatione disponas"; in the latter it seems to have been assumed that the reader needed only the first few words, his memory would supply the rest. If so, we carry the petition, Quam oblationem, back to a period before the time of Gelasius.

We meet with so many prayers for the rulers or princes of the "Roman Name" that we can have no difficulty in assigning the book to some Roman priest or bishop; and the manner in which the Roman primacy is urged (as we find it in no other sacramentary) may be deemed to justify Blanchini in his opinion that Leo might have been the compiler. We learn from Gerbert (Vetus Liturgia Alemannica, i. 80) that the effect of the discussions which followed his publication on the mind of Blanchini was this: he became persuaded that the work was still more ancient than at first he deemed it to be, and attributed it to Sylvester, who was pope from 314 to 335. One thing is clear, that, when the book was written, the liturgy at Rome had not assumed the character which Vigilius ascribed to it in the middle of the sixth century, unless we limit most rigidly his language as to the form of consecration.

(61.) In the year 1680 the learned Thomasius (afterwards Cardinal) published the contents of a manuscript which, having belonged to Petau, was then in the library of Queen Christina, and is now in the Vatican (Vat. 1455 according to Daniel, 316 according to Muratori). This part of Thomasius' work was republished by Muratori in the first volume of his learned work Liturgia Romana Vetus, and with it, in Migne's series, vol. lxxiv. p. 847, etc. The manuscript is of the tenth century, and is entitled, Liber Sacramentorum Romanæ Ecclesiæ ordinis anni circuli. It contains several prayers for the princes of the Roman kingdom and the governors of the Roman empire (Muratori, pp. 729-731); but one of the well-known collects for Good Friday (p. 561) has the prayer, "Respice propitius ad Romanum sive Francorum benignus imperium." Thus the Roman work had been adapted for use in France in the ninth or tenth century, and it is impossible to say how far this adaptation extended. We know that there were in the monastery at Centula (St. Richierus near Corbey) in the ninth century, fourteen Gelasian and three Gregorian missals, and thus it was inferred by Thomasius that this manuscript might represent the Gelasian order. All doubt on the subject was removed in the year 1777 by Gerbert, who discovered three similar books in the libraries of Switzerland, and the sacramentary, as distinct from the Canon of the Mass, may now unhesitatingly be described as Gelasian. It consists of three books, the prayers for great festivals, ordinary holy days, and ordinary Sundays, being arranged separately. Scattered over the work we have the word oratio prefixed to the collect of the day; the secretæ as now in the Roman missal; the Vere dignum varying with almost every festival; on p. 553 the words infra actionem form a rubric to the Communicantes, and the Hanc igitur is similarly introduced. Then we have post communionem, and lastly ad populum. Thus the benediction followed the communion. There is no mention anywhere of the use of the Constantinopolitan Creed in the service (perhaps we might scarcely expect such mention), but in the Order for the preparation for Baptism (which had commenced on the Monday in the third week in Lent, on p. 533), after the "opening of the ears," the acolyth recited this Creed in the name of the children, and the clause on the Procession ran in Greek, "tonectupatros emporeuomenon"; in Latin, "ex Patre procedentem" (compare Dr. Heurtley's Harmonia Symbolica, p. 158, or the writer's Creeds, p. 138). The omission of the clause Filioque is a further indication of the connexion of this volume with Rome.

(62.) But when we come to the canon of the Mass, the "Canon actionis" as it is called, which is to be found in the third book (Muratori, p. 695), we find the words, "disque nostros in tua pace disponas;" and, with the exception I shall mention just now, this canon agrees in every respect with what was deemed in the tenth century to be the Gregorian canon. It will be remembered that the Gregorian canon is also to be found in the "Missale Francorum" and the "Missale Gallicanum" of Besançon, although the books in other respects differ from the Roman use. It seems probable, therefore, that the work before us indicates that, although the Gelasian Prefaces etc. were used in some parts of France in the ninth or tenth century, still the directions of Charlemagne had been carried out completely, and the Gregorian canon had replaced all others.^d

^d Some questions on this point seem to be set at rest by observation of the following fact. Ratram. in his letter to the Emperor Charles the Bald on the Body and Blood of our Lord, § 2, refers to two collects used by the priest in the service of the Mass. Of these collects one is in the Gregorian Sacramentary, and indeed is used to the present day. Both are contained in that published by Thomasius and Muratori as the "Gelasian," and they are found nowhere else. Thus we may conclude that this really was the Gelasian sacramentary as used in France in the ninth century; and that this Gelasian

(63.) The exception to which I have referred is this. In the prayer Communicantes of the Gregorian canon the twelve martyrs commemorated were all connected immediately with the church in Rome. In the MS. before us mention is also made (either in the text or margin) of Dionysius, Rusticus, Hilary, Martin, Augustine, Gregory, Jerome, Benedict, Eleutherius. Of these, Hilary and Martin are also named in the Missale Francorum; and they, with Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, Jerome, Benedict, in the Bobio or Besançon copy. Thus these names carry us down to a period far later than Gelasius. Indeed, at p. 515 we have capitulum Sancti Gregorii Papæ.

(64.) Again, there is here no Memento et am of those who have "preceded us with the sign of faith and rest in the sleep of peace." It seems, however, that this is missing from several important manuscripts of the Gregorian canon (see Daniel, i. 38), and thus the omission cannot be regarded as a point of difference between it and the text before us. The same may be said of the clause, Pro quibus tibi offerimus in the Memento Domine. Thus we have no satisfactory direct evidence of the contents of the canon as left by Gelasius.* But I must mention that, as we have it here, we find that after the Lord's Prayer and the embolismus the Peace was given by the priest, with the usual response; announcements were made of festivals or fasts, and of sick persons to be prayed for; post hæc communicat sacerdos cum omni populo; fourteen collects are given under the title, "Post commun." and as many more under the words, "Item Benedictiones super populum post communionem."—There is no account of these benedictions in the brief summary of the Gregorian rite to which I must now proceed.

(65.) After these remarks the Gregorian Liturgy will not detain us long. Muratori speaks of four or five MSS. which were known in his time; to these the search of later investigators has added several more, so that Daniel professes to give the various readings in the Ordo and Canon of nineteen MSS. Of these several present similar titles: "Liber sacramentorum de circulo anni expositum a sancto Gregorio Papa Romano editum ex authentico Libro Bibliothecæ Cubiculi scriptum." Muratori thinks (not unreasonably) that this repetition of the same grammatical error indicates that these were all (or, all but one) transcripts of one copy taken from the cubiculum of the custodians of the relics at St. Peter's. The copy which he uses in his margin, has editus. But, as Muratori says, no one can believe that we have the book as it came from the hand of Gregory. The masses vary in the several editions; some copies have only nine prefaces; others have many more. The festivals vary; all (as I understand) include a commemoration of St. Gregory himself. Even the account, "Qualiter missa Romana cele-sacramentary continued in use in combination with the Gregorian canon. And it follows that we have no distinctive copy of the true Gelasian canon. (The passage from Ratram may be seen in Gieseler, third period, division i, § 14, note 6; and the collects referred to in Muratori, i. 657. 671.)

* It would appear that one of Gerbert's MSS. of the Gelasian sacramentary contains two prayers for the faithful departed; one before, the other after, the consecration [CANON, I. 271.]

bratur," varies in the details which I shall mention as I proceed.

(66.) What is now called the Ordo (of which we have no notice in the Gelasian Sacramentary) is given briefly but satisfactorily. Mention is made of the Introit, the Kyrie eleison, the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to be used on Sundays and festivals if a bishop is present, otherwise only at Easter. When the Litany is said, neither the Gloria in excelsis nor the Alleluia is sung. Then followed the Oratio or Oratio Missalis, i. e. the collect for the day; the Apostolus (sic) or Epistle; then either the Gradalis or the Alleluia: then the Gospel. This was followed by the offertory, and the prayer super oblata, which varied; it is called the secretæ in one MS. It concluded with the words, Per omnia sæcula sæculorum, which were recited aloud. The absence is noted (Gerbert, p. 301) of the salutations before the Epistle and before the Gospel, of the Creed, and of the Sermon. Then the canon commenced, but the records end with the salutation after the embolismus; i. e. we have no account of the communion, or the kiss of peace, or the benediction. The Vatican MS. used by Muratori has, however, one line more, Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis, which is also contained in two or more other MSS. In the body of the books we have for each day a prayer ad complendam, answering to the similar prayer in the modern missal.

(67.) I think it is certain that all the known MSS. of this sacramentary were used north of the Alps, yet not one of them refers to the use of the "Nicene" Creed in the service of the Mass. We know, however, that the Gallican churches used the Gloria in excelsis every Sunday, and that the recitation of the creed spread very much after the fall of Felix and Elipandus. The collects super oblata have never (I believe) any reference to the offerers. This had been discouraged by Pope Innocent I. The persons named in the Te igitur are different in the different manuscripts. In some places the king was prayed for; in others the emperor: many omitted the petition, pro omnibus orthodoxis, and all the MSS. but one (the Vat. Othob.) omit the words, Pro quibus tibi offerimus.¹ The Memento etiam on behalf of those who have died with the sign of faith is absent from five of the MSS., and in two other early copies it is inserted in the margin. The names adduced in the prayer commencing Nobis quoque are again all Roman. (This collect is referred to by Innocent III. as indicating the growth of the Roman service.)

(68.) Ambrosian Liturgy.—The church of Milan was said to have been founded by Barnabas, and it seems to be undoubted that it was regarded as entirely independent of Rome until Gregory in 593 attempted to exercise patriarchal privileges within the province. Milan certainly had a liturgy of its own, which, notwithstanding repeated efforts on the part of the Roman patriarch, was, though with some modifications, retained until our own times. One of the most important of these efforts was encouraged by Charlemagne, who, in his anxiety to compel the Lombards to follow the example he had set to his earlier subjects, carried off to Rome all the service-books he could collect at Milan, with the intention of replacing them by Roman offices (Mabillon, Iter Ital. tom. i. part ii. p. 106, etc.). Eugenius, a Gallican bishop, induced Leo to exercise some forbearance in the matter, and thus the Milanese rite was preserved; but, as the account proceeds, only one copy of the earlier service-book could be discovered, so that from it the more recent copies must have been taken.

(69.) This statement seems to be in some degree corroborated by the fact that no manuscript of very ancient date has been discovered containing the Ambrosian rite. The sacramentary published by Pamelius in 1571 differs considerably even in the canon from the modern rite given by Daniel, and it differs too in the service for the Thursday before Easter from that which Saxe, the librarian at Milan, furnished from a very old manuscript to Muratori (de Lit. Rom. i. 131). The text of Daniel approximates more nearly to that of the modern Roman Ordo and Canon than that given by Pamelius, shewing, I conceive, that the efforts of various popes to induce the Milanese to resign their inheritance have tended to encourage the admission of details from the Roman liturgy. Thus, the text of the Confiteor (Daniel, p. 50) and the absolutions, the Munda cor meum (p. 62), the Hanc igitur (p. 84, in which the well-known Gregorian words Diesce nostros in tua pace disponas are to be found), the Supplices te rogamus (p. 90), the Libera nos (p. 96) do not occur in Pamelius, nor do other prayers of great importance given by Daniel (pp. 100, 102, 104): and the language of many others differs considerably.

(70.) Taking the text of Pamelius as our guide, we observe that, after two private prayers said by the priest before and whilst he draws near to the altar, an Ingressa takes the place of the Roman Introit; and that before the Gloria in excelsis there is an oratio super populum, corresponding to our collect for the day. The salutations, Dominus vobiscum, etc., are very frequent; after the Gloria in excelsis (in which, as in the older copies, the Qui tollis peccata mundi miserere nobis is not repeated) the Kyrie eleison follows. (In the Gregorian it precedes the Angelic Hymn.) Three lessons were read, as in the Gallican and Spanish rites—the Prophecy, the Epistle, the Gospel; a Psalmus, consisting of two (or more) verses suited to the Prophecy, was sung after it; a Benedictus preceded the Epistle, and a verse for the day with the Alleluia followed it; the first few words of the Gloria in excelsis and a suitable benedictory prayer preceded the Gospel; salutations, the Kyrie eleison, and an antiphon succeeded it. The oblations of the bread and the cup were then made, and they were made even until our own day in a manner recalling the earlier conceptions of the church; they were brought in, not by the deacon, but by ten aged men and as many women, and presented by them to the priest. He had previously offered an oratio super sindonem, which varied with the day or season; then came the orationes secretæ ad munus oblatum, and a prayer resembling the suscipe Sancte Pater of the Roman office, and two others commencing Et suscipe Sancta Trinitas (these differ in very interesting details from those which in the Roman book follow the recitation of the creed). According to the book before us a prose hymn entitled offerendus was then chanted (it began Ecce apertum est templum tabernaculi testimonii, and ended with the Sanctus of the Apocalypse), and this introduced the creed. Then followed the varying prayer super oblatam repeated aloud, and the "preface to the canon" followed. The prefaces (they are so entitled) are numerous. The canon commenced in a manner similar to the Gregorian, but the Hanc igitur and Quam oblationem were replaced by a single prayer commencing Fac nobis. (This is not in Daniel, nor is there notice there of the washing of the fingers of the priest which here ensued, its position differing from that in the Roman book.) Then immediately ensued the consecratio panis per verba Christi and the consecratio calicis, and the commemoratio passionis resurrectionis et ascensionis Domini—all differing from the Gregorian text; but we have the Memento etiam and the Nobis quoque. The Per quem differed materially: there was a special prayer for the confection and commixtion, and the Lord's Prayer followed with a doxology. The Pacis nuntiatio, including a prayer, Pax in caelo, pax in terra, pax in omni populo, pax sacerdotibus ecclesiarum Dei; pax Christi et ecclesiae maneat semper in vobiscum. Then followed prayers of the priest before and after he communicated, and the communion of the bystanders (V. Corpus Christi, R. Amen). With the last exception, and that of the offering of the priest after his reception, Deo gratias, Deo gratias, etc., the modern or Danie's text here differs almost entirely from that of Pamelius, which has nothing analogous to the prayers of the Roman Liturgy. Then, an appeal to the church to rejoice, entitled transitorium; a varying prayer post communionem; Dominus vobiscum; Kyrie e eleison; Benedicat et exaudiat nos Deus; Procedamus in pace, R. in nomine Christi, and the service concluded.

(71.) The importance of our subject is such that it is necessary to say a few more words on the canon which Muratori printed in his famous work (p. 131), from the copy furnished to him by Saxe. Here we find the Hanc igitur oblationem adapted for the day, and the Quam oblationem, neither of which is in Pamelius; but there is a prayer commencing Haec facimus, to which I know of nothing analogous anywhere else. The service is represented as then passing on to a prayer resembling in some respects that commencing Per quem, and on this the Lord's Prayer follows. Thus then (if Muratori's account may be implicitly trusted) we have no offering after consecration, no prayer for those who have departed with the sign of faith, no commemoration of the (Roman) martyrs, no ceremony of fraction before the Lord's Prayer; all of which are contained in the rite as published by Pamelius. The fact is remarkable, and the discrepancy seems to require some explanation. We have an indication in both services that, as we have them, they are later than 800; for in both we have a prayer for the emperor, and Charles was not crowned emperor before that year.

(72.) We have no account of the early liturgy of the patriarchate of Aquileia.

(73.) Liturgies of the British Islands.—We are in almost entire ignorance of the character of the liturgies of the ancient British and Celtic churches. It is of course most probable that they resembled in some degree the uses of the churches in Gaul or Spain, but of the extent of this resemblance it is impossible to speak precisely. A curious document originally published by Spelman, and much used by Ussher, Stillingfleet, and others, may be found in Haddan and Stubbs (i. 138-140). It seems to have been written in the latter part of the seventh or in the eighth century, and professes to give some notes on the various 'courses' in use in Western Europe. The 'Cursus Gallorum' is referred to St. John, and it is stated that it was used widely. The 'Cursus Scottorum,' of which a marked feature was that the Sanctus, the Gloria in excelsis Deo, the Lord's Prayer, and the Amen were chanted by all the congregation, male and female, is assigned to St. Mark; and its introduction into Britain and Scotland is attributed to Germanus of Auxerre and Lupus, who visited the islands about the year 429. It thus (as Professor Stubbs says) is silent on the liturgy of Britain before 429, and its evidence, so far as it is worth anything, only "asserts that the Irish liturgy used by St. Patrick was neither Roman nor Gallican, but Alexandrian." Coming down to the next century, we find an assertion attributed to Gildas, that the Britons were opposed to the whole world and to the Romans in particular, "in the mass" (H. and S. i. 112). The date is questioned by Mr. Stubbs, who would refer the assertion to a later period; but, of course, if true in the seventh or eighth century it must have been true in the sixth to the opposition to Rome. The words of Gregory to Augustine (ib. iii. 19) authorised the latter to form a purely Anglican rite, and we know from his proposals to the British bishops (Bede, E. H. ii. 2, in Palmer, i. 178), that in matters of custom, in which at the time "the latter differed from the use of Rome and of the church universal," Augustine would give up all points but three. He insisted that they should celebrate Easter at the proper time, should baptize after the Roman ritual, and should join him in preaching the word of the Lord to the English nation. "Everything else, however contrary to our customs, we will bear with equanimity." Of course as long as the Britons and Celts refused to observe the Roman Easter, they must have refused to adopt the Roman ritual for the Eucharist. And we know that the Roman Easter was not observed either in Scotland or Ireland before the beginning of the eighth century. Bede (H. E. v. 15, see Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 110) states that Adamnan came to Aldfred, king of the Angli, about the year 704, and whilst staying with him saw the canonical rites of the church, and was then persuaded how undesirable it was for him and his people, very few in number and living in an extreme corner of the earth, to retain customs which were opposed to those of the whole Christian world. Adamnan succeeded in inducing the North Irish churches to adopt the Roman Easter, but he died before he could persuade his own monastery at Iona to do the same. It yielded, however, about the year 716 (H. and S. ii. 114). The British churches persisted for a few years longer, but at length, between the years 755 and 850, the bishops in Wales gave way one by one (ib. i. 203, 204), following the example of their countrymen amongst the West Saxons, who had yielded to the persuasion of Aldhelm in 705 (ib. i. 674).

(74.) One Tirechanus, writing about the year

750 (H. and S. i. 115, 141, 154), stated that the second order of Irish saints (beginning from the year 544) receive their office of the Mass from David, Gildas, and Cadoc. Dr. O'Connor, in the year 1819 gave some account of a manuscript (then in the library at Stowe, now in the collection of Lord Ashburnham) which contained a missal that must have been in use in Ireland. His account has been supplemented and corrected by Dr. Todd. We are still, unhappily, in great ignorance as to the character of the service contained in the MS. Two things of moment, however, are known. First, that a copy of the Nicene Creed is found in it, omitting the word Filioque. But we are not told whether this is in the office of the Mass or in the scrutiny in preparation for baptism. If the latter, we are reminded of the Gelasian or Gregorian Sacramentary, for the exclusion of the Filioque points to a mark of difference in the Irish church from the churches of Spain and Gaul. We are told, secondly, that there are several collects in this missal before the Epistles, and we know that at a synod of Macon, held about 624, the objection was raised against the famous Columbanus, that he celebrated the solemnities of the Mass with a multiplicity of prayers or collects. Eustatius, who was then abbat of Luxeuil (the convent had been founded by Columbanus), defended the use. Additional confirmation is furnished by the two very interesting books of Mullen and Dimma, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. They are undoubtedly Irish, and although they contain only services for the visitation of the sick, yet these services bear very strong resemblance to each other, and the words, Refecti Christi corpore et sanguine; tibi semper dicamus, Domine, alleluia, alleluia (which are repeated), are found, almost identically, in the words of the Spanish Liturgy, Refecti Christi corpore et sanguine, te laudamus Domine, alleluia, alleluia, alleluia. A post-communion collect commencing Refecti is frequently found in the Gallican and other services, but the jubilant alleluia is connected with it only in the Mozarabic rite. I have not seen in the Spanish books the concluding thanksgiving, Deus tibi gratias agimus, etc.

Mabillon (De Liturg. Gall. lib. i. col. iii. § 2) shews that the Roman order was not introduced into Ireland before the 12th century.

(75.) Mr. Haddan (H. and S. ii. p. 275) considered that the one fragment of Scottish-Celtic liturgical documents, that has as yet seen the light, is contained in the book of Deer;—a portion of the service for the Visitation of the Sick. It resembles closely that contained in the books I have just named, and thus it seems probable that the service was known from Aberdeen to Wexford. We thus connect the early Scottish rites also with those of Spain. It seems that in the 12th century the bishop of Glasgow introduced, with the consent of Pope Alexander III., the Sarum offices into his cathedral, and that his example was followed by other bishops in the next century (H. and S. 275 and 33). As the Sarum missal contains the Gregorian Canon, the inference is that the Scotch use up to that time must, like the Irish, have continued to differ from that adopted in Gaul and England.

(76.) Returning to England, we have only to notice that the Sarum, Bangor, York, and Hereford uses, which continued until the 16th century, all agreed in adopting the text of the Gregorian Canon. We must conclude that that canon had been introduced universally before the end of the 10th century, and thus we have proof that the 13th canon of the council of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) had secured complete obedience, and that "in the celebration of the masses all things were then done after the example which they had in writing from the Roman church." This canon seems to refer only to days kept in memory of events in the life of our Lord, but the spirit of the enactment is manifest. And doubtless when the Welsh bishops finally adopted the Roman Easter, they adopted simultaneously the Gregorian Liturgy. [C. A. S.]

LOAVES, MULTIPLICATION OF. Representations of this miracle are very frequent in early Christian art. Perhaps the most common form of treatment is that given by Bottari (pl. lxxxv.), in which the Lord lays one hand on the loaves and the other on the fishes presented by two disciples, whilst at his feet are the "baskets" containing the "fragments." A sarcophagus in the Vatican, however, presents a noteworthy variation from this type (Id. pl. xix.). Here the loaves are placed in three baskets at the Lord's feet; in His right hand He holds a rod, which He extends over them, whilst He lays His left hand on the fish, presented by a disciple (see woodcut). The principal symbolic use of this subject was doubtless to keep before the minds of the faithful the perpetual supply of the heavenly bread provided in the Eucharist for the nourishment of their souls. Hence we find the second of the two recorded miracles of multiplication is the one usually chosen for representation, as in it the loaves multiplied are supposed to have been of wheat, the "barley loaves" being expressly mentioned on the first occasions. The seven baskets, which are of almost invariable occurrence in these representations, show unmistakably that the second of those miracles is referred to. [Compare MANNA.]

From Bottari (Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus).

The Lord almost always appears with a rod in his hand (Buonarr. Vetri. tav. viiij.) Upon a sarcophagus given by Bottari (iii. p. 201) the Lord holds a rod in one hand, and from the other rays of light appear to stream upon three baskets of loaves. This subject is represented in paintings, in sarcophagi (v. Bosio, passim) and sepulchral slabs (Perret, vol. v. pl. xlvii. 18), on glasses (Buonarr. loc. laud.), and on mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Monim. ii. 98). On a curious sarcophagus in the Vatican the Jews appear to seize the Lord, perhaps to take him by force and make him a king (St. John vi. 15). [C.]

LOAVES, BENEDICTION OF. The procession of the Lite which occurs in the office of Great Vespers [v. art. LITE] returns into the nave of the church while the Aposticha are being sung; and each one puts down his candlestick^a on either side of a table^b, already prepared by the Cellarite (or steward), on which stands a dish with corn and five loaves, such as we are in the habit of offering in church; and on either side of the dish are two vessels (ἄγγεῖα); the one on the left filled with wine, the other on the right with oil. The priest with the deacon stands within the beautiful doors (τῶν ὡραίων πυλῶν)^c. When the Aposticha are finished, Nunc dinittis, the Trisugion, and the Lord's prayer are said; and after certain troparia belonging to the day, and certain ceremonies which are detailed in the rubrics, relating mainly to the censuring of the loaves, the priest takes one loaf in his hand, and says the following prayer in a loud voice:

"O Lord Jesus Christ, our God, who didst bless the five loaves in the desert, and didst feed five thousand men; do Thou bless these loaves also, the corn, the wine, and the oil; and multiply them in this holy monastery [or in the city], and throughout the whole world which is Thine, and sanctify the faithful who partake of them. For Thou art He that blesseth and sanctifieth all things, Christ our God; and to Thee we offer up [ἀνατίθουμεν] glory, with Thine eternal [lit. without beginning] Father, and Thine all Holy and Good and Life-giving Spirit, now and to all ages. Amen."

Then Psalm 33 [34 E. V. Benedicam Domino] is said as far as the words, "Shall want no manner of thing that is good."

And the priest goes from his place, and stands before the Holy doors looking West. And after the end of the psalm he says:

"The blessing of the Lord and His mercy come upon you, by His grace and love for men now and ever and to all ages."

And the dismissal takes place.

A note at the end of the office of vespers adds: "Be it known that the bread which has been blessed is a preservative against all sorts of evils, if it be taken with faith."

The following form of "Blessing bread and distributing it to the poor on the feasts of the Ascension or Pentecost" is from an old Pontifical of Narbonne, and is stated [Martene, iii. 193] to have been used in other churches.

After rubrical directions for the procession, and other ritual observances, the deacon reads the gospel from St. John vi. 1. The officiating priest or bishop (Sacerdos vel Pontifex) begins, and the choir continues the antiphon De quinque panibus, &c.

The Priest. Dispersit dedit pauperibus.

V. Beatus qui intelligit super egenum et pauperem.

R. In die mala liberabit eum Dominus.

V. Numquid panem poterit dare?

R. Aut parare mensam in deserto?

V. Pluit illis manna ad manducandum,

R. Et panem coeli dedit eis

V. Cibavit illos ex adipse frumenti,

R. Et de petra melle saturavit eos.

V. Manducaverunt et saturati sunt,

R. Et desiderium attulit eis.

V. Panem angelorum manducavit homo.

R. Misit eis cibaria in abundantia.

V. Domine exaudi orationem meam.

R. Et clamor meus ad te veniat.

And the form concludes with two collects (the former of which is substantially the same as the Greek prayer already given, in a Latin shape) for blessing the bread, and that it may convey spiritual and bodily health and protection against all diseases to those who partake of it.

LOCALIS ORDINATIO. By ancient custom, no priest, deacon, or other ecclesiastic was permitted to be ordained without having a definite sphere in which to exercise his ministry, or, in the later phrase, without a title to orders. This was termed in the Western Church localis ordinatio, and the clergy, because ordained to the charge of a particular church or monastery, were termed locales. And it was specially forbidden that a clerk should be ordained to two churches, "cauponarum enim est" (Syn. Nic. II. can. 15). The first Council of Arles (A.D. 314) recognises this custom incidentally in its 22nd canon, ordering that priests and deacons who should relinquish the churches to which they were bound by their ordination (in quibus ordinati sunt) should return and officiate there only, and that those who did not obey should be deposed. And the Council of Valencia in Spain (A.D. 524) expressly forbids ordination unless the candidate should have first promised to keep to a single post (se futurum localem) in order that none ordained might be able to transgress ecclesiastical rule and discipline with impunity by removing from one church to another. To the same effect the Oecumenical Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) in its 6th canon, forbidding any to be ordained ἀπολελυμένως, i.e. absolutely and without a title. It annuls ordinations performed in breach of this rule. By the two following canons it declares all clergy residing in monasteries or ^a τὰ μανοῦλῖα. So called because carried in the hand.

^b τετραπόδιον. Called in the parallel rubric in the office for Vespers ἀναλόγιον, which word is explained as pulpitum portabile.

^c It is disputed what is meant by this term. Here it evidently means the doors which separate the body (ναὸς) of the church from the narthex; for the rubric on the procession of the Lite, which starts from the interior of the church, says—διελθόντες διὰ τῶν ὡραίων πυλῶν . . . ἵστανται ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι, whence they are now returning. Dr. Neale, however, holds that these doors are the exterior doors of the narthex. The question appears to be connected with some ambiguity in the use of the term narthex, and probably with some structural variation in different churches. See Ducange, Constantin. Christia and Gloss. Gr. barb. 986; Goar, Euch. pp. 12, 14, &c.; Neale, Intr. pp. 197, &c. [Doors, p. 574.]

serving chapels of the martyrs, to be locales. And we find pope Leo (Ep. 92, ad Rustic. c. i.) instructing his correspondent accordingly that ordination without this designation to a particular place was null, "vana est habenda ordinatio, quae nec loco fundata est, nec auctoritate munita."

The principle in fact was that such ordinations had no mission, and this idea kept in mind will in every instance give the reasons of the rule. It is not to be understood as binding a priest to the same church throughout his life, but it would seem that he was expected to keep as a general rule to the same diocese. He owed obedience to the bishop who ordained him to his first grade, and was bound to go and exercise his ministry whither he was sent by him. The 3rd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) obliged Julian, a bishop, to send back to another bishop, Epigonius, a youth whom the latter had ordained as reader, although Julian had advanced him to the diaconate, and so might seem to have a claim upon him (can. 44). It was not usual for a bishop to promote to a higher grade a clerk ordained by another bishop. This was expressly forbidden by the ninth canon of a synod held at Angers, and by the tenth of another held at Vannes in Brittany. It was the breach of this well-known and understood rule that occasioned the loud complaints made by Demetrius of Alexandria when Origen, who was one of his deacons, was raised to the presbyterate in Palestine by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem. We find Gregory the Great (A.D. 590) writing to the bishop of Syracuse, requesting him to send back to their ordinary certain clerks who had taken refuge with him, having been ordained by another bishop (Epist. iii. 42).

Canonical penalties were imposed for breaches of this rule. The Council of Herda (Lerida, A.D. 524) suspended the bishop so offending from the power to ordain (can. 12). The third of Orleans (538) sequestered him altogether from officiating for six months (can. 6). The civil power appears at some periods to have been called in to relegate wandering clerks to their own diocesan (Conc. Tolet. xiii. A.D. 683, cann. 11, 12). The number of these seems to have been very great throughout the Western Churches. Isidore, writing in A.D. 595, calls them Acephali, and speaks of them as disgracing the church, and hardly deserving the name of clergy at all (Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Offi. lib. ii. c. 3).

The same Gregory wishing to appoint the archdeacon of Catania to the vacant see of Syracuse, formally asked for him a release by the bishop of Catania from this bond of localis (Epist. iv. 30). In like manner the assent of the archbishop of Ravenna was formally applied for before the appointment of Florentius, archdeacon of Ravenna, to the see of Ancona (Epist. xii. 6). Many such instances occur in history. Charlemagne himself presided over a council held at Frankfort in 794, when complaint was made of the wandering habit of a part of the clergy, and sundry prohibitions of this were repeated (Cyp. Frankf.). That neither bishop, presbyter, nor deacon should migrate from city to city, but remain attached to their own church according to rule (can. 7). That bishops should not receive wandering clergy (can. 27). That none should be ordained unattached (absolute) (can. 28).

Nor could they throw off their clerical character in order to escape this bond of localis (Syn. Caesaraugust. can. 6; Conc. Chalced. can. 7; Justinian, Novell. vi. c. 7, de clericis in aliam vitae formam transentibus). But the clerk could not be removed from his church or preferment at the mere will of the bishop (Greg. Mag. Epist. i. 19; iii. 13), though he might be transferred, "non invitus," from one to another (Conc. Carthag. iv. can. 27). The bishop might not in ordinary cases send a clerk into another diocese (Conc. Antioch. can. 22; Can. Apost. c. 35); but he might send him on a mission to the heathen, as e. g. Gregory the Great sent Augustine to the heathen English.

The priest might not travel without the licence and commendatory letters of his bishop under penalty of suspension (Conc. Laodic. A.D. 361, can. 42; also can. 41; and especially Concil. Milev. A.D. 416, can. 20, which is very express and detailed on this point). Similar canons were passed by the second of Seville (A.D. 619, can. 3; Worm. 868, can. 19). In 506 the Council of Agde imposed by its 64th canon the penalty of three years' suspension upon priests for absence from their churches for even three weeks.

The clerk seems not to have been quite helpless before the power of his bishop. The Council of Sardica (A.D. 381) gave permission to a clerk unjustly accused to appeal to neighbouring bishops, and to these a discretion to hear and judge of such a case (can. 17). But it is very cautiously worded, and seems to point rather to the rehabilitation of the clerk in his own diocese, than his admission to another. The thirteenth of Toledo, however, in its 12th canon gives to clerks a distinct right of appeal to the metropolitan and even to the sovereign. And see also a letter of Pope Leo I. (ad Anastas. c. 9), which imposes upon the metropolitan the obligation of compelling such a fugitive to return to his own church. And Conc. Wormat. can. 18.

There were occasional exceptions to this rule of making all clergy locales. Paulinus, bishop of Nola (A. D. 353-431) writes in his first letter to Sulpicius Severus that he was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona upon the express condition that he should not be bound to that church. But his was altogether a special case; that of a man of high rank and large fortune who was induced to take upon him the priesthood by the urgent persuasions of the people. The case of Jerome (A.D. 340-420) again is peculiar. He was ordained a presbyter by Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, having previously stipulated that he should not be obliged to quit his monastic life. He says (Apol. ad Pamm. h. tom. ii. p. 181) that he told Paulinus "si tribus presbyterum ut monachum nobis non auferas, tu videres de iudicio tuo." And from the tone of his description it would seem that like Paulinus of Nola, he too had been solicited to receive ordination. Yet we learn from Epiphanius that it struck him as very unusual and improper that Jerome and another presbyter, Vincentius, lived in retirement, discharging none of the duties of their function; not even celebrating the holy communion; a very remarkable thing at that time. But Jerome, whatever may have been his actual motive, was really in agreement with the principle of the canon of Chalcedon referred to above, which forbade men, ordained as he had been, to exercise their office. Theodore:

(Hist. Relig. c. xiii. 3) records that Flavian, another bishop of Antioch, sent for Macedonius, a famous monk out of the neighbouring desert, and having ordained him a presbyter against his will, allowed him to return.

It is evident that even these exceptions are more apparent than real; that the rule of localis was absolute, and was strictly observed.

It extended also to bishops. No bishop was to be consecrated, except to a particular diocese, and to that he was to confine himself. We find the 1st Council of Nicaea (can. 15) recognising this fact in the plainest manner, and applying it to all the clergy, bishops, priests, or deacons. The above refers to clergy obtaining these removals, so to speak, by fair means: can. 16 of the same council deals with the case of presbyters and deacons breaking the rule of localis altogether lawlessly. Justinian promulgated a law (Novell. lib. iv. c. 2) forbidding bishops to be absent from their dioceses more than a year, except by command of the emperor. The 3rd of Carthage (397) forbids (can. 38) the translation of bishops; and this canon recites the case which formed its occasion, viz. that Cresconius, bishop of Villa Regia, had left his see, and settled himself over that of Tubunae, contrary to the rule. For a bishop might not be transferred from his original see without the approval of a provincial synod (iv. Carth. can. 27, which no doubt embodies an earlier rule).

Yet even here we find some exceptions. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. vi. c. 34) relates that Barses and Eulogius, monks of Edessa, and Lazarus, a monk of Mount Sigoron, were raised to be bishops, not of any diocese, but purely and simply as an honour, οὐ πόλεως τινος, ἀλλὰ τιμῆς ἕνεκεν. These appear, however, to be the only cases expressly recorded of a honorary episcopate, until a much later period. In the 2nd Council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) there were three bishops present who subscribed the acts of the council "non habentes sedes." The Council of Vermeria [Verberie, dioc. Soissons] (A.D. 752) complains of the number of vagrant bishops, and refuses to recognise the ordinations performed by them (can. 14), and three years after (A.D. 755) one at Verneville appealed to such bishops not to ordain in the dioceses of others (can. 13). For the case of the chorepiscopi, or assistant bishops, see CHOREPISCOPUS. Their want of title and jurisdiction in the Western Church was, in the reign of Charlemagne, held to be fatal to their episcopal character, "nam episcopi non erant, q̃. nec ad quantam episcopalem sedem titulati erant, nec canonicè a tribus episcopis ordinati." The whole class were therefore to be recognised as presbyters only, and their ordinations were to be disallowed "pro inanibus vacuisque habitae." [S. J. E.]

LORD (κύριος, δεσπότης, Dominus). On the Old Testament (LXX) usage of these several words, see DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, art. Lord.

I. Dominus, see under that heading in vol. i.
II. Kýrios is a general title of respect, and, when employed in the vocative, exactly like Sir in English (St. John iv. 11, xii. 21).

Δεσπότης is employed sometimes in the same connexion: the use of dominus in later times is exactly similar.

Δεσπότης, κύριος, and dominus are bestowed upon bishops. In a letter from Eusebius of Nicomedia to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, we find him styling his correspondent lord (κύριος). This was probably an excess of adulation. The Prooemium to the acts of the 1st Council of Arles (A.D. 314) speaks of pope Sylvester as "Lord" (Dominus). Similarly the epistle of the synod at Gangra (324) speaks to the bishops of Armenia, as "dominis honorabilibus consacer-dotibus." A letter of the Egyptian bishops to pope Marcus (336) asking for copies of the Nicene canons, is addressed (if we may trust the text) "domino sancto et Apostolici culminis venerando papae. And he, in replying, used a similar formula, "dominis venerabilibus fratribus." So the epistle of the Orientals to pope Julius I. (337).

In and after the time of Constantine we find many examples of this usage. St. John Chrysostom, writing to pope Innocent (A.D. 402-417, Episc. 122, ad Innoc. Episc. Rom.), superscribes his letter "Τῷ δεσπότῃ μου τῷ αἰδεσιμωτάτῳ καὶ θεοφιλεστάτῳ ἐπισκόπῳ . . . Ἰωάννης ἐν Κυρίῳ χαίρειν." In fact henceforward it was applied to men of high rank, both in church and state, "pariterque caeteri principes atque nobiles tum ecclesiae tum reipublicae" (Spelman, Glossar. s. v. "Lord").

But yet the designation "Lord" was not universal in addressing bishops: many letters are found without it: and it is remarkable that St. Jerome, writing to pope Damasus, although he was his superior and patron, calls him merely "beatissimus papa." (The letter is curious, as being written to suggest that the "Gloria Patri" and Alleluia should be added to the psalms when sung; which had not, up to that time, been done at Rome.) Yet in the very next letter we find Stephen, archbishop of Aphricae (? Antiphra in Libya), addressing the same man in a synodical letter, as "lord" (dominus). So also this very Damasus in a letter to the bishops of Bithynia calls them "domini/venerabiles."

The truth seems to be that whenever any one, cleric or layman, addressing a bishop, wished to be particularly respectful, he said "dominus" not otherwise.

By the early part of the 6th century it had become, in some parts of the church, an official style of those in high position, whether ecclesiastical or civil. The early Frank kings both received it themselves and bestowed it upon others. (Epist. Clodov. Reg. Franc. ad Syn. Arel. I.) Compare SUPERScription.

III. Kýrios, Dominus, was especially a title of the emperors, both in earlier and later times, before and after the Christian era. Augustus, indeed, forbade by an edict the addressing of himself as Dominus (Suet. Vit. August. c. 53), probably from a prudent political motive; and Tiberius (Suet. Vit. Neron. c. 27) renewed the prohibition. But afterwards the use of the title became very common; and Domitian caused himself to be styled, not only "Dominus" but "Deus" (Suet. Vit. Domit. c. 13). Tertullian (Apolo. c. 34) praises the moderation of Augustus, and explains in what sense he himself employed the word; "dicam plane imperatorem dominum, sed more communi; sed quando non cogor ut Dominum Dei vice dicam. Ceterum liber sum illi; Dominus enim meus unus est, omnipotens Deus aeternus. . . Qui pater patriae est, quomodo dominus est? Sed et gratius est nomen pietatis quam potestatis: etiam familiae magis patres quam domini vocantur."

Arius and Euzoius, writing to Constantine about A.D. 326, call him "dominus noster." The bishops of the Council of Rimini (A.D. 359) address Constantius as "domine, amabilis Deo Imperator."

IV. Lord (dominus) appears to be sometimes used during this period in the sense of "saint." (Epist. Cabilon. Conc. ad Theod.) [S. J. E.]

V. Liturgical use. The word Kýrios is applied both to the first Person of the Holy Trinity, as in St. James, c. 26 (Daniel, Codex, iv. 105), where God the Creator is invoked as Kýrie ó Θεός; to the second, as in St. James, c. 5, where He is addressed as ó Kýrios καὶ Θεός ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστός; and to the Holy Trinity itself, as in St. James, c. 10, where Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, to whom the hymn is sent up, are addressed as Kýrie ó Θεός ἡμῶν. Δεσπότης is similarly used; in St. James, c. 21, for instance, we find it Δέσποτα ó Θεός ó παντοκράτωρ, ó Πατήρ τοῦ Χριστοῦ σου, where God the Father is addressed; in St. James, c. 3, the Son is addressed as Δέσποτα Kýrie Ἰησοῦ Χριστέ. In Latin, the word Dominus is used as an appellation both of the Father to whom the prayer is addressed, and of the Son through whom it is offered.

In most Western rites the reader, when about to recite a lection, says "Jube, domine, benedicere." It has been doubted whether this is addressed to God or to the priest. It probably, however, as archdeacon Freeman (Divine Service, i. 113) has pointed out, is a request to the priest that he would desire a blessing, and might be rendered, "Sir, desire God to bless us" (compare Leslie's Portiforium Sarab. p. 5, and note, p. lii.). The corresponding Greek form is simply εὐλόγησον δέσποτα, as (e.g.) in the Byzantine liturgy (Daniel, iv. 327, 329, etc.), where the δεσπότης is clearly the priest. It is noteworthy, that in the East the priest responded to the request by blessing God (εὐλόγητος ó Θεός), in the West by blessing himself and the congregation. See on this point the Regula Benedicti Commentata, note on c. 9, in Migne, Patrol. vol. lvi. p. 272. [C.]

LORD'S DAY. (ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα, Dominicus or Dominica dies.) The origin of the name is undoubtedly to be found in the well-known passage (Rev. i. 10), ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ. Even if that passage stood alone, it would be difficult to accept either of the rival interpretations, one of which refers the name to the Sabbath, and the other to the "Day of the Lord." But taking into consideration the remarkable catena of patristic usage which, from Ignatius downwards, establishes the regular and technical use of ἡ κυριακή for the "first day of the week," it is not too much to say that these interpretations may be dismissed as unworthy of serious attention. The same usage, moreover (especially in connection with the history of the Paschal controversy), seems effectually to dispose of a third interpretation, which understands by the τῇ κυριακῇ the annual festival of the Resurrection, or Easter day. (On these points see Dr. Hessey's article "Lord's Day" in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.) We accept, therefore, unhesitatingly the traditional interpretation which sees in this passage of St. John a reference to the weekly Lord's day, as a well-known and established festival in the apostolic church. The more common scriptural designation of that day is the ἡ μία ἢ μία σαββάτος (Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 2; Luke xxiv. 1; John xxi. 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) In one passage, Mark xvi. 9 (the disputed passage at the close of the Gospel), we have πρώτη σαββάτου or σαββάτων. The use of the ἡ κυριακή by St. John marks transition to the common post-apostolic usage. In one well-known passage in the (so-called) Epistle of Barnabas (c. xvi.), for a reason suggested by the context, we find the day, in contrast with the Jewish sabbath, called the ὁγδοὴ ἡμέρα, an expression taken up and amplified into the ὁγδοὴ ἡμέρα ἡ καὶ πρώτη of subsequent Fathers. At a later period, when the hebdomadal division of the time began to prevail in the Roman empire, we find Christian writers designating the day by its heathen name (the ἡ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρα of Justin Martyr). And from the time of the celebrated edict of Constantine, which speaks of the "venerabilis Solis dies," the two names were much interchanged, Christian writers sometimes using (though less frequently than we do) the name "Sunday," and on the other hand the Christian designation making its way into the statute book, as in the edict of Gratian, A.D. 386 ("Solis die, quem Dominicum ritē dixere majores"). [WEEK.]

(I.) Turning from the name to the thing, it seems impossible to doubt that from the earliest existence of the church the Lord's day was observed as the characteristic Christian festival, hallowed as a commemoration of that Resurrection of the Lord, which was the leading subject in the earliest forms of Christian preaching. To this primary consecration of the day was added a second, in the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, which in that year fell on the first day of the week. The passage in the Epistle of Barnabas referred to (διδὼ καὶ ἄγομεν τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν ὁγδοὴν εἰς εὐφροσύνην, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνέστη ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν καὶ φανερωθεὶς ἀνέβη εἰς τοὺς οὐρανούς) seems even to indicate the notion that it was the day of the Ascension also. We may naturally ask, How could a day so hallowed fail of reverent festal observance? We trace indications of such observance, brief indeed, but unmistakable, in Holy Scripture itself (see Dr. Hessey's article or his Bampton Lectures); and these are still further illustrated by the testimony of early writers.

But the undoubted fact of this observance by no means involves the inference often drawn from it, that the keeping of the Lord's day must be traced to an apostolic decree, transferring to it, directly or by implication, the sanctity of the Sabbath, which was familiar to the early Christians, as being themselves Jews, or having been converted under Jewish influence. It is almost needless to say that of such a decree we have no evidence whatever, either in Holy Scripture or in Church History. Now in regard to Holy Scripture, it would, indeed, be most unsafe to allege its silence as conclusive against the existence of such a decree; although that silence must to some degree tell against it, especially when we consider the many references in the Pastoral Epistles to details of church order and practical religious life. But we are not left here to negative evidence. There are positive indications of an absolute freedom of dealing with such subjects, quite incompatible not merely with the existence of a formal apostolic decree, but even with the idea that the observance of the Lord's day had yet attained to the supreme and unique sanctity accorded to it in later ages.

St. Paul's treatment of the general question of the observation of days in Rom. xiv. 5 (ὅς μὲν κρίνει ἡμέραν παρ' ἡμέραν, ὅς δὲ κρίνει πάσαν ἡμέραν ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ νοῦ πληροφορεῖσθω), and his unqualified condemnation of the "observing of days" in Gal. iv. 10—to say nothing of the tone of his celebrated reference to the abolition of the sabbath in Col. ii. 16—appear decisive on this point. Granting that the especial reference of the apostle was in all cases to the Jewish festivals, it is instructive to compare with his sweeping treatment of the subject the apologetic comments on these very passages, made by patristic writers, at a time when the Lord's day and other Christian festivals had established themselves in definite observance. See, for example, St. Jerome's twofold attempt to answer ("simpliciter" and "acutius respondere") the objection, "Dicat aliquis; Si dies observare non licet . . . nos quoque simile crimen incurramus, quartam sabbati observantes et Parasceven et diem Dominicam" (Comm. in Gal. lib. ii. ad c. iv. 10). If we pass from Holy Scripture to the writers of the early church, the fact of utter silence on this subject becomes more and more significant, when we remember their natural anxiety to appeal on all points to apostolic authority, their constant declaration or assumption that all Jewish observances had passed away, and their delight in tracing in these transitory observances types of the higher Christian ordinances, which were not to pass away. Hence we must, indeed, fully agree with those who urge that the celebration of the Lord's day is one of these essential and principal elements of the religious life of the church, which can plead apostolical authority. A priori we should hold it all but impossible that the day should have been neglected among the followers of Him who "was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." From the indications in holy Scripture, which have been so often commented upon, we cannot doubt that it was so regularly hallowed, as to make its observance, both to Christian and heathen, a distinctive mark of Christianity. But the notion that the Lord's day, in that completeness of sacred distinction from all other days which is now universal among all Christians, was formally established by apostolic decree is probably, in relation to historical truth, much what the old legend of the composition of the Apostles' Creed is to the actual process of its formation. In both cases what are chief treasures of our later Christianity grew up by the natural fitness of things and were never formally made. It is obvious that the true view of their genesis detracts nothing from their sacredness, nothing from their claim to be of the essence of the Christian system.

The history of the celebrated Paschal controversy is singularly instructive on this very point. If the Lord's day had been already stamped by definite apostolic decree as the one great Christian festival, deriving its sacredness from the resurrection of the Lord, it would have been impossible for the churches of Palestine and Asia to dream of keeping the annual commemoration of the resurrection itself on any day, except the Lord's day. But the gradual acceptance of the Roman view, disregarding all Jewish associations in consideration of the greater fitness of the Lord's day* is exactly that which we might expect to result from such a process of gradual establishment of the Lord's day, as has been described above.

(II.) It is likely that in this case, as in so many others, the close of the apostolic age was a period of rapid development of formal church ordinance. The existence in A.D. 170 of a regular treatise on the subject by Melito, bishop of Sardis (see Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 26), connected apparently with the Paschal controversy, seems plainly indicative of such a development. The well-known passage of Justin Martyr in his Apology, describes how "on the day called Sunday" there was a religious assembly of those who dwelt either in the cities or in the country. It notes the chief points of an established service—viz. the reading of the Apostles or the Prophets, the sermon, the prayers, the partaking of the bread and wine consecrated by thanksgiving and prayers, and the giving of alms, containing the germ of the clearly ancient liturgies. Nor is it possible to doubt that this celebration had become so marked as to impress the mind of the heathen with the distinctive character of the status dies of Pliny's famous letter to Trajan. In the passage from Dionysius of Corinth (A.D. 175), quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), the keeping of the Lord's day is spoken of as a matter of course (τὴν σήμερον κυριακὴν τὴν ἁγίαν ἡμέραν διηγόμεν), very much as we might speak now. And in the method of its observance (the celebration of the Holy Communion being, of course, excepted) much was probably borrowed from the practice of the synagogue on the sabbath day. But it must not be supposed for a moment that such observance was identified in any degree with sabbatical observance, or based on formal obligation of the fourth commandment. On the contrary, the principle of its observance is exactly that which is indicated in the celebrated passage of Ignatius (ad Magn. ix.), μηκέτι σαββατίζοντες ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν^b ζῶντες, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν ἀνέτειλεν δι' αὐτοῦ. To "sabbatize" is the mark of the Jew; the Christian is to live κατὰ κυριακὴν, i.e. not only in the observance of the Lord's day, but according to the spirit of that day, as something wholly diverse from the conception of the sabbath. The very types of the observance of the Lord's day, often fanciful enough, which were traced in the Old Testament, mark an entire separation in thought from the idea of the sabbath. In the Epistle of Barnabas (c. xvi.) for instance, the sabbath is a type of the millennium after the six thousand years typified in the six days of creation; the Lord's day, as the eighth day, is the beginning of another world (ἄλλου κόσμου ἀρχή).^c Justin Martyr, when he describes the special celebration of public service of the "day called Sunday" derives its sacredness, first, from its being the first day on which God, dispelling darkness and chaos, made the world, next, from the resurrection on it of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is in his Apology, addressed to the heathen (Apol. i. 67). Where he argues with the Jews, he actually makes the eighth day of the circumcision a type of our receiving the true circumcision of the heart through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead on the first day of the week, which after the completion of the cycle of the days is the eighth day, though it is still the first (Dial. with Trypho, sect. 19).^d This conception, fanciful as it is, is taken up more than once by later writers. Thus St. Augustine asks of circumcision, "Quare ergo octavo die? Quia in hebdomadibus idem primus qui octavus . . . Finitur septimus, Dominus sepultus: reditur ad primum, Dominus resuscitatus. Domini enim resuscitatio promisit nobis aeternum diem, et consecravit nobis Dominicum diem" (Serm. de Script. clxix. 1170 c). Hence our Lord Himself, as being the rest of the just, giving them a σαββατισμὸς in the millennial kingdom, is occasionally called the Great Sabbath, of which the "little sabbath" of the Jews is but a type. The idea is perhaps suggested by Col. ii. 10, where the sabbath and the other Jewish festivals are "the shadow of things to come, but the body" (or substance) "is of Christ." And His rest in the tomb marked what was technically known as the Μέγα σάββατον, the last of the ancient sabbaths; His rising from the dead on the Lord's day began the new Christian era. The notion afterwards embodied in the title of the "Christian sabbath"—that the Lord's day is a spiritualized sabbath, to which the obligation of the fourth commandment is transferred, perhaps a revival of a patriarchal sabbath of all mankind, which had been for a time overborne by the rigid legalism of the Mosaic sabbath—has no locus standi whatever either in Scripture or in primitive antiquity.

But it should be noticed that the development of the Lord's day in relation to the sabbath would naturally differ considerably in Jewish and Gentile Christianity. To the Jewish Christians, in the earliest stages of the history of the church, the sabbath and the sabbatical rest would remain unaltered. Just as they united the "being with one accord in the temple" with the "breaking of the bread at home," so the cele-

* In the treatise of Bede, de Aquinotio Vernali, there is a curious account of a council of Caesarea, held under Theophilus, on the Paschal controversy. In the course of it (see Labbe, Councils, i. 714) the bishops are represented as declaring the Benedictions of the Lord's day. (a) Because on it the light was created. (b) Because on it the people passed to freedom through the Red Sea. (c) Because on it the manna was given. (d) Because Moses (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 7, 8) commanded to keep "the first and the last day" (hoc est dominicus et sabbatum). (e) Because in Ps. cxviii. the words are spoken of it: "This is the day, which the Lord hath made." (f) Because the Lord on it rose from the dead. The historical value of the account is of course more than questionable. But the light which it throws on the traditional ideas of the Lord's day is very interesting.

^b The ζῶντες found here in the ordinary text is probably to be omitted, as in the Latin. If it be read it must be taken with ζῶντες.

^c Compare St. Aug. Serm. de Tempore, cclix. 2 (vol. v. p. 1548 A Ben. ed. 1838): "Octavus dies in fine saeculi novam vitam significat: septimus quietem futuram sanctorum in hac terrâ." The sermon was preached on the first Sunday after Easter (the octave), and begins—"Hodiernus dies magno sacramento perpetuae felicitatis est nobis."

^d Even in the eight saved in the ark for a new world he finds a type of the eighth day, on which Christ, the head of a new humanity, arose from the dead. (Dial. with Trypho, c. 138.)

bration of the new Lord's day would present itself to them as something co-existing with the sabbath, incapable of being confounded with it.* The idea of Christian worship would attach mainly to the one; the obligation of rest would continue attached to the other; although a certain interchange of characteristics would grow up, as worship necessitated rest, and rest naturally suggested worship. Under these circumstances the two days would be regarded as festivals, perhaps at first almost co-ordinate; afterwards the dignity of the Lord's day must have continually increased, and that of the sabbath as continually decreased. Even after Jewish Christianity, as such, had passed away, the effect of this original attitude of mind might easily remain. To it may probably be traced the well-known continuance of the sabbath as a festival in the Eastern church (with the sole exception of the great sabbath of Easter Eve). Even the tradition that Marcion kept the sabbath as a fast, because it was the festival of the God of the Jews, to whom he refused all homage, perhaps illustrates, by its spirit of antagonism, the connexion of the festal observation of the sabbath with the old Jewish influence upon the church. The quasi co-ordination of the Lord's day with the sabbath in the 'Apostolical Constitutions' brings it out in its most striking form. [On this subject see SABBATH.] But it concerns our present purpose chiefly to remark that this preservation of the ancient sabbath in the church must have acted as a constant witness against any tendency to "sabbatize" the Lord's day.

Among purely Gentile Christians it would be far otherwise. To them, except for its sacred historic associations, the sabbath would have no existence. The attempt to "exercise dominion over them in respect of the sabbath day" was one of the Judaizing usurpations which St. Paul bade them repel. Hence to them the Lord's day would be the one sole weekly festival. The sabbath appeared simply as the eve of the Lord's day; even for that reason it might naturally be kept as a fast, according to the general though not universal custom of the Western church; and, wherever strong anti-Judaic feeling developed itself, it would incline men to adopt the same practice out of sheer antagonism. But for this very reason, paradoxical as the statement may seem, the tendency to sabbatize the Lord's day would be far stronger than under the other condition of things. The study of the Old Testament, and especially the recognition of the decalogue as the code of divine morality, must have suggested that the weekly celebration of a hallowed day of rest was a moral duty, concerning all mankind as such, to be regarded, indeed, as a privilege, but yet, if necessary, to be enforced on the disobedient as a law. Where could such a day be found but in the Lord's day? Round that day would gather naturally and insensibly all the ideas which once attached to the sabbath. It would be felt that such a transference of idea could only take place mutatis mutandis. Such distinctions would be made between the characteristic principles of Jewish and Christian observance as we find in St. Jerome on Gal. iv. 10, asserting the greater elasticity and spirituality of the Christian system. But these would not prevent a certain tendency to sabbatize the day, from which the very preservation of the ancient sabbath would guard the churches, in which Jewish influence had been strong.

In this process of development the difference in character and tone between Eastern and Western Christianity is remarkably shewn. The Greek mind, as represented by the Alexandrian school, inclined more to theoretical principle; the Latin mind, as in the school of Carthage, to practical rule. Clement of Alexandria, for instance, urges that to the true Gnostic every day is a holy day, and when he alludes to the Lord's day he deals with its observance (just as with the fasts of the Wednesday and Friday) transcendently (Κυριακὴν ἐκέλην τὴν ἡμέραν ποιεῖ, ὅταν ἀποβάλλῃ φαῦλον νύημα καὶ γνωστικὸν προσλάβῃ, τὴν ἐν αὐτῷ τοῦ Κυρίου ἀνάστασιν δοξάζων, Strom. vii. 12). At the same time his implicit opposition of the Lord's day to the sabbath, as of the positive to the negative, is notable, as unconsciously preparing for the "spiritual sabbath" of the future. He speaks of the seventh day as being a rest only in the sense of an abstinence from evil, but it is said to introduce the first day, which is our "real rest," and the true birthday of light (ἐβδόμη τοίνυν ἡμέρα ἀνάπαυσις κηρύττεται ἀποχὴ κακῶν, ἐτοιμάζουσα τὴν ἀρχίγονον ἡμέραν τὴν τῷ ὄντι ἀνάπαυσιν ἡμῶν τὴν διὰ καὶ πρῶτην τῷ ὄντι φωτὸς γένεσιν, Strom. vi. 16). His idea is to contrast the whole of the lower system of the law with the higher light of the gospel. But the passage, as it seems to suggest the representation of the one by the sabbath, and the other by the Lord's day, might lead naturally to the conception of some substitution of the one day for the other. Exactly in the same spirit Origen, in defending the Christians against Celsus, quotes the dictum: ἐορτὴ οὐδὲν ἔστιν ἢ τὰ δέοντα πράττειν, and urges that the true Christian is always keeping Lord's days; and referring to Gal. iv. 10, apologises (much as St. Jerome does) for the setting apart of the "Lord's days and the Fridays, Easter and the Pentecost," as a necessary discipline for the less perfect. But he, like Clement, contrasts the Lord's day with the sabbath, as superior to it in nature, when in mystical commentary on Exod. xvi. 4, 5, he finds a foreshadowing of its superiority, in the gift on that day of the manna withheld on the sabbath. He makes the manna symbolic of the bread of heaven, the Word of God, unceasingly showered down on the Lord's day, and interprets "in the evening ye shall know that I am the Lord," of the rolling away of the stone and the earthquake at the close of the great sabbath on the eve of the first Lord's day (see vol. ii. p. 154. Bened. ed. 1733). And again, on John i. 6, in a curious mystical interpretation of the names of Zacharias, Elizabeth, and John, he describes the end of the old dispensation as the σαββατισμοῦ κορωνίς, and declares that from it we cannot derive τὴν μετὰ τὸ σάββατον ἀνάπαυσιν, the gift of which is connected with conformity, as to the death, so to the resurrection of Christ (see vol. iv. p. 86). Even in these writers we see a spiritual gravitation towards a virtual substitution of the Lord's day for the sabbath, not prevented by the assertion of the same superiority over it which the gospel manifests over the law. If we turn to Tertullian, the same conception of substitution presents itself in a more concrete form. He is anti-Judaic enough; the sabbaths and all the ceremonials of the law are, in his eyes, absolutely gone; they were but preparatory, and cannot continue when their function is completed. But in pleading against frequenting idolatrous festivals he makes the keeping of the Lord's day and the Pentecost the badge of Christianity, contrasting them with the heathen festivals on one side, and the sabbaths and "feriae aliquando a Deo dilectae" on the other. In speaking of the habit of standing in prayer on the Lord's day, he urges that on that day we should cast off all worldly anxieties, "differentes etiam negotia ne quem diabolus locum demus" (de Oratione, c. 23). The rest enjoined is, no doubt, simply a means, not an end; but it is notable as the first direct recognition of a sacred rest, as inseparable from the idea of the Lord's day. In a time like Tertullian's, when the church system was fully, even rigidly, organised, it is not difficult to trace here a preparation for some sabbatarianism hereafter.

In fact, two lines of thought must have co-existed in the church. On the one side there was the conviction, not only that the Jewish sabbath had passed away, but that the spirit of strict legal observance, especially in any negative aspect, was foreign to the whole spirit of the gospel. On the other side, there was the tendency to more regular and formal Christian observance, gathering naturally round the recurring weekly festival of the resurrection; and allied with this, the perception of the value of an ordinance of weekly rest, such as that ordained in the fourth commandment, to man as man. From this, by a natural transition, would grow up the disposition to set up the Lord's day, first for religious worship and then for rest, in some rivalry to the ancient sabbath, as being, indeed, superior in dignity and spirituality, but yet a supreme and unique festival, to be observed with equal strictness. These last lines of thought might enter sometimes into alliance, sometimes into conflict. Each would in turn emerge into prominence, and the conception of the Lord's day would fluctuate accordingly.

(III.) But with the beginning of the conversion of the empire a crisis came. The most important epoch in the history of the Lord's day is marked by the issue of the celebrated edict of Constantine: "Omnes iudices urbanaeque plebes et cunctarum artium officia venerabili die Solis quiescant. Ruri tamen positi agrorum culturae liberè licenterque inserviant, quoniam frequenter evenit ut non aptius alio die frumenta sulcis aut vineae scribibus mandentur, ne occasione momenti pereat commoditas coelesti provisione concessa" (see Cod. Just. book iii. tit. 12, 3). This edict was clearly intended to pay honour to the great Christian festival, although, in accordance with Constantine's general policy, it declined to identify the emperor with the religion, which he desired only indirectly to support, and only gradually to establish. The use of the heathen name of the "solis dies," with the vague title "venerabilis"—a title rendered the more ambiguous by the known reverence which Constantine had delighted to pay to the Sun-god—was probably something more than conventional. But the effect of the edict, at a time when Christianity was rising as rapidly as heathenism was sinking into decay, must undoubtedly have told mainly on the Christian festival. It would invest the observation of the Lord's day with all the strength (and the weakness) which the sanction of civil law to religious observance must necessarily produce. But more particularly by the prominence given to the idea of rest from ordinary work, which was emphasised all the more by the exemption granted to agricultural labour on the plea of necessity, it introduced a new conception of the day itself. The advocates of the sabbatarian view in later times were not wholly wrong when they compared Constantine to Moses, on the ground that he instituted a kind of new sabbath in the Christian church. For whatever tendency there was already existing to sabbatize the Lord's day would be enormously increased by this interference of the temporal power. The idea of rest would become primary instead of subsidiary; the observance would have more of the law, less of the spirit.

The tendency towards sabbatarianism was evidently slow, for it had the old and well-established conception of the day to overcome. But, although slow, it appears to have been sure.

The edict itself was only the beginning of a long series of imperial laws, constantly increasing in stringency and in unambiguous connexion of the solis dies with Christianity. Eusebius (de Vit. Const. iv. 18, 19, 20) declares that Constantine himself went much farther in this course, as his adhesion to Christianity became more decided. He speaks of two edicts to the army, enjoining rest from arms on that day and celebration of religious worship, by the Christians in the church service, by the pagans in the fields, offering to the supreme Deity a prayer authorised by the emperor. This prayer he quotes. It is a prayer in which nothing occurs distinctively Christian, but which is essentially monotheistic and entirely unconnected with the pagan mythology. In speaking of the ordinance for the Christians, Eusebius calls the day the Σωτήριος ἡμέρα ἣν καὶ φωτὸς εἶναι καὶ ἡλίον ἐπ' αὐτὸν συμβαίνει: in reference to the heathen, simply ἡ τοῦ φωτὸς ἡμέρα. He then adds, διὰ τοῖς ὑπὸ τὴν Ῥωμαίων ἀρχὴν πολιτευομένοις ἅπασιν σχολὴν ἔχειν ταῖς ἐπωνύμοις τοῦ Σωτήριος ἡμέραις ἐννοῦθεται. ὁμοίως δὲ τὴν πρὸ τοῦ σαββάτου ἑταίμην μνήμης ἐνεκεν μοι δοκεῖν τῶν ἐν ταύταις τῇ κοινῇ Σωτηρίᾳ πεπράχθαι μνημονευμένων. This passage extends the statement to the civil population, and adds the celebration of the Friday to that of the Sunday. It is true that these edicts of Constantine are not found in the codes, and that Eusebius is anxious to make the most of the Christianity of the subject of his panegyric. But it is incredible that he should have been either misinformed or insincere in the main substance of his statements; and it would have been quite accordant with Constantine's temporising policy to issue such commands, as special edicts, not to be enrolled among formal laws. However this may be, under Constantine's successors there were reiterated enactments in this direction, free from the ambiguity of the original law.

^f In another law of Constantine, A.D. 321, there is a recognition of the fitness of certain exceptional legal operations for this day: "gratum et iucundum est, eo die quae sunt maxime votiva compleri, atque ideo emancipandi et manumittendi die festo cuncto licentiam habeant" (Cod. Theod. II. tit viii. 1). This appears to have been borrowed from older practice as to heathen festivals. But it is not improbable that in this case there was a special reference to the characteristic idea of the Lord's day, as the day of the completion of our redemption.

^g This is an emendation for τὰς τοῦ σαββάτου, evidently necessary. There is a passage in Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. i. c. 8) which forms an excellent elucidation of this, especially of the last clause, in the words ἔτιμα δὲ τὴν Κυριακὴν, ὡς ἐν ταύτῃ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἀναστάντος ἐκ νεκρῶν τὴν δὲ ἐτέραν, ὡς ἐν αὐτῇ σταυρωθέντος.

Thus we have two laws prohibiting exaction of debt on that day, one under Valentinian and Valens (A.D. 368), protecting Christians against being forced into litigation on that day, the "dies solis, qui dudum faustus habetur" (Cod. Theod. VIII. tit. viii. 1); the other under Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius (A.D. 386), extending this immunity to all, calling the day plainly the "dies solis quem Dominicus ritè dixere majores," and branding any infringer of the law as "non modo notabilis, verum etiam sacrilegus" (Cod. Theod. VIII. tit. viii. 2). The progress marked by the contrast of these two laws is significant. The former, recognising the Christians as a sect, is exactly of the same nature as a law of Honorius and Theodosius in 409, protecting the Jews from being forced to work or litigation on the sabbath or other of their sacred days (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 3). The latter accepts Christianity as the religion of the empire, and enforces on all by law the sacredness of its chief festival.

Again, the celebration of the day was gradually separated by law from all heathen and even secular associations. In 389, under Theodosius, the "solis dies" and the "Sancti Paschae dies" (the weeks before and after Easter) are included with the harvest and vintage seasons, the Kalends of January, and the days of the foundation of Rome and Constantinople, as forensic holidays (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 2). In 386 it was ordered that no one should present to the people any spectacle on the "dies solis," "ne divinam venerationem confectâ solemnitate confundat" (Cod. Theod. XV. tit. v. 2). In 425, under Theodosius the younger, we find a law enacting an entire abstinence from all amusements of the theatre or the circus, on the "Dies Dominicus," Christmas day, Epiphany, Easter, and the Pentecost, in order that the whole minds of Christians may be devoted to worship of God. It denounces any infringement of the law by "the infatuated impiety of the Jews or the stolid error and madness of heathenism," and orders the celebration even of the emperor's birthday to be set aside for the sake of the Christian holy day (Cod. Theod. XV. tit. v. 5). The same law is reiterated in even stronger terms under Leo and Anthemius (A.D. 469), in reference to the Lord's day, which is to be kept absolutely sacred, not only from business, but also from "obscene pleasures" of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre (Cod. Just. lib. iii. tit. xii. 11). Nor should we pass over a remarkable law of Honorius and Theodosius (A.D.

409), which expressly orders that on the Lord's day the judges shall have prisoners brought before them, to inquire whether they have been treated humanely, to see that food is given to the destitute, and that the prisoners be allowed, under guard, to go to the bath. The bishops were to put the judges in mind of this duty (Cod. Just. i. tit. iv. 9). It may be noted that at a later period (A.D. 529) under Justinian, the bishops were ordered to visit the prisoners on Wednesdays or Fridays (the Lord's day being probably thought to be too much occupied), to inquire into the cases of the prisoners, and to see whether any neglect of duty on the part of the magistrates had taken place (Cod. Just. tit. iv. 22). But the fifth council of Orleans, twenty years later (A.D. 549), orders the arch-deacon or provost (praepositus ecclesiae) to make the visitation on the Lord's day itself, with a view to the relief of necessitous prisoners (see Labbe, Councils, vol. ix. p. 134). It should be observed that these laws recognise the positive duty of works of charity on the Lord's day, precisely as He Himself had recognised it on the sabbath.

This long series of temporal enactments (in considering which we have, for the sake of exhibiting them as a whole, anticipated chronological order) must have told very powerfully upon the conception of the Lord's day in the church itself, not only tending to formalize its celebration, but to invest it in great degree with the character of a sabbath. Still, however, there was no connexion of its observance with the obligation of the fourth commandment, and therefore no application to it either of the laws of the Jewish sabbath, or of our Lord's teaching on the subject, as modifying and spiritualizing these laws.

But when the legal enforcement of rest on the Lord's day was once established, the next step would not unnaturally follow. In fact, the conception of it, as formally sanctioned by a divine law, would recommend itself to different schools of thought. It would be a refuge to any who scrupled to accept in respect of Christian festivals the authority of a merely temporal power, not yet absolutely identified with Christianity. It would appear to earnest-minded men as a short and ready way of maintaining a high spirituality of tone, in the face of the conventional and insincere observance to which the imperial interference would probably give rise. It would afford to the courtly satellites of the emperor an opportunity of flattering his desire of being "a bishop as to things and men without," by representing him as being the restorer of a half-forgotten divine law. From various causes it would make its way; and, if once admitted, its simplicity and cogency would help it to supersede other pleas for the sacredness of the day.

(IV.) This effect is not at first visible in the great leaders of ecclesiastical opinion and faith. In them we find the same general line of thought which has already been described. It will be sufficient to quote a few leading examples from the East and West. St. Athanasius delights to trace signs of honour done prophetically to the Lord's day, the resurrection day of the Lord (ἀναστάσιμος ἡμέρα), as in the title of the sixth Psalm, "Upon the eighth" (which, however, seems to have no reference to the eighth day at all) or in the celebrated passage of Ps. cxviii. 24, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," which he connects with the "stone male the head of the corner" (see v. 22). In the treatise "de Sabbato et Circumcisione" (which is ascribed to him, and questioned by the Benedictine editors somewhat hesitatingly), there is a curious passage, comparing the sabbath and the Lord's day. His idea is that the first creation had its end, and therefore its sabbatical rest; the second or new creation has no end, and "therefore God rested not in it, but worketh hitherto" (ἔως ἄρτι ἐργάζεται), referring, of course, to John iv. 17. Accordingly (he says) "we keep no sabbath day (οὐδὲ σαββαρίζομεν ἡμέραν), but we look forward to the sabbath of sabbaths" in heaven, which "the new creation does not accept as its end, but its manifestation and perpetual festival." But he adds, "as God commanded men formerly to keep the sabbath day as a memorial of the end of the older dispensation, so we keep the Lord's day as a memorial of the beginning of the second new creation" (οὕτως τὴν Κυριακὴν τιμῶμεν μνήμην οὐσαν ἀρχῆς δευτέρας ἀνακτίσεως). (See vol. iii. pp. 42, 43, 44, Bened. ed.) On the subject of circumcision, he repeats the old symbolism of the eighth day, as signifying the Lord's day; and adds significantly, ἡ ὀγδόη τὸ σάββατον ἔλυσεν καὶ οὐ τὸ σάββατον τὴν ὀγδόην. But though in all this there is some suggestion of future ideas, there is still no view of the Lord's day as a sabbath. The passage in the Homily de Semente (falsely ascribed to him), in which we find the words, "The Lord changed the sabbath day into the Lord's day" (μετέθηκε δὲ ὁ Κύριος τὴν τοῦ σαββάτου ἡμέραν εἰς Κυριακὴν) speaks obviously in this the language of later times; and is as absolutely at variance with the tone of his teaching on this subject as with his general style and line of thought.

This same idea is still more fully and strikingly worked out by Epiphanius. He calls the sabbath of the Jews the "little sabbath," and, referring to the disciples' supposed breach of the sabbath in the corn-fields, he says that it signified the relaxation of the bond of this little sabbath, because "Christ, the great Sabbath was come," of whom Noah was a type and Lamech's words (Gen. v. 29) a prophecy; who is the great sabbath, first, because He gives us rest from our sins, and next, because the Father and the Holy Spirit have rested in Him (ἀναπαύονται ἐν αὐτῷ), and in Him all saints found rest" (adv. Haer. lib. i. tom. ii. p. 32). He refers, indeed, to the Lord's day, as of apostolic celebration, but in this he joins with it the Wednesday and Friday (adv. Haer. lib. i. tom. ii. pp. 23, 24); and mentions the occasional festal observation of the sabbath, and Marcion's deliberate protest against this by keeping it as a fast. From him alone we should hardly gather even what we know to have been true of the gradual emergence of the Lord's day into an unique observance, both as to worship and as to rest.

In connexion with this period it may be well to glance at the remarkable treatment of this subject in the "Apostolical Constitutions" which [see APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS] must be referred to about the fourth and fifth centuries. These exemplify in the clearest way the statement above made, that the preservation of the observance of the old sabbath tended to give clearness and certainty to the true idea of the Lord's day. In Book ii. c. 59, 2, we find the sabbath and "the day of the resurrection, the Lord's day" joined in an exhortation to special religious assemblies, which, however, goes on to dwell especially on the Lord's day, as that to which "the reading of the prophets, and the proclamation of the gospel, and the offering of sacrifice and the gift of spiritual food" peculiarly belong. In Book v. c. 18, 19, we have a vivid description of the fast of the "Great Sabbath," "when the bridegroom was taken away," and of the vigil of the Easter day, ending in the "offering of the sacrifice." Otherwise the general command is to keep both the sabbath and the Lord's day as feasts, the one in memory of the work of the Creator, the other of the resurrection (see Book vii. c. 23, 2). In a prayer of thanksgiving given in Book vii. c. 36, there is a remarkable passage on the sabbath and the Lord's day, which tells how the "sabbath is the rest from creation, the completion of the world, the seeking of God's laws, the praise of thanksgiving to God for all that He has given us. But rising above all these ideas, the Lord's day manifests to us the Mediator Himself, the guardian and lawgiver of men, the source of resurrection, the firstborn before all creation, God the Word, man born of the Virgin Mary, . . . who died and rose again; and so commands us to offer to God the highest of all thanksgiving." In Book viii. 33, 1, we find a command given in the names of St. Peter and St. Paul, "Let servants work five days, on the sabbath and the Lord's day let them rest, with a view to instruction in godliness in the church." This command introduces a series of commands to rest on holy days. It is notable, as looking like an apostolic extension of the enactment of the fourth commandment. But when the decalogue is expounded, we find that commandment explained thus, "Thou shalt keep a sabbath, on account of Him who ceased from creation but not from providence, a sabbath not of idleness of hands, but of meditation on his laws" (ii. 361). There is no idea of its transference for a Christian to the observance of the Lord's day.

In St. Chrysostom there is perhaps the first indication of the idea that the sabbath was so far of perpetual obligation, that the one day in seven should always be set apart. In his 10th Homily on Genesis, c. 1, we find him declaring that "God from the beginning teaches us figuratively, instructing us to set aside one day (or 'the first day') in the cycle of the week, and to devote it to work in spiritual things; for it was for this reason that God hallowed the seventh day" (ἥδη ἐντεθέν ἐκ προοιμίων αἰνιγματώδως διδασκαλίαν ἡμῖν ὁ Θεὸς παρέχεται, παιδεύων τὴν μίαν ἡμέραν ἐν τῷ κύκλῳ τῆς ἑβδομάδος ἅπασαν ἀνατιθέναι καὶ ἀφορίζειν τῇ τῶν πνευματικῶν ἐργασίᾳ, διὰ γὰρ τοῦτο ὁ θεσπότης, κ.τ.λ.) (See Bened. ed. vol. iv. p. 80.) This treatment, however, of the subject is but slightly indicated, and it exists side by side with teaching of a more ancient type. Thus the sabbath is to him also the type of eternal rest in heaven (Comm. on Heb. iii. 8, vol. xii. p. 63). In his 39th Homily on St. Matthew, he speaks of the formal sabbath as a condescension to the hardness of the hearts of the Jews, and urges that we should always keep festival by abstaining from evil, and "be idle with a spiritual idleness" (ἀργῶμεν ἀργίαν πνευματικὴν), by keeping our hands from recklessness (vol. vii. p. 435). Still it is significant; it appears to indicate a transition towards the later idea of connecting the fourth commandment directly with the observance of the Lord's day. The circumstances of his time, and the evils with which he had to grapple, may have suggested this short and easy way of maintaining the sanctity of the great Christian festival.

We turn to the West, and take as specimens of church opinion, the three whom Milman has called the great organizers of Latin Christianity.

St. Ambrose (on Ps. xlii.) holds, like St. Athanasius, that the Lord's day is "the day which the Lord hath made," of Ps. cxviii.; of all the days on which God works mighty works, it has the leadership (prærogativa), because illuminated by the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. In his commentary on Ps. xlviii. we observe a marked instance of the tendency to supersede the sabbath by the Lord's day. The Psalm is to be sung "Secundâ Sabbati." What (he asks) is this but "the Lord's day, which followed the sabbath?" He clearly means that it followed it in old times, not only in order, but in dignity; for he goes on to speak of the "eighth day, at once the eighth and the first," as "sanctified by the resurrection," and now accordingly having "ex numeri ordine prærogativam, et ex Resurrectione Domini Sanctitatem." He actually interprets the σάββατον δευτερόπρωτον as signifying that "the sabbath, which was once first, now begins to be but the second after the first;" and lastly, he uses the phrase "Prima requies cessavit, secunda successit," connecting with this the declaration of the "sabbath keeping for the people of God" (in Heb. iv. 8, 9). Similarly commenting on the passage "Vespere Sabbati, quæ lucescit in primam Sabbati," he remarks, "Before the resurrection the Evangelist spoke of the sabbath; after the resurrection he called it the first day of the week." It is true that he speaks of the "rest in Christ" as the true and "great sabbath," in the same sense as Epiphanius (de Obitu Theod., vol. ii. 1206 B, Bened. ed. 1690). But, while he would have doubtless repudiated the idea that the Lord's day was the "Christian sabbath," his words certainly prepare for it.

St. Jerome's treatment of the subject is markedly characteristic. He (adv. Jovin. ii. 25) deals with the six days of work as representing this life, the seventh the "true and eternal sabbath," in which we shall be free. In the passage already referred to (in Galat. lib. II. vol. vii. p. 456, Bened. ed.) he lays it down that, strictly speaking, all days are equal to a Christian, "nec per Parasceven tantum crucifigi Christum et die Dominicâ resurgere, sed semper sanctam resurrectionis esse diem et semper eum carne vesci Dominica," and he goes on to contrast the strict limitation of the Jews to certain days with the freedom of the Christian to fast, to pray, to celebrate a Lord's day by receiving the Body of the Lord, at all times. On Ezek. xx. 10, 11, he has a curious passage, declaring the sabbath and circumcision to have been given as signs, "ut sciamus nos perfecto et aeterno sabbato requiescendum a sæculi operibus." "Unde in sex diebus operantes septimo die requiescimus, ut nihil aliud die ac nocte faciamus, nisi omne quod vivimus, debere Domino noverimus, et redeunte hebdomade totos nos nomini ejus consecremus." While he bears constant testimony to the solemn observation of the Lord's day by religious worship, it is truly remarked by Dr. Hessey (Bampton Lectures, Lect. III.) that he describes the Egyptian coenobitæ, as after church making garments for themselves or others, and tells the story of his visits to the tombs of the apostles and martyrs, not as religious ceremonies, but as seemingly recreations. Throughout, both as to theory and practice, his view of the Lord's day is highly spiritual, with no tendency whatever to legal or sabbatical observance.

The same remark applies to the teaching of St. Augustine, who constantly refers to the question of the sabbath, and not unfrequently to the Lord's day. He expresses himself with singular clearness against any continuance of sabbatical obligation. In his De Genesi ad Litteram (Book iv., Opp. vol. iii. 208) he expressly says that in the time of full revelation of grace, that method of observance of the sabbath, which was symbolized by the rest of a single day, was taken away from the observance of the faithful (observatio illa sabbati, quæ unius diei vacatione figurabatur, ablata est observatione fidelium). Similarly in his Epistle to Januarius (Ep. lv. vol. ii. 203) he expressly distinguishes the fourth (or, as he calls it, the third commandment, connecting it mystically with the third Person of the Holy Trinity), as one to be observed figuratively, from all the others, which are to be observed literally. In both passages he urges on the faithful a perpetual sabbath, partly of rest from the "old works," partly of working whatever good they work with a view to the eternal sabbath of heaven. The Lord's day (he adds) was declared not to the Jews but to the Christians by the resurrection of the Lord, and from that time only began to have its festal character. There was indeed a mystical signification of the eighth day (octavi Sacramentum) under the law, which he traces fancifully enough, but it was reserved and concealed, and the sabbath alone given for celebration. Exactly in the same way he declares against the Manicheans (contra Adimantum, sect. 2, 16, and contra Faustum, book vi. vol. viii. 209, 240, 343), that the literal or carnal observance of the sabbath is abolished, while its spiritual significance remains, in the acceptance of the invitation, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." His principle is formally enunciated thus, "Apostolicam interpretationem spiritualiter teneo; Carnalem Servitutis observationem libertate contemno." In his treatise de Spiritu et Littera, sect. xiv. (vol. x. 328) he takes it so absolutely for granted that the observance of the sabbath according to the letter is carnal, that he thinks it necessary to plead that the principle, "the letter killeth," applies not only to the fourth commandment, but to the other nine. The sabbath day, he says elsewhere (on Ps. cl. vol. iv. 2411), signifies rest, the Lord's day, resurrection. The two ideas are in his view contrasted, as the old and new covenants are contrasted. Such is his genuine teaching. There is, indeed, a passage in one of the Homilies de Tempore (Hom. 251), attributed to him, but unhesitatingly rejected by the Benedictine editors, and assigned by them to the 9th century, in which he is made to say that "the doctors of the church decreed to transfer all the glory of the Jewish sabbath-keeping to the Lord's day, so that what they celebrated in figure, we might celebrate in reality" (see vol. v. p. 3101). But this is in direct opposition to St. Augustine's general teaching; it clearly breathes the spirit of a later time, and shews traces of a well-known passage of Alcuin.

(V.) In these leading representatives of Christian thought, we find, therefore, not only a preservation of the older and truer ideas, but, generally speaking, a care (possibly prophetic) to enforce the spirituality of the Lord's day more carefully than ever. It is rather in the enactments of councils, embodying the common opinion of the church at large, that we trace the changes of conception which have been described above.

The great Council of Nicaea, taking the Lord's day and its observance for granted, merely directs that on the Lord's day and within the Pentecost, all shall pray standing (Canon 20). Subsequent councils, however, of the 4th, 5th and 6th centuries legislate frequently on the subject.

The first class of enactments is directed to the enforcement of ritual and devotional observances. Thus absence from the church on their Lord's days is made a ground for excommunication; fasting on the Lord's day is denounced as savouring of Manicheism; the refusal to join the prayers and receive the Holy Eucharist, and the practice of leaving the church during preaching, are censured and punished; all frequenting of the games or the circus on the Lord's day is strictly forbidden (see Hessey's Bampton Lectures, Lect. III.). These enactments have no special significance as to the conception of the day. They simply take for granted its religious celebration after the primitive fashion; their existence only indicates that this celebration was becoming more and more a matter of legal regulation and enforcement.

There is, however, another class of enactments intended to secure and guard a quasi-sabbatical rest. To this the well-known canon of Laodicea (A.D. 363) seems certainly to belong. (See Labbe, Concilia, vol. ii. pp. 564, 565.) It declares that Christians "are not to Judaize and rest on the sabbath day, but to work on that day, and preferring the Lord's day in honour, on it, if possible, to rest as Christians (τὴν δὲ κυριακὴν προτιμῶντες, εἴγε δύναιντο, σχολάζειν ὡς Χριστιανοί). Obviously there is a marked distinction intended between the Jewish and Christian idea of rest; but still the result is to transfer a sabbatical rest to the Lord's day, and so to make it a kind of spiritualized and Christianized sabbath. This step being once taken, its necessary consequences follow, accumulating regulations of prohibition or injunction, until the original distinction is obscured or lost. The councils, in fact, were placed between tendencies to extreme observance and to extreme neglect. Thus at the third Council of Orleans (A.D. 538), we see that a certain public opinion had been growing up (persuasum est populis) that on the Lord's day no horse or ox or carriage should be used, no food prepared, nothing done for the cleanliness of the house or person. This the council wisely desires to check, and protests that such minute regulations "savour rather of Jewish than Christian observance" (ad Judaicam magis quam ad Christianam observantiam pertinere). It is accordingly laid down, somewhat vaguely, that the freedom hitherto used on the Lord's day should be preserved (quod antea fieri liceat, liceat). But in the very same canon abstinence from rural work in general is not only advised, in order that men may have leisure for church-going and prayer, but, in case of neglect, enforced by ecclesiastical censure (see Labbe, vol. ix. p. 10). On the other hand, the second Council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) declares itself driven to legislation, because "the people rashly profane the Lord's day, and as on ordinary days (privatis diebus) devote themselves to unceasing work." Accordingly the first canon pleads eloquently for the observation of the Lord's day, "which has given us the new birth and freedom from all our sins" (quae nos denuo peperit et a peccatis omnibus liberavit); on it "being made free from sin and become servants to righteousness, let us show the service which is perfect freedom" (liberam servitutem exhibeamus). "The day is the day of perpetual rest, which is suggested to us by the type of the seventh day in the law and the prophets." Hence it is urged that men should abstain from litigation and pleading, and should not even allow themselves on plea of necessity to yoke their oxen. Their whole soul is to be absorbed in hymns and praises; their eyes and hands raised all day to God. Not that there is value in bodily rest (corporali abstinentia), but in an obedience by which earthly actions may be set aside, and the soul raised to heaven. All this is spiritual exhortation; but it is significantly added that disobedience will be punished primarily by God, secondarily "by the implacable anger of the priest;" pleaders shall be non-suited, peasants or slaves severely scourged, clerks or monks suspended for six months from communion with their fellows. (See Labbe, ix. 947.) It will be observed that in this canon there is a vague reference to the seventh day's rest, laid down in the fourth commandment, as foreshadowing the Lord's day. But this is a tentative step anticipatory of the future. Every enactment of quasi-sabbatical rest prepared for a sabbatarian theory; but it was far from being as yet established.

This is clear, if we turn to the writings of Gregory the Great, the foremost man of his day in character as in office, and the unconscious founder of the future papal power. He obviously followed St. Augustine in his view of the Lord's day and its significance, and in some of his references to Old Testament types of its sacredness^b (see Hom. in Ezek. ii. 4). In a celebrated letter to the Romans (Epist. xiii. 1), written in reference to some introduction of strict rest on the sabbath, he declares that it is Antichrist, who "at his coming shall cause the sabbath day, and the Lord's day to be kept from all work"—in the one case, he adds, for the sake of Judaizing, in the other, because he himself shall pretend to die, and to rise again. In regard to the sabbath, which is his chief subject, he lays down the broad principle that the laws of the old covenant were but typical, and in the light of Christ's coming can be kept only in spirit. "Our true sabbath is the Lord Jesus Christ Himself." He then protests against a prohibition of the bath on the Lord's day (evidently on sabbatarian grounds), in a tone which would apply to many other such ordinances. He is content to lay it down that on the Lord's day we are to cease from all earthly work, and to devote ourselves altogether to prayer (atque omni modo orationibus insistentum), in order that any spiritual neglect in the six days may be atoned for on the day of the resurrection. It would have been impossible for him so to have written, had the idea of the transference of the obligation of the fourth commandment to the Lord's day attained to anything like general acceptance.

^b One is, however, peculiar. On Job i. 5, he contends that in his sanctifying his sons after the seven days, he prefigured the eighth day or Lord's day. He adds: "Quia ergo octavo die offerre septem sacrificia dicitur, plenus septiformis gratiae Spiritu pro spe resurrectionis Domino deservisse perhibetur."

There is a curious passage in a letter of Gregory to St. Augustine of Canterbury (considered to be of doubtful authenticity) which deals with fasting, and, referring apparently to Sundays in Lent, draws a singularly unpleasant picture of Sunday festivities. "De ipsa vero die Dominica haesitamus quidnam dicendum sit, cum omnes laici et saeculares illa die plus solito caeteris diebus accuratius cibos carnum appetant, et nisi nova quadam aviditate usque ad mediam noctem se ingurgitent, non aliter se huius sacri temporis observationem suscipere putant; . . . unde nec a tali consuetudine averti possunt, et ideo cum venia suo ingenio relinquendi sunt, ne forte peiores existant si a tali consuetudine prohibeantur" (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 54; Greg. Opp. ii. 1302, in App. ad Epist. xiii., from Gratian, Dist. iv. can. 6). It is possible that this practice indicates a reaction against the sabbatarianism referred to in Gregory's letter. Curiously enough, it exactly corresponds to those excessive sabbath festivities with which the Fathers of the 5th century reproach the Jews.

Meanwhile the current of opinion and legislation still continues to set in the sabbatarian direction. Legends of miraculous judgment on those who work on the Lord's day become rife. In the Life of St. Germanus of Auxerre (written by Venantius Fortunatus in the 6th century) we are told how the hand of a man at Essone, working on the Lord's day, and of a girl at Melun, spinning on the same day, were suddenly contracted (ita contrahitur digitus ut unguium acumen partem transiret in alteram), and how both were miraculously healed by St. Germanus (cc. 14, 16; Migne, Patrologie, lxxii. 61). As time goes on, such portents become more numerous and more striking; the hand which chops wood cleaves to the hatchet, or is withered: a cake made on the Lord's day streams with blood; a mill-wheel set in motion refuses to turn (see Heylin, On the Sabbath, part ii. c. v. 3, and Hesse's Bampton Lectures, lect. iii. n. 261).

Naturally the decrees of councils and the commands of secular authority follow in the same course. Thus in England, in the 7th and 8th centuries, the laws of Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 690), lay it down that "If a 'theowman' work on Sunday by his lord's command, let him be free, and let the lord pay xxx shillings as 'wite' [fine]. But if the 'theow' work without his knowledge, let him suffer in his hide, or in 'hide-gild' [ransom]. But if a freeman work on that day without his lord's command, let him forfeit his freedom, or sixty shillings; and let a priest be liable to twice as much." (See Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 215.) A law of about the same date makes the observation of the eve of Sunday, as well as the Sunday itself. "If an 'esne' do any servile labour, contrary to his lord's command, from sunset on Sunday eve till sunset on Monday eve [i.e. sunset on Saturday to sunset on Sunday], let him make a 'bote' of lxxx shillings to his lord. If an 'esne' do so of his own accord on that day, let him make a 'bote' of vid. to his lord, or his hide" (Laws of Wiltred, K. of Kent, A.D. 696, ll. 9 and 10, in Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 235).

In the Council of Clovesho (A.D. 747) it is ordered that all abbots and presbyters shall remain in their monasteries and churches on the Lord's day, abstaining from all business and from all travelling, except on inevitable necessity. But the object is stated to be that the Lord's day may be wholly dedicated to the worship of God, and that they may be ready to teach and to minister. Of the laity it is only said that on the Lord's day and other great festivals the people shall be invited by the priests to assemble in church for the hearing of the word and the celebration of the mass. (See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 367.) About the same time we find a "Judicium Clementis" (supposed to be Willebrord, A.D. 693), indicating a still greater extent of sabbatarian rigour. "If on the Lord's day any one by negligence works or bathes or washes his head, let him do penance seven days; if he repeats the offence, forty days; if he does so contumaciously (si per dampnationem facit hoc die) and refuses to amend, let him be expelled from the Catholic church like a Jew." (See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 226.)

(VI.) Still, however, it will be observed that even now no connexion of the Lord's day with the fourth commandment is avowed; and the process of sabbatarianism is therefore not complete. There is some reason to think that in this, as in some other ecclesiastical matters, we are to look to the time of Charlemagne for the final step. So late, indeed, as A.D. 797, a celebrated decree of Theodulph of Orleans (Capitula, n. 24; see Labbe, Councils, vol. xiii. p. 999), which was apparently observed beyond the limits of his diocese, speaking of the Lord's day, preserves the old teaching as to the grounds of its consecration, and deals with its observance freely and spiritually: "Diei vero Dominici, quia in eo Deus lucem condidit, in eo manna in eremo pluit, in eo Redemptor humani generis sponte pro salute nostra a mortuis resurrexit, in eo Spiritum Sanctum super discipulos infudit, tanta esse debet observantia, ut praeter orationes, et missarum solemnias, et ea quae ad vescendum pertinent, nihil aliud fiat. Nam et si necessitas fuerit navigandi, sive itinerandi, licentia datur, ita duntaxat, ut horum occasione missa et orationes non praetermittantur. Conveniendum est sabbato die cum lu-minaribus cuilibet Christiano ad ecclesiam, conveniendum est ad vigilias sive ad matutinum officium. Concurrendum est etiam cum oblationibus ad missarum solemniam. Et dum ad ecclesiam convenitur nulla causa dici debet vel audiri, nulla jurgia sunt habenda: sed tantummodo Deo vacandum est, in celebratione videlicet sacrorum officiorum, et exhibitione eleemosynarum, et in Dei laudibus cum amicis, proximis, et peregrinis spiritualiter epulandum."

But Alcuin, Charlemagne's great ecclesiastical adviser, speaking of the Jewish observation of the sabbath, says expressly, "cujus observationem mos Christianus ad diem Dominicum competentius transtulit" (Homil. xviii. post Pentec. quoted by Heylin). It is true that this is said to have been done by custom; there is no word of scriptural authority, or even of any institution of the apostles. But still this passage seems to enunciate for the first time the idea of "the Christian sabbath."¹ And its meaning is illustrated by the laws of the time. A law attributed to Clotaire lays it down that no one should work on the Lord's day, "quia hoc lex prohibet, et Sacra Scriptura in omnibus contradicit." Under Pepin (A.D. 791) a council at Friuli had strictly enforced the observance of the day, with some special restrictions apparently taken from the observance of the sabbath. But Charlemagne opens an imperial edict on the subject with the express words, "statuimus secundum quod et in lege Dominus praecepit," and proceeds to minute prohibitions against various kinds of work and to injunctions for attendance at divine service. (See Heylin, part ii. c. v.)

It is notable that not long after, an edict appears at Constantinople by the emperor Leo Philosophus (A.D. 884) for the observance of the Lord's day, referring to the old edict of Constantine as too lax in its exemptions, and declaring absolute rest for labour, as "decreed by the Holy Spirit and the apostles taught of Him" (quod Spiritui Sancto ab ipsoque institutus apostolis placuit), arguing that "if the Jews honoured their sabbath, which was but a shadow of ours, how much more should we honour the day which the Lord hath honoured, and on it delivered us from dishonour and death!" (Constit. 54, see Heylin, part ii. c. v.). We note here that it is on apostolic authority that the sanctity of the Lord's day is based, although at the same time the Jewish sabbath is looked upon as the shadow of the Christian. The period is, in fact, one of transition. That the sabbatical authority of the Lord's day was not held in theory is clear, from the fact that the general teaching of the schoolmen follows the express declaration of Aquinas that "the observance of the Lord's day in the new law supersedes the observance of the sabbath, not by obligation of the (divine) law, but by the ordinance of the church and the custom of Christian people" (non ex vi legis sed ex constitutione ecclesiae et consuetudine populi Christiani), or as it is elsewhere expressed, "non de jure divino, sed de jure humano canonico." But the "custom of Christian people," when once directed in the line of quasi-sabbatical observance, would be apt to ground itself naturally on the divine law, which such observance seemed to suggest, and to which reference is certainly made in the decrees already quoted.

It lies beyond the limits of this article to trace the steady and excessive development of festal observance in the mediaeval church, the tendency to place other holy days on nearly the same level as the Lord's day, and to guard all alike by quasi-sabbatarian regulations of an elaborate and burdensome nature. Nor can we do more than allude to the twofold protest made against this at the Reformation. On the Continent generally, it tended to reject all holy days, and treat the Lord's day itself as a matter of simple church ordinance, which any church at its will might alter; in England, Scotland, and Holland, it singled out the Lord's day, placing it on a scriptural basis, as the Christian sabbath, ordained in the fourth commandment, and surrounded it too often with a more than Judaic rigour.

The conclusions, to which within the historical limits assigned to this article we must come, may be thus briefly recapitulated.

(a) The Lord's day must be regarded as a festival, coeval with the existence of Christianity itself—growing up naturally from the apostles' time, gradually assuming the character of the one distinctively Christian festival, and drawing to itself, as by an irresistible gravitation, the periodical rest, which is enjoined in the fourth commandment on grounds applicable to man as man, and which was provided for under the Mosaic law by the special observance of the sabbath.

(b) The idea of the Lord's day is wholly distinct from that of the sabbath, never for a moment confused with it in the early church, in which, indeed, the observance of the sabbath long survived, sometimes as a festival, sometimes as a fast. Wherever rest is associated with it, such rest is invariably regarded as entirely secondary, as simply a means to a higher end. Accordingly the original regulation of observances connected with the Lord's day is positive and not negative, and directed by principle rather than by formal rule.

(c) The tendency to sabbatize the Lord's day is due chiefly to the necessities of legal enforcement—first, as exemplified in the series of imperial laws, then in the decrees of councils, generally backed by the secular power—dealing inevitably in prohibition more than in injunction, and so tending to emphasize negative instead of positive observance. For such enactments the law of the Old Testament "mutatis mutandis" became naturally a model, and the step was an easy one, from regarding it as a model to taking it as an authority.

(d) The direct connexion, however, of such observance with the obligation of the fourth commandment can claim no scriptural and no high ecclesiastical authority. Either the observance of that commandment is expressly declared to be figurative (consisting of rest from sin, rest enjoyed in Christ, and rest foreseen in heaven), or careful distinction is made between the moral obligation of religious observance in general, and the positive obligation, now passed away, to keep the sabbath in particular. The notion of connecting it with the keeping of the Lord's day grows up in the first instance through the natural supersession of the sabbath by the Lord's day in the Christian church, and the temptation to transfer to the latter the positive divine sanction of the former; and, once introduced, maintains itself by the very fact of presenting a strong and intelligible plea against any degradation of the high Christian festival.

On this subject the following works may be consulted with advantage: Heylin's History of the Sabbath, part ii., full of learning, though defective in arrangement and criticism; Bingham's Antiquities, book xx. c. ii., containing much valuable matter, though needing some correction; Dr. Hessey's Bampton Lectures on Sunday, presenting the literature of the subject accurately and popularly; Probst, Kirchliche Disciplin der Drei ersten Jahrhunderte (pt. iii. c. i. art. 1) discuss the principal passages bearing on the question found in the writers of the first three centuries; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part i. c. 4. In all there is much common material, derived from the obvious source of information on this subject—the writings of the Fathers, the edicts of the Imperial Codes, the canons of councils, and the mediaeval laws so often based upon them. The distinction is chiefly in the inferences drawn from these historical materials. [A. B.]

LORD'S DAY (LITURGICAL). The observance of Sunday began after None on Saturday, "ut dies Dominica a vespere usque in vespem servetur" (Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 794), and the reason is given by Durandus (Rat. v. 9, 2): "Quia vespertina synaxis seu hora primum est officium diei sequentis." The Sunday office was longer and more solemnly observed than that of other days. The number of psalms and lessons, and the number of nocturns at the night office was increased. The Gregorian distribution of the Psalter gives eighteen psalms and nine lessons in three nocturns, instead of twelve psalms and three lessons in one nocturn: and the Benedictine twelve psalms, and three canticles, with twelve lessons in three nocturns instead of twelve psalms and three lessons, in two nocturns on week days. Te Deum was said at the end of Matins, except in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter.

The nocturnal office and that of Lauds were to be said (Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 9) with modulation tractim, which word is explained as lentu ac morosa modulatione. Incense was offered (oblatum) at each nocturn, and the high altar censured at Benedictus at Lauds. The solemn benediction of the holy water "salis et aquae," a custom which is considered to have been introduced by pope Leo IV. A.D. 847–855, took place before mass; with which ceremony a procession was in many places joined. At the mass Gloria in excelsis was said except during Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter Eve: and the creed was said at the mass and at Prime in the Sunday office throughout the year. The reserved Eucharist was renewed. Many other distinctions between the Dominical office, and that for week days, might be pointed out. Those already enumerated are among the most conspicuous.

In the Ambrosian use the Dominical office differs from the Ferial in several points, of which the following are the most prominent. No psalms are said at matins, but in their place three canticles, one in each nocturn.

In Nocturn I. The Cantic of Isaiah, cap. xxvi. De nocte vigilat.

In Nocturn II. The Cantic of Hannah, 1 Reg. II. Confirmatum est.

In Nocturn III. The Cantic of Jonah, cap. 1. Clamavi; or, during the winter: i.e. from the first Sunday in October till Easter, the Cantic of Habakkuk, cap. ii. Domine audi.

Each of these canticles has its proper antiphon, and is followed by the usual form. V. Benedictus es, Deus. R. Amen.

After the third cantic three lessons are read, each with its response. These are not, as on week days, taken from scripture, but from a Homily on the Gospel of the day, and correspond therefore to the lessons in the third nocturn of the Roman Breviary. These are followed, except during Advent and Lent, by Te Deum, which is not said in the ferial office, and if Lauds are said separately, the office ends with a collect, and the customary form. V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo Gratias.

At Lauds after Benedictus, which begins the office both in the Dominical and the Ferial office,* follow, each preceded by its oratio secreta, and with its proper antiphon, the cantic of Moses (Exod. xv.) Contemus Domino et benedicite. In the place of these, on week days other than Saturday, Ps. l. (li.), Miserere is said, and on Saturday, Ps. cxvii. (cxviii.) Confitemini.

At the other hours there are certain differences in the disposition and number of the collects and antiphons, by whatever names they are called, but, as the general character of the office is unaltered, it is not necessary to enter minutely into them. Certain greater festivals, called Solemnitates Domini, have the office nearly identical with that of the Sunday.

In the Mozarabic rite the daily office differs throughout so much for the ordinary Western type that it is not easy to point out clearly in a few words the variations between that of Sunday and other days. The most conspicuous variation is at the beginning of matins, which on Sunday (after the opening) begin with the hymn Aeterne rerum conditor, followed by its oratio, and the three Psalms; iii. Domine quid, l. (li.) Miserere, lvi. (lvii.) Miserere mei, each with its antiphon and oratio, while on week days the corresponding portion of the office is an antiphon called matutinarium, and Ps. l. (li.) Miserere,^b with its antiphon and oratio. Sundays were of different degrees. The classification varied at different times, and in different churches, but the general Western division was into Greater Sundays: Dominicae majores v. solennes v. privilegiatae: and

* Except on Sundays in Advent, when the Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.), Attende Coelum, is said. On Christmas Day both are said.

^b This is the direction given in the Regula printed at the head of the Breviary. In the body of the Breviary the Psalm appointed for a week-day varies among the three Sunday psalms; and the matutinarium occurs later in the office, in the course of Lauds. The Mozarabic ritual directions are sometimes difficult to reconcile, into Ordinary Sundays: Dominicae communes, v. per annum. Martene, de Ant. Mon. rit. iv. § 4, from the statutes of Lanfranc, says, "Quinque dies Dominici sunt, qui communia quaedam inter se habent separata a caeteris diebus Dominicis, Dominica vid. prima de Adventu Domini, Dominica primae Septuagesimae, Dominica prima Quadragesimae, Dominica in medio Quadragesimae, Dominica in Palmis." He then proceeds to specify certain ritual peculiarities of those days mainly relating to the dress of the clergy, and the performance of the office in choir.^c In this classification Easter day and Pentecost have already been reckoned among the "quinque praecipuae festivitates."

Another classification given by Durandus [vii. 1-4] defines Dominicae principales v. solemnes to be those "in quibus officia mutantur," of which he reckons five. Dominica prima de Adventu, Dominica in Octavis Pascha, Dominica in Octavis Pentecostes, Dominica qua cantatur Laetare Hierusalem [sc. Midlent Sunday] et Dominica in Ramis Palmarum; Easter and Pentecost being as before otherwise accounted for. To these the first Sunday in Lent was afterwards added, "quia fit officii in ea mutatio."

The later Roman arrangement, which is still in force, subdivides the greater Sundays, Dominicae majores, into two classes: (1) Sundays of the first class, Dominicae primae classis, viz. the first Sunday in Advent, the first Sunday in Lent, Passion Sunday, Palm Sunday, Easter day, Low Sunday, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday; and (2) Sundays of the second class, Dominicae secundae classis, viz. the second, third, and fourth Sunday of Advent, Septuagesima and the two following Sundays, and the second, third and fourth Sundays in Lent. The other Sundays in the year are ordinary Sundays, Dominicae per annum.

The Ambrosian rule classifies Sundays according to their office, as follows:—Easter day, Pentecost and Trinity Sunday are reckoned among the Solemnitates Domini, the highest class of festivals. The other Sundays are divided into two classes—(1) those which have a proper office, and (2) those which have the ordinary Sunday office.

Those which have a proper office—officium proprium—are the Sundays in Advent, those in Lent, and the Sunday after the Nativity.

The Sundays between Easter and Pentecost have the Paschal office—Paschale officium—which has certain ritual peculiarities, and the Sundays from the Epiphany to the beginning of Lent have a mixed office, officium partim proprium, partim commune.

The Sundays from the second after Pentecost to Advent have the ordinary office (officium commune).

The classification of Sundays in the Greek calendar is not so minute. Easter day stands in a class by itself, at the head of all the festivals of the year; and Palm Sunday and Whitsunday are reckoned among the Twelve,^d which rank next in importance.

^c Among other points it is directed that the refectory tables be covered with clean cloths (festiva mappae; sint et quotidianae, lotae tamen), and clean towels provided (manutergia candida et honesta).

^d Otherwise called δεσποτικά v. κυριακά ἑορταί. They

Many Sundays were (and are still) often designated by the first word of the introit of the Roman mass. Thus the first five Sundays in Lent are often known by the names, Invocavit,^e Reminiscere, Oculi, Laetare, Judica; and the four Sundays following Easter as Quasimodo, Misericordia Domini, Subilate, Cantate. Some again are customarily known by some peculiarity in the celebration. Thus the Sunday next before Easter^f is known as Palm Sunday and Dominica palmarum v. in ramis palmarum, from the Benediction of the palm branches, and the subsequent procession which takes place on that day after terce and before mass; and the Sunday after Easter as Dominica in albis, or more fully in albis depositis, as it is called in the Ambrosian missal;^g from its being the day after the Saturday on which those who had been baptized on Easter eve laid aside their white garments; or sometimes as Clausum^h Paschae, from its being the conclusion of the Paschal celebration, and the second and following Sundays after Easter were sometimes called *Dominica*ⁱ and ii^a and post albas, or post clausum Paschae.

Other less familiar designations for particular Sundays which are found, are Dominica carnevale, de carne levatio v. de carne levanda, which would be Quinquagesima Sunday where Lent began on the following Wednesday, and the first Sunday in Lent in the Ambrosian ritual, which begins Lent on that day: Dominica in Quadragesima for the first Sunday in Lent, Dominica mediana v. mediante die festo [Miss. Mozar.] for the fourth Sunday in Lent, Dominica Osanna for Palm Sunday, also Pascha floridum from the flowers which were associated with Palm branches in the office for their benediction. Thus in the Mozarabic missal the office is to be said ad benedicendos flores vel ramos, and in the prayer of the office the clause occurs, "Hos quoque ramos et flores palmarum . . . hodie tua benedictione sanctifica." So also in the Ordo Romanus, "Dies palmarum, sive florum atque ramorum dicitur"; also in the Sarum missal the office is called benedictio florum ac frondium, and the phrase creatura florum vel frondium, or equivalent expressions frequently recur in it. In the York missal, too, we find the words "hos palmarum atque florum ramos, etc. . . ." Dominica Rogationum v. D. ante Litanias for the Sunday before Ascension.^l Many other similar names might be adduced, though several would not fall within our limits of time.

were originally seven in number, and a mystical reason for that number is given from St. Chrysostom. It was afterwards increased to twelve. The list at first contained Easter Day, which afterwards was placed by itself, and has otherwise slightly varied, the number remaining at twelve. The next order of festivals is called ἀποδόκιμα, i. e. not of the twelve; but it contains no Sunday.

^e Thus the rubrics of the Missal speak of Feria ii^a, etc. post Invocavit, etc.

^f So termed in the English Prayer Book.

^g In the Ambrosian rite the days of Easter week are called Feria ii^a, iii^a, etc. . . . in albis, and those in the week next following Feria ii^a, iii^a, etc. . . . post albas.

^h This expression must not be confounded with Claves Paschae.

ⁱ It may be noticed that several of these terms have established themselves in familiar use in England, though they nowhere appear in the service books, e.g. Midlent Sunday, Palm Sunday, Rogation Sunday.

The Dominical calendars throughout the year varied in different churches, and deserve a few words.

The Roman Calendar, as in use to the present time, is substantially the same as the early English (and as that now used among ourselves). The chief difference is that in it the Sundays throughout the summer are reckoned "post Pentecosten," instead of post Trinitatem as in the Sarum (and modern English) use; and that there are fewer of them. Thus in the Roman missal there are twenty-four Sundays post Pentecosten, in the English twenty-five post Trinitatem. In the York missal the Sundays were reckoned post octavas Pentecostes.

Allatius (de Domini et hebdomadibus Græcorum dissertatio) gives a Calendar "ad usum Breviarii Romani e bibliothecae Vaticanae Codice antiquissimo"; which (omitting all that does not relate to Sundays) runs thus:—

Dominica prima de Adventu Domini.
Dominica secunda ante Natale Domini.
Dominica tertia ante Natale Domini.
Dominica prima post Natale Domini.
Dominica prima, etc. post Epiphaniam.

(The Sundays after the Epiphany are reckoned up to Lent, but the names for the last three, Septuagesima, etc. are recognised.)

Dominica in Quadragesima.
Dominica prima mensis primi.
Dominica iia, iv^a, v^a, vi^a in Quadragesima.
Dominica Sancta in Pascha.
Dominica Octava Paschae.
Dominica i^a, ii^a, iii^a post Octavam Paschae.
Dominica post Ascensum Domini.
Dominica Pentecosten.
Dominica Octava Pentecosten.
Dominica ii^a, etc. Pentecosten.
Dominica post Natalem Apostolorum [i. e. SS. Pet. et Paull. Jun. 29].
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post Octavam Apostolorum.
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post S. Laurentii [Aug. 10].
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post S. Cypriani [Sept. 26].

The last of these Sundays that next after the festival of St. Andrew, and then follow the three Sundays of Advent.

The Mozarabic Calendar contains six Sundays in Advent. The Sundays after the Epiphany are numbered continuously till the beginning of Lent, omitting the names Septuagesima, etc., the Sunday corresponding to Quinquagesima being known as Dominica ante diem Cinerum v. ante carnes tollendas, after Pentecost are reckoned as the first, second, etc., seventh Sunday after Pentecost. After the seventh no Sunday mass and therefore no Sunday name is given till Advent, except one for "In Dominica ante jejunium Calendarum Novembrium."

The Ambrosian Dominical Calendar, which in its main features is of high antiquity, is as follows:—

Dominica i^a, ii^a, iii^a, iv^a, v^a, vi^a in Adventu.

(These six Sundays are exclusive of and in addition to the Vigil of the Nativity, when it falls on a Sunday.)

Dominica post Nativitatem Domini
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post Epiphaniam.
Dominica in Septuagesima, in Sexagesima, in Quinquagesima.
Dominica i^a in Quadragesima (the beginning of Lent).

Dominica ii^a in Quadragesima (sometimes called the Sunday of the Samaritan Woman).

Dominica iii^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of Abraham).

Dominica iv^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of the Blind Man).

Dominica v^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of Lazarus).

Dominica Olivarum.

Dominica Resurrectionis, v. Dies Sanctus Paschae.

Dominica in Albis depositis.

Dominica ii^a, iii^a, iv^a, v^a post Pascha.

Dominica i^a, ii^a Octobris.

Dominica iii^a. In Dedicatione Ecclesiae majoris.

Dominica i^a, ii^a, iii^a post Dedicationem.

The Greek Dominical Calendar differs in many respects. In all Western calendars the ecclesiastical year begins with Advent. The Greek Church has no such season,^k and the year begins with the Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican,^l which corresponds to the Sunday next before Septuagesima. The order of the Sundays is as follows:—

Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican [also called προσφώνησιμος].^m

Sunday of the Prodigal Son, answering to Septuagesima Sunday.

Sunday of Apocryphos [so called because it is the last day on which meat is eaten].

Sunday of Tyrophagus [the last day on which cheese is eaten].

First Sunday of the Fast, or Orthodoxy Sunday, διάταξις τῆς πρώτης κυριακῆς τῶν ἁγίων νηστειῶν, ἥτοι τῆς ὀρθοδοξίας (Typ. Sabae, cap. xvii.). The celebration under this name is in commemoration of the overthrow of the Iconoclasts.ⁿ

Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth Sundays of the Fast.

Palm Sunday (κυριακὴ τῶν βαῶν).

Pascha (or Bright Sunday, λαμπρά κυριακή).

Antipascha (or the Sunday of St. Thomas), sometimes New Sunday, καινὴ ἡ νέα κυριακή (Theod. Balsamon in Expos. de S. Bas. etc. ad Anphil. de Spir. Sanct.).

Sunday of the Ointment Bearers (τῶν μυροφόρων).

Sunday of the Paralytic.

Sunday of the Samaritan Woman, or Mid Pentecost

[μεσοπεντεκοστή].

Sunday of the Blind Man.^o

Sunday of the Three hundred and eighteen [i. e. the Fathers of Nicaea]. Sunday in the Octave of the Ascension.

Pentecost.

All Saints Sunday (Trinity Sunday or First Sunday of Matthew).

^k There is a fast preparatory to the Nativity, called the Fast of the Nativity, which lasts for the forty days before Christmas.

^l This and similar names of Sundays are derived from the subjects of the Gospels for the day.

^m For the reasons given for this name, see Allatius de Dominicis et Hebdomadibus Græcorum, s. viii.

ⁿ There is a long and peculiar office for the day in the Triodion, but it is without our limits of time.

^o The Sundays after Antipascha are variously reckoned as the 2nd, 3rd, etc., or as the 3rd, 4th, etc. Sunday after Pascha.

The Sundays from this point are called Sundays of Matthew or of Luke according as the gospels are taken from those Evangelists.^p

Second Sunday after Pentecost, or Second Sunday of Matthew.

Third Sunday after Pentecost, or Third Sunday of Matthew.

and so on, up to the Exaltation of the Cross [Sept. 14], the Sunday before which festival is called:—

The Sunday before the Exaltation; and that following is

The Sunday after the Exaltation.

After this the Sundays resume their reckoning from Pentecost, which varies with the years and are called Sundays of Luke, whose gospel is now read.

First Sunday of Luke.

Second " " "

Sunday before the Nativity.

Sunday before the Lights [πρὸ τῶν φώτων, sc. Epiphany].

Sunday after the Lights.

The numeration from Pentecost, and of the Sundays of Luke is then resumed and continued till the Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. LORD'S PRAYER (the Liturgical use of the). I. In nearly all ancient liturgies this was said between the consecration of the elements and the communion. The earliest direct witness is Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350; who, after explaining to his competentes the Sanctus, prayer of consecration, and the intercessions, as they occur in the order of the service, proceeds, "Then, after these things, we say that prayer which the Saviour delivered to His intimate disciples, out of a pure conscience addressing God and saying, Our Father," &c. (Catech. Myst. v. 8). Optatus in Africa (A.D. 368), charging the Donatist bishops, who "gave remission of sins as if they had no sin themselves," with a self-contradiction, says, "For at that very time, when ye impose hands and remit offences, soon turning to the altar, ye are obliged to recite the Lord's Prayer, and in fact say, Our Father, which art in heaven, forgive us our debts and sins" (de Schism. Don. ii. 20). Now we know from St. Cyprian (de Lapsis, p. 128; ed. 1690) that in Africa penitents were reconciled after the consecration. St. Augustine, also in Africa (A.D. 397), puts the Lord's Prayer there: "When the hallowing (of the elements) has taken place, we say the Lord's Prayer" (Serm. 227, ad Infantes, i.e. the newly baptized; see before, vol. i. p. 836). Again, writing in 414, he says that by προσευχῆς in 1 Tim. ii. 1, he understands those Prayers which are said "when that which is on the Lord's table is blessed, and hallowed, and broken for distribution; which whole form of prayer nearly every church concludes with the Lord's Prayer" (ad Paulin. Epist. 149, § 16). Again, to competentes: "When ye are baptized, that prayer is to be said by you daily. For in the church that Lord's Prayer is said daily at the altar of God, and the faithful hear it" (Serm. 58, c. x. § 12; see also Serm. Dom. ii. vi. § 26; Serm. 17, § 5; 49, 8). St. Jerome must have thought the practice of saying it somewhere in the liturgy universal, for he says in a work written about 415, "So He taught His apostles, that daily in the sacrifice of His body, believers should make bold to speak thus, Our Father," &c. (Dial. contra Pelag. iii. 15.) Germanus of Paris is a witness to the use of France in the middle of the 6th century: "But the Lord's Prayer is put in that same place (i.e. after the consecration and confection) for this reason, that every prayer of ours may be concluded with the Lord's Prayer (Expos. Brev. in Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. xii. ii.) In the treatise de Sacramentis, ascribed to St. Ambrose, but probably written in France, near the end of the 8th century (see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 590, 622, 2nd ed.) we read, "I said to you that before the words of Christ, that which is offered is called bread. When the words of Christ have been uttered, it is no longer called bread, but is named the Body. Wherefore then in the Lord's Prayer which follows after that, does he say, 'our bread' (lib. v. c. iv. § 24)?" Leontius of Cyprus relates of his contemporary, John the Almoner, pope of Alexandria, who died in 616, that during the celebration he sent for and exchanged forgiveness with a clerk, who was not in charity, after which "with great joy and gladness, he stood at the holy altar, able to say to God with a clear conscience, forgive us," &c. (Vita Joan. c. 13; Rosweyde, p. 186). St. Augustine (as above) alleges the use of the Lord's Prayer after the consecration in "nearly every church." We find it in that place in every ancient liturgy except the Clementine (Constit. Apost. viii. 13), in which it does not appear at all, and the Abyssinian (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. 521), in which it is said, as in the English, after the communion. In the Nestorian of Malabar it occurs both before and after the communion (Liturg. Mal. Raulin, 324, 327).

When the Greek compiler of the liturgy called after St. Clement of Rome omitted the Lord's Prayer, he was probably guided by the old Greek liturgy of Rome, which we may suppose to have been before him. We know from St. Gregory, writing in 598, that, until he inserted it, the Lord's Prayer was, according to the plain meaning of his words, certainly not said between the consecration and reception, and therefore probably not said at all in the Eucharistic office of his church. He had been blamed for having (among other innovations) "given an order that the Lord's Prayer should be said soon (mox) after the canon" (Epist. viii. 64). His defence was, "We say the Lord's Prayer soon after the prayer (of consecration), because the apostles were wont to consecrate the host of oblation to that very prayer only (ad ipsam solummodo orationem), and it seemed to me very unbecoming to say over the oblation a prayer which some scholastic had put together, and not to say the prayer (traditionem, lege jors. orationem) which our Redeemer composed over His body and blood" (ibid.). The Lord's Prayer, then, had not been said over the elements either during or after the act of consecration, nor is any place suggested at which it was said. From one of the canons of the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) we should infer that there were some in Spain who did not, even at that time, think it a necessary part of the liturgy: "Some priests are found throughout the Spains, who do not say the Lord's Prayer daily, but only on the Lord's day. . . . Whoever therefore of the priests, or of the clerks subject to them, shall fail to say this prayer of the Lord daily, either in a public or private office, let him be deprived of the honour of his order" (can. 10).

II. The statement of Gregory that the apostles consecrated by saying the Lord's Prayer only is probably a mistake; but it is repeated by Amalarius, A.D. 827, and Leo VII. A.D. 936. The first says of the wine on Good Friday, "The apostolic method of consecration is observed, which said the Lord's Prayer only over the Lord's body and blood. Therefore, if it were not prescribed by the Ordo Romanus that the body of the Lord should be reserved from the 5th day of the week to the 6th, its reservation would be unnecessary; because the Lord's Prayer alone would be sufficient for the consecration of the body, as it is for the consecration of the wine and water" (de Eccl. Off. Var. Lect. Hittorp. col. 1445; see also i. 15). After inquiries made at Rome in 831, Amalarius omitted this passage, but not the letter of Gregory, who had been his authority (iv. 26). Micrologus, without citing Gregory, or mentioning the apostles, remarks that the Ordo Romanus commands the priest to consecrate on Good Friday wine not consecrated before with the Lord's prayer and immission of the Lord's body, that the people may be able to communicate fully" (de Eccl. Obs. 19). The Ordo itself ascribes the consecration to the mixture only (Amal. u. s. col. 1445; see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 707, ed. 2). Leo forbade the Lord's Prayer in a grace at meals, "because the holy apostles were wont to say this prayer only in the consecration of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Epist. ii. Labbe, ix. 697).

III. In the ancient liturgies the Lord's Prayer is introduced by a preface. In the Roman and Ambrosian this is not connected with any preceding form, but in the Greek, Oriental, and Ephesine, it is the conclusion of a separate prayer. The Roman preface is as follows, "Oremus. Præceptis salutaribus moniti et divina institutione formati, audemus dicere" (Sacram. Gelas. Murat. i. 697). The Liturgy of Milan uses the same form generally, but on some feasts, as Easter and Christmas (Le Brun, Dissert. iii. 2; Pamel. Liturgycon, i. 304), the following: "Divino magisterio edocti et salutaribus monitis instituti audemus dicere," which is identical with a Gothico-Gallican form (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 297). The original Ambrosian canon, however, was followed by a prayer for the presence of Christ, ending thus, "That we may receive the verity of the Lord's body and blood; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord, saying, Our Father," &c. (Murat. Liturg. Rom. i. 134). The Roman and Milanese prefaces have been given above in Latin, that the reader may compare them with the language of St. Cyprian, A.D. 252, in his treatise on the Lord's Prayer (n. int.): "Evangelica præcepta . . . nihil sunt alia quam Magisteria divin . . . Inter sua salutaris monita et præcepta divina . . . etiam orandi ipse formam dedit." Of the title "Our Father," he says, "Quod nomen nemo nostrum in oratione auderet attingere, nisi ipse nobis sic permisisset orare" (compare St. Jerome, as above). It is a probable inference that a preface, or prefaces, resembling those quoted, was used with the Lord's Prayer in the Latin church of Africa in the 3rd century. In the old Gallican missals there is a variable prayer, called Collectio ante Orationem Dominicam, of which the following is a brief example: "We beseech Thee, O God the Father Almighty, in these petitions where-with our Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son, hath commanded us to pray, saying, 'Our Father,' &c. (Miss. Goth. Lit. Gall. 190). Some of these "collects" in the Gothico-Gallican missals are exhortations (195, 202, &c.). One (238) is partly addressed to God and partly to the people. The Gallicanum Vetus of Mabillon (p. 346), and the fragment known as the Reichenau missal (Gallican Liturgies, Neale and Forbes, p. 1), have each an example of exhortation. This collect disappears from the missale Francorum (Lit. Gall. 326) and the Besançon sacramentary found at Bobio (Mus. Ital. i. 281), as they had both adopted the Roman canon. We do not know the preamble used by the Franks, as the MS. fails near the end of the canon. The Besançon canon is followed by a Gallican preamble, "Divino magisterio edocti, et divina institutione (formati, Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 228) audemus dicere, Pater," &c. In the Mozarabic missal the formulary before the Lord's Prayer (headed Ad Orationem Dominicam) is often long. In some instances (Leslie, 20, 63, 85, &c.) it is not verbally connected with the latter. It may be a prayer to the Father (16, 20, 22, &c.) or to the Son (6, 12, 93, &c.), or an address to the people (10, 26, 32, &c.). The following example can hardly be classed under any of these heads: "That which is the way hath He shewn, that we might follow in it; that which is the life hath He taught, that we might speak of it; that which is the truth hath He ordained, that we might hold it. To Thee, Supreme Father, let us from the earth with trembling of heart cry aloud, Our Father," &c. (40).

In the ancient liturgy of Jerusalem, known as St. James, at the close of a long secret prayer, the priest says aloud, "And deign that we, O merciful Lord, may with boldness, uncondemned, with a pure heart, a contrite soul, unabashed face, sanctified lips, dare to call upon Thee, the holy God, the Father in the heavens, and to say, Our," &c. (Trollope, 99). This Ἐκφώνησις appears in abridged forms in the derived liturgies of St. Basil (Goar, 174), St. Chrysostom (80), and the Armenian (Neale's Introd. 622). In St. Mark, the priest concludes his secret prayer thus, "That with the holy disciples and apostles, we may say unto Thee this prayer, Our," &c. (Renaud. i. 159.) Then he says aloud the form above given from St. James, and the people say the Lord's Prayer. In the Syro-Jacobite liturgies there is also a secret prayer, which leads up to the Lord's Prayer thus,—"That we may dare to invoke Thee . . . and pray, and say, Our," &c. (Renaud. ii. 89, 131, &c.). In the Egyptian (Renaud. i. 20, 35, 50, 75, 116) and Nestorian (ii. 595) liturgies, the Lord's Prayer is introduced in a similar manner at the end of the prayer of Fraction.

IV. St. Augustine's expression, "All the faithful hear it" (see above), seems to imply that in Africa the people did not repeat the Lord's Prayer themselves in his time. When Gregory introduced it at Rome, he did not assign it to the congregation. "Among the Greeks, the Lord's Prayer is said by all the people, but among us by the priest alone" (Epist. u. s.). Yet elsewhere in the Latin church they said it. That it was so in France in the 6th century is clear from a story in Gregory of Tours. A dumb woman "on a certain Lord's day stood with the rest of the people. But it came to pass that, when the Lord's Prayer was said, she also opened her mouth and began to sing that holy prayer with the rest" (Mirac. S. Mart. ii. 30). In the Mozarabic Liturgy the people responded "Amen" at the end of the first clause, and the first three petitions: after "Give us this day our daily bread," they responded, "for Thou art God": after the two following petitions, "Amen": and after "Lead us not into temptation," they concluded with "But deliver us from evil" (Leslie, 6). In all the Eastern rites, as in their sources, St. James and St. Mark, this prayer is said by the people. In the Egyptian (Ken. i. 76, 77) and Syro-Jacobite (ii. 40, 131) they begin at "Hallowed be," &c. In the Nestorian, they say it all (Badger, Nestorians, ii. 237; Renaud. ii. 595).

V. St. Augustine more than once alludes to a custom of beating the breast when the words "forgive us our trespasses" were said in the liturgy: "If we are without sin, and we beat our breasts, saying, Forgive, &c., in this very thing at least we sin, even gravely; as no one can doubt; seeing that we lie while the very sacraments are being celebrated" (Serm. 351, 3, § 6. Similarly, Serm. 388, § 2). To what extent this custom prevailed does not appear.

For the form which followed the Lord's Prayer in every ancient liturgy, see EMBOLISMUS.

LORD'S SUPPER (Coena Domini, Coena Domínica, Δείπνον Κυριακόν). I. The primary notion was of the Last Supper of our Lord, at which the eucharist was instituted. That, says Hippolytus, A.D. 220, was the "first table of the mystical supper" (in Prov. ix. 1, Fragm.). St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, commenting on 1 Cor. xi. 20, says that St. Paul, by using the words "Lord's Supper," takes his hearers back to that "evening in which the Lord delivered the awful mysteries" (Hom. 27, in Ep. 1, ad Cor. § 2). With this view, he argues, the apostle called τὸ ἔσπτον δείπνον, that which in practice was taken early in the day by the name commonly given to the meal which was eaten last (ibid.). Somewhat similarly Pseudo-Dionysius (probably about 520): "The common and peaceable participation of one and the same bread and cup . . . brings (us) to a sacred commemoration of the most divine and archetypal (ἀρχισυνάβολου) supper" (Ecccl. Hierarch. c. iii. Cont. iii. § 1). Maximus, the commentator on this book, A.D. 660, here explains that "the mystical supper of the Lord is said to be ἀρχισυνάβολου, in relation to the divine mysteries now celebrated" (Scholium in loc.). The "Lord's Supper" was, therefore, in the conception of the early ages of the church, in the first instance and emphatically, that supper of which our Lord partook Himself with His disciples the night before His death, and of which the first reception of the holy eucharist was conceived a part.

II. For some length of time the eucharist was celebrated in connexion with a meal taken by the faithful in common, in resemblance of the Last Supper [AGAPE]. It is probable that at first the whole rite, agape and communion, was called the supper, or the Lord's Supper, partly to veil the sacrament from unbelievers, and partly owing to the language of St. Paul in 1 Cor. xi. 20 being so understood. To illustrate this, we may mention that the word agape itself in one passage appears to cover both the meal and the sacrament. "It is not lawful either to baptize or to make an agape apart from the bishop." This is found in the epistle of St. Ignatius to the church at Smyrna (c. 8), one of those mentioned by Eusebius, and the passage itself is cited by Antiochus Monachus, A.D. 614 (Hom. 124; Migne, No. 89, col. 1822). Now when the compiler of the twelve epistles of Ignatius came to this passage, he expanded the words οὐτε ἀγάπην ποιεῖν thus: "Nor to offer, or bring a sacrifice, or celebrate a feast" (δοχὴν). See Cureton's Corpus Ignatianum, 109. Tertullian in 198 describes the agape under the name of a supper: "our Supper shews its nature by its name. It is called that which love is among the Greeks" (Apol. 39). At a later period, when the agape was celebrated with the eucharist on one day of the year only, viz., Maundy Thursday, in commemoration of the institution of the sacrament on that day, it was still called the Lord's Supper. E.g. the council of Carthage, A.D. 397, decrees that the "sacraments of the altar be celebrated only by men fasting excepting on that one day in every year on which the Lord's Supper is celebrated" (can. 29). Three years later St. Augustine, speaking of the custom of bathing at the end of Lent, says that "for this purpose that day was rather chosen in which the Lord's Supper is yearly celebrated" (Epist. 54, vii. § 10). Again, "We compel no one to break their fast (prandere) before that Lord's Supper, but neither do we dare to forbid any one" (ibid. § 9). In 691 the council of Constantinople (can. i. 29) cites the canon of Carthage, as given above, and abolishes the permission which it left.

III. The eucharist was the chief part of the Lord's Supper, whether that name was applied to the occasion of its institution or to the united observance of the first period after Christ. Hence it was almost inevitable that when the unessential part of that observance was dropped, the name should adhere to the sacrament. Some of the Fathers, indeed, thought, as we shall see, that St. Paul applied it directly to the eucharist in 1 Cor. xi. 20; so that the designation had a double origin. It is necessary to bring many testimonies to the extent of this usage, because it has been rashly denied, in a polemical spirit (by Maldonatus, Suarez, and others), that the sacrament was called the "Lord's Supper," or a "supper," however qualified, in the early church. Our earliest witness is Tertullian, who paraphrasing the words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. x. 21, says, "We cannot eat the supper of God and the supper of devils" (de Spect. 13). When Hippolytus, as above, calls the institution "the first table of the mystical supper," he implies that any subsequent celebration may be so called. Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, says that Christ "gives Himself to us in the mystical supper" (Tract. c. Samos. R. ad Qu. 7). St. Basil, A.D. 370: "We are instructed neither to eat and drink an ordinary supper in a church, nor to dishonour the Lord's Supper (by celebrating it) in a house" (Regulae brevis tract. 310). St. Augustine, A.D. 396, expressly says that St. Paul "calls that reception itself of the eucharist the Lord's Supper" (1 p. 54, v. § 7). Again, "He gave the supper to His disciples consecrated by His own hands; but we have not reclined at that feast, and yet we daily eat the same supper by faith" (Serm. 112, iv.). In the regions of the East most do not partake of the Lord's Supper every day" (In Serm. Dom. ii. 7, § 25). Judas "drew near to the Lord's Supper equally" (with the other apostles) (Tract. 50 in St. Joan. Ev. § 10). "He permitted him to partake of the holy supper with the innocent" (Epist. 93, iv. § 15; Sim. Psalm, c. Part. Don. div. 16; c. Litt. Petil. ii. 23, § 53; 106, § 243; Enarr. ii. in Ps. xxi. (xxii.) § 27). St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, he says again, "As oft as ye eat it, ye do shew the Lord's death; and this is that supper" (of which St. Paul speaks) (Hom. xxvii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 5). "As to draw near at random is perilous, so not to partake of those holy mystical suppers is famine and death" (ibid. § 8). "Believe that even now this is that supper at which He Himself reclined" (Hom. 50 in St. Matt. xiv. 34-36). Pelagius, A.D. 405: "The Lord's Supper ought to be common to all, because He delivered the sacrament equally to all His disciples who were present" (Comment. in Ep. i. ad Cor. (xi. 20); inter Opp. Hieron. v. ii. 997). Cyril of Alexandria, A.D. 412: "Let us run together to the mystical supper" (Hom. x. tom. v. ii. 371, and commonly). Theodoret, 423: "He (St. Paul) calls the Master's mystery the Lord's Supper" (Comment. in Ep. i. ad Cor. xi. 20). St. Nilus, 440: "Keep thyself from all corruption, and be every day partaker of the mystical Supper; for thus the body of Christ begins to be ours" (Paraeneticus n. 120). Anastasius Sinaita, 561: "On the 5th day (of Holy Week) He gave the mystic supper which absolves all sin" (in Hexameron v.). Gregory of Tours, 573: "The day on which the Lord delivered the mystic Supper to the disciples" (de Glor. Mart. 24). Hesychius, 601: "The thanksgiving, that is, the oblation which holds the chief place in the Lord's Supper" (in Levit. p. 146 c.). The sacrament is frequently called by this author the mystical or the divine "Supper" (ibid.). Since the time of Justinian the Second, A.D. 686 (Leo. Allat. de Domin. Graec. xxi.), the choir have sung on Maundy Thursday in the Liturgy of St. Basil, "Make me this day, O Son of God, a partaker of Thy mystic Supper" (Goar, Euchol. 170). The foregoing testimonies appear to give an ample sanction to the usage of the Church of England, and to the statement of the Catechism of Trent, that "the most ancient Fathers, following the authority of the apostle, sometimes called the sacred eucharist also by the name of supper" (P. ii. de Euch. v.).

IV. In the 6th century we first find the name 'Coena Domini' given to Maundy Thursday, but generally then with some addition or explanation. The earliest example known to the writer occurs in a document of the year 519, "Quinta feria, hoc est, Coena Domini" (1 exempl. Sugg. 2ae Germani, inter Epp. Hormisdæ, Labbe, Conc. iv. 1488). Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, uses the phrase "Day of the Lord's Supper" (Hist. Franc. ii. 21), and calls its rites "Dominicae Coenae Festa" (ibid. viii. 43). The first council of Mâcon, 581, "Coena Domini usque ad primum Pascha" (Can. 14). Isidore of Seville, 610, calls it Coena Domini in the heading of a chapter, but explains, as if the usage were not familiar, "This 'Supper of the Lord' is the fifth day of the last week of Lent" (de Eccl. Off. i. 28). The Besançon sacramentary, written later in the 7th century, gives an "Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians to be read on Coena Domini" (Mus. Ital. i. 315). The Gallican Lectionary also gives "Lessons for Coena Domini at Matins" (Liturg. Gallic. 128). In the first Ordo Romanus, probably about A.D. 730, the day is called both Feria quinta Coenae Domini, and Coena Domini (Mus. Ital. ii. 19, 30-33). A law of Charلمان, in 742, says, "On Coena Domini let him (the presbyter) always seek fresh chrism from the bishop" (c. iii. in Capit. Reg. Franc. 147). So a law of Charlemagne in 769, col. 192). In 744 a chapter of Pepin ordered "every presbyter always on Coena Domini to give to the bishop a statement of the method and order of his ministry" (c. 4; u. s. i. 158). In the capitularies of the French kings is an order that "the presbyter on Coena Domini take with him two ampullae, one for the chrism, another for the oil to anoint catechumens and the sick" (L. i. c. 156). See other instances (coll. 824, 865, 953, &c.). It is evident that this singular designation of a day had quite established itself by the end of the 8th century. See MAUNDY THURSDAY. [W. E. S.]

LORD'S TABLE. I. For more than three hundred years after the institution of the sacrament the altar is but once called a table in the genuine remains of Christian writers. The exception occurs in an epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria (A.D. 254) to Xystus of Rome. He speaks of a communicant as "standing at the Table" (Euseb. Hist. E. cles. vii. 9). The next instance is a full century later, viz. in the commentary of Hilary the deacon, 354: "When he partakes of the table of devils, he outrages the Lord's Table, i.e. the altar" (Comm. in 1 Cor. x. 21). The explanation in the last words implies that the phrase was not common in that sense. The same remark applies to a passage in the Disput. c. Arianos ascribed to Athanasius, but certainly later. The table in Prov. ix. 2 is there understood of "the Table" prepared by Christ, "That is, the holy altar" (c. 17; App. Opp. Athan. iii. 164). The usage was never general in the West, and the examples found in the Greek writers of the 4th and 5th centuries, considering how much they have left, are not really numerous. The following are from every great division of the church:—St. Basil, A.D. 370, says that the orthodox in the district of Gangra "overthrew the altars" of the heretic Basilides and "set up their own Tables" (Epist. 226). Paulinus in Italy, 393: "There is everywhere one cup and one food of the Lord, and one Table and house of God" (Poema 17). Prudentius in Spain, A.D. 405, "calls the altar dedicated to God" poetically, illa sacramenti donatrix Mensa (de Coron. Hymn. 9). St. Augustine in Roman Africa, writing probably in 416: "The sacrament is prepared on the Lord's Table (in Dominica Mensa), and is taken from (de) the Lord's Table" (Tract. 26 in Joan. Ev. § 15). Cyril of Alexandria not many years later speaks of the "holy Table" (adv. Nestor. 4; vii. 116). Socrates, 439, relates of Alexander the bishop of Alexandria that in the distress caused by the apparent triumph of Arius, he "entered the altar-place and prostrated himself on his face beneath the sacred Table" (Hist. Eccl. i. 37). At a later period the name of Mensa was, in the Latin church, generally given to the slab alone, while the whole structure was called an altar. In the east on the other hand, the latter name became unfrequent; the phrases "holy Table" (ἁγία τραπέζα) or "sacred Table" (ιερά τρ.) being used instead. It will be sufficient to refer here to the rubrics of some ancient liturgies. That of St. James has, "When the priest sets the cup on the holy Table" (Trollope, 111). St. Basil, "The holy mysteries being removed from the sacred Table" (Goar, 175); "the setting down of the divine gifts upon the holy Table" (164). St. Chrysostom similarly has both "sacred" (82) and "holy (72, 73, 74, &c.) Table." The Armenian, "holy table" only (Neale's Introd. 562, 594, &c.). The rubrics of SS. Basil and Chrysostom do not employ the word "altar"; but it occurs in those of the earlier St. James (p. 36), St. Mark (Renaud. Liturg. Orient. i. 141) and St. Clement (Constit. Apost. viii. 12), the two latter using no other. We find it also in the Armenian rubrics (394, 432), in those of the Coptic St. Basil (Renaud. i. 4, 5, &c.); the Greek Alexandrian of St. Gregory (ibid. 91), the Ethiopian (560), the Syrian Ordo Communis (with "table of life") (ibid. ii. 42), and the Nestorian (ibid. 566, &c.). "Table" does not occur in the Nestorian rubrics. We cannot ascribe them to the age of Nestorius, but the fact witnesses to the early usage of the churches which became infested with his heresy. They adhered to the tradition of Ignatius and the sub-apostolic period, while the Syro-Jacobites, who separated from the church later, reflect the language of a later age.

II. We have cited a poem of Paulinus, in which he calls the altar "the table of God." That such language was not usual in Italy in his time appears certain from the fact that the same author in a prose composition gives the name of the "Lord's Table" to a table, as it is thought, in the Gazophylacium on which were set the gifts brought for the use of the poor. "Let us not suffer the Lord's Table to be left void for ourselves and empty for the poor" (Serm. 34, § 1); "Thou wilt know how much more profitable it is to put money out to increase on the Lord's Table" (§ 2). Our inference will hold, if Paulinus by the "Lord's Table" means a chest in the treasury, or even if it be a figure for the alms themselves.

III. The phrase "Lord's Table," "mystical Table," &c., are frequently used by ancient writers to denote not the structure (the use of which is, however, implied in them), but the Holy Communion itself. This usage may have arisen from the language of St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 21); it would certainly be fostered by it. For while some, as Hilary the deacon (Comm. in loco, "Mensae Domini, i.e. altari"), understood "the Lord's Table" of the altar, others, as Theodoret (in loc.), supposed the sacramental feast to be intended. Thus the latter paraphrases, "How is it possible for us to have communion with the Lord through His precious body and blood, and with the devils too, through the food that has been offered to idols?" This use of those terms is, however, common without any reference to 1 Cor. x. 21. Thus Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 374: "Reverence the mystic table to which thou hast come; the bread thou hast received, the cup of which thou hast partaken" (Orat. 40, de Baptismo, i. 660). St. Ambrose, 374: "The mystical table is prepared for by fasting . . . That table is attained at the cost of hunger, and that cup . . . is sought by a thirst for the heavenly sacraments" (de Eli. x. § 33). St. Augustine, 396: "Thou hast sat down at a great table (Prov. xxiii. 1) . . . What is that great table, but that from which we receive the body and blood of Christ?" (Serm. 31, § 2; Sim. S. 304, § 1; 329, § 1; 332, § 2; Tract. 47, in St. Joan. Ev. § 3.) On the words "the poor shall eat and be satisfied" (Ps. xxii. 30), "for they have been brought to the table of Christ, and received of His body and blood" (de Gratia, N. T. 27, § 66). Again, after speaking of a "life-giving feast" which Christ gave to His church, "satiating us with His body, inebriating us with His blood," he says, "the church exults, fed and quickened by this table, against them that trouble her" (Serm. 367, § 6). St. Chrysostom, 398: "With a pure conscience touch the sacred table, and partake of the holy sacrifice" (Hom. vi. in Pent. ii. 326). "On the festivals they come anyhow to this table" (Hom. vi. de Philo. i. 499). St. Hilary, 430: "There is a table of the Lord from which (ex qua) we take food, to wit, of the Living Bread . . . There is also the table of the Lord's lessons, at which we are fed with the meat of spiritual teaching" (Tract. in Ps. 127, § 10). Anastasius Sinaita, 561: "Many never trouble themselves about the self-cleansing and repentance with which they come to the sacred table; but with what garments they are adorned" (de Sacra Synaxi; Migne, 120. 89, col. 830). As the lay communicants did not "sit at," "touch," or even "come to" the material table or altar (see Scandamore, Notitia Eucharistica, 361, 702, ed. 2), the foregoing passages cannot be understood of that. There are many, however, which must be understood of it, though from the inappropriate epithets employed, they appear at first sight to speak of the sacrament, e.g., "I am not worthy to look towards this thy sacred and spiritual Table." This occurs in a prayer or preparation said before the priest places himself at the altar in the liturgy of St. James (Trollope, p. 27). [W. E. S.]

LUCAS (1) (ST. LUKE), evangelist, commemorated generally on Oct. 18. At Jerusalem, March 15 was set apart to him and to St. James the Apostle; at Aquileia, Sept. 3 was observed for the "ingressio reliquiarum" of St. Andrew, St. Luke, and St. John; in the city "Piralice," St. Luke's natalis was kept on Sept. 21 (Hieron. Mart.). In the Auctaria of Bede, and in the Ethiopic Calendar, October 19 is assigned to St. Luke. The relics of St. Luke, with those of St. Andrew and St. Timothy, are said to have been transferred by order of the emperor Constantius to Constantinople, and there deposited in the church of the Apostles [ANDREW, p. 82]. (Hieron. cont. Vigilantium; Patrol. Lat. xxiii. 345; Basil. Menol. Oct. 18). St. Luke's translation was observed "in Oriente" on Oct. 18 (Hieron. Mart.), and his natale on the same day (Usuard, Mart.; Bed. Mart.). His commemoration generally is given under Oct. 18 in Basil, Menol. and Cal. Byzant. See also Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 310.

The sacramentary of Gregory (p. 136) has a collect for St. Luke's natalis, which is assigned to Oct. 18; it prays the Lord for St. Luke's intercession; but the festival is omitted in some MSS. Krazier (de Liturgiis, 497) states the general belief that St. Mark and St. Luke are not mentioned in the Roman canon in the prayer Communicantes because of the uncertainty as to the fact of their martyrdom. Ciampini (de Sac. Aedif.) does not mention any churches dedicated to St. Luke, but he cites various authors explaining why the vitulus of the Apocalypse was assigned as the symbol of this evangelist (Vet. Mon. i. 192). [EVANGELISTS IN ART, I. 633.] [C. H.]

Mag. Lib. Sac. 130). The "natalis" (no day being named) of Euphemia, Lucia, and Geminianus, occurs in the Antiphonarium, but their names are not in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Antiph. 710). Basil's Menology assigns Sept. 17 to Lucia, widow, and Geminianus jointly.

There is a special service for her day and vigil (day of the month not mentioned) in the Liber Responsalis (842). In the Liber Antiphonarius (654) the festival of "St. Lucia, virgin," occurs between the second and third Sundays in Advent, but the collect does not contain her name.

LUCINA. In the Diurnum Romanum, i. 7, c. 17, we find: "Sed dispensator qui pro tempore fuerit in eadem venerabili diaconia (i.e. quando lucina perficitur in eadem Diaconia pro remissione peccatorum nostrorum), omnes diaconites et pauperes Christi, qui ibidem conveniunt Kyrie eleison exclamare student." Ducange supposes lucina here either to be synonymous with LUCERNA, the lamp-lighting, or to be a mistake for Litania. But in another instance that he quotes, "quantum vix in undecim lucinis laborare poterant," where he supposes it to mean simply 'days,' it would be more natural to take it for some special occasion of busy labour. Whether a great baptism day, or a great almsgiving day, or what else might be meant by it, and whether the name be taken from the church of San Lorenzo in Lucina, or the church named from the office, must be matters of pure conjecture.

lib. vii. tit. 13; de Tironibus Leg. 22) releases certain persons in the proconsular province of Africa from payment of the tax known as aurum tironicum, a sum of money levied in lieu of the contingent of recruits to the legions which every province was liable to render. And these persons are denominated sacerdotes. The question arises, what class of persons are denoted by this term? There are two theories; the one that the persons intended were heathen priests, who were obliged by their office to exhibit ludos to the people at great expense; whence the reason for their exemption (Gothofred, Comment. in Cod. Theod. in loc.) The exhibition of ludi was no doubt a very expensive charge. But there appears to have been no kind of these games which the priests were bound to exhibit at their own expense (see Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq. s. r. Ludi), whilst those few in which they and not the aediles took the chief place, for the most part belong, as e.g. the Liberalia, to the class of feriae stativae, and entailed little trouble or expense in their celebration. Apart therefore from the difficulty of supposing a Christian emperor to be founding a special exemption for the benefit of the heathen priesthood, which the Christian clergy were not to share, the reasons adduced appear not to be conclusive. Tertullian (Apol. c. ix.) mentions incidentally the absolute prohibition by law of the sacrifices to Saturn throughout this very province of Africa, in the reign of Tiberius.

The other theory, maintained by Petit (Varior. Lect.), regards the Christian bishops as being the persons thus exempted. It is hardly probable that bishops should be classed with the heathen priests under the common title sacerdotes, a course which both parties would have resented as an insult. And it is not clear what in the case of bishops could have been the "majoribus expensis," which are alleged as the reason for this exemption. Yet this is perhaps to be preferred as the solution of an obscure question.

LUGO, COUNCIL OF (Lucense Concilium), held at Lugo, in Galicia, by order of king Theodimir, A.D. 569, to lay down the bounds of the different sees in his dominions, with a view of curtailing any that were too large, which was accordingly done; Lugo thus itself becoming a metropolitan see. We find from the sees enumerated that his dominions extended into Portugal. The last named is called that of the Britons, and had thirteen churches belonging to them, and one monastery, given to it. A second council is supposed, by Mansi and others, to have taken place A.D. 572; the only real foundation for it being, that Martin, bishop of Braga, transmitted the collection of canons approved at Braga that year in a letter to the metropolitan of Lugo, with this address: "Nitigesio episcopo, vel universo concilio Lucensis ecclesiae:" which need not imply that any council was then sitting, or about to sit. (Mansi, ix. 815, et seq., with the later divisions appended there, and 845.)

LUKE, ST., THE EVANGELIST (IN ART). [See EVANGELISTS, I. 633.] Martigny refers to Borgia (De Cruce Veliterna, p. 133) for an engraving of a brazen cross, probably of the 8th or 9th century, which bears on its extremities busts of the four evangelists in person, instead of the symbolic creatures. Here St. Luke, like the others, bears a closed book in one hand and points to it with the other. It has been supposed that the evangelists are also personally represented on sarcophagi, as in that of Probus and Proba (Bottari, tav. xvi.; and at pl. cxxxi. in particular). In this last example, three figures hold the volume or roll, and stand in all probability for St. Matthew, St. John, and St. Mark. But the roll or book is frequently placed in the hands of all or any of the apostles. However, in a sepulchral urn, No. 36, in the Museum of Art, the apostles are represented with books rolled up, and the remaining four with them unfolded: the names are written on the rolls; St. Luke's as LUCANVS. The non-apostolic evangelists are, however, seldom added to the number of the twelve.

M. Perret (in Catacombes de Rome, vol. ii. pl. lxvi.) publishes a greatly damaged fresco from an arcosolium in the cemetery of Saint "Zoticus," wherever that may be. However, the fresco represents four standing figures, each of whom has at his feet a "scrinium" full of rolls. The two letters MA are legible near one of them, which may be St. Matthew or St. Mark. St. Luke must be one of the others. He is also represented among the four evangelists in the mosaics of the baptisteries of Ravenna (Ciampini, 1. et Monumenta, tab. lxxii. A.D. 451). Four figures holding books cannot well be other than the writers of the Gospels, though Ciampini expresses some doubt as to the subject of the painting.

The earliest representation of St. Luke as a painter is in the Menologium of Basil II., A.D. 980. See D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xxxi., where the Virgin is sitting to him in a pleasant garden scene (perhaps on a house top), which reminds us of some of Fra Angelico's works. [R. St. J. T.]

LUXURY (Luxuria). The original signification of the word luxuria was that of an overflow or excess of fertility in crops or fields; thence it had the meaning of wantonness and of luxury generally: in mediaeval ecclesiastical Latin it expresses sins of uncleanness, "luxuriæ concubinatice, luxoriosos vel adulteros luxuriam explere cum consanguinea sua." (See Ducange, s. v.)

The church from the very first assumed an attitude of antagonism to luxury in every form. Simple and comely dress, plain food, an active, not an idle life, and a disregard of riches, were the outward marks of a Christian profession; and the circumstances of the early Christians were obviously such as to restrain any tendency to self-indulgence. So soon, however, as the church obtained any toleration in the empire and wealthy members joined her ranks, the case was altered. Even as early as the 2nd century Tertullian has frequent denunciations against intemperate "voluptates." He will not allow the public shows to be frequented by Christians. "The state of faith," he declares (de Spectac. c. 1), "the argument of truth and the rule of discipline bar the servants of God from the pleasures of the public shows." The outrageous immodesty of the theatre, no less than the contagion of idolatry in the whole apparatus of the shows, was held to render them inconsistent with the renouncements which were made at baptism. (For the words of renunciation, see BAPTISM, I. 160; RENUNCIATION.) What the church opposed was not festivity in itself, but the vice inseparable from the exhibition of the public plays. Cyprian, for example, writing to Donatus (c. 7), inveighs with severity against the shows; yet he dates his own treatise on the feast of the vintage (ad Donat. c. 1), which he implies that he was himself observing. An instance of the corruption which then prevailed in theatrical representations appears from the play which was called Maiuma, part of which consisted in the exhibition of naked women swimming in water. This disgraceful display was the subject of no less than eight imperial laws, and was not finally prohibited till the time of Arcadius (Cod. Theod. XV. vi. 2).

The tendency to luxury in the adornment of the person in the 2nd and 3rd centuries is apparent from the exhortations of Tertullian (de Cultu Femîn.) and Cyprian (de Habitu Virgin.), in the West, and of Clement in the East (Stromata, ii. 10). They could not tolerate that Christian women should exhibit the same immodesty in their apparel, and should deck themselves with the same meretricious arts as were common in the depraved society of the heathen world. Cyprian treats of what is becoming in dress and behaviour in a consecrated virgin, but his treatise also exhibits the fashions which beguiled women generally in that age. He warns them (de Habitu Virgin. c. 7) against exposing their face and figure in public from want of modest clothing; he asks (c. 9) if it is God's wish that their ears should be scarred and traversed with costly earrings, or that a circle of black should be drawn round the eye; he cautions them against tampering with what God has formed, whether with "yellow dye or black powder or rouge;" and as the sum of the matter he gives them his fatherly advice, "be what you were fashioned by your Father's hand, remain with your countenance simple, your shoulders let alone, your figure natural, wound not your ears, circle not arm or neck with precious chain, fetter not ankles with golden bonds, stain not your hair, and keep your eyes worthy of seeing God." All such lascivious arts he regards, in common with other Christian fathers, as having been taught mankind by the apostate angels (ibid. c. 9). Closely allied to immodest dressing is wantonness of manners. Cyprian (ibid. c. 10) rebukes those of his flock who make no scruple when they attend marriage parties of abandoning themselves to revelry, "they interchange unchaste speeches, hear what is unbecoming and say what is unlawful, and are exposed to view, and countenance with their presence shameful language and convivial excess." The wedding-feasts very frequently formed an excuse for riot; and the lascivious singing and promiscuous dancing practised on these occasions were brought under canonical censure. The clergy more than once were forbidden (Conc. Venet. c. 11; Conc. Agath. c. 39) to sanction such gatherings by their presence. With respect to bathing, that luxury was not altogether prohibited, but the public baths were to be used with a regard to that honour which the doctrine of the Incarnation teaches is due to the human body. As a proof of the need that the church should regulate the use of the baths, Cyprian found it necessary to exhort even the virgins to abstain from bathing in company with men (de Habitu Virgin. c. 11). For a fuller account of these various developments of luxury, see BATHING, DANCING, DRESS, HAIR.

Part of the subject of over-indulgence in the pleasures of the table is treated under the heading of DRUNKENNESS. It remains to notice the efforts of the church to check luxury in food. The sumptuous meals, the pains and expense lavished in obtaining rare delicacies, the unbridled indulgence of the appetite which prevailed among the wealthy classes of the Roman empire are matters of notoriety. It was a primary duty of a society, one of whose fundamental moral precepts was the restraint of fleshly appetites, to make a stand against such flagrant abuses. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39) contrasts the simplicity of the Christian agapae, in which the guests eat as much as hungry men desire, with the Apaturian and Bacchanal festivals, for which a levy of cooks is ordered; and asks his opponents which is most likely to propitiate heaven in time of calamity (ibid. c. 40), the heathen daily fed to the full and about forthwith to dine, or the Christian dried up with fasting and pinched with every sort of abstinence. The simplicity of the agapae did not long survive, and some allowance must be made for Tertullian's rhetorical language, and his own habits of rigid self-denial; but after these deductions sufficient remains to shew that Christian meals in the 2nd century were a standing protest against luxury and excess in matter of food. Clement of Alexandria inveighs (Paedagog. ii. 1) against the lavishness and gluttony of heathen meals, and exhorts Christian converts to be satisfied with plain fare; he urges that meat should be eaten without sauces and boiled rather than roast, but recommends in preference such food as olives, herbs, milk, cheese, fruit, and honey. Among more specific directions of a later date the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 15), requires the African bishops to maintain a frugal table. The plea that bishops should be free in entertaining magistrates and others in office that they might thus obtain readier access to them to intercede for criminals, is rejected by Jerome (Ep. ad Nepotian. cc. 3, 4). Judges, he says, will shew greater respect to frugal clergy than to luxurious ones. He adds, in the same epistle, that a clergyman who takes every opportunity of going to the entertainments to which he is invited soon sinks in estimation. By the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 4) widows who are brought to want from gluttony or idleness are not to receive relief from the church. The directions in the Rule of Benedict, which was practical rather than ascetic in its aim, give the diet which was considered sufficient for all the purposes of an industrious life in Italy at the beginning of the 6th century. Each monk was allowed 1 lb. of bread daily, but flesh only in case of illness. At dinner two dishes of cooked pulmentaria were to be placed on the table, and a third dish of fruit and salad when it could be got (Regula, cc. 39, 40). The composition of these "pulmenta" or "pulmentaria" was various. Grain and vegetables cooked in different ways were their ordinary ingredients. Eggs, fish, cheese, and even fowls, if the flesh was minced, were admitted into them. One definition states that they were made ex mediæ qualitatis materiâ; another, that they included any ordinary food except bread and meat. (See Ducange, s. v.) As we advance into the middle ages the ecclesiastical injunctions regarding food take the form of prohibitions of gluttony rather than of luxury. Gross feeding was one of the particular vices of the barbarian tribes which were being gradually incorporated into the church. The council of Autun, A.D. 670 (Labbe, Concilia, vi. 18-8), forbade any priest who had overeaten himself to touch the sacrifice. In the Penitential of Gildas, which probably contains the earlier canonical rules of the British church, it is enacted that if a monk is sick from too much food on a day when he has received the sacrifice, he shall go without his supper and keep seven additional fasts (c. 7); on any other day he shall keep one fast and be severely chided (c. 8). Similar injunctions are found in the early ecclesiastical documents of the Anglo-Saxon church. Theodore in his Penitential (I. i. 8) imposes a penance of three days on any one making himself ill by gluttony, with an additional penance (c. 9) if the offence is committed after receiving the sacred elements. In these rules he is followed by Archbishop Egbert, who moreover inflicts different sentences on different orders. Thus a 'clericus' overeating himself is to fast forty days (Poenitent. xi. 7), a monk or deacon sixty, a priest seventy, a bishop eighty (Bed. Poenitent. vi. 3, 4). Theodore (I. i. 4) made an exemption in favour of any one who had been fasting a long time, and then at Christmas or Easter, or any of the saints' days eat moderately, but did not make allowance for the weakness which succeeds a long fast, and causes sickness on eating.

The eating of unclean food frequently comes under notice in the Penitential Books of the 7th and 8th centuries. The existence of these decrees points to some remote influence of the Mosaic Law in the mediaeval church, and also indicates the lingering of barbarous habits among the converts to Christianity in the remote corners of Europe. The Canones Hibernenses (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der Abendländischen Kirche, p. 136) inflict (c. 13) four years on bread and water on any eating horseflesh; a severity which was probably called for by some local practices. For the same canons only impose (cc. 14, 15) forty days on those who eat flesh which dogs have torn or which has died from natural causes. By the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 6) it is no canonical offence if carrion is eaten from necessity. In the case (cc. 8, 9) of food which has been contaminated by a mouse or weasel having been drowned in it, if there is a small quantity it must be thrown away; but if there is much, it will be sufficient to sprinkle it with holy water. A goat or deer found dead in the forest (II. xi. 1), unless there is some appearance of its having been slain by the hand of man, must be thrown to the swine or dogs, on no account be eaten. Birds or beasts strangled in nets or slain by hawks (c. 2) must also be rejected, because the Capitula in the Acts of the Apostles prohibit the using of things strangled. Fish, however (c. 3), caught in a net may be eaten, because they belong to another order. The direction with regard to horse-flesh (c. 4) differs from the Irish canon. Theodore does not forbid it, but states it is not customary to eat it. Hares are allowable (c. 5), their flesh is said to be good for dysentery, more particularly the gall mixed with pepper. The Confessionaria of Pseudo-Egbert adds that it is a remedy for face-ache. Bees (c. 9) stinging a man to death must be killed, but their honey may be kept. It is not necessary to reject either swine or fowl (c. 7) which have fed on carrion or human blood; but any which have fed on human flesh must not be eaten (c. 8) till the meat has been soaked. Bede (Poenitential. vii.) lays down the same injunctions in the main about unclean food. In these he is followed by Egbert, with some curious varieties of penance. Any one (Egbert, Poenitential. xiii. 4) knowingly eating or drinking what has been polluted by a cat or dog shall chant 100 psalms, or fast three days; if the offence is committed unknowingly, the penalty is halved. So any secular (c. 5) deliberately drinking any liquor in which a mouse or a weasel has been drowned, shall do seven days' penance in a monastery and chant 300 psalms. The penalty of eating food half raw was three days' penance, or chanting the psaltery.

Luxuria in the middle ages was used in ecclesiastical language to signify lust, more particularly such indulgence of the passions as was not included under ADULTERY, FORNICATION, or INCEST. The lascivious desire which stopped short of overt act was not generally brought under canonical censure; the rule of discipline being that the church judges actions only, and of actions those alone which create scandal. Secret thoughts, intentions, and desires were left to spiritual remedies. So the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314 (c. 4), merely states that any man who desires to sleep with a woman and does not accomplish it, has fallen from grace. No mention is made of penance. Even the Penitentials which pursue offenders into the minutest details, either assign no penalty to a desire, or a very slight one. The British canonical book which bears the name of the Penitential of Vinniaus (Wasserschleben, p. 108) states that if a man has meditated uncleanness but checked himself, although the sin is the same, the penitence may be light. And Theodore (I. ii. 21, 22) only bids such a man seek pardon from God; but if he has proceeded to wanton words, then he must be a penitent for seven days. Kissing a woman per desiderium was punished with twenty days (I. viii. 2). Rape was severely visited, both by civil and ecclesiastical law. One of the laws of Constantine (Cod. Theod. IX. xxiv. 1) condemned to the flames not only any one who committed a rape on a virgin, but even carried her off with her own consent against the will of her parents. This severity was a little modified by Constantius (ibid. c. 2); the crime was still a capital one, but only slaves guilty of it were to be burned. Under Jovian the scope of the law was extended (Cod. Theod. IX. xxv. 2), not only was it a capital offence to ravish a consecrated virgin, but even to solicit her to marry against the rule of her profession, whether she was willing or not. The offence was also brought under canonical discipline. The Apostolical Canons (c. 66) expel from the church the man who offers violence to a virgin not espoused to him, and prohibits his marrying any one but her however poor she may be. Basil assigns (ad Amphiloc. c. 22) four years' penance to one carrying off a virgin espoused to another man, and directs (Ep. 244) that not only shall the man himself suffer, but all his accomplices shall be censured, even to his family and the inhabitants of his village. The proof of the widespread existence of unnatural crime during the decay of the empire is too strong to be questioned (Clement Alex. Pædagog. ii. 10; Cyprian, cont. Donat. c. 8). And no serious efforts were made by the heathen emperors to put an end to it (see the authorities quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XVI. ix. 11). In the Christian imperial code, however, it was treated with extreme severity. Constantine ordered (Cod. Theod. IX. vii. 3) that offenders should be executed; and Theodosius (ibid. c. 6) that they should be burned. The decrees of the church on the subject shew that even Christians were not altogether clean. Tertullian (de Pudicit. c. 4) states that offenders were kept not only from the porch of the church, but from contact with any part of the building, for such sins were not "delicta" but "monstra." The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 71), denies them communion even at death. By a canon of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (c. 16), those guilty before the age of twenty were to do penance as prostrators fifteen years, and then to be permitted to join in the prayers only for another five years before being admitted to full communion; if they are older than twenty, ten years are to be added to the penance; and if they exceed fifty years, then they are to be granted communion only at death. Basil (cc. 7, 62, 63) fixes their penance at either twenty or thirty years. The Penitentials which represent the ecclesiastical code of races which had not yet cast off the vices of barbarism, abound, as might be expected, with injunctions against unnatural lusts. In the British code the Penitential Book of Gildas (c. 1) lays down in curious detail the punishment of a presbyter or deacon who had so sinned. His penance was to extend over three years, every hour of which he was to beg pardon, and every week he was to add an extra act of penance (superpositionem) except on the fifty days after Easter: on the Lord's day he might eat bread without stint, and some dish fattened with butter, but on other days he was to take only a British formella of dried bread (paximatum) and vegetables and a few eggs. His allowance of drink was to be a Roman hemina of milk to recruit his strength, but if he had work to do, he was to be given a Roman sextarius of skimmed (tenuclae vel bolthutae) milk: his bed was to be made without much grass; and if at the end of a year and a half he shewed deep repentance he might receive the eucharist and sing the psalms again with the brothers. By the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 1) boys polluting themselves were to be flogged; and an offence against nature combined with any other crimen capitale was to be expiated only by seclusion in a monastery for life. For further particulars on a matter which does not admit of detail, but where the details are only too numerous, the reader is referred to these early Penitential Books (Theodor. I. ii. vii.; Bed. iii.; Egbert. iv. v.) [G. M.]

LYING. It does not appear that the mere uttering of a falsehood, apart from any injury it might inflict, was brought under ecclesiastical censure. Tertullian, writing after he had joined the Montanists, and not likely therefore to err on the side of laxity, contrasts (de Pudicit. c. 19) the deadly sins which were visited with excommunication with those lighter offences of daily incursion of which discipline took no cognizance; and among these latter he enumerates thoughtlessly speaking evil, rash swearing, the breaking of a promise, and the telling of a lie from shame or necessity. This list does not include perjury, which was treated as a grave canonical offence. [OATHS.] Whether and under what circumstances it was held pardonable by any of the fathers to tamper with the truth, is a matter difficult to decide absolutely. Passages may be adduced which support a strict adherence to veracity at all times and at all hazards: or the other hand there are passages which seem to countenance equivocation or economy. What is beyond question is that they did not attempt to build up a system of accurate casuistry. That is the production of a later age. A collection of quotations bearing on the subject will be found in Jeremy Taylor (Ductor Dubitantium, III. ii. 5). One of the tenets which Augustine charges (contra Mendac.) the Priscillianists with upholding is, that they were at liberty to forswear themselves in order to conceal their secret doctrines.

On false witness the imperial code, following the early Roman law, affixed a heavy penalty. The false accuser was to undergo the same punishment (Cod. Theod. IX. xxxix. 1, 2, 3; XVI. ii. 21) which his accusation, had it been substantiated, would have brought upon the accused. This law of retaliation was to hold good (ibid. IX. i. 9, 14) whether the false charge attacked another's reputation or property or life. The frequent mention of the same offence in the canonical law shews that the evil was widespread in the church. The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 74), sentences a false witness to five years' abstention from communion; the kindred but, in the circumstances of the early church, far graver offence of "delatio" was visited by a life-long exclusion (c. 73). [INFORMER.] The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 37), puts false witnesses in the same category with murderers, and excommunicates them in general terms till they repent (cf. Conc. Venet. c. 1; IV. Conc. Carthag. c. 55). The legislation with regard to libel occupies a chapter of the Theodosian Code (IX. xxiv. de famosis libellis). [LIBEL.] [G. M.]

LYONS, COUNCIL OF (Lugdunensis Concilii). Of the councils of Lyons, several have been misnamed and misnumbered.

1. Said to have been held A.D. 197, because this seems to have been the year in which St. Irenaeus addressed a letter, in the name of the brethren in France, over whom he ruled, to pope Victor, on the disputed question of keeping Easter, and because Eusebius speaks in general terms of synods and meetings of bishops having been held in connection with it (E. H. v. 23-4, comp. Mansi, i. 715 and 726).

2. A.D. 475, when a priest named Lucidus is said to have retracted his errors on predestination. But the only record of this is found in a work of Faustus, bishop of Riez, who was himself a semi-Pelagian.

3 and 4. A.D. 501 and 516, in which St. Avitus, of Vienne, is supposed to have taken part. But the first was a mere conference between the orthodox and the Arians (Mansi, viii. 241, comp. Pagi ad Baron. A.D. 501, n. 4), and to the second he refers himself but casually (Ep. xxviii. comp. Mansi, ib. 537).

5. A.D. 517, where Viventolus, bishop of Lyons, with ten others, passed and subscribed to six canons. In the first of these, the twentieth canon passed at Epaoe respecting incestuous marriages, was reaffirmed with special application to Stephen, an official of king Sigismund, whose possible displeasure may have dictated the second and third. St. Avitus is also thought to have taken part in this council, but he is not named among those who subscribed to it. The title given to it of the first council of Lyons is misleading; and several canons are cited by Burchard and others as of this council, for which there would seem to be no foundation (Mansi, viii. 567-74).

6. Held A.D. 567, by command of king Guntram, and called the second council of Lyons, in which two bishops, named Salonius and Sagittarius, were condemned; eight bishops and six representatives of absent bishops subscribed to its canons, six in number; the bishop of Vienne subscribing first, and of Lyons second. Canon 2 decrees that the wills of the departed should be religiously maintained and carried out, even when they ran, or seemed to run, counter to the civil law. Canon 4 decrees that persons suspended from communion are to be restored only by him who suspended them. Canon 6 is of a piece with the second and third of Gerona. (Mansi, ix. 785-90, comp. Conc. Gerund.)

7. Held A.D. 589, under king Guntram, and called the third council of Lyons. Here the bishop of Lyons subscribed first, and of Vienne second, of eight present bishops, and twelve who subscribed through their representatives. Once more the number of canons passed was six; in most cases for giving effect to former canons. By the sixth lepers are to be sufficiently fed and clothed by the bishop of the diocese to which they belong, and not allowed to be wanderers (Mansi, ix. 941-4). [E. S. Ff.]

LYRE. The lyre is borne by the mystic Orpheus (see Aringhi, vol. i. pp. 547, 563, both pictures from vaultings of the Callixtine catacomb, and FRESCO, I. 696), and is held to represent the attractive power of the Lord. Aringhi quotes St. John xi.: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to Me," and proceeds to reflect on the lyre of Orpheus, "qui dulcisonis et concinnatis ad plectrum vocibus feras pertrahebat." Eusebius makes ingenious use of the simile in his oration de Laudibus Constantini Imp., where he speaks of the Lord's saving all, "by the instrument of the human body with which He invested Himself; not otherwise than Orpheus the singer, who makes known his skill in art by his lyre, so that, as it is said in the Greek tales, he could tame all kinds of beasts with his singing; and by touching the strings of his instrument with the plectrum, could soften the wrath of merciless wild beasts."

Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedag. iii. 11, p. 246 D) includes the lyre among the symbols permitted to be used as signets. [GEMS, I. 712, 716.] For a curious illustration of the symbolic lyre of the passions or bodily nature, see CALF, I. 258. [R. St. J. T.]
